THE SIXTH BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Observations of Africa, taken out of Iohn Leo his nine Bookes, translated by Master * Pory, and the most remarkable things hither transcribed.

* In diuers places the translation is amended.

§. I.

Collections out of the first Booke of Iohn Leo, touching the People, Tribes, Languages, Seasons, Vertues, Vices, and other more generall considerations of Africa.

AFRICA is called in the Arabian Tongue Iphrichia, of the word Faraca, which signifieth in the said Language, to diuide: but why it should be so called, there are two opinions; the first is this: namely, because this part of the World is diuided from Europa by the Mediterran Sea, and from Asia * by the Riuer of Nilus. Others are of opinion, that this name of Africa was deriued from one Ifricus the King of Arabia Fœlix, who is said to haue bene the first that euer inhabited these parts. This Ifricus waging war against the King of Assyria, & being at length by him driuen out of his Kingdome, passed with his whole Armie ouer Nilus, and so conducting his troupes westward, made no delay till he was come vnto the Region lying

John Leo, lib. r.
* Others diuide it from Asia by the Red Sea.
As there was Asia proprie dicta, so likewise Africa was the name of the whole and of a speciall part; and that both amongst the Ancients, so (but in larger latent) with the African Authors and John Leo.

about Carthage. Hence it is that the Arabians doe imagine the Countrey about Carthage onely, and the Regions lying Westward thereof, to comprehend all Africa.

Africa (if we may giue credit vnto the Writers of that Nation; being men of Learning, and most skilfull Cosmographers) beginneth Southward at certaine Riuers issuing forth of a Lake in the Desart of Gaoga. East-ward it bordereth vpon the Riuer Nilus. It extendeth Northward to that part of Egypt, where Nilus at seuen mouthes dischargeth his streames into the Mediterran Sea: from whence it stretcheth Westward as farre as the Straights of Gibraltar, and is bounded on that part with the vtmost Sea-towne of all Libya, called * Nun. Likewise the South part thereof abutteth vpon the Ocean Sea, which compasseth Africa almost as farre as the Desarts of Gaoga.

The diuision
of Africa.
We usually call all Africa which lyeth betweene the Red, Indian, Atlantike, and Mediterran Seas; ioyned with a necke of Land to Arabia.

Our Authours affirme, that Africa is diuided into foure parts, that is to say, Barbaria, Numidia, Libya, and the Land of Negros. Barbaria taketh beginning from the Hill called Meies, which is the extreme part of all the Mountaines of Atlas, being distant from Alexandria almost three hundred miles. It is bounded on the North-side with the Mediterran Sea, stretching thence to Mount-Meies afore said, and from Mount-Meies extending it selfe to the Streights of Gibraltar. West-ward it is limited with the said Streights, from whence winding it selfe out of the Mediterran Sea into the mayn Ocean, it is inclosed with the most Westerly point of Atlas: namely, at that Westerne Cape which is next vnto the Towne called Messa. And Southward it is bounded with that side of Atlas which lyeth towards the Mediterran Sea. This is the most noble and worthy Region of all Africa, the Inhabitants whereof are of a browne or tawny colour, being a ciuill people, and prescribe whollome Lawes and Constitutions vnto themselves.

* Nun.

The second part of Africa is called of the Latines Numidia, but of the Arabians Biledulgerid: this Region bringeth forth Dates in great abundance. It beginneth East-ward at the Citie of Eloacat, which is an hundred miles distant from Egypt, and extendeth West as far as the Towne of * Nun, standing vpon the Ocean Sea. North-ward it is inclosed with the South-side of Atlas. And the South part thereof bordereth vpon the sandy Desarts of Libya. All the Arabians doe usually call it the Land of Dates: because this onely Region of Africa beareth Dates.

The third part called of the Latines Libya, and of the Arabians Sarra, (which word signifieth a Desart) beginneth Eastward at that part of Nilus which is next vnto the Citie of Eloacat, and from thence runneth West-ward as farre as the Ocean Sea. North-ward it is bounded with Numidia, South-ward it abutteth vpon the Land of Negros, East-ward it taketh beginning at the Kingdome of Gaoga, and stretcheth West-ward euen to the Land of Gualata, which bordereth vpon the Ocean Sea.

The Riuer of

The fourth part of Africa which is called the Land of Negros, beginneth East-ward at the Kingdome of Gaoga, from whence it extendeth West as farre as Gualata. The North part thereof is inclosed with the Desart of Libya, and the South part, which is vnknowne vnto vs, with the Ocean Sea: howbeit the Merchants which daily come from thence to the Kingdome of Tombuto, haue sufficiently described the situation of that Countrey vnto vs. This Land of Negros hath a mightie Riuer, which taking his name of the Region, is called Niger: this Riuer taketh his originall from the East out of a certaine Desart called by the fore-said Negros, Sem. Others will haue this Riuer to spring out of a certaine Lake, and so to runne Westward till it exonerateth it selfe into the Ocean Sea. Our Cosmographers affirme, that the said Riuer of Niger is deriued out of Nilus, which they imagine for some certaine space to bee swallowed vp of the Earth, and yet at last to burst forth into such a Lake as is before mentioned. Some others are of opinion, that this Riuer beginneth West-ward to spring out of a certaine Mountaine, and so running East, to make at length a huge Lake: which verily is not like to be true; for they usually faile West-ward from Tombuto to the Kingdome of Ginea, yea, and to the Land of Melli also; both which in respect of Tombuto are situate to the West: neither hath the said Land of Negros any Kingdomes comparable, for beautifull and pleasant soyle, vnto those which adioyne vnto the bankes of Niger. And here it is to be noted, that (according to the opinion of our Cosmographers) * that Land of Negros by which Nilus is said to runne (namely, that part of the World which stretcheth East-ward euen to the Indian Sea, some Northerly parcell whereof abutteth vpon the Red Sea, to wit, the Countrey which lyeth without the Gulfe of Arabia) is not to bee called any member or portion of Africa; and that for many reasons, which are to bee found in the proesse of this Historie set downe more at large: The said Countrey is called by the Latines Ethiopia. From thence come certaine religious Friars seared or branded on the face with an hot Iron, who are to be seene almost quer all Europe, and specially at Rome. These people haue an Emperour, which they call Prete Gianni, the greater part of that Land being inhabited with Christians. Howbeit, there is also a certaine Mahumetane among them, which is said to possesse a great Dominion.

* Ethiopia.

A diuision of the foure forenamed parts
of Africa.

Barbarie is distinguished into foure Kingdomes: the first whereof is the Kingdome of Marocco; which is likewise diuided into seuen Regions or Prouinces; namely, Hea, Sus, Guzula, the territorre of Maroco, Ducoala, Hazcora, and Tedles. The second Kingdome of Barbarie called Fez, comprehendeth in like sort seuen Regions within the bounds thereof; to wit, Temesne, the Territory of Fez, Argara, * Elabat, Errif, Garet, and * Elcauz. The third Kingdome is called * Telenfin, and hath three Regions vnder it, namely, the Mountaines, Tenez, and Algezzer. The fourth Kingdom of Barbarie is named Tunis; vnder which are comprized foure Regions, that is to say, Bugia, Constantina, Tripolis in Barbarie, and Ezzaba, which is a good part of Numidia. Bugia hath alwayes beene turmoyled with continuall warres; because sometimes it was subiect vnto the King of Tunis, and sometimes againe vnto the King of Tremizen. Certaine it is that euen vntill these our dayes, this Bugia was a Kingdome of it selfe, and so continued, till the principall Citie of that Region was at the commandement of Ferdinando the King of Castile, taken by one Peter of Nauarre.

* Habat.

* Chaux.

* Tremizen.

This

This is the basest part of all Africa; neither will our Cosmographers vouchsafe it the name of a Kingdome, by reason that the Inhabitants thereof are so farre distant a sunder; which you may easily coniecture by that which followeth. Tesset a City of Numidia, containeth about foure hundred families, and is in regard of the Libyan Desart, seuered from all places of habitation almost three hundred miles; wherefore this second part is thought by diuers not to bee worthy the name of a Kingdome. Howbeit we will make some relation of the habitable parts of Numidia; some whereof may not vnfitly bee compared with other Regions of Africa; as for example, that of Segelmess, which territorie of Numidia lyeth ouer against Barbarie; likewise Zeb, which is situate against Bugia, and the signorie of Biledulgerid, which extendeth vn-
 10 to the Kingdome of Tunis. Reseruing therefore many particulars for the second part of this Historie, we will make our entrie and beginning at those places, which lie vpon the West of Numidia: the names whereof be these; Tesset, Gnaden, Isren, Hacca, Dare, Tabelbelt, Todga, Fercalc, Segelmess, Benigumi, Figbig, Tegua, Tsabit, Tegorarin, Mesab, Tegort and Guarghela. The Region of Zeb containeth five townes, to wit, Pescara, Elborh, Nesta, Taolac and Densin: so many Cities likewise hath the territories of Biledulgerid; namely, Teozar, Caphesa, Nesreoa, Elchamid and Chalbis: and from hence Eastward are found the Isles of Gerbe, Gaxion, Mesellata, Mestrata, Tecirraga, Gademis, Fizza, Angela, Birdeoa and Eloacat. These are the names of the most famous places of all Numidia, being bounded (as is said before) Westward vpon the Ocean Sea, and Eastward with the Riuer of Nilus.

The diuision of Numidia.Tesset.

In the map of Africa, the West of Numidia is marked with the names of the cities mentioned in the text.

These Desarts haue not as yet any certaine name amongst vs, albeit they be diuided into five 20 parts, and receiue all their denomination from the inhabitants which dwell vpon them, that is to say, from the Numidians, who are in like sort themselues diuided into five parts also, to wit, the People or Tribes called Zanaga, Ganziga, Terga, Lenta and Berdeoa. There bee likewise certaine places, which take some proper and particular name from the goodnesse and badnesse of the soile; as namely, the Desart of Azaohad, so called for the drought and vnfruitfulnesse of that place: likewise Hair, albeit a Desart, yet so called for the goodnesse and temperature of the ayre.

A description of the Libyan Desarts, which lie betweene Numidia and the Land of Negros.

Moreouer, the land of Negros is diuided into many Kingdomes: whereof albeit a great part be vnknowne vnto vs, and remooued farre out of our trade; wee will notwithstanding make relation of those places, where wee our selues haue abroad, and which by long experience are growne very familiar vnto vs: as likewise of some other places, from whence Merchants vsed
 30 to trauell vnto the same Cities wherein my selfe was then resident; from whom I learned right well the state of their Countries. I * my selfe saw fifteene Kingdomes of the Negros: howbeit there are many more, which although I saw not with mine owne eyes, yet are they by the Negros sufficiently knowne and frequented. Their names therefore (beginning from the West, and so proceeding Eastward and Southward) are these following: Gualata, Ghinea, Melli, Tombuto, Gago, Guber, Agadez, Cano, Casena, Zegzeg, Zanfara, Guangara, Burno, Gaoga, Nube. These fifteene Kingdomes are for the most part situate vpon the Riuer Niger, through the which Merchants vsually trauell from Gualata to the City of * Alcair in Egypt. The iourney indeede is very long, but yet secure and voyd of danger. All the said Kingdomes adioyne one vpon another; ten whereof are separated either by the Riuer Niger, or by some sandie desart:
 40 and in times past each one of the fifteene had a seuerall King, but now * at this present, they are all in a manner subiect vnto three Kings onely: namely, to the King of Tombuto, who is Lord of the greatest part; to the King of Borno, who gouerneth the least part, and the residue is in subiection vnto the King of Gaoga: howbeit, he that possesseth the Kingdome of Ducala hath a very small traine attending vpon him. Likewise these Kingdomes haue many other Kingdomes bordering vpon the South frontiers of them: to wit, Bito, Temiam, Damma, Medra, and Gorhan; the Gouvernors and Inhabitants whereof, are most rich and industrious people, great louers of Iustice and equitie, albeit some leade a brutish kind of life.

A diuision of the land of Negros into seuerall Kingdomes.* John Leo trauelled ouer fifteene Kingdomes of the land of Negros.* Cairo.

* About the yeere 1526.

Our Cosmographers and Historiographers affirme, that in times past Africa was altogether disinhabited, except that part which is now called the Land of Negros: and most certaine it is,
 50 that Barbarie and Numidia were for many ages destitute of Inhabitants. The tawnie people of the said Region were called by the name of Barbar, being deriued of the Verbe Barbara, which in their tongue signifieth to murmur: because the African tongue soundeth in the eares of the Arabians, no otherwise then the voyce of Beasts, which vtter their sounds without any accents. Others will haue Barbar to be one word twice repeated, forso much as Bar in the Arabian tongue signifieth a Desart. For (say they) when King Iphricus being by the Assyrians or Ethiopians driuen out of his owne Kingdome, trauelled towards Egypt, and seeing himselfe so oppressed with his enemies, that he knew not what should become of him and his followers, 60 he asked his people how or which way it was possible to escape, who answered him Bar-Bar, that is, to the Desart, to the Desart: giuing him to vnderstand by this speech, that he could haue no safer refuge, then to crosse ouer Nilus, and to flee vnto the Desart of Africa. And this reason seemeth to agree with them, which affirme the Africans to bee descended from the people of Arabia felix.

Of the habitations of Africa, and of the signification of this word Barbar.

The tawny Moores are diuided into five seuerall People or Tribes: to wit, the Tribes called Zanhagi, Musmudi, Zeneti, Hacari and Gumeri. The Tribe of Musmudi inhabit the Westernne part of Mount Atlas, from the Prouince of Hea, to the Riuer of * Sernan. Likewise they dwell vpon the South part of the said Mountaine, and vpon all the inward plaines of that Region. These Musmude haue foure Prouinces vnder them: namely, Hea, Sus, Guzula, and the Territorie of Morocco. The Tribe of Gumeri possesse certaine Mountaines of Barbarie, dwelling on the sides of those Mountaines which lie ouer against the Mediterranean Sea: as likewise they are Lords of all the Riuer called in their language Rif. This Riuer hath his Fountaine neere vnto the streights of Gibraltar, and thence runneth Eastwards to the Kingdome of Tremizen, called by the Latines Cesaria. These two tribes or people haue seuerall habitations by themselves: the other three are dispersed confusely ouer all Africa: howbeit, they are like strangers, discerned one from another by certaine properties or tokens, maintaining continuall warre among themselves, especially they of Numidia. Out of all which it is euident, that in times past all the foresaid people had their habitations and tents in the plaine fields: euery one of which fauoured their owne faction, and exercised all labours necessary for mans life, as common among them. The Gouvernours of the Countrey attended their droues and flocks; and the Citizens applyed themselves vnto some manuell Art, or to husbandry. The said people are diuided into five hundred seuerall families, as appeareth by the Genealogies of the Africans, Author whereof is one Ibnu Rachu, whom I haue oftentimes read and perused. Some writers are of opinion, that the King of Tombuto, the King of Melli, and the King of Agadez fetch their originall from the people of Zanaga, to wit, from them which inhabite the Desert.

The foresaid five families or people, being diuided into hundreds of progenies, and hauing innumerable habitations, doe notwithstanding vse all one kind of language, called by them Aquel Amarig, that is, the noble tongue: the Arabians which inhabit Africa, call it a barbarous tongue; and this is the true and naturall language of the Africans. Howbeit it is altogether different from other languages, although it hath diuers words common with the Arabian tongue. Yea, all the Gumeri in a manner and most of the Hacari speake Arabian, though corruptly; which (I suppose) came first hereupon to passe, for that the said people haue had long acquaintance and conuersation with the Arabians. The Negros haue diuers languages among themselves, among which they call one Sungai, and the same is current in many Regions; as namely, in Gualata, Tombuto, Ghinea, Melli and Gago. Another language there is among the Negros, which they call Guber; and this is rise among the people of Guber, of Cano, of Casena, of Perzegreg, and of Guangra. Likewise the Kingdome of Borno hath a peculiar kind of speech, altogether like vnto that, which is vsed in Gaoga. And the Kingdome of Nube hath a language of great affinitie with the Caldean, Arabian and Egyptian tongues. But all the Sea-townes of Africa, from the Mediterranean Sea to the Mountaines of Atlas, speake broken Arabian. Except the Kingdome and Towne of Maroco, and the in-land Numidians bordering vpon Maroco, Fez and Tremizen; all which, vse the Barbarian tongue. Howbeit, they which dwell ouer against Tunis and Tripoli, speake indeede the Arabian language; albeit most corruptly.

Of that Army which was sent by Califa * Otmen the third, in the foure hundred yeere of the Hegira, there came into Africa fourescore thousand Gentlemen and others, who hauing subdued sundry Prouinces, at length arriued in Africa: and there the Generall of the whole Army called * Hucha Hibnu Nafich remained. This man built that great City which is called of vs * Alcair. For he stood in feare of the people of Tunis, lest they should betray him, misdoubting also that they would procure aide out of Sicily, and so giue him the incounter. Wherefore with all his treasure which he had got, he trauelled to the Desert and firme ground, distant from Carthage about one hundred and twenty miles, and there is he said to haue built the City of * Alcair. The remnant of his Souldiers he commanded to keepe those places, which were most secure and fit for their defence, and willed them to build where no rocke not fortification was. Which being done, the Arabians began to inhabit Africa, and to disperse themselves among the Africans, who, because they had beene for certaine yeeres subiect vnto the Romans or Italians, vsed to speake their language: and hence it is, that the naturall and mother-tongue of the Arabians, which hath great affinitie with the African tongue, grew by little and little to be corrupted: and so they report that these two Nations at length conioyned themselves in one. Howbeit the Arabians vsually doe blaze their Pedigree in daily and triuiall Songs, which custome as yet is common both to * vs, and to the people of Barbarie also. For no man there is, be he neuer so base, which will not to his owne name, adde the name of his Nation; as for example, Arabian, Barbarian, or such like.

The Mahumetan Priests alwayes forbad the Arabians to passe ouer Nilus with their Armies and Tents. Howbeit in the foure hundred yeere of the Hegira we reade, that they were permitted so to doe by a certaine factious and schismaticall * Califa: because one of his Nobles had rebelled against him, vsurping the City of Cairaoan, and the greatest part of Barbarie. After the death of which Rebell, that Kingdome remained for some yeeres vnto his posteritie and family; whose iurisdiction (as the African Chronicles report) grew so large and strong in the time time of Elcain (the Mahumetan Califa and Patriarch of Arabia) that hee sent vnto them one Gehoar, whom of a slave he had made his Counsellor, with an huge Armie. This Gehoar conducting me his Armie Westward, recovered all Numidia and Barbarie. Insomuch that hee pierced vnto the Region of Sus, and there claymed most ample Tribute: all which being done, he returned backe vnto his Califa, and most faithfully surrendred vnto him whatsoever hee had gained from the Enemy. The Califa seeing his prosperous successe, beganne to aspire vnto greater Exploits. And Gehoar most firmly promised, that as hee had recovered the Westerne Dominion vnto his Lord, so would he likewise by force of Warre most certainly restore vnto him the Countries of the East, to wit, Egypt, Syria, and all Arabia; and protested moreouer that with the greatest hazard of his life, he would bee auenged of all the iniuries offered by the Family of Labbus vnto his Lords Predecessors, and would reuest him in the Royall Seate of his most famous Grand-fathers, great-grand-fathers, and Progenitors. The Califa liking well his audacious promise, caused an Armie of fourescore thousand Souldiers, with an infinite summe of money and other things necessary for the Warres, to bee deliuered vnto him. And so this valiant and stout Chieftaine being prouided for warfare, conducted his Troupes through the Desarts of Egypt and Barbarie; and hauing first put to flight the Vice-Califa of Egypt (who fled vnto Eluir, the Califa of Bagdet) in short time he subdued very easily all the Prouinces of Egypt and Syria. Howbeit he could not as yet hold himselfe secure; fearing least the Califa of Bagdet would assaile him with an Army out of Asia, and least the Garrisons which he had left to keepe Barbarie, should be constrained to forsake those conquered Prouinces. Wherefore hee built a Citie, and caused it to be walled round about. In which Citie hee left one of his most trustie Captaines, with a great part of the Army: and this Citie hee called by the name of Alchair, which afterward by others was named Cairo. This Alchair is said daily so to haue increased, that no Citie of the World for buildings and Inhabitants was any way comparable thereunto.

Moreouer, Califa Elcain arriuing at Alchair, and beeing most honourably entertayned by his Seruant Gehoar, (who had written for him to come) began to thinke vpon great affaires, and hauing gathered an huge Armie, resolved to wage battell against the Califa of Bagdet. In the meane season he that was appointed Vice-Roy of Barbarie, compacting with the Califa of Bagdet, yeelded himselfe and all Barbarie into his hands. Which the Califa most kindly accepted, and ordayned him King ouer all Africa. But Califa Elcain hearing this newes at Alchair was wonderfully afflicted in minde. Howbeit there was one of his secret Counsellors a very learned and wittie man, who seeing his Lord so sad and pensieue; I assure you, said he, if you please to take mine aduise, that I will forth-with procure you such an Armie, as shall giue you great store of money, and yet notwithstanding shall doe you good seruice also. The Califa beeing some-what emboldened at these speeches, asked his Counsellour how this might possibly bee brought to effect: My Lord (sayth his Counsellor) certaine it is, that the Arabians are now growne so populous, and to so great a number, that all Arabia cannot contayne them, scarcely will the yeerely increase of the ground suffice to feed their Droues, and you see with what great famine they are afflicted, and how they are destitute not onely of habitations, but euen of victuals and sustenance. Wherefore if you had heretofore giuen them leaue, they would long ere this haue inuaded Africa. And if you will now licence them so to do, doubt you not, but that you shall receiue of them an huge Masse of Gold. This counsell could not altogether satisfie the Califa his minde: for he knew right well that the Arabians would so waste all Africa, as it should neither be profitable for himselfe, nor for his Enemies. Notwithstanding, seeing that his Kingdome was altogether endangered, he thought it better to accept those summes of money which his Counsellour promised, and so to be reuenged of his Enemy, then to lose both his Kingdome and Gold all at once. Wherefore he permitted all Arabians, which would pay him Duckats apiece, freely to enter Africa; conditionally that they would shew themselves most deadly Enemies vnto the treacherous King of Barbarie. Which libertie being granted vnto them, it is reported that ten Tribes or Families of Arabians, being halfe the people of Arabia Deserta, came immediately into Africa; vnto whom certaine Inhabitants of Arabia Felix ioyned themselves, insomuch that there were found amongst them about fiftie thousand persons able to beare Armes: their women, children, and cattell were almost innumerable: the Storie whereof Ibnu Rachu, the most diligent Chronicler of African Affaires (whom wee haue before mentioned) setteth downe at large.

These Arabians hauing trauesed the Desart betweene Egypt and Barbarie, first laid siege vnto Tripolis a Citie of Barbarie, which being overcome, they slue a great part of the Citizens, the residue escaping by flight. Next of all they encountred the Towne of Capes, which was by them taken and vanquished. At length they besieged Cairoan also; howbeit the Citizens being sufficiently prouided of victuals, are said to haue indured the siege for eight monethes: which being expired, they were constrained to yeeld: at what time there was nothing in Cairoan but wofull slaughters, hideous out-cryes, and present death. This Land the Arabians diuided among themselves, and began to people and inhabit the same; requiring in the meane space large Tributes of the Townes and Prouinces subiect vnto them. And so they possessed all Afri- petually remaine in the Desarts. They are able to leuie fourescore thousand souldiers, the greatest part being footmen. Likewise the Tribe of Sabid doe inhabite the Desart of Libya: and these haue had alwaies great league and familiaritie with the King of Guargala. They haue such abundance of cattell, that they doe plentifully supply all the Cities of that region with flesh, and that especially in Summer-time, for all the Winter they stir not out of the Desarts. Their number is increased to about a hundred and fiftie thousand, hauing not many Horsmen among them. The Tribe of Delleg possesse diuers habitations; howbeit, Casaria containeth the greatest part of them. Some also inhabit vpon the frontiers of the Kingdom of Bugia, who are said to receiue a yearely stipend from their next neighbours. But the least part of them dwell vpon the field-10 countrey of Acdes, vpon the borders of Mauritania, and vpon some part of mount Atlas, being subiect vnto the King of Fez. The people of Elmuntefig are seated in the Prouince of Azgar, and are called by the later writers Elcaluth. These also pay certaine yearely tribute vnto the King of Fez, being able to furnish about eight thousand Horsmen to the warres. The Kindred of Sobair doe inhabit not farre from the Kingdome of Gezeir, being many of them vnder the pay of the King of Tremizen, and are said to enioy a great part of Numidia. They haue more or lesse, three thousand most warlike Horsmen. They possesse likewise great abundance of Camels; for which cause they abide all Winter in the Desarts. The remnant of them occupieth the Plaine which lieth betweene Sala and Mecnes. These haue huge droues of Cattell, and exercise themselves in Husbandrie, being constrained to pay some yearely tribute vnto the King of Fez. They haue Horsmen, who, as a man may say, are naturally framed to the warres, about foure thousand 20 in number.

Hillel, which are also called Benhamir, dwell vpon the frontiers of the Kingdome of Tremizen and Oran. These range vp and downe the Desart of Tegorarin, being in pay vnder the King of Tremizen, and of great riches and power; insomuch that they haue at all times in a readinesse for the warres sixe thousand Horsmen. The Tribe of Hurua possesse onely the borders of Mustaganim. These are sauage people, giuing themselves wholly to spoyles and robberies, and alienating their minds from the warres. They neuer come forth of the Desarts; for the people of Barbarie will neither allow them any places of habitation, nor yet any stipend at all: Horsmen they haue to the number of two thousand. The Kindred of Hucbar are next neighbours vnto the region of Melian, who receiue certaine pay from the King of Tunis. They are rude and wild people, and in very deed estranged from all humanitie: they haue (as it is reported) about fiftene 30 hundred Horsmen. The Tribe of Habru inhabit the region lying betweene Oran and Mustaganim: these exercise Husbandrie, paying yearely tribute vnto the King of Tremizen, and being scarce able to make one hundred Horsmen.

The people called Massim, possesse those Desarts of Masla, which extend vnto the Kingdome of Bugia. These likewise are giuen onely to theft and robbetrie; they take tribute both of their owne people, and of other regions adioyning vnto them. The Tribe of Rieeb inhabit those desarts of Libya, which border vpon Constantina. These haue most ample Dominions in Numidia, being now diuided into sixe parts. This right famous and warlike Nation receiue stipend from the King of Tunis, hauing five thousand Horsmen at command. The people of Snaid enioy that Desart, which is extended vnto the Signiorie of Tenez. These haue very large possessions, receiuing stipend from the King of Tremizen, being men of notable dexteritie, as well in the warres, as in all other conuersation of life. The Kindred of Azgeg dwell not altogether in one place: for part of them inhabit the region of Garet, among the people called Hemram; and the residue possesse that part of Duccala, which lieth neere vnto Azaphi. The Tribe of Elcherit dwell vpon that portion of Helin which is situate in the Plaine of Sahidim, hauing the people of Heah tributarie vnto them, and being a very vnciuill and barbarous people. The people called Enedri are seated in the Plaine of Heah: but the whole region of Heah maintaineth almost foure thousand Horsmen, which notwithstanding are vnfit for the warres. The people of Garfa haue sundry Mansions: neither haue they any King or Gouvernour. They are dispersed among other Generations, and especially among the Kindreds of Manebbi and Hemram. These conuay Dates from Segelmessa to the Kingdome of Fez, and carry backe againe from thence such things as are necessarie for Segelmess.

The people called Ruche, who are thought to be descended from Mastar, doe possesse that desart, which lieth next vnto Dedes and Farcala. They haue very small dominions, for which cause they are accounted no whit rich; howbeit, they are most valiant souldiers, and exceeding swift of foote; insomuch that they esteeme it a great disgrace, if one of their footemen be vanquished by two horsmen. And you shall find scarce any one man among them, which will not outgoe a very swift horse, be the iourney neuer so long. They haue about five hundred Horsmen, but most warlike Footemen, to the number of eight thousand. Selim inhabite vpon the Riuer of Dara, from whence they range vp and downe the Desarts. They are endowed with great riches, carrying euery yeare merchandize vnto the Kingdome of Tombuto, and are thought to be in high fauour with the King himselfe. A large iurisdiction they haue in Darha, and great plentie of Camels: and for all opportunities of warre they haue euer in a readinesse three thousand Horsmen.

- Elbasis. The Tribe of Elbasis dwelleth vpon the sea-coast, neere vnto Messa. They doe arme about fūe hundred Horsēmen, and are a Nation altogether rude, and vnacquainted in the warres. Some part of them inhabiteth Azgar. Those which dwell about Messa, are free from the yoke of superiority; but the others which remaine in Azgar, are subiect to the King of Fez. The Kindred of Chinan are dispersed among them, which before were called Elcaluth, and these also are subiect vnto the King of Fez. Very warlike people they are, and are able to set forth two thousand Horsēmen. The people of Deuibessen are diuided into the Kindreds of Duleim, Burbun, Vode, Deuimansor, and Deuibubaidulla. Duleim are conuersant in the Desarts of Libya with the African people, called Zanhaga. They haue neither dominion, nor yet any stipend; wherefore they are very poore, and giuen to robbrie: they trauell vnto Dara, and exchange Cattell for Dates with the inhabitants there. All brauerie and comelinesse of apparrell they vtterly neglect; and their number of fighting men is ten thousand, foure thousand being Horsēmen, and the residue Footemen. The people called Burbun, possesse that part of the Libyan Desart which adioyneth vnto Sus: They are a huge multitude, neither haue they any riches besides Camels. Vnto them is subiect the Citie of Tesset; which scarce sufficeth them for the maintenance of their Horsēs, being but a few. The people of Vode enioyeth that Desart, which is situate betweene Guaden and Gualata. They beare rule ouer the Guadenites, and of the Duke of Gualata they receiue yearely tribute, and their number is growne almost infinite: for by report, they are of abilitie to bring into the field almost threescore thousand most skilfull souldiers; notwithstanding, they haue great want of Horsēs. The Tribe of Racmen occupie that Desart which is next vnto Hacha: they haue verie large possessions, and doe in the Spring-time vsually trauell vnto Tesset; for then alwaies they haue somewhat to do with the inhabitants there. Their people fit for Armes are to the number of twelue thousand, albeit they haue very few Horsēmen. The Nation of Hamrum inhabit the Desarts of Taganost, exacting some tribute of the inhabitants there, and with daily incursions likewise molesting the people of Nun. Their number of souldiers is almost eight thousand.
- The Generation of Dehemrum, which are said to deriue their pedigree from Deuimansor, inhabit the Desart ouer against Segelmess, who continually wander by the Libyan Desarts as farre as Ighid. They haue tributarie vnto them the people of Segelmess, of Todgatan, of Tebelbeli, and of Dara. Their soile yeeldeth such abundance of Dates, that the yearely increase thereof is sufficient to maintaine them, although they had nothing else to liue on. They are of great fame in other Nations, being able to furnish for the warres about three thousand Horsēmen. There dwell likewise among these certaine other Arabians of more base condition, called in their language Garfa Esgeb; which notwithstanding haue great abundance of Horsēs, and of all other Cattell. The people of Menebbe doe almost inhabite the very same Desart, hauing two Prouinces of Numidia vnder them; to wit, Margara, and Retebbe. These also are a most valiant Nation, being in pay vnder the Prouince of Segelmess, and being able to make about two thousand Horsēmen. The Kindred of Husein, which are thought to be descended of Deuimansor, are seated vpon the Mountaines of Atlas. They haue in the said Mountaines a large iurisdiction, namely, diuers Castles euery where, and many most rich and flourishing Cities; all which, they thinke, were giuen them in old time by the Vice-royes of the Marini: for as soone as they had wonne that Kingdome, the Kindred of Husein afforded them great aide and seruice. Their dominion is now subiect vnto the Kings of Fez and of Segelmess. They haue a Captaine, which for the most part resideth at the Citie, commonly called Garfeluin. Likewise they are alwaies in a manner, trauersing of that Desart, which in their language is called Eddara. They are taken to be a most rich and honest people, being of abilitie to furnish for the warres about fixe thousand Horsēmen. Among these, you shall oftentimes find many Arabians of another sort, whom they vse onely to be their seruants. The Tribe of Abulhusein doe inhabit part of the foresaid Desart of Eddara, howbeit a very small part; the greatest number of whom are brought vnto such extreme misery, that they haue not in those their wild tents sufficient sustenance to liue vpon.
- One Generation of the people of Deuibubaidulla are those which are named Gharrag: these enioy the Desarts of Benigomi and Fighig, hauing very large possessions in Numidia. They are stipendaries vnto the King of Tremizen, who diligently endeouureth to bring them to peace and tranquillitie of life; for they are wholly giuen to theft and robbrie. In Summer-time they vsually repaire vnto Tremizen, where they are thought for that season of the yeare to settle their abode: their Horsēmen are to the number of foure thousand, all which are most noble warriors. The Kindred of Hodeg possesse a certaine Desart neere vnto Tremizen, called in their owne language Hangad. These haue no stipend from any Prince, nor yet any iurisdiction at all, rapine and stealth is onely delightfull vnto them; they provide onely for their family and themselves, and are able to set forth about fūe hundred Horsēmen. The Tribe of Theleb inhabite the Plaine of Algezzer; these haue often vagaries ouer the Desarts vnto the Prouince of Tedgear. Vnto them were subiect in times past, the most famous Cities of Algezzer and Tedelles: howbeit in these our dayes they were recovered againe from them by Barbarossa the Turke; which losse could not but greatly grieue and molest their King. It is reported moreouer, that at the same time, the principall of the said people of Theleb were cut off. For strength and cunning in chiuallrie ualrie they were inferiour to no other Nation; their Horsemen were about three thousand. The Tribe of Geboan inhabite not all in one place: for part of them you may find among the people of Guarag, and the residue amongst the people of Hedeg; and they are vnto them no other-10 wise then their seruants, which condition they notwithstanding most patiently and willingly submit themselues vnto. And here one thing is to bee noted by the way; to wit, that the two forenamed people called Schachin and Hilel, are originally Arabians of Arabia Desarta, and think themselues to be descended from Ismael, the sonne of Abraham. And those which we called Machil, came first forth of Arabia Felix, and deriue their pedigree from Saba. Before whom the Mahumetans preferre the former, which of Ismael are called Ismaelites. And because there hath 20 alwaies been great controuersie among them, which part should bee of greater Nobilitie, they haue written on both sides many Dialogues and Epigrams, whereby each man is wont to blaze the Renowne, the Vertues, Manners, and laudable Customes of his owne Nation. The ancient Arabians, which were before the times of the Ismaelites, were called by the African Historiographers Arabi-Araba; as if a man should say, Arabians of Arabia. But those which came of Ismael, they call Arabi Mus-Araba; as if they should say, Arabians ingrafted into the land of Arabia, or Arabians accidentally, because they were not originally bred and borne in Arabia. And them which afterward came into Africa, they name in their language Mustehgeme, that is, Barbarous Arabians; and that because they ioyned themselues vnto strangers, insomuch that not onely their speech, but their manners also are most corrupt and barbarous. These are (friend-30 ly Reader) the particulars, which for these ten yeeres my memorie could reserue, as touching the originals and diuersities of the Africans and Arabians; in all which time I remember not, that euer I read, or saw any Historie of that Nation. He that will know more, let him haue recourse vnto Hibnu Rachu the Historiographer before named.

Those five kinds of people before rehearsed, to wit, the people of Zenega, of Gansiga, of Terga, of Leuta, and of Bardeoa, are called of the Lains, Numida: and they liue all after one manner, that is to say, without all law and ciuilitie. Their garment is a narrow and base piece of cloth, where-40 with scarce halfe their body is couered. Some of them wrap their heads in a kind of black cloth, as it were with a scarfe, such as the Turkes vse, which is commonly called a Turbant. Such as will be discerned from the common sort, for Gentlemen weare a Iacket made of blew Cotton with wide sleeues. And Cotton-cloth is brought vnto them by certaine Merchants from the land of Negros. They haue no beasts fit to ride vpon, except their Camels; vnto whom Nature, be-
 50 tweene the bunch standing vpon the hinder part of their backes and their necks, hath allotted a place, which may fitly serue to ride vpon, in stead of a saddle. Their manner of riding is most ridiculous. For sometimes they lay their leggs acrosse vpon the Camels necke; and sometimes againe (hauing no knowledge nor regard of stirrups) they rest their feete vpon a rope, which is cast ouer his shoulders. Instead of spurs, they vse a truncheon of a cubites length, hauing at the one end thereof a Goade, wherewith they pricke onely the shoulders of their Camels. Those Camels which they vse to ride vpon, haue a hole bored through the gristles of their nose; in the which a ring of leather is fastened, whereby as with a bit, they are more easily curbed and ma-
 60 stred; after which manner I haue seene buffles vsed in Italie. For beds, they lie vpon mats made of sedge and bulrushes. Their tents are couered for the most part with course chamlet, or with a harsh kind of Wooll, which commonly groweth vpon the boughes of their Date-trees.

As for their manner of liuing, it would seeme to any man incredible what hunger and scarcitie this Nation will indure. Bread they haue none at all, neither vse they any seething or roasting; their foode is Camels milke onely, and they desire no other dainties. For their break-fast they drinke off a great cup of Camels milke: for supper they haue certaine dried flesh steeped in butter and milke, whereof each man taking his share, eateth it out of his fist. And that this their meate may not stay long vndigested in their stomacks, they sup off the foresaid broth wherein 70 their flesh was steeped: for which purpose they vse the palmes of their hands as a most fit instrument framed by nature to the same end. After that, each one drinks his cup of milke, and so their supper hath an end. These Numidians, while they haue any store of milke, regard water nothing at all, which for the most part hapneth in the Spring of the yeare, all which time you shall find some among them that will neither wash their hands nor their faces. Which seemeth not altogether to be vnlikely; for (as we said before) while their milke lasteth, they frequent 80 not those places where water is common: yea, and their Camels, so long as they may feede vpon grasse, will drinke no water at all. They spend their whole dayes in hunting and theeuing: for all their indeauour and exercise is to driue away the Camels of their enemies; neither will they remaine about three dayes in one place, by reason that they haue not pasture any longer for the sustenance of their Camels. And albeit (as is aforesaid) they haue no ciuilitie at all, nor 90 any Lawes prescribed vnto them; yet haue they a certaine Gouvernour or Prince placed ouer them, vnto whom they render obedience and due honour, as vnto their King. They are not only ignorant of all good learning and liberall Sciences; but are likewise altogether carelesse and destitute of vertue: insomuch that you shall find scarce one amongst them all, which is a man of

- iudgement or counsell. And if any iniured partie will goe to the Law with his aduerfarie, hee must ride continually fve or fixe daies before he can come to the speech of any iudge. This Nation hath all learning and good disciplines in such contempt, that they will not once vouchsafe to goe out of their deserts for the study and attaining thereof: neither, if any learned man shall chance to come among them, can they loue his company and conuersation, in regard of their most rude and detestable behauiour. Howbeit, if they can find any iudge, which can frame himselfe to liue and continue among them, to him they giue most large yearely allowance. Some allow their Iudge a thousand ducates yearely, some more, and some lesse, according as themselves thinke good. They that will seeme to be accounted of the better sort, couer their heads (as I said before) with a piece of blacke cloth, part whereof, like a vizard or maske, reacheth downe ouer their faces, couering all their countenance except their eyes; and this is their daily kind of attire. And so often as they put meate into their mouthes, they remoue the said maske; which being done, they forthwith couer their mouthes againe, alleaging this fond reason: for (say they) as it is vnseemely for a man, after he hath receiued meate into his stomacke, to vomit it out of his mouth againe, and to cast it vpon the earth; euen so it is an vndecent part to eate meate with a mans mouth vncouered.
- Iudges.
- Learning.
- Manner of eating.
- Their women. The women of this Nation be grosse, corpulent, and of a swart complexion. They are fatestt vpon their brest and paps, but slender about the girdle-stead. Very ciuill they are, after their manner, both in speech and gestures: sometimes they will accept of a kisse; but who so tempteth them farther, putteth his owne life in hazard. For by reason of ieaousie, you may see them daily one to be the death and destruction of another, and that in such sauage and brutish manner, that in this case they will shew no compassion at all. And they seeme to bee more wise in this behalfe then diuers of our people, for they will by no meanes match themselves vnto an harlot. The liberalitie of this people hath at all times been exceeding great. And when any trauellers may passe through their drie and desert Territories, they will neuer repaire vnto their tents, neither will they themselves trauell vpon the common high way. And if any Carauan, or multitude of Merchants will passe those Delarts, they are bound to pay certaine Custome vnto the Prince of the said people, namely, for euery Camels load, a piece of cloth worth a Ducat.
- Ieaousie.
- Merchants.
- The Authours trauels. Vpon a time I remember, that traueilling in the companie of certaine Merchants ouer the Desert, called by them Arauan, it was our chance there to meete with the Prince of Zanaga; who, after he had receiued his due custome, inuited the said companie of Merchants, for their recreation, to goe and abide with him in his tents foure or fve dayes. Howbeit, because his tents were too farre out of our way, and for that wee should haue wandred farther then we thought good, esteeming it more conuenient for vs to hold on our direct course, we refused his gentle offer, and for his courtesie gaue him great thanks. But not being satisfied therewith, he commanded that our Camels should proceede on forward, but the Merchants he carried along with him, and gaue them very sumptuous entertainment at his place of abode. Where we were no sooner arriued, but this good Prince caused Camels of all kinds and Ostriches, which he had hunted and taken by the way, to bee killed for his household prouision. Howbeit, wee requested him not to make such daily slaughters of his Camels; affirming moreouer, that we neuer vsed to eate the flesh of a gelt Camell, but when all other victuals failed vs. Whereunto hee answered, that he should deale vnciuilly, if he welcommed so worthy and so seldome-seene ghests with the killing of smal Cattell onely. Wherefore hee wished vs to fall to such prouision as was set before vs. Heere might you haue scene great plenty of roasted and sodden flesh: their roasted Ostriches were brought to the Table in wicker platters, being seasoned with sundry kinds of Herbes and Spices. Their bread made of Mill and Panicke was of a most sauorie and pleasant taste: and alwaies at the end of dinner or supper we had plentie of Dates, and great store of Milke serued in. Yea, this bountifull and noble Prince, that he might sufficiently shew how welcome wee were vnto him, would together with his Nobilitie alwaies beare vs company: howbeit, we euer dined and supped apart by our selues. Moreouer, hee caused certaine religious and most learned men to come vnto our banquet; who, all the time wee remained with the said Prince, vsed not to eate any bread at all, but fed onely vpon flesh and milke. Whereat we being somewhat amazed, the good Prince gently told vs, that they all were borne in such places, whereas no kind of graine would grow: howbeit, that himselfe for the entertainment of strangers, had great plentie of Corne laid vp in store. Wherefore he bade vs to be of good cheere, saying, That he would eate onely of such things as his owne natie soyle affoorded: affirming moreouer, that bread was yet in vse among them at their feast of Pascheouer, and at other feasts also, whereupon they vsed to offer sacrifice. And thus we remained with him for the space of two dayes; all which time, what wonderfull and magnificent cheere we had made vs, would seeme incredible to report. But the third day, being desirous to take our leaue, the Prince accompanied vs to that place where wee ouertooke our Camels and companie sent before. And this I dare most deeply take mine oath on, that we spent the said Prince ten times more, then our Custome which he receiued came to. We thought it not amisse here to set downe this Historie, to declare in some sort the courtesie and liberalitie of the said Nation. Neither could the Prince aforesaid vnderstand our language, nor we his; but all our speech to and fro was made by an interpreter. And this which we haue here recorded as touching this nation, is likewise to bee vnderstood of the other foure Nations aboue mentioned, which are dispersed ouer the residue of the Numidian Desarts.

- The Arabians, as they haue sundrie mansions and places of abode, so doe they liue after a diuers and sundry manner. Those which inhabite betweene Numidia and Libya leade a most miserable and distressed life, differing much in this regard from those Africans, whom we affirmed to dwell in Libya. Howbeit, they are farre more valiant then the said Africans, and vse commonly to exchange Camels in the land of Negros: they haue likewise great store of Horses, which in Europe they call Horses of Barbarie. They take wonderfull delight in hunting and pursuing of Deere, of wild Asses, of Ostriches, and such like. Neither is here to be omitted, that the greater part of Arabians which inhabite Numidia, are very witty and conceited in penning of verses; wherein each man will decypher his loue, his hunting, his combates, and other his worthy acts: and this is done for the most part in rime, after the Italian manner. And albeit they are most liberally minded, yet dare they not by bountifull giuing make any shew of wealth; for they are daily oppressed with manifold inconueniences. They are apparelled after the Numidians fashion, sauing that their women differ somewhat from the women of Numidia. Those Desarts which they doe now enioy, were wont to be possessed by Africans: but the Arabians with their Armie inuading that part of Africa, draue out the naturall Numidians, and reserued the Desarts adioyning vpon the Land of Dates, vnto themselves: but the Numidians began to inhabit those Desarts which border vpon the land of Negros. The Arabians which dwell betweene Mount Atlas and the Mediterran sea, are farre wealthier then these which wee now speake of, both for costlinesse of apparrell, for good horse-meate, and for the statelinesse and beautie of their tents. Their Horses also are of better shape, and more corpulent, but not so swift as the Horses of the Numidian Desart. They exercise Husbandry, and haue great increase of corne. Their droues and flockes of Cattell be innumerable, inso much that they cannot inhabit one by another for want of pasture. They are somewhat more vile and barbarous then those which inhabit the Desarts, and yet they are not altogether destitute of liberalitie: part of them which dwel in the territory of Fez, are subiect vnto the King of Fez. Those which remaine in Marocco and Duccala, haue continued this long time free from all exaction and tribute: but so soone as the King of Portugall began to beare rule ouer Azafi and Azamor, there began also among them strife and ciuill warre. Wherefore being assailed by the King of Portugall on the one side, and by the King of Fez on the other, and being oppressed also with extreme famine and scarcitie of that yeere, they were brought vnto such misery, that they freely offered themselves as slaues vnto the Portugals, submitting themselves to any man, that was willing to relieue their intolerable hunger: and by this meanes scarce one of them was left in all Duccala.

- Moreover, those which possesse the Desarts bordering vpon the Kingdomes of Tremizen and Tunis, may all of them (in regard of the rest) be called Noblemen, and Gentlemen: For their Gouvernours receiuing euery yeare great reuenues from the King of Tunis, diuide the same afterward among their people, to the end they may auoide all discord: and by this meanes all dissention is eschewed, and peace is kept firme and inuiolable among them. They haue notable dexteritie and cunning, both in making of Tents, and in bringing vp and keeping of Horses. In Summer-time they vsually come neere vnto Tunis, to the end that each man may prouide himself of bread, armour, and other necessities; all which they carrie with them into the Desarts, remaining there the whole Winter. In the Spring of the yeare they apply themselves vnto hunting, inso much that no beast can escape their pursuite. My selfe (I remember) was once at their tents, to my no little danger and inconuenience, where I saw greater quantitie of Cloth, Brasse, Yron, and Copper, then a man shall oftentimes find in the most rich ware-houses of some Cities. Howbeit no trust is to be giuen vnto them; for if occasion serue, they will play the thieues most slyly and cunningly; notwithstanding, they seeme to carrie some shew of ciuilitie. They take great delight in Poetrie, and will pen most excellent verses, their language being very pure and elegant. If any worthy Poet be found among them, he is accepted by their Gouvernours with great honor and liberalitie; neither would any man easily belieue what wit and decencie is in their verses.

- Their women (according to the guise of that countrie) goe very gorgeously attired: they weare linnen Gownes died blacke, with exceeding wide sleeves, ouer which sometimes they cast a Mantle of the same colour, or of blew, the corners of which Mantle are very artificially fastened about their shoulders with a fine siluer claspe. Likewise they haue rings hanging at their eares, which for the most part are made of siluer: they weare many rings also vpon their fingers. Moreover, they vsually weare about their thighes and ankles certaine scarfes and rings, after the fashion of the Africans. They couer their faces with certaine maskes, hauing onely two holes for their eyes to peepe out at. If any man chance to meete with them, they presently hide their faces, passing by him with silence, except it be some of their Allies or Kinsfolks; for vnto them they alwaies discover their faces, neither is there any vse of the said maske so long as they be in presence. These Arabians when they trauell any journey (as they oftentimes doe) they set their women vpon certaine saddles made handsomely of wicker for the same purpose, and fastned to their Camels backs, neither be they any thing too wide, but fit onely for a woman to sit in. When they goe to the wars, each man carries his wife with him, to the end that she may cheare vp her good man, and giue him encouragement. Their Damsels which are vnmarried, do vsually paint their faces, breasts, armes, hands, and fingers with a kind of counterfeite colour: which is accounted a most decent custome amongst them. But this fashion was first brought in by those Arabians, which before we called Africans, what time they began first of all to inhabite that region; for before then, they neuer vsed any false or glozing colours. The women of Barbarie vse not this fond kind of painting, but contenting themselues onely with their naturall hiew, they regard not such fained ornaments: howbeit sometimes they will temper a certaine colour with hens-dung and safron, wherewithall they paint a little round spot on the bals of their cheekes, about the bredth of a French Crowne. Likewise betweene their eye-browes they make a triangle, and paint vpon their chinnes a patch like vnto an oliue leafe. Some of them also doe paint their eye-browes: and this custome is very highly esteemed of by the Arabian Poets, and by the Gentlemen of that countrie. Howbeit, they will not vse these fantastical ornaments aboue two or three dayes together: all which time they will not bee seene to any of their friends, except it be to their husbands and children: for these paintings seeme to be great allurements vnto lust, whereby the said women thinke themselues more trim and beautiful.

The life of the Arabians in the Desarts betweene Barbarie and Egypt is full of miserie and calamitie: for the places where they inhabite, are barren and vnpleasant. They haue some store of Camels and other Cattell: howbeit, their fodder is so scarce, that they cannot well sustaine them. Neither shall you find ouer all the whole region any place fit to beare corne. And if in that Desart there be any villages at all, which vse to husband and manure their ground; yet reape they small commoditie thereby, except it bee for plentiful increase of Dates. Their Camels and other of their Cattell, they exchange for Dates and Corne; and so the poore Husbandmen of the foresaid villages haue some small recompence for their labours: notwithstanding, how can all this satisfie the hunger of such a multitude? For you shall daily see in Sicilia great numbers of their sonnes laid to pawne; because when they haue not wherewithall to pay for the Corne which they there buy, they are constrained to leaue their sonnes behind them, as pledges of future payment. But the Sicilians, if their money bee not paid them at the time appointed, will challenge the Arabians sonnes to be their slaues. Which day being once past, if any father will redeeme his child, hee must disburse thrice or foure times so much as the due debt amounteth vnto: for which cause they are the most notable thieues in the whole world. If any stranger fall into their hands, depriving him of all that he hath, they presently carry him to Sicily, and there either sell or exchange him for Corne. And I think, that no Merchants durst at any time within these hundred yeares arriue for trafficks sake vpon any part of their coast. For when they are to passe by with merchandize, or about any other weightie affaires, they eschew that region fise hundred miles at the least. Once I remember, that I my selfe, for my better securitie, and to auoid the danger of those mischieuous people, went in companie with certaine Merchants, who in three ships sailed along their coast. Wee were no sooner espied of them, but forthwith they came running to the shore, making signes that they would traffique with vs to our great aduantage. Howbeit, because we durst not repose any trust in them, none of our companie would depart the ship, before they had deliuered certaine pledges vnto vs. Which being done, we bought certaine Eunuchs, or gelded men, and good store of butter of them. And so immediately weighing our ankens, we betooke vs to flight, fearing lest wee should haue been met withall by the Sicilian and Rhodian Pirates, and been spoiled not onely of our goods, but of our liberties also. To be short, the said Arabians are very rude, forlorne, beggerly, leane, and hunger-starued people, hauing God (no doubt) alwaies displeased against them, by whose vengeance they daily sustaine such grievous calamities.

You shall find many among the Africans which liue altogether a shepheards or droyers life, inhabiting vpon the beginning of mount Atlas, and being dispersed here and there ouer the same Mountaine. They are constrained alwaies to pay tribute either to the King of the same region where they dwell, or else to the Arabians, except those onely which inhabite Tamesna, who are free from all forren superioritie, and are of great power. They speake the same kind of language that other Africans doe, except some few of them which conuerse with the inhabitants of the Citie called Urbs (which is neere vnto Tunis) who speake the Arabian tongue. Moreover, there is a certaine people inhabiting that region, which diuideth Nu-midia from Tunis. These oftentimes wage warre against the King of Tunis himselfe, which they put in practice not many yeares since, when as the said King his sonne marching towards them from Constantina with an Armie, for the demanding of such tribute as was due vnto him, fought a verie vnfortunate battell. For no sooner were they aduertised of the Kings sonne his approach, but forthwith they went to meete him with two thousand Horsemen, and at length vanquished and slew him at vnawares, carrying home with them all the furniture, bag, and and baggage, which he had brought forth. And this was done in the yeere of Mahumets Hegeira 915. From that time their Fame hath beene spread abroad in all places. Yea, many of the King of Tunis his Subjects revolted from their King vnto them; insomuch that the Prince of this People is growne so puissant, that scarcely is his equall to be found in all Africa.

The ancient Africans were much addicted to Idolatrie, euen as certaine of the Persians are at this day; some of whom worship the Sunne, and others the Fire, for their gods. For the said Africans had in times past magnificent and most stately Temples built, and dedicated as well to the honour of the Sunne as of the Fire. In these Temples day and night they kept Fire kindled, giuing diligent heed that it might not at any time be extinguished, euen as we reade of the Roman Vestall Virgins: all which you may reade more fully and at large in the Persian and African Chronicles. Those Africans which inhabited Libya and Numidia, would each of them worship some certaine Planet, vnto whom likewise they offered Sacrifices and Prayers. Some others of the Land of Negros worship Guighimo, that is to say, The Lord of Heauen. And this found point of Religion was not deliuered vnto them by any Prophet or Teacher, but was inspired, as it were, from God himselfe. After that, they embraced the Iewish Law, wherein they are said to haue continued many yeeres. Afterward they professed the Christian Religion, and continued Christians, vntill such time as the Mahumetan Superstition preuailed; which came to passe in the yeere of the Hegeira 208. About which time certaine of Mahumets disciples so bewitched them with eloquent and deceivable speeches, that they allured their weak minds to consent vnto their opinion; insomuch that all the Kingdomes of the Negroes adioyning vnto Libya receiued the Mahumetan Law. Neither is there any Region in all the Negros Land, which hath in it at this day any Christians at all. At the same time such as were found to be Iewes, Christians, or of the African Religion, were slaine euery man of them. Howbeit those which dwell neere vnto the Ocean Sea, are all of them very grosse Idolaters. Howbeit afterward, ciuill dissensions arising among them, neglecting the Law of Mahumet, they slew all the Priests and Gouvernours of that Region. Which tumult when it came to the eares of the Mahumetan Califa, they sent an huge Armie against the said Rebels of Barbarie, to wit, those which were revolted from the Califa of Bagdet, and seuerely punished their misdeemeanour.

Those Writers which record the Histories of the Arabians doings are all ioyntly of opinion, that the Africans were wont to vse onely the Latine letters. The Arabians haue no Historie of African matters, which was not first written in Latine. They haue certaine ancient Authors, who writ partly in the times of the Arrians, and partly before their times, the names of all which are cleane forgotten. But when as those which rebelled against the Califa of Bagdet (as is aforesaid) got the vpper hand in Africa, they burnt all the Africans bookes. For they were of opinion, that the Africans, so long as they had any knowledge of Naturall Philosophie, or of other good Arts and Sciences, would euery day more and more arrogantly contemne the Law of Mahumet. Contrariwise, some Historiographers there are which affirme, that the Africans had a kind of letters peculiar vnto themselves; which notwithstanding, from the time wherein the Italians began first to inhabite Barbarie, and wherein the Christians fleeing out of Italie from the Gothes, began to subdue those Prouinces of Africa, were vtterly abolished and taken away. For it is likely that a People vanquished should follow the customes and the letters also of their Conquerours. And did not the same thing happen to the Persians, while the Arabians Empire stood? For certaine it is, that the Persians at the same time lost those letters which were peculiar vnto their Nation; and that all their bookes, by the commandement of the Mahumetan Prelates, were burnt; least their knowledge in naturall Philosophie, or their idolatrous Religion might moue them to contemne the precepts of Mahumet. The like also (as wee shewed before) befell the Barbarians, when as the Italians and the Gothes viurped their Dominions in Barbarie; which may here (I hope) suffice the gentle Reader. Howbeit this is out of doubt, that all the Sea-Cities and Inland-Cities of Barbarie doe vse Latine letters onely, whensoever they will commit any Epitaphs, or any other Verses or Prose vnto posteritie. The consideration of all which former particulars hath made me to be of opinion, that the Africans in times past had their owne proper and peculiar letters, wherein they described their doings and exploits. For it is likely that the Romans, when they first subdued those Prouinces (as Conquerours vsually doe) vtterly spoiled and tooke away all their letters and memorie, and established their owne letters in the stead thereof; to the end that the fame and honour of the Roman People might there onely be continued. And who knoweth not that the very same attempt was practised by the Gothes vpon the stately buildings of the Romans, and by the Arabians against the Monuments of the Persians. Concerning those nine hundred yeeres, wherein the Africans vsed the letters of the Arabians, Ibnu Rachich, a most diligent Writer of Africa, doth in his Chronicle most largely dispute; whether the Africans euer had any peculiar kind of writing or no. And at last he concludeth the affirmative part; that they had: for (sayth he) whosoever denyeth this, may as well denye, that they had a Language peculiar vnto themselves. For it cannot be that any People should haue a proper kind of Speech, and yet should vse letters borrowed from other Nations, and being altogether vnfit for their Mother-language.

All the Region of Barbarie, and the Mountaines contained therein, are subiect more to cold then to heat. For seldome commeth any gale of wind which bringeth not some Snow therewith. In all the said Mountaines there grow abundance of Fruits, but not so great plentie of Corne. The Inhabitants of these Mountaines liue for the greatest part of the yeere vpon Barley Bread. The Springs and Riueris issuing forth of the said Mountaines, representing the qualitie and taste of their native soyle, are somewhat muddie and impure, especially vpon the confines of Mauritania. These Mountaines likewise are replenished with Woods and loftie Trees, and are greatly stored with Beasts of all kinds. But the little Hills and Valleys lying betweene the foresaid Mountaines and Mount Atlas are farre more commodious, and abounding with Corne. For they are moistened with Riueris springing out of Atlas, and from thence holding on their course to the Mediterran Sea. And albeit Woods are somewhat more scarce vpon these Plaines, yet are they much more fruitfull, then be the plaine Countreys situate betweene Atlas and the Ocean Sea, as namely, the Regions of Maroco, of Duccala, of Tedles, of Temesna, of Azgara, and the Countrey lying towards the Straights of Gibraltar. The Mountaines of Atlas are exceeding cold and barren, and bring forth but small store of Corne, being woody on all sides, and engendring almost all the Riueris of Africa. The Fountaines of Atlas are euen in the midst of Summer extremely cold; so that if a man dippeth his hand therein for any long space, he is in great danger of losing the same. Howbeit the said Mountaines are not so cold in all places: for some parts thereof are of such milde temperature, that they may be right commodiously inhabited: yea, and sundry places thereof are well stored with inhabitants; as in the second part of this present discourse we will declare more at large. Those places which are destitute of Inhabitants be either extremely cold, as namely, the same which lie ouer against Mauritania: or very rough and vnpleasant, to wit, those which are directly opposite to the Region of Temesna. Where notwithstanding in Summer time they may feed their great and small Cattell, but not in Winter by any meanes. For then the North wind so furiously rageth, bringing with it such abundance of Snow; that all the Cattell which till then remaine vpon the said Mountaines and a great part of the People also are forced to lose their liues in regard thereof: wherefore whosoever hath any occasion to trauaile that way in Winter time, chuseth rather to take his Iourney betweene Mauritania and Numidia. Those Merchants which bring Dates out of Numidia for the vse and seruice of other Nations, set forth vsually vpon their Iourney about the end of October: and yet they are oftentimes so oppressed and ouertaken with a sodaine fall of Snow, that scarcely one man among them all escapeth the danger of the tempest. For when it beginneth to snow ouer night, before the next morning not onely Carts and Men, but euen the very Trees are so drowned and ouerwhelmed therein, that it is not possible to finde any mention of them. Howbeit the dead Carkasses are then found, when the Sunne hath melted the Snow.

I my selfe also, by the goodnesse of Almighty God, twice escaped the most dreadfull danger of the foresaid Snow; whereof, if it may not be tedious to the Reader, I will here in few words make relation. Vpon a certaine day of the foresaid moneth of October, traueiling with a great companie of Merchants towards Atlas, wee were there about the Sunne going downe weather-beaten with a most cold and snowy kind of Hayle. Here we found eleuen or twelue Horse-men (Arabians to our thinking) who perswading vs to leave our Carts and to goe with them, promised vs a good and secure place to lodge in. For mine owne part, that I might not seeme altogether vnciuill, I thought it not meet to refuse their good offer; albeit I stood in doubt lest they went about to practise some mischiefe. Wherefore I bethought my selfe to hide vp a certaine summe of gold which I had as then about me. But all being readie to ride, I had no leasure to hide away my Coyne from them; whereupon I fained that I would goe ease my selfe. And so departing a while their companie, and getting me vnder a certaine Tree, whereof I tooke diligent notice, I buried my money betweene certaine stones and the roote of the said Tree. And then we rode on quietly till about mid-night. What time one of them thinking that he had stayed long enough for his Prey, began to vtter that in words which secretly he had conceiued in his mind. For he asked whether I had any money about me or no? To whom I answered, that I had left my money behind with one of them which attended the Carts, and that I had then none at all about me. Howbeit they being no whit satisfied with this answer, commanded me, for all the cold weather, to strip my selfe out of mine apparell. At length when they could find no money at all, they said in iesting and scoffing wise, that they did this for no other purpose, but onely to see how strong and hardy I was, and how I could endure the cold and tempestuous season. Well, on we rode, seeking our way as well as wee could that darke and dismall night; and anone we heard the bleating of Sheepe, coniecturing thereby, that wee were not farre distant from some habitation of people. Wherefore out of hand we directed our course thitherwards: being constrained to leade our Horses thorow thicke Woods, and ouer steepe and craggie Rockes, to the great hazard and perill of our liues. And at length after many labours, labours, wee found Shepheards in a certaine Caue : who, hauing with much paines brought their Cattell in there, had kindled a lustie fire for themselues, which they were constrained, by reason of the extreme cold, daily to sit by. Who vnderstanding our companie to be Arabians, feared at the first that we would doe them some mischief: but afterward being perswaded that we were driuen thither by extremitie of cold, and being more secure of vs, they gaue vs most friendly entertainment. For they set bread, flesh, and cheese before vs, wherewith hauing ended our Suppers, we laid vs along each man to sleep before the fire. All of vs were as yet exceeding cold, but especially my selfe, who before with great horroure and trembling was stripped starke naked. And so we continued with the said shepheards for the space of two dayes: all which 10 time we could not set forth, by reason of continuall Snow. But the third day, so soone as they saw it leaue snowing, with great labour they began to remooue that Snow which lay before the doore of their Caue. Which done, they brought vs to our Horses, which wee found well prouided of Hay in another Caue. Being all mounted, the shepheards accompanied vs some part of our way, shewing vs where the Snow was of least depth, and yet euen there it touched our Horse bellies. This day was so cleere, that the Sunne tooke away all the cold of the two dayes going before.

Continuall
Snow.

At length entring into a certaine Village neere vnto Fez, wee vnderstood, that our Carts which passed by, were ouerwhelmed with the Snow. Then the Arabians seeing no hope of recompence for all the paines they had taken (for they had defended our Carts from Theeues) carried a certaine Iew of our Companie with them as their Captiue, (who had lost a great 20 quantitie of Dates, by reason of the Snow aforesaid) to the end that he might remayne as their Prisoner, till he had satisfied for all the residue. From my selfe they tooke my Horse, and committed me vnto the wide World and to Fortune. From whence, riding vpon a Mule, within three daies I arriued at Fez, where I heard dolefull newes of our Merchants and Wares, that they were cast away in the Snow. Yea, they thought that I had beene destroyed with the rest; but it seemed that God would haue it otherwise.

Now, hauing finished the Historie of mine owne misfortunes, let vs returne vnto that Discourse where we left. Beyond Atlas there are certaine hot and dry places moystened with very few Riuers, but those which flow out of Atlas it selfe: some of which Riuers running into the vp by sands.

30 Libyan Desarts are dried vp with the Sands, but others do ingender Lakes. Neither shall you find in these Countreyes any places apt to bring forth Corne, notwithstanding they haue Dates in abundance.

There are also certaine other Trees bearing fruit, but in so small quantitie, that no increase nor gaine is to be reaped by them. You may see likewise in those parts of Numidia which border vpon Libya, certaine barren hills destitute of Trees, vpon the lower parts whereof grow nothing but vnprofitable thornes and shrubs. Amongst these Mountaines you shall find no Riuers nor Springs, nor yet any waters at all, except it be in certaine Pits and Wels almost vnknowne vnto the Inhabitants of that Region. Moreouer, in sixe or seuen dayes iourney they haue not one drop of water, but such as is brought vnto them by certaine Merchants vpon Camels backs.

And that especially in those places which lye vpon the mayne Road from Fez to Tombuto or from Tremizen to * Agad. That iourney likewise is very dangerous which is of late found

Danger by

40 out by the Merchants of our dayes from Fez to Alcair ouer the Desarts of Libya, were it not for an huge Lake in the way, vpon the bankes whereof the Sinites and the Goranites doe inhabit. But in the way which leadeth from Fez to Tombuto are certaine Pits enuironed either with the hides or bones of Camels. Neither doe the Merchants in Sommer time passe that way without great danger of their liues: for oftentimes it falleth out, when the South-wind bloweth, that all those Pits are stopped vp with sand. And so the Merchants when they can find neither those Pits, nor any mention thereof, must needs perish for extreame thirst: whose carkasses are afterward found lying scattered here and there, and scorched with the heat of the Sunne. One remedie they haue in this case, which is very strange: for when they are so grievously oppressed with thirst, they kill forth-with some one of their Camels, out of whose bowels they wring

50 and expresse some quantitie of water, which water they drinke and carrie about with them, till they haue either found some Pit of water, or till they pine away for thirst. In the Desart which they call Azaoad, there are as yet extant two Monuments built of Marble, vpon which Marble is an Epitaph engrauen, signifying that one of the said Monuments represented a most rich Merchant, and the other a Carrier or transporter of Wares. Which wealthfull Merchant bought of the Carrier a cup of water for ten thousand Ducats, and yet this precious water could suffice neither of them; for both were consumed with thirst. This Desart likewise contayneth sundry kinds of beasts, which in the fourth part of this Discourse concerning Libya, and in our Treatise of the beasts of Africa, we will discourse of more at large.

60 The Land of Negros is extreame hot, hauing some store of moysture also, by reason of the Riuer of Niger running through the midst thereof. All places adioyning vpon Niger doe mightily abound both with Cattell and Corne. No Trees I saw there but only certaine great ones, bearing a kind of bitter fruit like vnto a Chestnut, which in their Language is called Goron.

Like-

Cocos, Cucumbers, Onions.

Likewise in the same Regions grow Cocos, Cucumbers, Onions, and such kinde of herbs and fruits in great abundance.

There are no Mountaines at all either in Libya or in the Land of Negros: howbeit diuers Fennes and Lakes there are; which (as men report) the inundation of Niger hath left behind it. Neither are the woods of the said Regions altogether destitute of Elephants and other strange beasts; whereof we will make relation in their due place.

What naturall impressions & motions the Aire of Africa is subject vnto; and what effects ensue thereupon. The seasons of the yeare. Cherries ripe in Aprill.

Throughout the greatest part of Barbarie stormie and cold weather begin commonly about the midst of October. But in December and January the cold groweth some-what more sharpe in all places: howbeit this happeneth in the morning onely, but so gently and remissely, that no man careth greatly to warme himselfe by the fire. February some-what mitigateth the cold of Winter, but that so inconstantly, that the weather changeth sometime fue and sometime fixe times in one day. In March the North and West winds vsually blow, which cause the Trees to be adorned with blossomes. In April all fruits attaine to their proper forme and shape, insomuch that Cherries are commonly ripe about the end of Aprill and the beginning of May. In the midst of May they gather their figs: and in mid-Iune their Grapes are ripe in many places. Likewise their Peares, their sweete Quinces, and their Damascens attayne vnto sufficient ripenesse in the monethes of Iune and Iuly. Their Figs of Autumne may be gathered in August; howbeit they neuer haue so great plentie of Figs and Peaches, as in September. By the midst of August they vsually begin to dry their Grapes in the Sunne, whereof they make Rafins. Which if they cannot finish in September, by reason of vnseasonable weather, of their Grapes as then vngathered they vse to make Wine and Must, especially in the Prouince of Rifa, as wee will in due place signifie more at large. In the midst of October they take in their Honey, and gather their Pomegranates and Quinces. In Nouember they gather their Oliues, not climbing vp with Ladders nor plucking them with their hands, according to the custome of Europe; for the Trees of Mauritania and Cesarea are so tall, that no Ladder is long enough to reach vnto the fruit. And therefore their Oliues being full ripe, they climbe the Trees, beating them off the boughes with certaine long Poles, albeit they know this kind of beating to be most hurtfull vnto the said Trees. Sometimes they haue great plentie of Oliues in Africa, and sometimes as great scarcitie. Certaine great Oliue-trees there are, the Oliues whereof are eaten ripe by the Inhabitants because they are not so fit for Oyle. No yeare falls out to be so vnseasonable, but that they haue three monethes in the spring alwayes temperate.

The Oliues of Africa.

Pleasant spring

Raine signifying plentie or scarcitie.

They begin their spring vpon the fifteenth day of February, accounting the eighteenth of May, for the end thereof: all which time they haue most pleasant weather. But if from the fue and twentieth of Aprill, to the fifth of May they haue no raine fall, they take it as a signe of ill lucke. And the raine-water which falleth all the time aforesaid they call Naisan, that is, water blessed of God. Some store it vp in Vessels, most religiously keeping it, as an holy thing. Their Summer lasteth till the sixteenth of August; all which time they haue most hot and cleere weather. Except perhaps some showres of raine fall in Iuly and August, which doe so infect the Aire, that great plague and most pestilent Feuers ensue thereupon; with which plague whosoever is infected, most hardly escapeth death. Their Autumne they reckon from the seuenteenth of August to the sixteenth of Nouember; hauing commonly in the monethes of August and September not such extreme heate as before. Howbeit all the time betweene the fifteenth of August and the fifteenth of September is called by them the furnace of the whole yeare, for that it bringeth Figs, Quinces, and such kind of fruits to their full maturitie. From the fifteenth of Nouember they beginne their winter-season, continuing the same till the fourteenth day of February. So soone as Winter commeth, they begin to till their ground which lyeth in the Plaines: but vpon the Mountaines they goe to plough in October. The Africans are most certainly perswaded that euery yeare containeth fortie extreme hot dayes, beginning vpon the twelfth of Iune; and againe so many dayes extreme cold, beginning from the twelfth of December. Their Aequinoctia are vpon the sixteenth of March, and the sixteenth of September. For their Solstitia they account the sixteenth of Iune and the sixteenth of December. These rules they doe most strictly obserue, as well Husbandrie and Nauigation, as in searching out the houses and true places of the Planets: and these instructions, with other such like they teach their young children first of all.

Forty dayes of extreme heate and forty of cold.

The Peasants and vnlearned people of Africa cunning in Astrologie. Note.

Many Countrey-people and Husbandmen there be in Africa, who knowing (as they say) neuer a Letter of the Booke, will notwithstanding most learnedly dispute of Astrologie, and alleage most profound reasons and arguments for themselves. But whatsoeuer skill they haue in the Art of Astrologie, they first learned the same of the Latines: yea, they giue those very names vnto their Moneths which the Latines doe.

Moreouer, they haue extant among them a certaine great Booke diuided into three Volumes, which they call, The Treasure or Store-house of Husbandry. This Booke was then translated out of Latine into their Tongue, when Manzor was Lord of Granada. In the said Treasure are all things containd which may seeme in any wise to concerne Husbandry; as namely, the changes changes and varietie of times, the manner of sowing, with a number of such like particulars, which (I thinke) at this day the Latine Tongue it felte, whereout these things were first translated, doth not contayne. Whatsoever either the Africans or the Mahumetans haue, which seemeth to appertaine in any wise to their Law or Religion, they make their computation thereof altogether according to the course of the Moone.

Their yeare is diuided into three hundred fiftie foure dayes: for vnto fixe Monethes they allot thirtie dayes, and vnto the other fixe but nine and twentie; all which beeing added into one summe doe produce the number aforesaid: wherefore their yeare differeth eleuen daies from the yeare of the Latines. They haue at diuers times Festiuall Dayes and Fasts,

10 About the end of Autumne, for all Winter, and a great part of the Spring they are troubled with boysterous winds, with Haile, with terrible Thunder and Lightening: yea then it snoweth much in some places of Barbarie. The Easterne, Southerne, and South-easterne winds blowing in May and Iune, doe very much hurt there: for they spoyle the Corne, and hinder the fruit from comming to ripenesse. Their Corne likewise is greatly appayred by Snow, especially such as falleth in the day time, when it beginneth to flowre. Vpon the Mountaynes of Atlas they diuide the yeare into two parts onely: for their Winter continueth from October to Aprill; and from Aprill to October they account it Summer: neither is there any day throughout the whole yeare, wherein the tops of those Mountaines are not couered with Snow. In Numidia, the yeare runneth away very swiftly: for they reape their Corne in May, and in October they gather their Dates: but from the midst of September, they haue Winter till the beginning of Ianuarie. But if September falleth out to be raynie, they are like to lose most part of their Dates.

The yeare of the Arabians & Africans.

The yeares diuided into two seasons onely, vpon the Mountaines of Atlas.

The time of the Dates.

All the fields of Numidia require watering from the Rivers; but if the Mountaynes of Atlas haue no raine fall vpon them, the Numidian Rivers waxe dry, and so the fields are destitute of watering. October being destitute of raine, the Husbandman hath no hope to cast his seed into the ground; and he despayreth likewise, if it raine not in Aprill. But their Dates prosper more without raine, whereof the Numidians haue greater plentie then of Corne. For albeit they haue some store of Corne, yet can it scarcely suffice them for halfe the yeere. Howbeit, if they haue good increase of Dates, they cannot want abundance of Corne, which is sold vnto them by the Arabians for Dates. If in the Libyan Desarts there fall out change of weather about the midst of October; and if it continue rayning there all December, Ianuary, and some part of February, it is wonderfull what abundance of grasse and milke it bringeth forth. Then may you find diuers Lakes in all places, and many Fennes throughout Libya; wherefore this is the meetest time for the Barbarie Merchants to trauell to the Land of Negros. Heere all kind of fruits grow sooner ripe, if they haue moderate showers about the end of Iuly. Moreover, the Land of Negros receiueth by raine neither any benefit, nor yet any dammage at all. For the River Niger together with the water which falleth from certaine Mountaynes doth so moysten their grounds, that no places can be deuised to be more fruitfull: for that which Nilus is to Egypt, the same is Niger to the Land of Negros: for it increaseth like Nilus from the fifteenth of Iune the space of fortie dayes after, and for so many againe it decreaseth. And so at the increase of Niger when all places are ouer-flowne with water, a man may in a Barke passe ouer all the Land of Negros, albeit not without great perill of drowning; as in the fift part of this Treatise we will declare more at large.

The increase of the River of Niger and Nilus.

All the people of Barbarie by vs before mentioned liue vnto sixtie sixe or seuentie yeares of age, and few or none exceed that number. Howbeit in the foresaid Mountaynes I saw some which had liued an hundred yeares, and others which affirmed themselues to bee older; whose age was most healthfull and lustie. Yea, some you shall find heere of fourescore yeares of age, who are sufficiently strong and able to exercise Husbandry, to dresse Vines, and to serue in the Warres; insomuch that yong men are oftentimes inferiour vnto them. In Numidia, that is to say, in the Land of Dates, they liue a long time: howbeit they lose their Teeth very soone, and their Eyes waxe wonderfull dimme. Which infirmities are likely to be incident vnto them, first because they continually feed vpon Dates, the sweetnesse and naturall qualitie whereof doth by little and little pull out their Teeth; and secondly, the dust and sand, which is tossed vp and downe the Ayre with Easterne windes entring into their Eyes, doth at last miserably weaken and spoile their eye-sight. The Inhabitants of Libya are of a shorter life; but those which are most strong and healthfull among them liue oftentimes till they come to threescore yeares; albeit they are slender and leane of bodie.

The length and shortnesse of the African liues.

Teeth soone lost and Eyes decayed.

The Negros commonly liue the shortest time of all the rest: howbeit they are alwayes strong and lustie, hauing their Teeth sound euen till their dying day: yet is there no Nation vnder Heaven more prone to Venerie; vnto which vice also the Libyans and Numidians are too too much addicted. To be short, the Barbarians are the weakest people of them all.

What kinds of Diseases the Africans are subiect vnto.

The children, and sometimes the ancient women of this Region are subiect vnto baldnesse or vnnaturall shedding of haire; which disease they can hardly be cured of. They are likewise oftentimes troubled with the head-ache, which vsually afflicteth them without any ague ioyned theretherewith. Many of them are tormented with the tooth-ache, which (as some thinke) they are the more subiect vnto, because immediately after hot pottage they drinke cold water. They are oftentimes vexed with extreame paine of the stomacke, which ignorantly they call, the paine of the heart. They are likewise daily molested with inward gripings and infirmities ouer their whole bodie, which is thought to proceed of continuall drinking of water. Yea, they are much subiect vnto bone-aches and gowts, by reason that they sit commonly vpon the bare ground, and neuer weare any shooes vpon their feet. Their chiefe Gentlemen and Noblemen proue gowtie oftentimes with immoderate drinking of Wine and eating of daintie meates. Some with eating of Oliues, Nuts, and such course fare, are for the most part infected with the Scuruies.

Those which are of a sanguine complexion are greatly troubled with the cough, because that in the Sprin-season they sit too much vpon the ground. And vpon Fridayes I had no small sport and recreation to goe and see them. For vpon this day the people flocke to Church in great numbers to heare their Mahumetan Sermons. Now if any one in the Sermon-time fals a neezing, all the whole multitude will neeze with him for company, and so they make such a noise, that they neuer leaue, till the Sermon be quite done; so that a man shall reape but little knowledge by any of their Sermons.

If any of Barbarie be infected with the Disease commonly called the French Poxe, they dye thereof for the most part, and are seldome cured. This Disease beginneth with a kinde of anguish and swelling, and at length breaketh out into Sores. Ouer the Mountaines of Atlas, and throughout all Numidia and Libya they scarcely know this Disease. Insomuch that oftentimes the parties infected trauell forth-with into Numidia or the land of Negros, in which places the Aire is so temperate, that onely by remaying there they recouer their perfect health, and returne home sound into their owne Countrey: which I saw many doe with mine owne eyes; who without the helpe of any Physician or Medicine, except the foresaid holosome aire, were restored to their former health. Not so much as the name of this malady was euer known vnto the Africans, before Ferdinand the King of Castile expelled all Iewes out of Spaine; after the returne of which Iewes into Africa, certaine unhappie and lewd people lay with their Wiues; and so at length the Disease spread from one to another, ouer the whole Region: insomuch that scarce any one Family was free from the same. Howbeit, this they were most certainly perswaded of, that the same Disease came first from Spaine; wherefore they (for want of a better name) doe call it, The Spanish Poxe. Notwithstanding at Tunis and ouer all Italy, it is called the French Disease. It is so called likewise in Egypt and Syria: for there it is vsed as a common Prouerbe of Cursing; The French Poxe take you. Amongst the Barbarians the Disease called in Latine Hernia is not so common; but in Egypt the people are much troubled therewith. For some of the Egyptians haue their Cods oftentimes so swollen, as it is incredible to report. Which infirmitie is thought to be so common among them, because they eate so much Gumme, and Salt Cheese. Some of their children are subiect vnto the falling sicknesse; but when they grow to any stature, they are free from that Disease. This falling sicknesse likewise possesseth the women of Barbarie, and of the Land of Negros; who, to excuse it, say that they are taken with a Spirit. In Barbarie the Plague is rife euery tenth, fifteenth, or twentieth yeare, whereby great numbers of people are consumed; for they haue no cure for the same, but onely to rub the Plague-sore with certaine Ointments made of Armenian Earth.

In Numidia they are infected with the Plague scarce once in an hundred yeares. And in the Land of Negros they know not the name of this Disease: because they neuer were subiect thereunto.

Those Arabians which inhabit in Barbarie or vpon the Coast of the Mediterran Sea, are greatly addicted vnto the studie of good Arts and Sciences: and those things which concerne their Law and Religion are esteemed by them in the first place. Moreouer, they haue beene heretofore most studious of the Mathematikes, of Philosophie, and of Astrologie: but these Arts (as it is aforesaid) were foure hundred yeares agoe, vterly destroyed and taken away by the chiefe Professors of their Law. The Inhabitants of Cities doe most religiously obserue and reuerence those things which appertaine vnto their Religion: yea, they honour those Doctors and Priests, of whom they learne their Law, as if they were pettie gods. Their Churches they frequent very diligently, to the end they may repeat certaine prescript and formall Praiers; most superstitiously perswading themselues that the same day wherein they make their praiers, it is not lawfull for them to wash certaine of their members, when as at other times they will wash their whole bodies.

Moreouer those which inhabit Barbarie, are of great cunning and dexteritie for building and for Mathematicall Inuentions, which a man may easily coniecture by their artificiall Workes. Most honest people they are, and destitute of all fraud and guile; not onely imbracing all simplicitie and truth, but also practising the same throughout the whole course of their liues: albeit certaine Latine Authors, which haue written of the same Regions, are farre otherwise of opinion. Likewise they are most strong and valiant people, especially those which dwell vpon the Moun-

No Nation in the World is ſo ſubieſt vnto lealouſie; for they will rather loſe their liues, then put vp any diſgrace in the behalfe of their women. So deſirous they are of Riches and Honour, that therein no other people can go beyond them. They trauel in a manner ouer the whole World to exerciſe Traffike. For they are continually to be ſeene in Egypt, in Ethiopia, in Arabia, Persia, India, and Turkie: and whitherſoeuer they goe, they are moſt honourably eſteemed of: for none of them will profeſſe any Art, vnleſſe hee hath attained vnto great exactneſſe and perfection therein. They haue alwayes bene much delighted with all kind of ciuilitie and moſt behauiour: and it is accounted hainous among them for any man to vtter in companie, any Bawdie or unſcemely word. They haue alwayes in mind this ſentence of a graue Author; Give place to thy Superiour. If any youth in preſence of his Father, his Vncle, or any other of his Kindred, doth ſing or talke ought of loue matters, he is deemed to be worthy of grieuous puniſhment. Whatſoeuer Lad or Youth there lighteth by chance into any companie which diſcourſeth of Loue, no ſooner heareth nor vnderſtandeth what their talke tendeth vnto, but immediately he withdraweth himſelfe from among them.

Thoſe Arabians which dwell in Tents, that is to ſay, which bring vp Cattell, are of a more liberall and ciuill diſpoſition: to wit, they are in their kind as deuout, valiant, patient, courteous, hoſpitall, and as honeſt in life and conuerſation as any other people. They be moſt faithfull obſeruers of their word and promiſe: inſomuch that the people, which before we ſaid to dwell in the Mountaines, are greatly ſtirred vp with emulation of their Vertues. Howbeit the ſaid Mountainers, both for Learning, for Vertue, and for Religion, are thought much inferiour to the Numidians; albeit they haue little or no knowledge at all in naturall Philoſophie. They are reported likewiſe to be moſt ſkilfull Warriours, to be valiant, and exceeding louers and practiſers of all humanitie. Alſo, the Moores and Arabians inhabiting Libya are ſomewhat ciuill of behauiour, being plaine dealers, void of diſſimulation, fauourable to Strangers, and louers of Simplicitie.

and their vertues.

Thoſe which we before named white, or tawnie Moores, are moſt ſtedfaſt in friendſhip: as likewiſe they indifferently and fauourably eſteeme of other Nations: and wholly indeauour themſelues in this one thing, namely, that they may leade a moſt pleaſant and iocund life. Moreover, they maintaine moſt learned Profeſſors of liberall Arts, and ſuch men as are moſt deuout in their Religion. Neither is there any people in all Africa that lead a more happie and honourable life.

Neuer was there any people or Nation ſo perfectly endued with vertue, but that they had their contrary faults and blemiſhes: now therefore let vs conſider, whether the vices of the Africans doe ſurpaſſe their vertues and good parts. Thoſe which we named the Inhabitants of the Cities of Barbarie, are ſomewhat needie and couetous, being alſo very proud and high-minded, and wonderfully addicted vnto wrath; inſomuch that (according to the Prouerbe) they will deeply engraue in Marble any iniurie be it neuer ſo ſmall, and will in no wiſe blot it out of their memorance. So ruſticall they are and void of good manners, that ſcarcely can any ſtranger obtaine their familiaritie and friendſhip. Their wits are but meane, and they are ſo credulous, that they will beleue matters impoſſible, which are told them. So ignorant are they of naturall Philoſophie, that they imagine all the effects and operations of nature to be extraordinarie and diuine.

What vices the foreſaid Africans are ſubieſt vnto.

Vindicatiue,
Rude, Credulous.

They obſerue no certaine order of liuing nor of Lawes. Abounding exceedingly with choler, they ſpeake alwayes with an angry and lowd voice. Neither ſhall you walke in the day-time in any of their ſtreets, but you ſhall ſee commonly two or three of them together by the eares. By nature they are a vile and baſe people, being no better accounted of by their Gouernours then if they were Dogges. They haue neither Iudges nor Lawyers, by whoſe wiſdome and counſell they ought to be directed. They are vtterly vnſkilfull in Trades of Merchandize, being deſtitute of Bankers Money-changers: wherefore a Merchant can doe nothing among them in his abſence, but is himſelfe conſtrayned to goe in perſon, whitherſoeuer his Wares are carried. No people vnder Heauen are more addicted vnto couetiſe then this Nation: neither is there (I thinke) to be found among them one of an hundred, who for courteſie, humanitie, or deuotions ſake, will vouchſafe any entertainment vpon a ſtranger. Mindfull they haue alwayes bene of iniuries, but moſt forgetfull of benefiſts. Their mindes are perpetually poſſeſſed with vexation and ſtriſe, ſo that they will ſeldome or neuer ſhew themſelues tractable to any man; the cauſe whereof is ſuppoſed to be; for that they are ſo greedily addicted vnto their filthy lucre, that they neuer could attayne vnto any kind of ciuilitie or good behauiour.

The Shepheards of that Region liue a miſerable, toylſome, wretched and beggerly life: they are a rude people, and (as a man may ſay) borne and bred to theft, deceit, and brutiſh manners. Their young men may goe a wooing to diuers Maides, till ſuch time as they haue ſped of a wife. Yea, the father of the Maide moſt friendly welcommeth her Suiter; ſo that I thinke ſcarce any Noble or Gentleman among them can chuſe a Virgine for his Spouſe: albeit, ſo ſoone as any

Beginning at the West part of Africa, we will in this our Geographicall Historie proceed Eastward, till we come to the borders of Egypt.

Hea being one of the Prouinces of Maroco is bounded Westward and Northward with the maine Ocean, Southward with the Mountaines of Atlas, and Eastward with the Riuer which they call Esfinalo. This Riuer springeth out of the foresaid Mountaine, discharging it selfe at length into the Riuer of Tensift, and diuiding Hea from the Prouince next adjacent.

The Region of Hea lying vpon the West part of Africa.

The Region of Hea is an vneuen and rough soile, full of rockie Mountaines, shadie Woods, and Christall Streames in all places; being wonderfully rich, and well stored with Inhabitants. They haue in the said Region great abundance of Goats and Asses, but not such plentie of Sheep, Oxen, and Horses. All kind of Fruits are very scarce among them.

This People for the most part eateth Barly-bread vnleauened, which is like rather vnto a Cake, then to a Loafe: this Bread is baked in a kind of earthen Baking-pan.

Their Food.

The greatest part of them are clad in a kind of cloth Garment made of Wooll after the manner of a Couerlet, called in their Language, Elchise, and not vnlike vnto those Couerlets or Blankets which the Italians lay vpon their Beds. In these kind of Mantles they wrap themselves; and then are they girt with a woollen girdle, not about their waste, but about their hips. You may easily discerne which of them is married, and who is not: for an vnmarried man must alwayes keepe his Beard shauen, which, after hee bee once married, hee suffereth to grow at length. The said Region bringeth forth no great plentie of Horses, but those that it doth bring forth, are so nimble and full of mettall, that they will climbe like Cats over the steep and craggie Mountaines. These Horses are alwayes vnshod: and the People of this Region vse to till their ground with no other Cattell, but onely with Horses and Asses. You shall here find great store of Deere, of wild Goats, and of Hares. No good learning nor liberall Arts are here to be found; except it be a little skill in the Lawes, which some few challenge vnto themselves: otherwise you shall find not so much as any shadow of vertue among them. They haue neither Physician nor Surgeon of any learning or account. But if a disease or infirmitie befall any of them, they presently seare or cauterize the sicke partie with red hot Irons, euen as the Italians vse their Horses. Howbeit some Chyrurgians there are among them, whose dutie and occupation consisteth onely in circumcising of their male Children. Whosoever will trauell into a forraine Countrey must take either a Harlot, or a Wife, or a religious man of the contrary part, to beare him companie. They haue no regard at all of Iustice.

Cauterizing.

The ancient Citie of Tednest was built by the Africans vpon a most beautifull and large Plaine, which they inuironed with a loftie Wall built of Bricke and Lime. In this Citie there are no Innes, Stoues, nor Wine-tauernes: so that whatsoeuer Merchant goes thither, must seeke out some of his acquaintance to remaine withall: but if hee hath no friends nor acquaintance in the Towne, then the principall Inhabitants there cast lots who should entertaine the strange Merchant: insomuch that no Stranger, be he neuer so meane, shall want friendly entertainment, but is alwaies sumptuously and honourably accepted of. But whosoever is receiued as a Guest, must at his departure bestow some gift vpon his Host in token of thankfulness, to the end hee may be more welcome at his next returne. Howbeit if the said Stranger be no Merchant, hee may chuse what great mans house he will to lodge in, being bound at his departure to no recompence nor gift. To be short, if any Beggar or poore Pilgrim passe the same way, he hath some sustenance prouided for him in a certaine Hospitall, which was founded onely for the reliefe of poore people, and is maintained at the common charge of the Citie. In the midst of the Citie stands an ancient Temple, being most sumptuously built, and of an huge bignesse, which was thought to be founded at the very same time when as the King of Maroco bare rule in those places. This Temple hath a great Cisterne standing in the midst thereof, and it hath many Priests and such kind of People which giue attendance thereunto, and store it with things necessarie. In this Citie likewise are diuers other Temples, which, albeit they are but little, yet be they most cleanly and decently kept. There are in this Citie about an hundred Families of Iewes. My selfe saw this Citie vtterly ruined and defaced, the Walls thereof being laid euen with the ground, the Houses being destitute of Inhabitants, and nothing at that time to be there scene, but onely the nests of Rauens and of other Birds. All this I saw in the 930. yeere of the Hegeira.

Vpon the foot of an hill, eightene miles Eastward from Tednest, stands a Towne called by the Africans Teculeth, and containing about one thousand Housholds. Here also is to be seene a most stately and beautifull Temple; as likewise foure Hospitals, and a Monasterie of Religious persons. The Inhabitants of this Towne are farre wealthier then they of Tednest: for they haue a most famous Port vpon the Ocean Sea, commonly called by Merchants, Goz. They haue likewise great abundance of Corne and Pulse, which grow in the fruitfull fields adjacent. It was destroyed by the Portugals, 1514.

The Citie of Hadeccbis being situate vpon a Plaine, standeth eight miles Southward of Teculeth: it containeth seuen hundred Families: and the Walls, Churches, and Houses throughout this whole Citie are all built of Free-stone. They haue certaine yeerely Faires or Marts, wher-

But the Men beare a most sauage mind, being to extremely possessed with iealousie, that whomsoever they find but talking with their Wiues, they presently goe about to murder them. They haue no Iudges nor learned men among them, nor any which can assigne vnto the Citizens any Functions and Magistracies according to their worthinesse: so that he rules like a King that excelleth the residue in wealth. For matters of Religion, they haue certaine Mahumetan Priests. Who neither pay Tribute nor yeerely Custome, euen as they whom we last before mentioned. Here I was entertained by a certaine courteous and liberall minded Priest, who was exceedingly delighted with Arabian Poetrie. From hence I trauelled vnto Maroco. This Towne is situate vpon the top of a certaine high Mountaine which is distant eight miles to the South of Hadecchis: it consisteth of about two hundred Families. They are at continuall war with their neighbours, which is performed with such monstrous blood-shed and manslaughter, that they deserue rather the name of Beasts then of Men. They haue neither Iudges, Priests, nor Lawyers, to prescribe any forme of liuing among them, or to gouerne their Common-wealth: wherefore iustice and honestie is quite banished out of their habitations. Those Mountaines are altogether destitute of Fruits: howbeit they abound greatly with Honie, which serueth the Inhabitants both for Food, and for Merchandize to sell in the neighbour-Countries. And because they know not what seruice to put their Waxe vnto, they cast it forth, together with the other excrements of Honie. No People vnder Heauen can be more wicked, treacherous, or lewdly addicted, then this People is.

The Towne Tesegdel being situate vpon the top of a certaine high Mountaine, and naturally enuironed with an high Rocke in stead of a Wall, containeth more then eight hundred Families. It is distant from Tejant Southward about twelue miles, and it hath a Riuer running by it, the name whereof I haue forgotten. About this Towne of Tesegdel are most pleasant Gardens and Orchards, replenished with all kind of Trees, and especially with Walnut-trees. The Inhabitants are wealthie, hauing great abundance of Horses, neither are they constrained to pay any Tribute vnto the Arabians. There are continuall Warres betweene the Arabians and them, and that with great blood-shed and man-slaughter on both parts. The Villages lying neere vnto Tesegdel doe vsually carrie all their Graine thither, lest they should be deprived thereof by the Enemie, who maketh daily inrodes and inuasions vpon them. The Inhabitants of the foresaid Towne are much addicted vnto curtesie and ciuilitie; and for liberalitie and bountie vnto Strangers, they will suffer themselves to be inferiour to none other. At euery Gate of Tesegdel stand certaine Watch-men or Warders, which doe most louingly receiue all In-commers, enquiring of them, whether they haue any friends and acquaintance in the Towne, or no? If they haue none, then are they conducted to one of the best Innes of the Towne, and hauing had entertainment there, according to their degree and place, they are friendly dismissed: and whatsoever his expences come to, the Stranger payes nought at all, but his charges are defrayed out of the common Purse. This People of Tesegdel are subiect also vnto iealousie: howbeit they are most faithfull keepers of their promise. In the very midst of the Towne stands a most beautifull and stately Temple, whereunto belong a certaine number of Mahumetan Priests.

The most ancient Citie of Tagtefs is built round, and standeth vpon the top of an Hill: on the sides whereof are certaine winding steps hewen out of the hard Rocke. It is about fourteene miles distant from Tesegdel. By the foot of the said Hill runnes a Riuer, whereout the Women of Tagtefs draw their water, neither haue the Citizens any other drinke: and although this Riuer be almost sixe miles from Tagtefs, yet a man would thinke, looking downe from the Citie vpon it, that it were but halfe a mile distant. The way leading vnto the said Riuer being cut out of the Rocke, in forme of a paire of Staires, is very narrow. While I was in that Countrey, there came such a swarme of Locusts, that they deuoured the greatest part of their Cornes which were as then ripe: insomuch that all the vpper part of the ground was couered with Locusts. Which was in the yeere of the Hegira 919. that is, in the yeere of our Lord 1510.

Fifteene miles Southward from Tagtefs stands another Towne called Eidenet. In the said Towne are Jewes of all Occupations: and some there are which affirme, that the first Inhabitants of this Towne came by naturall descent from King Dauid: but so soone as the Mahumetan Religion had infected that place, their owne Law and Religion ceased. Here are great store of most cunning Lawyers, which are perfectly well seene in the Lawes and constitutions of that Nation: for, I my selfe saw a very aged man, who could most readily repeat a whole Volume written in their Language, called by them Elmudevnaana, that is to say, the Bodie of the whole Law. The said Volume is diuided into three Tomes, wherein all difficult questions are dissolued: together with certaine Counsels or Commentaries of a famous Author, which they call Melic.

This

This Culeibat Elmuridin is a Castle built vpon the top of a certaine high Mountaine, hauing round about it diuers other Mountaines of a like heighth, which are enuironed with craggie Rocks and huge Woods. There is no passage vnto this Castle, but onely a certaine narrow path vpon one side of the Mountaine. By the one side thereof stands a Rocke, and vpon the other-side the Mountaine of Tesegdelt is within halfe a mile, and it is distant from Endeuet almost eightene miles. This Castle was built euen in our time by a certaine Apostata, or renouncer of the Mahumetan religion, called by them Homar Seijef; who being first a Mahumetan Preacher vnto the people, propounded vnto a great number of Disciples and Sectaries, whom hee had drawn to be of his opinion, certain new points of religion. This fellow seeing that he preuailed so 10 with his Disciples, that they esteemed him for some petty-god, became of a false Preacher a most cruell tyrant, and his gouernment lasted for twelue yeares. Hee was the chiefe cause of the destruction and ruine of the whole Prouince. At length he was slaine by his owne wife, because he had vnlawfully lien with her daughter which she had by her former husband. And then was his peruerse and lewd dealing laid open vnto all men: for hee is reported to haue been vtterly ignorant of the lawes, and of all good knowledge. Wherefore not long after his decease, all the inhabitants of the region gathering their forces together, slew euery one of his Disciples and false Sectaries. Howbeit, the Nephew of the said Apostata was left aliue; who afterward in the same Castle endured a whole yeares siege of his aduersaries, and repelled them, insomuch that they were constrained to depart. Yea, euen vntill this day he molesteth the people of Hea, and those which inhabite neere vnto him, with continuall warre, liuing vpon robberie and spoile;
 20 for which purpose he hath certaine Horsemen, which are appointed to watch and to pursue trauellers, sometimes taking Cattell, and sometimes men captiues. He hath likewise certaine Gunners, who, although trauellers be a good distance off (for the common high-way standeth almost a mile from the Castle) will put them in great feare. Howbeit, all people doe so deadly hate him, that they will not suffer him to till one foote of ground, or to beare any dominion without the said Mountaine. This man hath caused his Grandfathers body to be honourably buried in his Castle, suffering him to be adored of his people, as if he were a God. Passing by that way vpon a certaine time, I escaped their very bullets narrowly.

The greatest part of the people of Hea dwelleth vpon mountaines, some whereof being called Ideuacal (for so are they named) inhabite vpon that part of Atlas, which stretcheth it selfe from the Ocean Sea Eastward, as farre as Igilingil; and this ridge of mountaines diuideth Hea
 30 from Sus. The breadth of this mountaine is three dayes journey. It is replenished with inhabitants and country Villages. Their ordinarie food is Barly, Goates-flesh, and Hony. Shirts they weare none at all, nor yet any other garments which are sowne together; for there is no man among them which knoweth how to vse the needle; but such apparell as they haue, hangeth by a knot vpon their shoulders. Their women weare silver rings vpon their eares, some three, and some more. They haue silver buttons of so great a scantling, that each one weigheth an ounce, wherewith they fasten their apparell vpon their shoulders, to the end it may not fall off. The nobler and richer sort of people among them weare silver rings vpon their fingers and leggs; but such as are poore, weare rings only of iron or of copper. There are likewise certaine Horses in this Region, being so smal of stature and so swift, as it is wonderfull. Here may you find great plentie
 40 of wild Goats, Hares, & Deere, and yet none of the people are delighted in hunting. Many fountaines are here to be found, and great abundance of trees, but especially of Walnut-trees. The greater part of this people liueth after the Arabians manner, often changing their places of habitation. A kind of Daggers they vse, which are broad and crooked like a wood-knife; and their Swords are as thicke as Siches, wherewith they mow Hay. When they goe to the warres, they carrie three or foure hunting Toyles with them. In all the said mountaine are neither Iudges, Priests, or Temples to be found. So ignorant they are of learning, that not one among them either loueth, or embraceth the same. They are all most lewd and wicked people, and apply their minds vnto all kind of villanie. It was told the Seriffo in my presence, that the foresaid mountaine was able to afford twentie thousand souldiers for a neede.

This mountaine also is a part of Atlas, beginning from the mountaine last before mentioned, and extending it selfe Eastward for the space of about fiftie miles, as farre as the mountaine of Niff, in the Territorie of Maroco; and it diuideth a good part of Hea from the Region of Sus before named. It aboundeth with inhabitants, which are of a most barbarous and sauage disposition. Horses they haue great plentie: they goe to warre oftentimes with the Arabians which border vpon them; neither will they permit any of the said Arabians to come within their Dominions. There are no Townes nor Castles vpon all this mountaine: howbeit, they haue certaine Villages and Cottages, wherein the better sort doe hide their heads. Great store of Noblemen or Gouernours they haue in all places, vnto whom the residue are very obedient. Their ground yeeldeth Barly and Mill in abundance: They haue euerie where many fountaines, which being disperfed ouer the whole Prouince, doe at length issue into that Riuer, which is called in their language Siffaia. Their apparell is somewhat decent: also they possesse great quantitie of 60 Iron, which is from thence transported into other places; and these people are well giuen to thrift and good husbandrie. Great numbers of Iewes remaine in this Region, which liue as stipendarie souldiers vnder diuers Princes, and are continually in Armes; and they are reputed and called by other Iewes in Africa, Carraum; that is to say, Heretikes. They haue store of Boxe, of Mastick, and of high Walnut-trees. Vnto their Argans (for so they call a kind of Oliues which they haue) they put nuts; out of which two simples they expresse very bitter Oyle, vsing it for a sauce to some of their meates, and powring it into their lampes. I heard diuers of their principall men auouch, that they were able to bring into the field fve and twenty thousand most expert souldiers.

This mountaine is not to be accounted any part of Atlas: for it beginneth Northward from the Ocean, and Southward it extendeth to the Riuer of Tensift, and diuideth Hea from Duccala and Maroco. The inhabitants are called Regraga. Vpon this hill are waste Defarts, cleare Fountaines, and abundance of hony, and of Oyle Arganick, but of Corne and Pulse great scarcitie, vnlesse they make prouision thereof out of Duccala. Few rich men are here to bee found, but they are all most deuout and religious after their manner. Vpon the top of this mountaine are many Hermites, which liue onely vpon the fruites of certaine trees, and drinke water. They are a most faithfull and peaceable Nation. Whosoever among them is apprehended for theft or any other crime, is forthwith banished the countrey for certaine yeares. So great is their simplicitie, that whatsoever they see the Hermites doe, they esteeme it as a miracle. They are much oppressed with the often inuasions of their neighbours the Arabians; wherefore this quiet Nation choose rather to pay yearely tribute, then to maintaine warre.

Now comes the Region of Sns to be considered of, being situate beyond Atlas, ouer against the Territorie of Hea, that is to say, in the extreme part of Africa. Westward it beginneth from the Ocean Sea, and Southward from the Sandie Defarts: on the North it is bounded with the vtmost Towne of Hea; and on the East with that mightie Riuer whereof the whole Region is named. Wherefore beginning from the West, we will describe all those Cities and places which shall seeme to be worthy of memorie.

Three small Townes were built by the ancient Africans vpon the Sea shoare (each being a mile distant from other) in that very place where Atlas takes his beginning: all which three are called by one onely name, to wit, Messa; and are inuironed with a wall built of white stones. Through these three runneth a certaine great Riuer, called Sns, in their language: this Riuer in Summer is so destitute of water, that a man may easily without perill passe ouer it on foote; but it is not so in the Winter-time. They haue then certaine small barkes, which are not meete to saile vpon this Riuer. The place where the foresaid three Townes are situate, aboundeth greatly with Palme trees, neither haue they in a manner any other wealth; and yet their Dates are but of small worth, because they will not last about one yeare. All the inhabitants exercise husbandry, especially in the moneths of September and Aprill, what time their Riuer encreaseth.

And in May their Corne groweth to ripenesse. But if in the two foresaid moneths the Riuer encreaseth not according to the wonted manner, their haruest is then nothing worth. Cattell are very scarce among them. Not farre from the sea-side they haue a Temple, which they greatly esteeme and honour. Out of which, Historiographers say, that the same Prophet, of whom their great Mahumet foretold, should proceed. Yea, some there are which sticke not to affirme, that the Prophet Iudas was cast forth by the Whale vpon the shoare of Messa, when he was sent to preach vnto the Ninuites. The rafters and beames of the said Temple are of Whales bone. And it is a vsuall thing amongst them, to see Whales of an huge and monstrous bignesse cast vp dead vpon their shoare, which by reason of their hugenesse and strange deformitie, may terrifie and astonish the beholders. The common people imagine, that, by reason of a certaine secret power and vertue infused from heauen by God vpon the said temple, each Whale which would swim past it, can by no meanes escape death. Which opinion had almost perswaded me, especially when at my being there, I my selfe saw a mighty Whale cast vp, vnlesse a certaine Iew had told me, that it was no such strange matter: for (quoth he) there lie certaine rockes two miles into the Sea on either side, and as the Sea moues, so the Whales moue also; and if they chance to light vpon a rocke, they are easily wounded to death, and so are cast vpon the next shoare. This reason more preuailed with me, then the opinion of the people. My selfe (I remember) being in this Region at the same time when my Lord the Seriffo bare rule ouer it, was inuited by a certaine Gentleman, and was by him conducted into a Garden, where he shewed me a Whales rib of so great a size, that lying vpon the ground with the connexe or bowing side vpward, in manner of an arch, it resembled a gate, the hollow or inward part whereof aloft we could not touch with our heads, as we rode vpon our Camels backs: this rib (he said) had laine there about an hundred yeares, and was kept as a miracle. Here may you find vpon the sea-shore great store of Amber, which the Portugal and Fessan Merchants fetch from thence for a verie meane price: for they scarcely pay a Duckat for a whole ounce of most choise and excellent Amber. Amber (as some thinke) is made of Whales dung, and (as others suppose) of their Sperma or Seede, which being consolidate and hardned by the Sea, is cast vpon the next shoare.

Teyent containeth foure thousand families, and standeth not farre from the Riuer of Sns. The soyle soyle adiacent is most fruitfull for graine, for Barly, and for all kind of Pulse. They haue here likewise a good quantitie of Sugar growing; howbeit, because they know not how to presse, boyle, and trim it, they cannot haue it but blacke and vnfaurie: wherefore so much as they can spare, they sell vnto the Merchants of Maroco, of Fez, and of the land of Negros. Of Dates likewise they haue plentie; neither vse they any mony besides the Gold which is digged out of their own natiue soile. The women weare vpon their heads a piece of cloth worth a duckat. Siluer they haue none, but such as their women adorne themselves with. The least Iron-coin vfed amongst them, weigheth almost an ounce. No fruites take plentifully vpon their soile but onely Figgs, Grapes, Peaches, and Dates. Here is that excellent Leather dressed, which is called Leather of

That part of this Region which lieth toward Atlas hath many Villages, Townes, and Hamlets: but the South part thereof is vtterly destitute of inhabitants, and subiect to the Arabians, which border vpon it. In the midst of this Citie standeth a faire and stately Temple, which they call The greatest, and The chiefest, through the verie midst whereof they haue caused a part of the foresaid Riuer to runne. The inhabitants are sterne and vnciuill, being so continually exercised in warres, that they haue not one day of quiet. Each part of the Citie hath a feuerall Captaine and Gouvernour, who all of them together doe rule the Common-wealth: but their authoritie continueth neuer aboue three moneths, which being expired, three other are chosen in their roome.

For when the Family of Marin gouerned at Fez, part of them also inhabited Sus, and in those dayes Sus was the seate of the King of Fez his Vice-roy. All authoritie is committed vnto their Noble, or principall men, who gouerne foure by foure, fixe moneths onely.

The Citizens are great louers of peace, and of all ciuilitie: and they haue a flourishing Common-wealth. The whole Citie

Here dwell many Iewes, which are most cunning Gold-smiths, Carpenters, and such like Artificers. They haue a very stately Temple, and many Priests and Doctors of the Law, which are maintained at the publike charge. Euery Munday great numbers of Arabians both of the Plaines, and of the Mountaines come hither to Market.

The Citie of Taganost.

In all Sus there is no Citie comparable vnto that which is commonly called Taganost, for it containeth aboue eight thousand households; the wall thereof is built of rough stones. From the Ocean it is distant about threescore miles, and about fiftie miles Southward of Atlas: and the report is, that the Africans built this Citie. About ten miles from this place lieth the Riuer of

They haue continuall ciuill warres among themselves, and one part haue the Arabians alwaies on their side; who for better pay will take part sometime with one side, and sometime with the contrarie. Of Corne and Cattell here is great abundance; but their Wooll is exceeding course. In this Citie are made certaine kinds of apparell, which are vsually carried for merchandize once a yeere to Tombuto, to Gualata, and to other places in the land of Negros. Their Market is twice euery weeke: their attire is somewhat decent and comely: their women are beautifull: but their men are of a tawnie and swart colour, by reason they are descended of blacke fathers, and white mothers.

50 The Mountaine Hanchisa beginneth Westward from Atlas, and from thence stretcheth almost fortie mile as Eastward. The inhabitants of this Mountaine are such valiant foot-men, that one of them will encounter two Horsemen. The soile will yeeld no Corne at all but Barly; howbeit hony there is in great abundance. With snow they are almost at all times troubled: but how patiently and strongly they can endure the cold, a man may easily ghesse, for that the whole yeare throughout they weare one single garment onely.

The Mountaine Ilalem beginneth Westward from the Mountaine afore said; on the East it abutteth vpon the region of Guzula, and Southward vpon the Plaines of Sus. The inhabitants are valiant, hauing great store of Horses. They are at continuall warre among themselves for certaine Siluer mines; so that those which haue the better hand, digge as much Siluer as they can, and distribute to euery man his portion, vntill such time as they bee restrained from digging droues and flocks of Cattell : it is greene euery where, and most fertile of all things, which serue for foode, or which delight the senses of smelling or seeing. It is altogether a plaine country.

Tenessa.

Vpon a certaine hill of Atlas named Ghedm standeth a towne, which was built (as some report) by the ancient Africans, and called by the name of Tenessa, being a most strong and defensible place, and being distant about eight miles Eastward from the riuer of Asfinuall. At the foot of the said hill lieth a most excellent plaine, which, were it not for the lewd theewith Arabians, would yeeld an incomparable crop. And because the inhabitants of Tenessa are deprived of this notable commodity, they till onely that ground which is vpon the side of the mountaine, and which lieth betweene the towne and the riuer. Neither doe they enioy that gratis; for they yeerely pay vnto the Arabians for tribute the third part of their corne.

The new towne of Delgumuba.

Vpon the top of a certaine high mountaine was built in our time a most large and impregnable Fort, being inuironed on all sides with diuers other mountaines, and called by the inhabitants New Delgumuba. Beneath the said mountaine springeth Asfinuall, which word signifieth the African tongue, the Riuer of Rumor, because that breaking forth by the side of the hill with a monstrous noise, it maketh a most deepe gulfe, much like vnto that, which the Italians call Inferno di Truoli. The said Fort containeth almost a thousand families. They haue alwayes beene great louers of ciuility, and haue worne neat and decent apparell; neither shall you find any corner in the whole towne which is not well peopled. In this towne are plentie of Artificers, for it is but fiftie miles from the City of Maroco.

The Citie of Imizmizi.

Vpon a certaine part of Atlas standeth a Citie called Imizmizi. Westward it is distant from new Delgumuba about fourteene miles: and this citie the Arabians are reported to haue built. Neere vnto this Citie lieth the common high way to Guzula ouer the mountaines of Atlas, being commonly called Burris, that is, A way strewed with feathers: because snow falls often there vpon, which a man would thinke rather to be feathers then snow. Not farre from this towne likewise there is a very faire and large plaine, which extendeth for the space of thirtie miles, euen to the territory of Maroco. This most fertile plaine yeeldeth such excellent corne, as (to my remembrance) I neuer saw the like. Saying that the Arabians and souldiers of Maroco doe so much molest the said plaine countrey, that the greater part thereof is destitute of the inhabitants:

* Obscurum.

This noble City of Maroco in Africa is accounted to be one of the greatest cities in the world. It is built vpon a most large field, being about fourteene miles distant from Atlas. One Ioseph the sonne of Tesfin, and king of the tribe or people called Luntuna, is reported to haue beene the founder of this Citie, at that very time when he conducted his troupes into the region of Maroco, and settled himselfe not farre from the common high-way, which stretcheth from Agmeg ouer the mountaines of Atlas, to those desarts where the foresaid tribe or people doe usually inhabit. Heere may you behold most stately and wonderfull workmanship: for all their buildings are so cunningly and artificially contriued, that a man cannot easily describe the same. This huge & mighty City, at such time as it was gouerned by Hali the son of King Ioseph, contained moe then one hundred thousand families. It had foure and twenty gates belonging therto, and a wall of great strength and thicknes, which was built of white stone and lime. From this City the riuer of Tensift lieth about fixe miles distant. Heere may you behold great abundance of Temples, of Colledges, of Bath-stoues, and of Innes, all framed after the fashion and custome of that region. Some were built by the King of the tribe of Luntuna, and others by Elmnochidin his successor: but the most curious and magnificent Temple of all, is that in the midst of the City which was built by Hali the first King of Maroco, and the sonne of Ioseph aforesaid, being commonly called the Temple of Hali ben Ioseph. Howbeit one Abdul-Mumen which succeeded him, to the end he might vtterly abolish the name of Hali, and might make himselfe onely famous with posterity, caused this stately Temple of Maroco to be razed, and to be reedified somewhat more sumptuously then before. Howbeit he lost not onely his expences, but failed of his purpose also: for the common people euen till this day doe call the said Temple by the first and ancientest name.

Likewise in this City not farre from a certaine rocke was built a Temple by him that was the second vsurper ouer the kingdome of Maroco: after whose death his nephew Mansor enlarged the said Temple fiftie cubits on all sides, and adorned the same with many pillars, which he commanded to be brought out of Spaine for that purpose. Vnder this Temple he made a Cisterne or vault as bigge as the Temple it selfe: the rooffe of the said Temple he couered with lead: and at euery corner he made leaden pipes to conuay raine water into the Cisterne vnderneath the Temple. The turret or steeple is built of most hard and well framed stone, like vnto Vespasian his Amphitheatrum at Rome, containing in compasse moe then an hundreth elles, and in height exceeding the steeple of Bononia. The staires of the said turret or steeple are each of them nine handfuls in breadth, the vtmost side of the wall is ten, and the thicknes of the turret is sixe. The said turret hath seuen lofts, vnto which the staires ascending are very lightsome: for there are great store of windowes, which to the end they may giue more light, are made broader within then without. Vpon the top of this turret is built a certaine spire or pinnacle rising sharpe sharpe in forme of a sugar-loafe, and containing five and twenty elles in compasse, but in height being not much more then two speares length: the said spire hath three lofts one aboue another; vnto euery of which they ascend with wooden ladders. Likewise on the top of this spire standeth a golden halfe moone, vpon a barre of Iron, with three spheares of gold vnder it; which golden spheares are so fastened vnto the said iron bar that the greatest is lowest, and the least highest. It would make a man giddie to looke downe from the top of the turret; for men walking on the ground, be they neuer so tall, seeme no bigger then a child of one yeere old. From hence likewise may you plainly escrie the promontory of Azaphi, which notwithstanding is an hundredth and thirtie miles distant. But mountaines (you will say) by reason of their huge bignesse

10 may easily be seene a farre off: howbeit from this turret a man may in cleere weather most easily see fiftie miles into the plaine countreys. The inner part of the said Temple is not very beautiful. But the rooffe is most cunningly and artificially vaulted, the timbers being framed and set together with singular workmanship, so that I haue not seene many fairer Temples in all Italy. And albeit you shall hardly find any Temple in the whole world greater then this, yet it is very meanly frequented; for the people doe neuer assemble there but onely vpon fridayer. Yea a great part of this City, especially about the aforesaid Temple lieth so desolate & void of inhabitants, that a man cannot without great difficulty passe, by reason of the ruines of many houses lying in the way. Vnder the porch of this Temple it is reported that in old time there were almost an hundredth shops of sale-bookes, and as many on the other side ouer against them: but at this time I thinke there is not one Book-seller in all the whole City to be found. And scarcely is the third

Within the wals of Maroco are Vines, Palme-trees, great Gardens, and most fruitfull Cornefields: for without their wals they can till no ground, by reason of the Arabians often inrodes.

State of it 1526.

Know ye this for a certainty, that the said City is growen to vntimely decay and old age: for scarcely five hundredth and sixe yeeres are past, since the first building thereof, forasmuch as the foundations thereof were laid in the time of Ioseph the sonne of Tesfin, that is to say, in the foure hundredth twentieth and fourth yeere of the Hegeira. Which decay I can impute to none other cause, but to the iniurie of continuall warres, and to the often alterations of Magistrates and of the common-wealth. After King Ioseph succeeded his sonne Hali, and the sonne of Hali was ordained gouernour after his fathers decease. In whose time sprung vp a factious crue, by the 30 meanes of a certaine Mahumetan Preacher named Elmaheli, being a man both borne and brought vp in the mountaines. The said Elmaheli hauing leuied a great army, waged warre against Abraham his soueraigne Lord. Whereupon King Abraham conducting another armie against him, had marueilous ill successe: and after the battell ended, his passage into the City of Maroco was so stopped and restrained, that he was forced with a few souldiers, which remained yet aliue, to flee Eastward to the mountaines of Atlas. But Elmaheli not being satisfied with expelling his true Soueraigne out of his owne Kingdome, commanded one of the Captaines called Abdul Mumen, with the one halfe of his armie to pursue the distressed King, while himself with the other halfe laide siege to Maroco. The king with his followers came at length vnto Oran, hoping there to haue renewed his forces. But Abdul Mumen and his great armie pursued the said King so narrowly, that the Citizens of Oran told him in plaine termes, that they would not hazard

40 themselves for him. Wherefore this unhappie King being vtterly driuen to dispaire, set his Queene on horse-backe behind him, and so in the night time road forth of the Citie. But perceiving that hee was discried and knowen by his enemies, he fled forthwith vnto a certaine rocke standing vpon the sea-shore: where, setting spurs to his horse-side, he cast himselfe, his most deare spouse, and his horse downe headlong, and was within a while after found slaine among the rockes and stones, by certaine which dwelt neere vnto the place. Wherefore Abdul Mumen hauing gotten the victorie, returned in triumphant manner toward Maroco, where the foresaid Elmaheli was deceased before his comming, in whose place Abdal was chosen King and Mahumetan Prelate ouer the fortie disciples, and tooke ten persons to be of his priuy counsell, which was a new inuention in the law of Mahumet. This Abdul Mumen hauing besieged

50 the Citie of Maroco for the space of an whole yeere, at last ouercame it: and killing Isaac the onely sonne of King Abraham with his owne hand, he commanded all the souldiers, and a good part of the Citizens to be slaine. This mans posteritie reigned from the five hundred sixteenth, to the sixe hundred sixtie eight yeere of the Hegeira, and at length they were dispossessed of the Kingdome by a certaine King of the Tribe called Marin. The family of Marin after the said Kings decease bare rule till the yeere of the Hegeira, seven hundredth eightie and five. The principall court of this family was holden for the most part at Fez; but ouer Maroco were appointed Vice-royes and Deputies: insomuch that Fez was continually the head and Metropolitane Citie of all Mauritania, and of all the Westerne dominion.

New Sect.

60 In the said City of Maroco is a most impregnable Castle, which, if you consider the bignes, the walls, the towres, and the gates built all of perfect marble, you may well thinke it to be a City rather then a Castle. Within this Castle there is a stately Temple, hauing a most loftie and high steeple, on the top whereof standeth an halfe moone, and vnder the halfe moone are three golden spheares one bigger then another, which all of them together weigh one hundreth and thirty thousand ducates. Some Kings there were, who being allured with the value, went about to take downe the said golden spheares: but they had alwayes some great misfortune or other, which hindred their attempt: Likewise the said Castle containeth a noble Colledge, which hath thirtie Hals belonging thereunto. In the midst whereof is one Hall of a marvellous greatnesse, wherein publike Lectures were most solemnly read, while the studie of Learning flourished among them. Such as were admitted into this Colledge had their victuals and apparell freely giuen them. Of their Professours some were yearly allowed an hundred, and some two hundred Duckats, according to the qualitie of their profession: neither would they admit any to heare them read, but such as perfectly vnderstood what belonged to those Arts which they professed. The wals of this beautifull Hall are most stately adorned with painting and caruing, especially of that Hall where Lectures were woont publikely to be read. All their Porches and vaulted Roofes are made of painted and glittering stones, called in their Language Ezzulleia, such as are yet vsed in Spain. In the midst of the said building is a most pleasant and cleare Fountaine, the wall whereof is of white and polished Marble, albeit low built, as in Africa for the most part such wals are. I haue heard that in old time here was great abundance of Students, but at my being there I found but five in all: and they haue now a most senselesse Professour, and one that is quite void of all humanitie.

Moreover, the foresaid Castle (as I remember) hath twelue Courts most curiously and artificially built by one Mansor. In the first lodged about five hundred Christians, which carryed Crosse-bowes before the King whither soeuer he went. Not farre from thence is the lodging of the Lord Chancellour and of the Kings Priue Counsell, which House is called by them, The House of Affaires. The third is called, The Court of Victorie; wherein all the Armour and Munition of the Citie is layed vp. The fourth, belongeth to the great Master of the Kings Horse. Vpon this Court three Stables adioyne, each one of which Stables will containe two hundred Horses. Likewise there are two other Ostleries, whereof one is for Mules, and the other for an hundred of the Kings Horses onely. Next vnto the Stables were two Barnes or Garners adioynning in two seuerall places, in the lower of which Barnes was layed Straw, and Barley in the other. There is also another most large place to lay vp Corne in, euery Roome whereof will containe more then three hundred Bushels. The couer of the said Roome hath a certaine hole whereunto they ascend by staires made of stone. Whither the beasts laden with Corne being come, they powre the said Corne into the hole. And so when they would take any Corne from thence, they doe but open certaine holes below, suffering so much Corne to come forth as may serue their turnes, and that without any labour at all. There is likewise a certaine other Hall, where the Kings Sonne, and the Sonnes of Noblemen are instructed in Learning. Then may you behold a certaine foure-square building, containing diuers Galleries with faire Glasse Windowes, in which Galleries are many Histories most curiously painted: heere likewise the glittering and gilt Armour is to be seene. Next vnto this building is another, wherein certaine of the Kings Guard are lodged: then followes that wherein State-matters are discussed: whereunto adioyneth also another, which is appointed for Ambassadors to conferre with the Kings Priue Counsell in. Likewise the Kings Concubines and other Ladies of Honour haue a most conuenient place assigned them: next vnto which standeth the Lodging of the Kings Sonnes. Not farre from the Castle wall, on that side which is next vnto the fields, may you behold a most pleasant and large Garden, containyng almost all kind of Trees that can be named.

Moreover, there is a sumptuous and stately Porch built of most excellent square Marble: in the midst whereof standeth a Pillar with a Lion very artificially made of Marble, out of the mouth of which Lion issueth most cleere and Christall water, falling into a Cisterne within the Porch: at each corner of the said Porch standeth the Image of a Leopard framed of white Marble, which is naturally adorned with certaine blacke spots: this kind of parti-coloured Marble is nowhere to be found but onely in a certaine place of Atlas, which is about an hundred and fiftie miles distant from Maroco. Not farre from the Garden stands a certaine Wood or Parke walled round about: And here I thinke no kind of wild beasts are wanting: for heere you may behold Elephants, Lions, Stagges, Roes, and such like: howbeit the Lions are separated in a certaine place from other beasts, which place euen to this day is called The Lions Den. Wherefore such Monuments of Antiquitie as are yet extant in Maroco, albeit they are but few, doe notwithstanding sufficiently argue, what a Noble Citie it was in the time of Mansor.

At this present all the Courts and Lodgings before described lye vtterly voyd and desolate: except perhaps some of the Kings Ostlery which tend his Mules and Horses do lye in that Court, which we said euen now was to lodge Archers and Crosse-bow-men: all the residue are left for the Fowles of the Aire to nestle in. That Garden which you might haue named a Paradise in old time, is now become a place where the filth and dung of the whole Citie is cast forth. Where the faire and stately Librarie was of old, at this present there is nothing else to be found, but Hens, Doves, and other such like Fowles, which build their Nests there. Certaine it is, that the foresaid Mansor, whom we haue so often mentioned, was a most puissant and mighty Prince: for it is well knowne that his Dominion stretched from the Towne of Messa to the Kingdome of Tripolis in Barbarie, which is the most excellent Region of Africa, and so large, that a man can hardly trauell the length thereof in fourescore and ten dayes, or the breadth in fiftene. This Mansor likewise was in times past Lord of all the Kingdome of Granada in Spaine. Yea, his Dominion in Spaine extended from Tariffa to Aragon, and ouer a great part of Castilia and of Portugall. Neither did this Iacob, surnamed Mansor, only possesse the foresaid Dominions; but also his Grand-father Abdul Mumen, his father Ioseph, and his Sonne Mahumet Enasir, who beeing vanquished in the Kingdome of Valentia, lost threescore thousand Souldiers, Horsemen and 10 Footmen: howbeit himselfe escaped and returned to Maroco. The Christians being encouraged with this victorie, refrayned not from Warre, till, within thirtie yeares space, they had wonne all the Townes following, to wit, Valentia, Denia, Alcauro, Murcia, Cartagena, Cordona, Similia, Iaen, and Vbeda. After which vnhappy warre succeeded the decay of Maroco. The said Mahumet deceasing, left behind him ten Sonnes of a full and perfect age, who contended much about the Kingdome. Hereupon it came to passe, while the Brethren were at discord, and assailed each other with mutuall warres, that the people of Fez called Marini, and the Inhabitants of other Regions adiacent, began to vsurpe the Government. The people called Habdulwad enioyed Tremizen, expelling the King of Tunis, and ordaining some other, whom they pleased, in his stead. Now haue you heard the end of Mansor his Progenie and Successors. The Kingdome therefore was translated vnto one Iacob the Sonne of Habdulach, who was the first King of the Family called Marin. And at length the famous Citie of Maroco it selfe, by reason of the Arabians continuall out-rages, fell into most extreme calamitie: so great is the inconstancie of all earthly things. That which we haue here reported as touching Maroco, partly wee saw with our owne eyes, partly we reade in the Historie of one Ibnu Abdul Malich, a most exact

ginneth almost from Atlas, is distant from Maroco about foure and twentie miles. In times past, when Myachidin was Prince thereof, it containd more then fixe thousand Families: at what time the people were very ciuill, and had such plentie and magnificence of all things, that 30 many would not sticke to compare this Towne with the Citie of Maroco. It had on all sides most pleasant Gardens, and great store of Vines, whereof some grew vpon the Mountaine it selfe, and others on the Valley. By the foot of this Hill runneth a faire Riuer, which springing forth of Atlas falleth at length into Tensift. The field which lyeth neere vnto this Riuer is said to be so fruitfull, that it yeeldeth euery yeere fiftie fold increase. The water of this Riuer looketh alwaies white.

The Towne of Agmet.

Howbeit the Citie of Agmet, which I haue now described vnto, hath at this day no other Inhabitants but Woolues, Foxes, Deere, and such other wilde beasts. Except onely at my being there I found a certaine Hermite, who was attended vpon by an hundred persons of his owne Sect: all of them were well-horsed, and did their best endeour to become Gouvernours and 40 Commanders; but their forces were insufficient. With this Hermite I staid (as I remember) for the space of ten dayes, and found one amongst his followers, with whom I had old acquaintance, and familiaritie: for we were certaine fellow-students together at Fez, where beeing of one standing and senioritie, we heard that Booke of the Mahumetan Religion expounded which is commonly called the Epistle of Nensesi.

The desolation of Agmet.
Hermite.

Having before described all the Cities and Townes of Maroco, it now remayneth that wee briefly declare the situation and qualitie of the Mountaines there. Wherefore wee will beginne with the Mountaine of Nifisa, from whence the Region of Maroco it selfe beginneth Westward, and is thereby diuided from the Prouince of Hsa. The said Mountaine hath great store of Inhabitants: and albeit the tops thereof are continually couered with Snow; yet doth it 50 yearely affoord maruellous increase and abundance of Barley. The rude people there are so destitute of all humanitie and ciuill behauiour, that they doe admire not onely all Strangers, but also doe euen gaze and wonder at their apparell. I my selfe remayned two dayes among them, in which space all the people of the Towne came flocking about mee, greatly wondring at the white Garment which I wore (being such as the learned men of our Countrey are vsually clad in) so that euery one being desirous to handle and view this Garment of mine, in two dayes it was turned from white to blacke, and became all greasie and filthy.

The Mountaine of Nifisa.

At the bounds of Nifisa, a certaine other Mountaine called by the Inhabitants Semedé, taketh his originall: and these two Mountaines are separated by the Riuer of Sesaua. Semedé extendeth East-ward almost twentie miles, the Inhabitants whereof are most base and witlesse people. Great store of Springs and Fountaines are here to be found; the Snow is perpetuall; all good Lawes, Ciuitie and honestie are quite banished from hence, except perhaps the people be moued thereunto by the aduice of some stranger, whom they find to be of a modest and sober disposition. Here being entertayned by a certaine religious man of the same place (who was had in great reputation by the people) I was constrained to eate of such grosse meats as the said people are accustomed vnto, to wit, of Barley meale mingled with water, and of Goats-flesh, which was extremely tough and hard by reason of the staleness and long continuance. After Supper we had no other Bed but the bare ground to lye vpon.

John Leo con-strayned to play the Iudge.

The next morning being readie to take Horse, and desirous to depart, fiftie of the people came about me, laying open each man their Causes and Suites vnto me, as our people vse to do before a Iudge. Vnto whom I answered, that I had neuer in all my life either knowne or heard of the manners and customes of that Region. Forth-with comes one of the chiefe men amongst them, affirming that it was their custome neuer to dismisse any Stranger, till hee had both heard and thoroughly decided all the Quarrels and Controuersies of the Inhabitants. Which words he had no sooner vttered, but immediately my Horse was taken from me. Wherefore I was constrayned for nine dayes, and so many nights, longer to abide the penurie and miserie of that Region. Moreouer, my trouble was the greater, for that, in such abundance of Suites and Affaires, there was not one man present, which could set downe so much as a word in writing: wherefore I my selfe was fayne to play both the Iudge and the Notarie.

Vpon the eight day they all of them promised to bestow some great Reward vpon mee. Wherefore the night following seemed vnto me a yeare long: for I was in good hope, the next morrow to haue receiued a masse of Gold from my Clients. So soone as the next day began to dawne, they placed me in a certaine Church-porch: whither, after an vsuall and short Prayer ended, each man full reuerently presented his gift vnto me. Here some offered me a Cocke, others brought me Nuts and Onions, and some others bestowed a handfull of Garlicke vpon me. The principall and head-men amongst them presented mee with a Goat; and so by reason that there was no money in all the said Mountayne, they proffered mee not one farthing for my paines: wherefore all the said gifts I bequeathed vnto mine Host for his worthy entertayning of me. And this was all the notable reward which I reaped in regard of so great and intolerable paines. All things being thus dispatched, they sent fiftie Horsemen to accompany and guard me from Theeues in that dangerous way.

The Mountain called Sensana.

This Mountaine of Sensana taketh his beginning where Semedé endeth, out of which springeth a certaine Riuer, hauing one name with the said Mountaine from whence it proceedeth. Neuer were the tops of this Mountaine seene destitute of Snow. The Inhabitants leade a brutish and sauage life, waging continuall warre with their next Neighbours: for which purpose they vse neither Swords, lauelins, nor any other Warlike Instruments, but onely certaine Slings, out of which they discharge stones after a strange and wonderfull manner. Their victuals consist of Barley, Honey, and Goates flesh. In the same Mountaine great multitudes of Iewes exercising Handie-crafts, doe inhabit: likewise they make Sope, Iron-hookes, and Horse-shoes. Diuers Masons are here to be found also. They build their wals of no other matter but onely of rough stone and lime, and the roofes of their houses they vse to couer with thatch: neither haue they any other kind of lime or bricke. They haue among them also abundance of learned men and of skilfull Lawyers, whose counsell they vse at all times. Among whom I found some, who had heretofore beene my fellow-students at Fez, and for our old acquaintance sake, gaue me most courteous entertaynement: and, to the end I might escape the danger of Theeues, they conducted me a good part of my way.

Neuer did I see (to my remembrance) an higher Mountayne, then that which the Africans call Hanteta.

Carrain Iewes.

Many Iewes exercising diuers Handie-crafts doe here inhabit, and doe yearly pay vnto the Governour of this Mountayne great summes of money. As concerning Religion, they follow them especially which are called Carrain. The top of this Mountayne is continually couered with Snow. When I first beheld this Mountayne, I thought it had beene Cloudes, so great is the height thereof. The sides of this Mountayne being altogether destitute of Herbs and Trees, are in many places stored with excellent white Marble, which the people might digge, and make a good commoditie thereof, were they not so sluggish and so ignorant in hewing and polishing of the same. In this place are many Pillars and Arches which were most artificially and sumptuously built by those mightie Princes whom wee haue often before made mention of: which Pillars they would haue vsed for the building of Water-conduits, had they not beene hindered by the violence of warres.

Weekly Truces

This Region is exceeding populous: Westward it abutteth vpon Ilda a Mountayne of Sus; Northward it ioyneth vnto Atlas, and Eastward it stretcheth vnto the Region of Hea. It is inhabited with sauage and fierce people, being most needie of money, and yet abounding greatly in Cattell. Great store of Copper and Iron is here digged out of Mines. Great Villages they haue, which containe many of them, more then a thousand Families a piece. They haue neyther King nor Governour to prescribe any Lawes vnto them: but every one is his owne Capitaine and Commander; whereupon they are at continuall warres among themselves, neither haue they any truce at all, but three dayes onely every weeke; during which time every man may safely and freely bargain with his Enemy, and may trauell whither hee listeth. But these dayes of Truce being past, the wretched people of this Region doe continually commit most hor-horrible slaughters. The foresaid dayes of truce a certaine Hermite appointed vnto them, whom they honoured and reuerenced like a god. This Hermite with one eye, I my selfe saw, and found him to be a trusty, sincere, courteous, and most liberall person. Once every yeere they haue a Faire of two months long: all which time (though the number of Merchants be neuer so great) they giue free entertainment vnto all such as either bring wares with them, or come thither to fetch away their wares. When the time of their Faire approacheth, they forthwith make truce, and each faction appointeth a Captaine ouer an hundred souldiers, to the end they may keepe themselves in safety, and may defend their said Faire from the inuasion and iniury of all lewd persons. If any offence be committed, the Captaines immediately giue sentence vpon the guilty person: and whosoever be conuicted of theft, is forthwith slaine like a brute beast, and his theenes carkasse is throwne out to bee deuoured of dogges, wilde beasts, and rauenous fowles.

Azapi was built by the Africans, and standeth vpon the shore of the Ocean sea, containing foure thousand families: inhabitants there are great store, being for the most part very vnciuill and barbarous. In times past there dwelt many Jewes in this Towne, which exercised diuers Handicrafts. Their soyle is exceeding fertile; but so grosse is their owne vnskilfulnesse and negligence, that they know neither how to till their ground, to sow their Corne, or to plant Vineyards.

Azamur, a Towne of Duccala, was built by the Africans vpon that part of the Ocean sea-shore, where the Riuer of Ommirabib disemboueth, being distant from Elmadina Southward, about thirtie miles. Very large it is, and well inhabited, and containeth to the number of five thousand families. Here doe the Portugall Merchants continually reside. The inhabitants are very ciuill, and decently apparelled. And albeit they are diuided into two parts, yet haue they continuall peace among themselves. Pulse and Corne they haue great plentie, though their Gardens and Orchards bring forth nought else but figs. They haue such plentie of fishes, that they receiue yearely for them sometime sixe thousand, and sometime seven thousand duckats. And their time of fishing dureth from October to the end of Aprill. They vse to drie fishes in a certaine pan with oyle, whereby they gather an incredible quantitie of trane: neither vse they any other oyle to put into their lampes. The Jewes compounded with the King of Portugall, to yeeld the Citie to him, on condition, that they should sustaine no iniurie) with a generall consent opened the Gates vnto them: and so the Christians obtained the Citie, and the people went to dwell part of them to Sala, and part to Fez. Neither doe I thinke that God for any other cause brought this calamitie vpon them, but onely for the horrible vice of Sodomie, whereunto the greatest part of the Citizens were so notoriously addicted, that they could scarce see any young stripling, who escaped their lust.

Likewise this Mountaine is very rough and full of Woods, affording great store of Acornes and Pine-apples, and a certaine kind of red fruit which the Italians commonly call Africano. Many Hermites also doe inhabite vpon this Mountaine, liuing with no other kind of victuals, but such as the Woods yeeld vnto them: for they are about five and twenty miles distant from all Townes and Cities. Here are great store of fountaines and of Altars built after the Mahometan fashion, and many ancient houses also erected by the Africans.

Betweene which foure Mountaines and the said Towne, are diuers most large and beautiful Gardens replenished with all kind of fruits: Quinces here are of an incredible bignesse. Their Vines dispersing themselves vpon the boughes of trees, doe make most pleasant Bowers and Walkes; the Grapes whereof being red, are for their bignesse called in the language of that people, Hennes eggs. They haue here great abundance of Oyle, and most excellent Honey: some of their Honey being white, and some yellow. This Towne hath many fountaines about it, which ioyning into one streame, doe serue for many Water-mills thereabouts. Here are likewise great store of Artizans, who exercise themselves onely about things necessary. The inhabitants are somewhat ciuill, their women are most beautifull, being most gorgeously decked with siluer Jewels. Their Oyle they carry vnto the next Cities Southward of them on this side Atlas: but they send their Leather vnto Fez and Mecnasa. Their Plaine is almost sixe miles long, the soyle being most fruitful for Corne: in regard whereof, the Townesmen pay certaine yearely tribute vnto the Arabians. This Towne hath Iudges, Priests, and a great number of Gentlemen.

Neere vnto the foresaid Towne, within five miles, standeth Elgiumuba. It was in our time built vpon the top of an high Mountaine, and containeth to the number of five hundred families, besides so many families comprised in the Villages of that Mountaine. Here are innumerable Springs and Fountaines, and most pleasant and fruitfull Gardens in all places. Here are likewise Walnut-trees huge and tall. The little Hills enuironing this Mountaine, doe yeeld Barly and Oliues in great abundance. In the said Towne are great numbers of Artizans, as Smiths, Leather-dressers, and such like. And because they haue here notable Yron-mines, they make plentie of Horse-shooes.

In the Mountaine of Tennenes, being but sixteene yeares old, I trauelled with mine Vncle, Ambassadour from the King of Fez to the King of Tombuto; and the Prince here gaue mee in recompence of Arabia Verles wherewith I presented him, fiftie duckats, and a good Horle. 10

Tefza, the chiefe Towne of all Tedles, was built by the Africans vpon the top of Mount Atlas, some five miles from the Plaine. The Towne-walls are built of most excellent Marble, which is called in their language Tefza, and hereupon the Towne was so called likewise. Heere doe reside most rich Merchants of all sorts: of Iewes here are two hundred families, who exercise Merchandise and diuers other trades. And heere you shall finde many Outlandish Merchants which buy from hence certaine blacke Mantles with hoods, commonly called Ilbernus: of these there are great numbers both in Italy and Spaine. They haue Golden Coine without any Image or superscription: their apparell is decent: and their women are beautifull and of good behauiour. In this towne are diuers Mahumetan Temples, and many Priests and Iudges. The King recei- 20 ueth from that City, euen at this present twenty thousand Ducats for yeerely tribute.

The Mountain called Magran.

These people line like the Tartars.

Somewhat beyond the foresaid Mountaine of Seggheme standeth Mount Magran. Southward it bordereth vpon the Region of Farcali, neere vnto the Lybian desert: Westward it beginneth at Seggheme, and extendeth Eastward to the foot of Mount Dedes. It is continually couered with snow. The inhabitants haue such abundance of small & great cattell that they cannot long remaine in one place together. They build their houses of the Barke of certaine trees, the rooffe whereof dependeth on slender sparres, fashioned like vnto the hoopes inuironing the lids of such Chests or Trunks, as the women of Italy, when they trauell, carry vpon their Mules. So likewise these people transport their whole houses vp and downe by the strength of Mules, till they haue found a fit place of aboad; where, so soone as they arriue, they plant their sayd houses, remaining there with their whole families, so long as they haue grasse sufficient to feede their cattell. Howbeit all the spring time they settle themselues in one place, making certaine low Stables or Cottages, and couering them with the boughs of trees, which serue for their cattell to lie in a nights: and to the end that the cold may not pinch them ouermuch, they kinde certaine huge fires neere vnto their said Stables, whereupon sometimes the wind so violently driueth the fire, that vnlesse the cattell escape by flight, they are in great danger to be consumed: and as their houses are destitute of walls, so are their Stables. They are continually molested and haunted with Lions and Woolues. In their apparell and customes they wholly agree with the foresaid people of Seggheme, sauing that these haue houses of Barke and Wood, and the other of Stone. I my selfe, in the nine hundreth and seuenteenth yeere of the Hegeira, was in this Moun- 40 taine, as I trauelled from Dara to Fez.

A description of Mount Dede.Serisso Essacalli an Historian.

*Or Salt-pe-ter.

The high and cold Mountaine of Dedes greatly aboundeth with Fountaines and Woods. Westward it beginneth at Mount Magran, extending thence almost as far as the Mountaine of Adesan; and Southward it bordereth vpon the plaines of Todga. The length thereof is almost fourescore miles. Vpon the very top of this Mountaine there was a City built in ancient time, whereof a few ruinous Monuments are to be seene at this present; namely, certaine walses of white Stone, wherein are diuers letters and words grauen, which the inhabitants themselues doe not vnderstand. Many are of opinion, that this City was built long agoe by the Romanes: howbeit I my selfe could neuer finde so much affirmed by an African writer, nor yet the City it selfe mentioned. Sauing that Serisso Essacalli in a certaine Story of his maketh mention of Tedsi, which he saith is neere vnto Segelmesse and Dara: but he declareth not whether it bee built vpon Mount Dedes or no. Howbeit for mine owne part I thinke it to be the very same: for there is no other City in the whole Region. The inhabitants of Dedes are in very deed most base people; of whom the greater part dwell in Caues vnder the ground: their food is Barly and Elhasid, that is to say, Barly meale sodden with water and salt, which we mentioned before in our description of Hea: For heere is nothing but Barly to be had. Goates and Asses they haue in great baundance. The Caues wherein their cattell lodge are exceedingly full of * Nitre: so that I verily thinke if this Mountaine were neere vnto Italy, the said Nitre would yeerely be worth five and twenty thousand Ducats. But such is their negligence and vnskilfulnesse, that they are truly ignorant to what purposes Nitre serueth. Their garments are so rude, that they scarce couer halfe their nakednesse. Their houses are so loathsome, being annoyed with the stinking smell of their Goats. In all this Mountaine you shall finde neither Cattle nor walled Towne: when they build an house, they pile one stone vpon another without any mortar at all, the rooffe whereof they make of certaine rubbish, like as they doe in some places of Sisa and Fab- 60 brtano:

briano : the residue (as we haue said) doe inhabite in Caues, neither saw I euer, to my remembrance, greater swarms of fleas then among those people. Moreover, they are trecherous and strong theeuers, so giuen to stealing and quarrelling, that for one vnkind word they will not only contend, but seeke also the destruction one of another. They haue neither Iudge, Priest, nor any honest Governour among them. No Merchants resort vnto them : for being giuen to continuall idlenesse, and not exercising any trades or handie-crafts, they haue nothing meete for Merchants to buy. If any Merchant bring any wares into their Region, vnlesse he be safe conducted by their Captaine, he is in danger to be robbed of altogether. And if the wares serue not for their owne necessary vses, they will exact one fourth part of them for custome. Their women are most forlorne and sluttish, going more beggerly apparelled then the men. So continuall and slauish are the toiles of these women, that for misery, the life of Asses is not comparable to theirs. And, to be briefe, neuer was I so weary of any place in all Africa, as I was of this : howbeit in the yeere of the Hegeira, nine hundred and eightene, being commanded by one, to whom I was in duty bound, to trauell vnto Segelmesse, I could not choose but come this way.

the familie of Marin got the vpper hand, who here setling their aboad, were the first that euer called Fez by the name of a Kingdome.

Westward it beginneth at the Riuer Ommirabih, and stretcheth to the Riuer Buragrag Eastward; the South Frontire thereof bordereth vpon Atlas, and the North vpon the Ocean Sea. It is all ouer a plaine Countrey, contayning in length from the West to East almost fourescore miles, and in breadth from Atlas to the Ocean Sea about threescore. This Prouince hath euer almost bene the principall of the seuen before named: for it contained to the number of forty great Townes, besides three hundred Castles, all which were inhabited by Barbarian Africans. In the three hundred three & twentieth yeer of the Hegira, this Prouince was by a certaine heretike against the Mahumetan Religion, called Chemim the sonne of Mennall, freed from paying of tribute. This bad fellow perswaded the people of Fez to yeeld no tribute nor honour vnto their Prince, and himselfe he professed to be a Prophet: but a while after he dealt not onely in matters of Religion, but in common-wealth affaires also. At length waging warre against the King of Fez (who was himselfe then warring with the people of Zenete) it so befell, that a league was concluded betweene them, conditionally that Chemim should enioy Temesne, and that the King should containe himselfe within his Signiorie of Fez, so that from thencefoorth neither should molest other. The said Chemim gouerned the Prouince of Temesne about fve and thirtie yeeres: and his successours enioyed it almost an hundred yeeres after his decease. But King Ioseph hauing built Maroco, went about to bring this Prouince vnder his subiection. Whereupon he sent sundry Mahumetan Doctors, and Priests to reclaime the gouernour thereof from his heresie, and to perswade him, if it were possible, to yeeld vnto the King by faire meanes. Whereof the inhabitants being aduertised, they consulted with a certaine kinsman of the foresaid Gouernour, in the Citie called Anfa, to murder the King of Maroco his Ambassadors: and so they did. Soone after leuying an army of fifty thousand men, he marched towards Maroco, intending to expell thence the family of Luntuna, and Ioseph their King. King Ioseph hearing of this newes, was driuen into wonderfull perplexity of mind. Wherefore preparing an huge and mighty army, he stayed not the comming of his enemies: but on the sudden within three dayes, hauing conducted his forces ouer the Riuer of Ommirabih, he entred Temesne, when as the foresaid fifty thousand men were so dismayed at the Kings army, that they all passed the Riuer Buragrag, and so fled into Fez. But the King so dispeopled and wasted Temesne, that without all remorse he put both man, woman, and child to the sword. This army remayned in the Region eight dayes, in which space they so razed and demolished all the Townes and Cities thereof, that there scarce remaine any fragments of them at this time. But the King of Fez on the other side hearing that the people of Temesne were come into his Dominions, made a truce with the Tribe of Zenete, and bent his great army against the said Temesnites. And at length hauing found them halfe famished neere vnto the Riuer of Buragrag, he so stopped their passages on all sides, that they were constrained to run vp the craggie mountaines and thickets. At last being enuironed with the Kings forces, some of them were drowned in the Riuer, others were throwne downe headlong from the rockes, and the residue were miserably slaine by their enemies. And for the space of ten moneths there was such hauocke made among the Temesnites, that a silly remnant of them was left aliue. But King Ioseph Prince of the Luntunes returned foorthwith to Maroco for the repaying of his forces, to the end he might bid the King of Fez a battell. Howbeit Temesne being bereft of her people, was left to be inhabited of wilde beasts. Neither had that Prouince any new Colony, or supply of inhabitants, till that about one hundred and fifty yeeres after, King Mansor returning from Tunis, brought thence certaine Arabians with him, vnto whom he gaue the possession of Temesne. And these Arabians enioyed the said Prouince for fifty yeeres, till such time as King Mansor himselfe was expelled out of his Kingdom: & then were they also expelled by the Luntunes, & were brought into extreme miserie. Afterward the Kings of the familie of Marin bestowed the said Prouince vpon the people of Zenete and Haoara. Hence it came to passe that the said people of Zenete & Haoara, were alwayes great friends vnto the Marin family, and were thought to haue defended them from the fury of the King of Maroco. From which time they haue peaceably enioyed Maroco, and now they are grown in lesse then an hundred yeers so mighty, that they stand not in feare of the King of Fez. For they are able to bring threescore thousand horsemen into the field, & haue two hundred Castles at their commaund. My selfe had great familiarity and acquaintance with them, and therefore I will not sticke to record all memorable things which I saw among them.

This famous Towne was built by the Romanes vpon the Ocean Sea shoare, Northward of Atlas sixtie, Eastward of Azamur sixty, and Westward Rebat forty miles. The Citizens thereof were most ciuill and wealthy people: the fields thereto adioyning are exceeding fruitfull for all kind of graine: neither doe I thinke, that any Towne in all Africa is for pleasant situation comparable thereto. The plaine round about it (except it be to the Sea Northward) is almost fourescore miles ouer. In old time it was fraught with stately Temples, rich ware-houses and shops, and beautifull palaces: which the monuments as yet remayning doe sufficiently testifie. They had also most large and faire gardens, out of which they gather great abundance of fruit, especially especially of Melons, & Pome-citrons euen at this day: all which are perfectly ripe by mid-Aprill. So that the inhabitants vsually carry their fruits vnto Fez, by reason that the fruits of Fez are not so soone ripe. Their attire is trim and decent, and they haue alwayes had great traffique with the Portugals and the English. Likewise they haue many learned men among them. But is now desolate and destroyed by Portugals.

of Rebat.

This great and famous Towne was built not many yeers ago by Mansor the King & Mahumetan Patriark of Maroco, vpon the Ocean Sea shoare. By the East part thereof runneth the Riuer Buragrag before-named, and there dischargeth it selfe into the maine Sea. The rocke whereon this Towne is founded, standeth neere the mouth of the said Riuer, hauing the Riuer on the one side thereof, and the Sea on the other. In building it much resembleth Maroco, which Mansor willed to be a patterne thereof: sauing that it is a great deale lesse then Maroco. Some say that the reason why it was built in this place was, for that King Mansor possessing the Kingdome of Granada, and a great part of Spaine besides, and considering that Maroco was so farre distant, that if any warres should happen, he could not in due time send new forces against the Christians, determined to built some Towne vpon the Sea shoare, where he and his army might remaine all summer time. Some perswaded him to lie with his army at Centa a Towne vpon the streights of Gibraltar: but Mansor seeing that by reason of the barrennes of the soile he could not maintain an army Royall for three or foure moneths in the Town of Centa; he caused this Town of Rebat in short space to be erected, & to be exceedingly beautified with Temples, Colledges, Palaces, Shops, Stones, Hospitals, and other such buildings. Moreouer, on the South side without the wals he caused a certaine high Tower like the Tower of Maroco to be built, saying that the winding staires were somewhat larger, insomuch that three horses a-breast might well ascend vp: from the top whereof they might escry ships an huge way into the Sea. So exceeding is the height thereof, that I thinke there is no where the like building to be found. And to the end that greater store of Artificers and Merchants might hither from all places make resort, he appointed, that euery man according to his trade and occupation should be allowed a yeerely stipend, whereupon it came to passe that within few moneths, this Towne was better stored with all kind of Artificers and Merchants, then in any Towne in all Africa besides, and that because they reaped a double gaine. Heere vsed Mansor with his Troupes to remaine from the beginning of Aprill, till the month of September. And whereas there was no water about the Town meer to be drunke (for the Sea runneth ten miles vp into the Riuer, and the wels likewise yeeld salt-water) Mansor caused fresh water to be conueied to the Towne by certaine Pipes and Channels, from a fountaine twelue miles distant. And the Conduits hee made arch-wise, like vnto the Conduits of Italy in many places, and specially at Rome. So soone as the said water-conduit was deriued vnto the Towne, he caused it to be diuided and sent into sundry places, as namely, some pipes thereof to the Temples, some to the Colledges, others to the Kings Palace, and the rest into the common Cisternes, throughout all the City. Howbeit after King Mansors death this Towne grew into such decay, that scarce the tenth part thereof now remaineth. The said notable water-conduit was vtterly fordone in the warre betweene the Marin familie and the successors of Mansor.

Also King Mansor caused Sella to be walled round about, and built therein a faire Hospitall, & a stately Palace, into which his souldiers might at their pleasure retire themselves. Here likewise he erected a most beautifull Temple, wherein he caused a goodly Hall or Chappell to be set vp, which was curiously carued, and had many faire windows about it: and in this Hall (when he perceiued death to seaze vpon him) he commanded his subiects to burie his corps. Which being done, they laid one Marble-stone ouer his head, and another ouer his feete, whereon sundry Epitaphes were engrauen. After him likewise all the honourable personages of his family and blood, choose to be interred in the same Hall. And so did the Kings of the Marin family, so long as their Common-wealth prospered. My selfe on a time entring the same Hall, beheld there thirty Monuments of noble and great personages, and diligently wrote out all their Epitaphes: this I did in the yeere of the Hegera nine hundred and fiteene.

In Thagia is visited the Sepulchre of one accounted for a most holy man, who is reported in the time of Habdulmumen, to haue wrought many miracles against the fire of Lions: where vpon he was reputed by many as a great Prophet. I remember that I read in a certaine writer of that Nation commonly called Erdedle, a whole Catalogue of the said holy mans miracles: which whether he wrought by Arte-magicke, or by some wonderfull secret of nature, it is altogether vncertaine. Howbeit his great fame and honourable reputation is the cause why this Towne is so well fraught with inhabitants. The people of Fez hauing solemnized their Easter, do yeerely frequent this Towne to visite the said Sepulchre, and that in such huge numbers, that you would esteeme them to be an whole armie; for euery principall man carries his Tent and other necessities with him: and so you shall see sometime an hundred Tents, and sometimes more in that company. Fiteene dayes they are in performing of that Pilgrimage; for Thagia standeth from Fez almost an hundred and twenty miles. My selfe being a child, went thither on Pilgrimage oftentimes with my Father; as likewise being grown vp to mans estate, I repaired red thither as often, making supplication to bee deliuered from the danger of Lions.

Westward it beginneth at the Riuer of Buragrag, and stretcheth Eastward to the riuer called Inanen: which two Riuers are almost a hundred miles distant asunder. Northward it bordereth vpon the Riuer * Sabu, and Southward vpon the foote of Atlas. The soile both for abundance of Corne, Fruits, and Cattell seemeth to be inferiour to none other.

The buildings of Sella carry a shew of Antiquity on them, being Artificially carued and state-ly supported with Marble pillars. Their Temples are most beautifull, and their are shops built vnder large Porches. And at the end of euery row of shops is an Arch, which (as they say) is to diuide one occupation from another. And (to say all in a word) here is nothing wanting, which may be required either in a most honourable City, or a flourishing Common-wealth. Moreouer hither resort all kind of Merchants, both Christians and others. Heere the Genowayes, Venetians, English and low Dutch vsed to traffique. The grounds adioyning vpon this Towne are sandy: neither are they fit for Corne, but for Cotten-wooll in diuers places very profitable. The inhabitants, diuers of them doe weaue most excellent Cotten. Heere likewise are made very fine Combes, which are sold in all the Kingdome of Fez, for the Region thereabout yeeldeth great plenty of Boxe, & of other wood fit for the same purpose. Their gouernment is very orderly and discreet euen vntill this day: for they haue most learned Iudges, Vmpires, and deciders of doubtfull cases in Law. This Towne is frequented by many rich Merchants of Genoa, whom the King hath alwayes had in great regard; because he gaineth much yeerely by their traffique.

In the time of Abusaid the last King of the Marin family, his Cousin, called Sahid, was taken by Habdilla the King of Granada; whereupon by letters he requested his Cousin the King of Fez to send him a certaine summe of money, required by the King of Granada for his ransome. Which when the Fessan King refused to yeeld vnto, Habdilla restored his prisoner to libertie, and sent him towards Fez to destroy both the City and the King. Afterward Sahid, with the helpe of certaine wilde Arabians besieged Fez for seven yeeres together; in which space most of the Townes, Villages, and Hamlets throughout the whole Kingdome were destroyed. But at length such a Pestilence inuaded Sahids forces, that himsele, with a great part of his army, in the * nine hundred and eighteenth yeere of the Hegeira, died therof. Howbeit those desolate Towns neuer receiued from thenceforth any new inhabitants, especially Fanzara, which was giuen to certaine Arabian Captaines, that came to assist Sahid. Whatsoeuer commodity ariseth out of Banibasil redoundeth to the Priests of the principall Mahumetan Temple in Fez, and it amounteth almost yeerely to twenty thousand Dukats. Heere also in times past were most large, pleasant, and fruitfull Gardens, as appeareth by the Monuments and reliques thereof, howbeit, they were like other places, laid waste by the warre of Sahid. The Towne it selfe remaineth destitute of inhabitants an hundred and ten yeeres; but as the King of Fez returned home from Duccala, he commanded part of his people to inhabite the same: albeit their inciuilitie made them loth so to doe.

Fez was built in the time of one Aron a Mahumetan Patriarke, in the yeere of the Hegeira one hundreth eighty and siue, and in the yeere of our Lord seven hundred eightie sixe, by a certaine hereticke against the Religion of Mahumet. But why it should so be called, some are of opinion, because when the first foundations thereof were digged, there was found some quantity of Gold, with mettall in the Arabian language is called Fez.

The Founder of this City was one Idris, being the foresaid Aron his neere kinsman. This Idris ought rather to haue bene an Mahumetan Patriarke, because he was nephew vnto Hali the Cousin-german of Mahumet, who married Falerna, Mahumets owne daughter, so that Idris both by Father and Mother was of Mahumets Linage: but Aron being nephew vnto one Habbus the Vncle of Mahumet, was of kinred onely by the Fathers side. Howbeit both of them were excluded from the said Patriarkship for certaine causes mentioned in the African Chronicles, although Aron vsurped the same by deceit. For Arons Vncle being a most cunning and crafty man, and faining himsele to beare greatest fauour vnto the family of Hali, and to be most desirous, that the Patriarkship should light thereon, sent his Ambassadors almost throughout the whole world. Whereupon the dignity was translated from Vmene to Habdulla Seffec the first Patriarke. Which, Vmene being informed of, waged warre against the family of Hali, and so preuailed, that some of them he chased into Asia, and some into India. Howbeit, an ancient Religious man of the same family remained still alieue at Elmadina, who being very old, no whit regarded the dignity. But this ancient sire left behind him two sonnes, who when they were come to mans estate, grew into so great fauour with the people of Elmadin, that they were chased thence by their enemies; the one being taken and hanged; and the other (whose name was Idris) escaping into Mauritania. This Idris dwelling vpon Mount Zaron, about thirtie miles from Fez, gouerned not onely the Common-wealth, but matters of Religion also: and all the Region adjacent paid him tribute. At length Idris deceasing without lawfull issue, left one of his maydes big with child, which had bene turned from the Gothes Religion to the Moores. Being deliuered of her sonne, they called him after his Fathers name, Idris. This child the inhabitants chusing for their Prince, caused him to be most carefully brought vp: and as he grew in yeeres, yeeres, to the end they might trayne him vp in feates of Chiuallrie; they appointed one Rasid a most valiant and skilfull Captaine to instruct him. Infomuch, that while hee was but fifteene yeeres of age, he grew famous for his valiant Acts and Stratagems, and beganne wonderfully to inlarge his Dominions. Wherefore his Troupes and Family increasing euery day more and more, he set his minde vpon building of a Citie, and changing of his habitation. And so hee sent for cunning builders into all Nations, who hauing diligently perused all places in the Region, at last made choise of that where the Citie of Fez now standeth. For heere they found great store of Fountaines, and a faire Riuer, which springing forth of a plaine not farre off, runneth pleasantly almost eight miles amidst the little Hills, till at length it casteth it selfe vpon another 10 plaine. Southward of the place they found a wood, which they knew would be right commodious for the Towne. Here therefore vpon the East banke of the said Riuer, they built a Towne contayning three thousand Families: neither omitted they ought at all which might bee required in a flourishing Common-wealth. After the decease of Idris, his Sonne erected another Towne directly ouer against the foresaid, on the other side of the Riuer. But in proceſſe of time either Towne so increased, that there was but a small distance betweene them: for the Gouernours of each laboured might and mayne to augment their owne Iurisdiccions. An hundred and fourescore yeeres after, there fell out great dissention and Ciuill warre betweene these two Cities, which by report continued an hundred yeeres together.

At length Ioseph King of Mareco of the Luntune Family, conducting an huge Armie against 20 both these Princes, tooke them Prisoners, carryed them home vnto his Dominions, and put them to a most cruell death. And he so vanquished the Citizens, that there were slaine of them thirtie thousand. Then determined King Ioseph to reduce those two Townes into firme vnitie and concord: for which cause, making a bridge ouer the Riuer, and beating downe the wals of either Towne right against it, he vnited both into one, which afterward he diuided into twelue Regions or Wards. Now let vs make report of all such memorable things as are there to bee seene * at this day.

A most exact description of the Citie of Fez.

A World it is to see, how large, how populous, how well fortified and walled this Citie is. The most part thereof standeth vpon great and little Hills: neither is there any plaine ground but onely in the midst of the Citie. The Riuer entreth the Towne in two places, for it is diu-
 30 ded into a double branch, one whereof runneth by new Fez, that is, by the South-side of the Towne, and another commeth in at the West-side. And so almost infinitely dispersing it selfe into the Citie, it is deriued by certaine conduits and chanelles vnto euery Temple, Colledge, Inne, Hospitall, and almost to euery priuate house. Vnto the Temples are certaine square conduits adioyned, hauing Cels and Receptacles round about them; each one of which hath a Cock, whereby water is conueyed through the wall into a Trough of Marble. From whence flowing into the Sinkes and Gutters, it carryeth away all the filth of the Citie into the Riuer. In the midst of each square conduit standeth a low Cisterne, beeing three Cubits in depth, foure in breadth, and twelue in length: and the water is conueyed by certaine Pipes into the foresaid square conduits, which are almost an hundred and fiftie in number. The most part of the hou-
 40 ses are built of fine bricke and stones curiously painted. Likewise their bay-windowes and portals are made of partie-coloured bricke, like vnto the stones of Maiorica. The Roofes of their Houses they adorne with Gold, Azure, and other excellent Colours, which Roofes are made of wood, and plaine on the top, to the end that in Summer-time Carpets may be spred vpon them, for here they vse to lodge by reason of the exceeding heate of that Countrey. Some houses are of two and some of three Stories high, whereunto they make fine staires, by which they passe from one roome to another vnder the same rooffe: for the middle part of the house is alwayes open or vncovered, hauing some Chambers built on the one side, and some on the other. The Chamber doores are very high and wide: which in rich mens houses are framed of excellent and carued wood. Each Chamber hath a Presse curiously painted and varnished belonging thereun-
 50 to, being as long as the Chamber it selfe is broad: some will haue it very high, and others but fixe handfuls in height, that they may set it on the Tester of a Bed. All the portals of their houses are supported with bricke Pillars finely playstered ouer, except some which stand vpon Pillars of Marble. The Beames and Transomes vpholding their Chambers are most curiously painted and carued. To some houses likewise belong certaine square Cisternes, contayning in breadth fixe or seuen Cubits, in length ten or twelue, and in height but fixe or seuen handfuls, being all vncovered, and built of bricke trimly playstered ouer. Along the sides of these Cisternes are certaine Cokes, which conuay the water into Marble Troughs, as I haue seene in many places of Europe. When the foresaid Conduits are full of water, that which floweth ouer, runneth by certaine secret pipes and conueyances into the Cisternes: and that which ouer-
 60 floweth the Cisternes, is carryed likewise by other passages into the common Sinkes and Gutters, and so into the Riuer. The said Cisternes are alwayes kept sweete and cleane, neyther are they couered but onely in Summer-time, when Men, Women, and Children bathe themselves therein.

Moreover, on the tops of their houses they vsually build a Turret with many pleasant roomes therein, whither the women for recreations sake, when they are wearie of working, retyre themselves; from whence they may see wel-nigh all the Citie ouer.

The number and stateliness of the Mahumetan Temples
in Fez.

Of Mahumetan Temples and Oratories there are almost seuen hundred in this Towne, fiftie whereof are most stately and sumptuously built, hauing their Conduits made of Marble and other excellent stones vnknowne to the Italians; and the Chapiters of their Pillars beartificially adorned with painting and caruing. The tops of these Temples, after the fashion of Christian Churches in Europe, are made of Ioyes and Plankes: but the pauement is couered with Mats which are so cunningly sowed together that a man cannot see the breadth of a finger vncouered. The wals likewise on the inner side are lined a mans height with such Mats. Moreover, each Temple hath a Turret or Steeple, from whence certaine are appointed with a lowd voice to call the people at their set-time of Prayer. Euery Temple hath one onely Priest to say Seruice therein; who hath the bestowing of all Reuenues belonging to his owne Temple, as occasion requireth: for thereby are maintayned Lampes to burne in the night, and Porters to keepe the doores are paid their wages out of it, and so likewise are they that call the people to ordinarie Prayers in the night season: for those which cry from the said Towres in the day time haue no wages, but are onely released from all Tributes and Exactions.

The principall
Temple of Fez called Caruuen.

The chiefe Mahumetan Temple in this Towne is called Caruuen, beeing of so incredible a bignesse, that the circuit thereof and of the buildings longing vnto it, is a good mile and a halfe about. This Temple hath one and thirtie gates or portals of a wonderfull greatnesse and height. The Roofe of this Temple is in length one hundred and fiftie, and in breadth about fourescore Florentine Cubits. The Turret or Steeple, from whence they cry amayne to assemble the people together, is exceedingly high; the breadth whereof is supported with twentie, and the length with thirtie Pillars. On the East, West, and North-sides, it hath certaine Walkes or Galleries, fortie Cubits in length, and thirtie in breadth. Vnder which Galleries there is a Cell or Storehouse, wherein Oyle, Candles, Mats, and other such necessities for the Temple are layd vp. Euery night in this Temple are burnt nine hundred Lights; for euery arch hath a seuerall Lampe, especially those which extend through the mid-quire. Some Arches there are that haue one hundred and twentie Candles a piece: there are likewise certaine Brasse Candlestickes so great and with so many Sockets, as they will hold each one fiftene hundred Candles: and these Candlestickes are reported to haue beene made of Bels, which the King of Fez in times past tooke from Christians.

Pulpits and preaching.

About the wals of the said Temple are diuers Pulpits, out of which those that are learned in the Mahumetan Law instruct the people. Their Winter Lectures beginne presently after Sunrise, and continue the space of an houre. But their Summer Lectures hold on from the Sunne going downe, till an houre and a halfe within night. And here they teach as well Morall Philosophie as the Law of Mahumet. The Summer Lectures are performed by certaine priuate and obscure persons; but in Winter such onely are admitted to read, as bee reputed their greatest Clerkes. All which Readers and Professours are yearely allowed most liberall Stipends. The Priest of this great Temple is enioyned onely to read Prayers, and faithfully to distribute almes among the poore. Euery Festiuall day he bestoweth all such Corne and Money as he hath in his custodie, to all poore people according to their need.

The Treasuror or Collector of the Reuenues of this Church hath euery day a Duckat for his pay. Likewise he hath eight Notaries or Clerkes vnder him; euery one of which gayneth fixe Duckats a moneth: and other fixe Clerkes who receiue the rent of houses, shops, and other such places as belong to the Temple, hauing for their wages the twentieth part of all such Rents and Duties as they gather.

Moreover, there belong to this Temple twentie Factors or Baylies of Husbandry, that without the Citie wals haue an eye to the Labourers, Ploughmen, Vine-planters, and Gardeners, and that prouide them things necessarie: there gaine is three Duckats a moneth. Not farre from the Citie are about twentie Lime-kils, and as many Bricke-kils, seruing for the reparation of their Temple, and of all houses thereto belonging.

The Reuenues
of the great Temple, and how they are bestowed.

The Reuenues of the said Temple daily receiued, are two hundred Duckats a day; the better halfe whereof is layd out vpon the particulars aforesaid. Also if there bee any Temples in the Citie destitute of liuing, they must all be mayntayned at the charges of this great Temple: and then that which remayneth after all expenses, is bestowed for the behoote of the Commonwealth: for the people receiue no Reuenues at all. In our time the King commanded the Priest of the said Temple to lend him an huge summe of money, which he neuer repayed againe.

Colledges of Fez.

Moreover, in the Citie of Fez are two most stately Colledges, of which diuers roomes are adorned with curious painting; all their beames are carued, their wals consisting both of Marble and Freestone. Some Colledges heere are which contayne an hundred studies, some more, and some fewer, all which were built by diuers Kings of the Marin Family. One there is among the rest most beautifull and admirable to behold, which was erected by a certaine King called Habu Henon. Here is to be seene an excellent Fountaine of Marble, the Cisterne whereof containeth two Pipes. Through this Colledge runneth a little streame in a most cleere and pleasant pleasant chancell, the brimmes and edges whereof are workmanly framed of Marble, and stones of Maiorica. Likewise heere are three Cloysters to walke in, most curiously and artificially made, with certaine eight square Pillars of diuers colours to support them. And betweene Pillar and Pillar the arches are beautifully ouer-cast with Gold, Azure, and diuers other Colours; and the Roofe is very artificially built of wood. The sides of these Cloysters are so close, that they which are without cannot see such as walke within. The wals round about as high as a man can reach, are adorned with Playster-worke of Maiorica. In many places you may find certaine Verses, which declare what yeare the Colledge was built in, together with many Epigrams in the Founders commendation. The Letters of which Verses are very great and black, so that they may be read a farre off. This Colledge gates are of Brasse most curiously carued, and so are the doores artificially made of wood. In the Chappell of this Colledge standeth a certaine Pulpit mounted nine stayres high, which staires are of Iuorie and Ebonie. Some affirme, that the King hauing built this Colledge, was desirous to know how much money hee had spent in building it; but after he had perused a leafe or two of his Account-booke, finding the summe of fortie thousand Duckats, he rent it asunder, and threw it into the foresaid little Riuer, adding this Sentence out of a certaine Arabian Writer: Each precious and amiable thing, though it costeth deare, yet if it be beautifull, it cannot choose but bee good cheape: neither is any thing of too high a price, which pleaseth a mans affection. Howbeit a certaine Treasurer of the Kings, making a particular account of all the said expenses, found that this excellent building stood his Master in foure hundred and eightie thousand Duckats. The other Colledges of Fez are somewhat like vnto this, hauing euery one Readers and Professors, some of which read in the forenoone, and some in the afternoone.

A Colledge cost 480000 Duckats the building.

In times past the Students of these Colledges had their apparell and victuals allowed them for seuen yeares, but now they haue nothing gratis but their Chamber.

For the warre of Sahid destroyed many possessions, whereby Learning was maintayned; so that now the greatest Colledge of all hath yeerely but two hundred, and the second but an hundred Duckats for the maintenance of their Professors. And this perhaps may bee one reason, among many, why the gouernment not onely of Fez, but of all the Cities in Africa, is so base.

The suppression of Learning and learned men, a principal cause of disorderly and base gouernment.

Now these Colledges are furnished with no Schollers but such as are strangers, and liue of the Citie Almes: and if any Citizens dwell there, they are not aboue two or three at the most. The Professor being readie for his Lecture, some of his Auditors readeth a Text, whereupon the said Professor dilateth, and expalayneth obscure and difficult places. Sometimes also the Schollers dispute before their Professor.

Many Hospitals there are in Fez, no whit inferiour, either for building or beautie, vnto the foresaid Colledges. For in them whatsoever strangers came to the Citie were entertayned at the common charge for three dayes together. There are likewise as faire and as stately Hospitals in the Suburbes. In times past their wealth was maruellous great; but in the time of Sahids warre, the King standing in need of a great summe of money, was counselled by some of his greedie Courtiers to sell the Liuinges of the said Hospitals. Which when the people would in no case yeeld vnto, the Kings Oratour or Speaker, perswaded them that all those Liuinges were giuen by his Maiesties Predecessours, and therefore (because when the warres were ended, they should soone recouer all againe) that it were farre better for them by that meanes to pleasure their Soueraigne, then to let his Kingly Estate fall into so great danger. Whereupon all the said Liuinges being sold, the King was preuented by vntimely and sudden death before he could bring his purpose to effect: and so these famous Hospitals were depriued of all their maintenance.

Liuinges belonging to Hospitals.

The poore indeed and impotent people of the Citie are at this day relieued; but no strangers are entertayned, saue only learned men or Gentlemen. Howbeit there is another Hospitall for the reliefe of sicke and diseased strangers, who haue their dyet onely allowed them, but no Physician or Medicine: certaine women there are which attend vpon them, till they recouer their former health, or dye. In this Hospitall likewise there is a place for frantike or distracted persons, where they are bound in strong Iron Chaines; whereof the part next vnto their walkes is strengthened with mightie beames of Wood and Iron. The Gouernour of these distracted persons, when he bringeth them any sustenance, hath a Whip of purpose to chastise those that offer to bite, strike, or play any mad part.

Likewise this Hospitall hath many Roomes for the Purueyors, Notaries, Cookes, and other Officers belonging to the sicke persons; who each of them haue some small yeerely stipend. Being a young man, I my selfe was Notarie heere for two yeeres, which Office is worth three Duckats a moneth.

Iohn Leo in his youth a Notary of an Hospitall for two yeeres together.

In this Citie are moe then an hundred Bath-stoues very artificially and stately built; which though they bee not of equall bignesse, yet are they all of one fashion. Each Stoue hath foure Halls, without which are certaine Galleries in an higher place, with fve or sixe staires to ascend vnto them: here men put off their apparell, and hence they goe naked into the Bath. midst they alwaies keepe a Cisterne full of water. First therefore, they that meane to bathe themselves, must passe through a cold Hall, where they vse to temper hot water and cold together, then they goe into a roome somewhat hotter, where the seruants clense and wash them; and last of all, they proceede into a third Hot-house, where they sweate as much as they thinke good. The fire that heateth their water is made of nought else but beasts dung: for which purpose many boyes are set on worke to run vp and downe to Stables, and thence to carrie all the dung, and to lay it on heapes without the Towne-walles; which being parched in the Sunne for two or three moneths together, they vse for fuell. Likewise, the women haue their Stoues apart from the men. And yet some Hot-houses serue both for men and women, but at sundrie times, namely, for men from the third to the fourteenth houre of the day, and the residue for women. While women are bathing themselves, they hang out a rope at the first entrance of the house, which is a signe for men, that they may then proceede no farther. Neither may husbands here be permitted to speake with their owne wiues; so great a regard they haue of their honestie. Here men and women both, after they haue done bathing, vse to banquet and make merrie with pleasant Musicke and singing. Young Striplings enter the Bath starke naked without any shame, but men couer their priuities with a linnen cloth. The richer sort will not enter the common Bath, but that which is adorned and finely set forth, and which serueth for Noble-men and Gentle-men. When any one is to be bathed, they lay him along vpon the ground, anointing him with a certaine oyntment, and with certaine instruments doing away his filth. The richer sort haue a Carpet to lie on, their head lying on a wooden Cushion, couered with the same Carpet. Likewise, here are many Barbers and Chyrurgions which attend to doe their office. The most part of these Baths pertaine to the Temples and Colledges, yeelding vnto them a great summe of money for yearly rent: for some giue an hundred, some an hundred and fiftie Duckats a yeare. Neither must I here omit the Festiuall-day which the Seruants and Officers of the Bathes celebrate; who with Trumpets and Pipes calling their friends together, goe forth of the Towne, and there gather a wild Onion, putting it in a certaine brazen vessell, and couering the same with a linnen cloth wet in Lee: afterward with a great noise of Trumpets and Pipes, they solemnely bring the said Onion vnto the Hot-house doore, and there they hang it vp in the little brazen vessell or Lauer, saying, That this is a most happy boading, or signe of good luck vnto their Stoue. Howbeit, I suppose it to be some such Sacrifice, as the ancient Moors were wont in times past, when they were destitute of Lawes and ciuilitie, to offer, and that the same custom hath remained till this very day. The like is to be seene euen among Christians, who celebrate many Feasts, wherof they can yeeld no reason. Likewise, euery African towne had their peculiar Feast, which, when the Christians once enioyed Africa, were vtterly abolished and done away.

In this Citie are almost two hundred Innes, the greatest whereof are in the principall part of the Citie neere vnto the chiefe Temple. Euery of these Innes are three stories high, and containe an hundred and twenty, or moe Chambers apiece. Likewise, each one hath a Fountaine, together with Sinks, and Water-pipes, which make auoidance of all the filth. Neuer, to my remembrance, did I see greater building, except it were the Spanish Colledge at Bologna, or the Palace of the Cardinall di San Giorgio at Rome; of which Innes all the Chamber-doores haue Walkes or Galleries before them. And albeit the Innes of this Citie are very faire and large, yet they affoord most beggerly entertainment to strangers; for there are neither Beds nor Couches for a man to lie vpon, vnlesse it be a course Blanket and a Mat. And if you will haue any victuals, you must goe to the Shambles your selfe, and buy such meate for your Host to dresse, as your stomack stands-to. In these Innes certaine poore Widdowes of Fez, which haue neither wealth nor friends to succour them, are relieved: sometimes one, and sometimes two of them together are allowed a Chamber; for which courtesie they play both the Chamberlaines and Cookes of the Inne. The Inne-keepers of Fez being all of one Family, called Elcbena, goe apparelled like Women, and shauie their Beards, and are so delighted to immitate Women, that they will not onely counterfeite their speech, but will sometimes also sit downe and spin. Each one of these hath his Concubine, whom hee accompanieth as if she were his owne lawfull Wife; albeit the said Concubines are not onely ill-fauoured in countenance, but, notorious for their bad life and behauior. They buy and sell wine so freely, that no man controles them for it. None resort hither but most lewd and wicked people, to the end they may more boldly commit vilany. The very company of these Inne-keepers is so odious, and detestable in the sight of all honest men, learned men, and Merchants, that they will in no wise vouchsafe to speake vnto them. And they are firmly enioyned not to enter into the Temple, into the Burse, nor into any Bath. Neither yet are they permitted to resort vnto those Innes which are next vnto the great Temple, and wherein Merchants are vsually entertained.

In this Citie are Mills in foure hundred places at least. And euery of these places containeth fve or fixe Mills; so that there are some thousands of Mills in the whole City. Euery Mill standeth in a large roome vpon some strong pillar or post, whereunto many Country-people vse to resort. All the said Mills pertaine either to the Temples or Colledges.

Each trade or occupation hath a peculiar place allotted thereto, the principall whereof are

next vnto the great Temple: for there first you may behold to the number of fourescore Notaries or Scriueners shops, whereof some ioyne vpon the Temple, and the residue stand ouer against them: euery of which Shops hath alwaies two Notaries. Then Westward there are about thirtie Stationers or Booke-sellers. The Shoo-merchants which buy Shooes and Buskins of the Shoo-makers, and sell them againe to the Citizens, inhabite on the Southside of the Temple: and ext vnto them, such as make Shooes for children onely, their Shops being about fiftie. On the East-side dwell those that sell vessels, and other commodities made of brasfe.ouer against the great Gate of the said Temple stands the Fruit-market, containing fiftie Shops, where no kind of fruit is wanting. Next vnto them stand the Waxe-merchants, very ingenious and cunning workmen, and much to be admired. Here are Merchants factors likewise, though they bee but few. Then followes the Herbe-market, wherein the Pome-citrons, and diuers kinds of greene Boughes and Herbes doe represent the sweete and flourishing Spring, and in this Market are about twenty Tauernes: for they which drinke Wine, will shrowd themselues vnder the shade and pleasant Boughes. Next vnto them stand the Milke-sellers: I thinke there passeth scarce one day ouer their heads, wherein they vtter not fve and twentie tunnes of Milke. Next vnto these are such as sell Cotton, and they haue about thirtie shops: then follow those that sell Hempe, Ropes, Halters, and such other hempen commodities. Then come you to the Girdlers, and such as make Pantofles, and Leather-bridles embrodered with silke: next their shops adioyne that make Sword-scabberds and Caparisons for Horses. Immediately after dwell those that sell Salt and Lime; and vpon them border an hundred Shops of Potters, who frame al kind of earthen vessels adorned with diuers colours. Then come you to the Sadlers Shops: and next of all to the streete of Porters, who (as I suppose) are about three hundred: these Porters haue a Confull or Gouvernour, who euery weeke allotteth vnto part of them some set businesse. The gaine which redoundeth thereof, they put into a Coffer, diuiding it at the weekes end among them, which haue wrought the same weeke. Strange it is to consider how exceedingly these Porters loue one another: for when any of them deceaseth, the whole company maintaineth his widow and fatherlesse children at their common charge, till either she die, or marieth a new Husband. The children they carefully bring vp, till they haue attained to some good Art or occupation. Next vnto the Porters companie dwell the chiefe Cookes and Victuallers. Here also stands a certaine square house couered with Reed, wherein Pease and Turnep-rootes are to bee sold, which are so greatly esteemed of in Fez, that none may buy them of the country people at the first hand, but such as are appointed, who are bound to pay tole & tribute vnto the Customers: and scarcely one day passeth, wherein moe then fve hundred sacks of Pease and Turneps are not sold. On the North-side of the Temple is a place whither all kind of Hearbs are brought to make Sallets withall: for which purpose there is fortie Shops appointed. Next whereunto is the place of Smoke, so called, by reason of continuall smoke: here are certaine Fritters or Cakes fried in Oyle, like vnto such as are called at Rome, Pan Melato. They roste their flesh not vpon a spit, but in an Ouen: for making two Ouens one ouer another for the same purpose, in the lower they kindle a fire, putting the flesh into the vpper Ouen when it is well het; you would not beleue how finely their meat is thus roasted; for it cannot be spoiled either by smoke or too much heate: for they are all night roasting it by a gentle fire, and in the morning they set it to sale. The foresaid Steakes and Fritters they sell vnto the Citizens in so great abundance, that they daily take for them moe then two hundred Ducats; for there are fiftene Shops which sell nothing else. Likewise, here are sold certaine Fishes and flesh fried, and a kind of excellent fauorie bread, tasting somewhat like a Fritter; which being baked with Butter, they neuer eate but with Butter and Honie. Here also are the feete of certaine beasts sodden, wherewith the Husbandmen betimes in the morning breake their fast, and then hie them to their labour. Next vnto these are such as sell Oyle, Salt, Butter, Cheese, Oliues, Pome-citrons and Capers: their shops are full of fine earthen vessels, which are of much greater value then the things contained in them. Then follow the Shambles, consisting of about forty Shops, wherein the Butchers cut their flesh a pieces, and sell it by weight. They kill no beasts within the Shambles, for there is a place allotted for this purpose neere vnto the Riuer, where hauing once dressed their flesh, they send it to the Shambles by certaine seruants appointed for that end. But before any Butcher dare sell his flesh vnto the Citizens, he must carrie it to the Gouvernour of the Shambles, who so soone as he seeth the flesh, he sets downe in a piece of paper the price thereof, which they shew together with their meate vnto the people; neither may they in any case exceed the said price. Next vnto the Shambles standeth the Market where course cloathes are sold, which containeth at least an hundred Shops: the said cloth is deliuered vnto certaine Criers (which are about threescore in number) who carrying the cloth from Shop to Shop, tell the price thereof. Then follow their Shops that scowre and sell Armour, Swords, Iauelings, and such like warlike instruments. Next vnto them stand the Fishmongers, who sell most excellent and great Fish. Next vnto the Fishmongers dwell such as make of a certaine hard Reed, Coopes and Cages for Fowles; their Shops being about fortie in number: for each of the Citizens vseth to bring vp great store of Hennes and Capons. And that their houses may not be defiled with Hennes-dung, they keepe them

Then are there tenne Shops of them that sell Straw. Next them is the Market where Thread and Hempe is to be sold, and where Hempe vseth to bee kempt: which place is built after the fashion of great Houses, with foure Galleries, or spare-rooms round about it: in the first whereof they sell Linnen-cloth, and weigh Hempe: in two other sit a great many women, hauing abundance of sale-thread, which is there sold by the Criers.

Tauris in Persia.

Let vs now come to the West part, which stretcheth from the Temple to that Gate that leadeth to Mecnase. Next vnto the Smokie place before mentioned, their habitations directly stand, that make Leather-tankards to draw water out of Wells, of whom there are some foure-teene Shops. Vnto these adioyne such as make Wicker-vessels, and other, to lay vp Meale and Corne in: and these enioy about thirty Shops. Next them are one hundred and fifty Shops of Taylors. And next the Taylors are those that make Leather-shields, such as I haue often seene brought into Europe. Then follow twenty Shops of Landresses or Washers, being people of a base condition; to whom the Citizens that haue not Maids of their owne, carry their Shirts and other foule linnen, which after few dayes are restored vnto them so cleane and white, as it is wonderfull. These Landresses haue diuers Shops adioyning together in the same place: but here and there throughout the Citie are about two hundred Families of such persons. Next vnto the Landresses are those that make Trees for Saddles; who dwell likewise in great numbers Eastward right in the way to the Colledge founded by King Abuhinan. Vpon these adioyne about fortie shops of such as worke Stirrops, Spurres, and Bridles, so artificially, as I thinke the like are not to be seene in Europe. Next standeth their streete, that first rudely make the said Stirrops, Bridles and Spurres. From thence you may goe into the streete of Sadlers, which couer the Saddles before mentioned threefold with most excellent Leather: the best Leather they lay vppermost, and the worst beneath, and that with notable Workmanship, as may bee seene in most places of Italy: and of them there are moe then an hundred Shops. Then follow their long Shops that make Pikes and Launces. Next standeth a Rocke or Mount, hauing two Walkes thereupon; the one whereof leadeth to the East-gate, and the other to one of the Kings Palaces, where the Kings Sisters, or some other of his Kindred are vsually kept. But this is by the way to be noted, that all the foresaid Shops, or Market, begin at the great Temple.

The Burse you may well call a Citie, which being walled round about, hath twelue Gates, and before every Gate an Iron-chaine, to keepe Horses and Carts from comming in. The said Burse is diuided into twelue seuerall Wards or parts: two whereof are allotted vnto such Shoo-makers as make Shooes onely for Noblemen and Gentlemen, and two also to Silke-merchants, or Haberdashers, that sell Ribands, Garters, Scarfes, and such other like ornaments; and of these there are about fittie Shops. Others there are that sell Silke onely for the embrodering of Shirts, Cushions, and other such furniture made of Cloth, possessing almost as many Shops as the former. Then follow those that make Womens Girdles of course Wooll (which some make of Silke) but very grossely, for I thinke they are moe then two fingers thicke, so that they may serue almost for Cables to a Ship. Next vnto these Girdlers are such as sell Woollen and Linnen-cloth brought out of Europe: which haue also Silke-stuffes, Caps, and other like commodities to sell. Hauing passed these, you come to them that sell Mats, Mattrailes, Cushions, and other things made of Leather. Next adioyneth the Customers Office; for their Cloth is sent about by certaine Criers to be sold, who before they can passe, must goe to the Customers to haue the said Cloth sealed, and to pay Toll vnto the Customers. Criers here are to the number of fixtie, which for the crying of euery Cloth haue one * Liardo allowed them. Next of all dwell the Taylors, and that in three seuerall streetes. Then come you to the Linnen-drapers, which sell Smocks and other apparell for women: and these are accounted the richest Merchants in all Fez, for their wares are the most gainefull of all others. Next vnto these are certaine Woollen garments to be sold, made of such Cloth as is brought thither out of Europe. Euery after-noone Cloth is sold in this place by the Criers, which is lawfull for any man to doe, when necessary occasion vrgeth him. Last of all is that place where they vse to sell wrought Shirts, Towels, and other embrodered works; as also where Carpets, Beds, and Blankets are to be sold.

Next vnto the said Burse, on the Northside, in a streight lane, stand an hundred and fifty Grocers and Apothecaries Shops, which are fortified on both sides with two strong Gates. These Shops are garded in the night-season by certaine hired and armed Watchmen, which keep their station with Lanthornes and Mastiues. The said Apothecaries can make neither Sirrups, Oyntments, nor Electuaries: but such things are made at home by the Physicians, and are of them to be bought. The Physicians houses adioyne for the most part vnto the Apothecaries: howbeit, very few of the people know either the Physician, or the vse of his Physick. The Shops here are so artificially built and adorned, that the like (I thinke) are no where else to be found. Being in Tauris, a Citie of Persia, I remember that I saw diuers stately Shops curiously built vnder certaine Galleries, but very darke, so that (in my iudgement) they be far inferiour vnto the Shops of Fez.

Next

Next the Apothecaries are certaine Artificers that makes Combes of Boxe and other wood. Comb makers Eastward of the Apothecaries dwell the Needle-makers, possessing to the number of fifty shops.
 Then follow those that turne Iuory, and such other matter, who (becaule their craft is practised Turners.
 by some other Artizans) are but few in number. Vnto the Turners adioyne certaine that sell Meale, Sope, and Broomes : who dwelling next vnto the Thread-market before mentioned, are Vpholsters.
 scarce twenty shops in all : for the residue are disperfed in other places of the City, as we will hereafter declare. Amongst the Cotten-merchants are certaine that sell ornaments for Tents and Beds. Next of all stand the Fowlers, who, though they be but few, yet are they stored with Poulters.
 all kind of choice and dainty Fowles : whereupon the place is called the Fowlers market. Then 10 come you to their shops that sell Cords and Ropes of Hempe : and then to such as make high Coorke-slippers for Noblemen and Gentlemen to walk the streets in, when it is foule weather: Corkslippers.
 these Corke-slippers are finely trimmed with much silke, and most excellent vpper leathers, so that the cheapest will cost a Ducat, yea some there are of ten Ducats, & some of five and twenty Ducats price. Such slippers as are accounted most fine and costly are made of blacke and white Mulberie-tree, of blacke Walnut-tree, and of the Injuba tree, albeit the Corke-slippers are the most durable and strong. Vnto these adioyne ten shops of Spanish Moores, which make Crosse- Crosse-bowes.
 bowes : as also those that make Broomes of a certaine wilde Palme-tree, such as are dayly brought out of Sicilie to Rome. These Broomes they carry about the City in a great basket, ei- Broome-men, ther selling them, or exchanging them for Bran, Ashes, or old Shooes : the Bran they sell againe 20 to Shepherds, the Ashes to such as white Thread, and old Shooes to Coblers. Next vnto them are Smithes that make Nailed; & Coopers which make certain great vessels in forme of a bucket, Smithes.
 hauing Corne-measures to sell also : which measures, when the Officer, appointed for the same purpose, hath made triall of, he is to receiue a farthing a-peece for his fee. Then follow the Wooll-chapmen, who hauing bought wooll of the Butchers, put it forth vnto others to Woolmen, be scowred and washed : the Sheepe-skinnes they themselves dresse : but as for Oxe-hides they belong to another occupation, and are tanned in another place. Vnto these adioyne such as make certaine Langols or Withs, which the Africans put vpon their horses feet. Next of all are the Brasiers : then such as make Weights and Measures ; and those likewise that make in- Weights and struments to carde Wooll or Flaxe. At length you descend into a long street, where men of di- Measures.
 30 uers occupations dwell together, some of which doe polish and enamell Stirops, Spurres, and Enamellers.

 exceeding pleasant in the Summer time. Next them are a company of Farriers, that shooe Mules and Horses : and then those that make the Iron-worke of Crosse-bowes. Then follow Smithes that make Horse-shooes ; and last of all, those that white Linnen-cloth : and here the west part 40 of the City endeth, which in times past (as is afore said) was a City by it selfe, and was built after the City on the East side of the Riuer.

The second part of Fez situate Eastward, is beautified with most stately Palaces, Temples, A Description Houses, and Colledges ; albeit there are not so many trades and occupations as in the part before of the second described. For here are neither Merchants, Taylors, Shoo makers, &c. but of the meaner sort. part of Fez.
 Heere are notwithstanding thirty shops of Grocers. Neere vnto the walles dwell certaine Grocers.
 Bricke-burners and Potters : and not farre from thence is a great Market of white Earthen Vef- Earthen vessels, Platters, Cups, and Dishes. Next of all stands the Corne-market, wherein are diuers Gra- sels.

 round about which diuers handi-crafts and occupations are exercised. There are likewise many other trades diuersly disperfed ouer this East part of the City. The Drapers and Grocers haue Drapers.

accounted the best; for that which commeth out of the Riuer is in Summer oftentimes dried vp: as likewise when the Conduits are to be clenched, the course of the Riuer must of necessitie bee turned out of the City. Wherefore euery family vseth to fetch water out of the said Fountaines, and albeit in Summer-time the chiefe Gentlemen vse Riuer-water, yet they will often call for Fountaine-water, because it is more coole and pleasant in taste. But in the Spring-time it is nothing so. These Fountaines haue their Originall for the most part from the West and South, for the North part is all full of Mountaines and Marble Rockes, containing certaine Caues or Cels, wherein Corne may be kept for many yeeres; of which Caues some are so large, that they will hold two hundred bushels of Corne. The Citizens dwelling neere those Caues, and such as possesse them, do sufficiently maintaine themselues in taking yeerely euery hundred bushell for rent. The South part of East Fez is almost halfe destitute of Inhabitants; howbeit the gardens abound with Fruits and Flowres of all sorts. Euery Garden hath an house belonging thereunto, and a Christall-fountaine enuironed with Roses, and other odoriferous Flowres and Herbes; so that in the Spring-time a man may both satisfie his eyes, and solace his mind in visiting this part of the City: and well it may be called a Paradise, sithence the Noblemen doe here reside from the moneth of Aprill till the end of September. Westward, that is, toward the Kings Palace, standeth a Castle built by a King of the Luntune Familie, resembling in bignesse an whole towne: wherein the Kings of Fez, before the said Palace was built, kept their Royall residence. But after new Fez began to be built by the Marin Kings, the said Castle was left onely to the Gouvernor of the City. Within this Castle stands a stately Temple built (as aforesaid) what time it was inhabited by Princes and Nobles, many places being afterward defaced and turned into Gardens: howbeit certaine houses were left vnto the Gouvernour, partly to dwell in, and partly for the deciding of controuersies. Heere is likewise a certaine Prison for captiues supported with many pillars, and being so large, that it will hold (as diuers are of opinion) three thousand men. Neither are there any seuerall roomes in this prison: for at Fez one prison serueth for all. By this Castle runneth a certaine Riuer very commodious for the Gouvernour.

In the City of Fez are certaine particular Iudges and Magistrates: and there is a Gouvernour that defineth ciuill controuersies, and giueth sentence against Malefactors. Likewise there is a Iudge of the Canon Law, who hath to doe with all matters concerning the Mahumetan Religion. A third Iudge there is also, that dealeth about marriages and diuorcements, whose authoritie is to heare all witnesses, and to giue sentence accordingly. Next vnto them is the high Aduocate, vnto whom they appeale from the sentence of the said Iudges, when as they doe either mistake themselues, or doe ground their sentence vpon the authoritie of some inferiour Doctor. The Gouvernour gaineth a great summe of money by condemning of parties at seuerall times. Their manner of proceeding against a Malefactor is this: hauing given him an hundred or two hundred stripes before the Gouvernour, the Executioner putteth an Iron-chaine about his necke, and so leadeth him starke-naked (his priuities onely excepted) through all parts of the City: after the Executioner followes a Serieant, declaring vnto all the people what fact the guilty person hath committed, till at length hauing put on his apparell againe, they carry him backe to prison. Sometimes it falleth out that many offenders chained together are led about the Citie: and the Gouvernour for each Malefactor thus punished, receiueth one Ducat and one fourth part; and likewise at their first entrance into the Gaole, he demands of each one a certaine duety, which is paid particularly vnto him by diuers Merchants and Artificers appointed of purpose. And amongst his other liuings, he gathered out of a certaine Mountaine seuen thousand Ducats of yeerely Reuenue: so that when occasion serueth, he is at his proper costes to finde the King of Fez three hundred horses, and to giue them their pay.

Those which follow the Canon law haue neither stipend nor reward allowed them: for it is forbidden by the Law of Mahumet, that the Iudges of his Religion should reape any commoditie or Fees by their Office; but that they should liue onely by reading of Lectures, and by their Priesthood. In this faculty are many Aduocates and Proctors, which are extreme idiots, and vtterly voyd of all good learning. There is a place also in Fez whereinto the Iudges vse to cast the Citizens for debt, or for some light offence. In all this City are foure Officers or Serieants onely; who from midnight till two a clocke in the morning doe walke about all parts of the Citie; neither haue they any stipend, but a certaine Fee of such Malefactors as they lead about in chaines, according to the qualitie of euery mans crime; moreover, they are freely permitted to sell Wine, and to keepe Harlots. The said Gouvernour hath neither Scribes nor Notaries, but pronounceth all sentences by word of mouth. One onely there is that gathereth Customes and Tributes ouer all the City, who daily payeth to the Kings vse thirty Ducats. This man appointeth certaine substitutes to watch at euery Gate, where nothing, be it of neuer so small value, can passe before some Tribute be paid. Yea, sometime they goe forth of the City to meet with the Carriers & Muliters vpon the high wayes, to the end they may not conceale nor closely conuey any merchandize into the City. And if they be taken in any deceit, they pay double. The set order or proportion of their Custome is this, namely, to pay two Ducats for the worth worth of an hundred: for Onix-stones, which are brought hither in great plentie, they pay one fourth part: but for Wood, Corne, Oxen, & Hens, they giue nothing at all. The said Gouvernor of the Shambles hath alwaies twelue men wayting vpon him, and oftentimes hee rideth about the Citie to examine the weight of bread, and finding any bread to faile of the duewaight, he causeth the Baker to be beaten with cudgels, and to bee led in contempt vp and downe the Citie.

The Citizens of Fez goe very ciuilly and decently attyred, in the Spring time wearing Garments made of out-landish cloth: ouer their Shirts they weare a Iacket or Caslock beeing narrow and halfe-sleeued, whereupon they weare a certayne wide Garment; close before on the brest. Their Caps are thinne and single, like vnto the Night-caps vsed in Italie, sauing that they couer not their eares: the se Caps are couered with a certayne Skarfe, which beeing twice wreathed about their head and beard, hangeth by a knot. They weare neither Hose nor Breeches, but in the Spring time when they ride a Iourney, they put on Boots: many, the poorer sort haue onely their Caslocke, and a Mantle ouer that called, * Bannussi, and a most course Cap. The Doctors and ancient Gentlemen weare a certayne Garment with wide sleeues, somewhat like to the Gentlemen of Venice. The common sort of people are for the most part clad in a kind of course white cloth. The women are not altogether vnseemely apparelled, but in Summer time they weare nothing saue their Smockes onely. In Winter they weare such a wide sleeued Garment, being close at the brest, as that of the men before mentioned. When they goe abroad, they put on certayne long Breeches, wherewith their legges are all couered, hauing also, after the fashion of Syria, a Veile hanging downe from their heads, which couereth their whole bodies. On their faces likewise they weare a Maske with two little holes, onely for their eyes, to peepe out at. Their eares they adorne with golden Eare-rings, and with most precious Iewels: the meaner sort weare Eare-rings of Siluer and gilt only. Vpon their armes the Ladies and Gentlewomen weare golden Bracelets, and the residue Siluer, as likewise Gold or Siluer-rings vpon their legs, according to each ones estate and abilitie.

Their apparel.

* Or ilbermus.

Let vs now speake somewhat of their victuals and manner of eating. The common sort set on the pot with fresh meate twice euery weeke: but the Gentlemen and richer sort euery day, and as often as they list. They take three meales a day: their Break-fast consisteth of certayne Fruits and Bread, or else of a kind of liquid Pap made like vnto Fruementie: in Winter they sup off the Broth of salt flesh thicken'd with course meale. To dinner they haue Flesh, Sallets, Cheese, and Oliues: but in Summer they haue greater cheere. Their Supper is easie of digestion, consisting of Bread, Melons, Grapes, or Milke: but in Winter they haue sodden flesh, together with a kind of meate called Cuscusu, which being made of a lump of Dow is set first vpon the fire in certayne Vessels full of holes, and afterward is tempered with Butter and Pottage. Some also vse often to haue Roste-meat. And thus you see after what sort both the Gentlemen and common people lead their liues: albeit the Noblemen fare somewhat more daintily: but if you compare them with the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Europe, they may seeme to be miserable and base fellowes; not for any want or scarcitie of victuals, but for want of good manners and cleanness. The Table whereat they sit is low, vncovered, and filthy: seates they haue none but the bare ground, neyther Kniues or Spooones but only their ten Talons. The said Cuscusu is set before them all in one only Platter, whereout as well Gentlemen as others take it not with Spooones, but with their Clawes fiew. The meate and pottage is put all in one Dish; out of which euery one raketh with his greasie fists what hee thinkes good: you shall neuer see Knife vpon the Table, but they teare and greedily deuoure their meate like hungry Dogges. Neyther doth any of them desire to drinke before he hath well stuffed his panch; and then will he sup off a cup of cold water as bigge as a Milke-bowle. The Doctors indeed are somewhat more orderly at meales: but, to tell you the very truth, in all Italie there is no Gentleman so meane, which for fine Dyet and stately Furniture excelleth not the greatest Potentates and Lords of all Africa.

Their manner of eating and drinking.

A kind of meat called Cuscusu.

As touching their Marriages, they obserue these courses following. So soone as the Maydes Father hath espoused her vnto her Louer, they goe forth with like Bride and Bridegroom to Church, accompanied with their Parents and Kinsfolkes, and call likewise two Notaries with them, to make record before all that are present of the Couenants and Dowrie. The meaner sort of people vsually giue for their Daughters Dowrie thirtie Duckats and a woman-slaue of fifteen Duckats price; as likewise a parti-coloured Garment embroydered with Silke and certayne other Silke Skarfes, or Iags, to were vpon her head in stead of a Hood or Veile; then a paire of fine Shooes, and two excellent paire of Startups; and lastly, many prettie Knackes curiously made of Siluer and other Metals, as namely, Combes, Perfuming-pans, Bellowes, and such other Trinkets as Women haue in estimation. Which beeing done, all the Ghests present are invited to a Banquet, whereunto for great Dainties is brought a kind of Bread fried and tempered with Honey, which we haue before described; then they bring Rost-meat to the boord, all this being at the Bridegroomes cost: afterward the Brides Father maketh a Banquet in like sort. Who if he bestow on his Daughter some apparell besides her Dowrie, it is accounted a point of liberalitie. And albeit the Father promiseth but thirtie Duckats onely for a Dowrie, yet will he sometimes bestow, in apparell and other Ornaments belonging to Women men, two hundred, yea sometimes three hundred Duckats besides. But they seldome giue an House, a Vineyard, or a field for a Dowrie. Moreouer vpon the Bride they bestow three Gownes made of costly cloth; and three others of Silke Chamlet, or of some other excellent Stuffe. They giue her Smockes likewise curiously wrought, with fine Veiles, and other embroydered Vestures; as also Pillowes and Cushions of the best sort. And besides all the former gifts, they bestow eight Carpets or Couerlets on the Bride, foure whereof are onely for seemeliness to spread vpon their Presses and Cupboards: two of the courser they vse for their Beds; and the other two of Leather to lay vpon the floore of their Bed-chambers. Also they haue certaine Rugs of about twentie els compasse or length; as likewise three Quilts beeing made of Linnen and Woollen on the one side, and stuffed with flocks on the other side, which they vse in the night in manner following. With the one halfe they couer themselves, and the other halfe they lay vnder them: which they may easily doe, when as they are both waies about ten ells long. Vnto the former they adde as many Couerlets of Silke very curiously embroydered on the vpper-side, and beneath lined double with Linnen and Cotton. They bestow likewise white Couerlets to vse in Summer-time onely: and lastly, they bestow a Woollen hanging diuided into many parts, and finely wrought, as namely, with certaine pieces of gilt Leather; whereupon they sowe Iags of partie-coloured Silke, and vpon euery Iagge a little Ball or Button of Silke, whereby the said hanging may for Ornaments sake bee fastened vnto a wall.

Italians mistaken.
Fetching home the Bride.

Here you see what be the Appurtenances of their Dowries; wherein some doe strue so much to excell others, that oftentimes many Gentlemen haue brought themselves vnto Pouerty thereby. Some Italians thinke that the Husband bestowes a Dowrie vpon his Wife; but they altogether mistake the matter.

The Bridegroom being readie to carry home his Bride, causeth her to be placed in a wooden Cage or Cabinet eight square couered with Silke, in which shee is carryed by Porters, her Parents and Kinsfolkes following, with a great noyse of Trumpets, Pipes, and Drummes, and with a number of Torches; the Bridegroomes Kinsmen goe before with Torches, and the Brides Kinsfolkes follow after: and so they goe vnto the great Market place, and hauing passed by the Temple, the Bridegroom takes his leaue of his Father-in-law and the rest, hying him home with all speed, and in his Chamber expecting the presence of his Spouse. The Father, Brother, and Vncle of the Bride leade her vnto the Chamber-doores, and there deliuer her with one consent vnto the Mother of the Bridegroom: who, as soone as she is entred, toucheth her foot with his, and forth-with they depart into a seuerall roome by themselves. In the meane season the Banquet is comming forth: and a certaine woman standeth before the Bride-chamber doore, expecting till the Bridegroom hauing deflowered his Bride, reacheth her a Napkin stayned with blood, which Napkin she carryeth incontinent and sheweth to the Ghests, proclaiming with a lowd voyce, that the Bride was euer til that time an vnspotted & pure Virgine. This woman, together with other women her Companions, first the Parents of the Bridegroom, and then of the Bride, doe honourably entertayne. But if the Bride be found not to be a Virgine, the Marriage is made frustrate, and shee with great disgrace is turned home to her Parents.

The Marriage of Widdowes.

The Circumcision of their Children.

But so soone as the new married man goeth forth of the house (which is for the most part on the seuenth day after the Marriage) hee buyeth great plenty of fishes, which hee causeth his Mother or some other woman to cast vpon his Wiues feet; and this they, from an ancient Superstitious custome take for a good boding.

The morrow after a company of women goe to dresse the Bride, to combe her Lockes, and to paint her Cheekes with Vermillion; her hands and her feet they dye blacke, but all this Painting presently loseth the fresh hue; and this day they haue another Banquet. The Bride they place in the highest Roome that she may be seene of all. The same night, which was spent in dancing, there are present at the Bridal-house certayne Minstrels and Singers, which by turnes sometimes vse their Instruments and sometimes Voyce-musick: they dance alwayes one by one, and at the end of each Galliard they bestow a Largeesse vpon the Musicians. If any one will honour the Dancer, he bids him kneele downe before him, and hauing fastened pieces of money all ouer his face, the Musicians presently take it off for their fee. The women dance alone without any men, at the noyse of their owne Musicians. All these things vse to bee performed when the Bride is a Mayde. But the Marriages of Widdowes are concluded with lesse adoe. Their cheere is boyled Beefe and Mutton, and stewed Hens, with diuers iuncating Dishes among. In stead of Trenchers, the Ghests being ten or twelue in number, haue so many great round Platters of wood set before them. And this is the common custome of Gentlemen and Merchants. The meaner sort present their Ghests with certaine sops or bruesle of Bread like vnto a Pancake, which being dipped in flesh-pottage, they eat out of a great Platter not with Spooones but with their fingers onely: and round about each great Platter stand to the number of ten or twelue persons.

Likewise they make a solemne Feast at the Circumcision of their male children, which is vpon the seuenth day after their birth; and at this Feast the Circumcisor, together with all their Friends and Kinsfolkes is present: which being done, each one, according to his abilitie, bestoweth a Gift vpon the Circumcisor in manner following. Euery man layes his money vpon a Lads face which the Circumcisor brought with him. Whereupon the Lad calling euery one by by his name, giueth them thanks in particular: and then the Infant beeing circumcised, they spend that day with as great iollity as a day of Marriage. But at the birth of a Daughter they shew not so much alacritie.

Among the people of Fez, there haue remayned certaine Relikes of Festiuall Dayes instituted of old by the Christians, whereupon they vse certaine ceremonies which themselves vnderstand not. Vpon Christmas euen they eate a Sallet made of diuers Hearbs: they seeth likewise that night all kind of Pulse, which they feede vpon for great dainties. Vpon New-yeeres day the children goe with Maskes and Vizards on their faces to the houses of Gentlemen and Merchants, and haue Fruites giuen them for singing certaine Carols or Songs. When as the Feast of Saint Iohn Baptist is hallowed among Christians, you shall here see all about great store of fires made with Straw. And when their childrens teeth begin to grow, they make another feast called, according to the Latines, Dentilla. They haue also many other Rites and Customes of Diuining, or Southsaying, the like whereof I haue seene at Rome, and in other Cities of Italy: As touching their Feasts prescribed by the Mahumetan Law, they are at large set downe in that briefe Treatise which we haue written concerning the same Law.

The women hauing by death lost their husbands, fathers, or any other of their deare friends, assemble forth-with a great multitude of their owne Sexe together, who stripping themselves out of their owne attire, put on most vile sack-cloth, and defile their faces with much durt: then call they certaine men clad in womens attire, bringing great foure-square Drums with them, at the noyse of which Drums the women-mourners sing a Funerall-song, tending as much as may be, to the commendation of the partie deceased; and at the end of euery Verse, the said women utter most hideous shrieks and out-cries, tearing their haire, and with much lamentation beating their cheekes and breasts, till they be all-imbrued with blood: and so these Heathenish superstitions continue for seuen whole dayes together. At which seuen daies end they surcease their mourning for the space of forty daies, and then they begin anew to torment themselves for three daies together in manner aforesaid: howbeit, these kinds of Obsequies are obserued only by the baser people, but the Gentlemen and better sort behaue themselves more modestly. At this time all the widowes friends come about her to comfort her, and send diuers kinds of meats vnto her: for in the mourning-house they may dresse no meate at all, till the dead corps bee carried forth. The woman her selfe that looseth her husband, father, or brother, neuer goeth forth with the funerall. But how they wash and burie the dead corps, and what superstitions they vse thereabout, you shall find recorded in my little Treatise aboue mentioned.

The Citizens vse most of all to play at Chesse, and that from ancient times. Other Games there are also, but very rude, and vsed onely by the common people.

In Fez, there are diuers most excellent Poets, which make Verses in their owne Mother-tongue: most of their Poems and Songs intreate of Loue. Euery yeare they pen certaine Verses in the commendation of Mahumet, especially vpon his Birth-day: for then betimes in the morning they resort vnto the Palace of the chiefe Iudge or Gouvernour, ascending his Tribunall seate, and from thence reading their Verses to a great audience of people: and he whose Verses are most elegant and pithy, is that yeare proclaimed Prince of the Poets. But when as the Kings of the Marin Family prospered, they vsed to inuite all the learned men of the Citie vnto their Palace; and honourably entertaining them, they commanded each man in their hearing to recite their Verses to the commendation of Mahumet: and hee that was in all mens opinions esteemed the best Poet, was rewarded by the King with an hundred Duckats, with an excellent Horse, with a Woman-slave, and with the Kings owne Robes wherewith hee was then apparelled: all the rest had fifty Duckats apiece giuen them, so that none departed without the Kings liberalitie: but an hundred and thirtie yeares are expired since this custome, together with the Maiestie of the Fezzan Kingdome decayed.

Of Schooles in Fez, for the instructing of Children, there are almost two hundred, euery one of which is in fashion like a great Hall. The Schoole-masters teach their Children to write, and reade not out of a Booke, but out of a certaine great Table. Euery day they expound one sentence of the Alcoran: and hauing read quite through, they begin it againe, repeating it so often, till they haue most firmly committed the same to memorie: which they doe right well in the space of seuen yeeres. Then reade they vnto their Scholers some part of Orthography: howbeit, both this and the other parts of Grammar are farre more exactly taught in the Colledges, then in these triuiall Schooles. The said Schoole-masters are allowed a very small stipend; but when their Boyes haue learned some part of the Alcoran, they present certaine gifts vnto their Master, according to each ones abilitie. Afterward so soone as any Boy hath perfectly learned the whole Alcoran, his Father inuiteth all his sonnes Schoole-fellowes vnto a great Banquet: and his soune in costly apparell rides through the streete vpon a gallant Horse, which Horse and apparell the Gouvernour of the Royall Citadell is bound to lend him. The rest of his Schoole-fellowes beeing mounted likewise on Horse-backe accompany him to the Banqueting-house, singing diuers Songs to the praise of God, and of Mahumet. Then are they brought to a most sumptuous Banquet, whereat all the Kinsfolks of the foresaid Boyes Father are vsually present: euery one of whom bestoweth on the Schoole-ma-ster some small gift, and the Boyes Father giues him a new suite of apparell. The said Scholers likewise vse to celebrate a Feast vpon the birth-day of Mahumet, and then their Fathers are bound to send each man a Torch vnto the Schoole: whereupon euery Boy carrieth a Torch in his hand, some of which weigh thirtie pound. These Torches are most curiously made, being adorned round about with diuers fruits of Waxe, which being lighted betimes in the morning, doe burne till Sun-rise; in the meane while certaine Singers resound the prayes of Mahumet; and so soone as the Sunne is vp, all their solemnitie ceaseth: this day vseth to be very gainefull vnto the Schoole-masters, for they sell the remnant of the Waxe vpon the Torches for an hundred Duckats, and sometimes for more. None of them payes any rent for his Schoole: for all their Schooles were built many yeeres agoe, and were freely bestowed for the training vp of youth. Both in these common Schooles, and also in the Colledges they haue two dayes of recreation euery weeke, wherein they neither teach nor studie.

Now let vs speake of the Fortune-tellers and Diuiners, of whom there is a great number, and three kinds. For one sort vseth certaine Geomanticall figures. Others powring a drop of Oyle into a viall or glasse of water, make the said water to be transparent and bright, wherein, as it were in a mirror, they affirme that they see huge swarmes of Deuils that resemble an whole Armie, some whereof are traouelling, some are passing ouer a Riuer, and others fighting a Land-battell, whom when the Diuiner seeth in quiet, he demandeth such questions of them as he is desirous to be resolu'd of; and the Deuils giue them answere with beckning, or with some gesture of their hands or eyes; so inconsiderate and damnable is their credulitie in this behalfe. The foresaid Glasse-viall they will deliuer into childrens hands scarce of eight yeeres old, of whom they will aske whether they see this or that Deuill. Many of the Citie are so besotted with these vanities, that they spend great sums vpon them. The third kind of Diuiners are Women-witches, which are affirmed to haue familiaritie with Deuils: some Deuils they call red, some white, and some blacke Deuils: and when they will tell any mans fortune, they perfume themselues with certaine Odours, saying, That then they possesse themselues with that Deuill which they called for: afterward changing their voyce, they faine the Deuill to speake within them: then they which come to enquire, ought with great feare and trembling aske these vild and abominable Witches such questions as they meane to propound; and lastly, offering some fee vnto the Deuill, they depart. But the wiser and honestest sort of people call these women Sahacat, which in Latin signifieth Fricatrices, because they haue a damnable custome to commit vnlawfull Venerie among themselues, which I cannot expresse in any modestest termes. If faire women come vnto them at any time, these abominable Witches will burne in lust towards them, no otherwise then lustie Younkers doe towards young Maides, and will in the Deuils behalfe demand for a reward, that they may lie with them: and so by this meanes it often falleth out, that thinking thereby to fulfill the Deuils command they lie with the Witches. Yea, some there are, which being allured with the delight of this abominable vice, will desire the company of these Witches, and faining themselues to be sicke, will either call one of the Witches home to them, or wil send their husbands for the same purpose: and so the Witches perceiuing how the matter stands, will say, That the Woman is possessed with a Deuill, and that she can no way be cured, vnales she be admitted into their society. With these words her silly husband being perswaded, doth not only permit her so to do, but makes also a sumptuous banquet vnto the damned crew of Witches: which being done, they vse to dance very strangely at the noyse of Drums: and so the poore man commits his false wife to their filthy disposition. Howbeit, some there are that will soone coniure the Deuill with a good cudgell out of their wiues: others faining themselues to be possessed with a Deuill, will deceiue the said Witches, as their wiues haue been deceiued by them.

In Fez likewise there are a kind of Iuglers, or Coniurers called Muhazimin, who of all others are reported to be most speedie casters out of Diuels. And because their Negromancie sometimes taketh effect, it is a wonder to see into what reputation they grow thereby: but when they cannot cast forth a Deuill, they say, It is an Airie Spirit. Their manner of adiuring Deuils, is this: First, they draw certaine Characters and Circles vpon an ash-heape, or some other place; then describe they certaine signes vpon the hands and fore-head of the partie possessed, and perfume him after a strange kind of manner. Afterward they make their Inchantment or Coniuration, enquiring of the Deuill, which way, or by what meanes he entred the party, as likewise what he is, and by what name he is called; and lastly, charging him to come forth. Others there are that worke by a certaine Cabalisticall rule, called Zamagis: this rule is contained in many Writings, for it is thought to be Naturall Magique: neither are there any other Negromancers in all Fez, that will more certainly and truly resolute a doubtfull question: howbeit, their Art is exceeding difficult, for the Students thereof must haue as great skill in Astrologie, as in Cabala. My selfe in times past hauing attained to some knowledge in this facultie, continued (I remember) an whole day in describing one figure onely: which kind of figures are described in manner following. First, they draw many circles within the compasse of a great circle: in the first circle they make a crosse, at the foure extremities whereof, they set downe the foure quarters of the World, to wit, East, West, North and South: at each end of one of the said crosse lines they note either Pole: likewise about the circumference of the first circle, they paint the foure Elements: then diuide they the same circle and the circle following into foure parts, and euery fourth part they diuide into other seuen, each one being distinguished with certaine great Arabian Characters, so that euery Element containeth eight and twenty Characters. In the third circle they set downe the seuen Planets: in the fourth, the twelue Signes of the Zodiack: in the fifth, the twelue Latine names of the moneths: in the sixth, the eight and twentie Houses of the Moone: in the seuenth, the three hundred sixty five dayes of the yeare; and about the conuexitie thereof, the foure Cardinall or principall Windes. Then take they 10 one onely letter of the question propounded, multiplying the same by all the particulars aforenamed, and the product or summe totall they diuide after a certaine manner, placing it in some roome, according to the quality of the character, and as the Element requireth wherein the said Character is found without a figure. All which being done, they marke that figure which seemeth to agree with the foresaid number, or summe produced, wherewith they proceed as they did with the former, til they haue found eight and twenty Characters, whereof they make one word, and of this word the speech is made that resolueth the question demanded: this speech is alwaies turned into a verse of the first kind, which the Arabians call Etbaul, consisting of eight Stipites, and twelue Chordi, according to the Meeter of the Arabian Tongue, whereof we haue intreated in the last part of our Arabian Grammer. And the Verse consisting 20 of those Characters, comprehendeth alwaies a true and infallible answer vnto the question propounded, resoluing first that which is demanded, and then expounding the sense of the question it selfe. These Practitioners are neuer found to erre, which causeth their Art of Cabala to bee had in great admiration: which although it bee accounted Naturall, yet neuer saw I any thing that hath more affinitie with supernaturall and Diuine knowledge. I remember that I saw in a certaine open place of King Abulunan his Colledge in Fez, vpon a floore paved with excellent smoothe Marble, the description of a figure. Each side of this floore or court was fifty ells long, and yet two third parts thereof were occupied about the figure, and about the things pertaining thereto: three there were that made the description, euery one attending his appointed place, and they were an whole day in setting it downe. Another such figure I saw at Tunis, drawne by one that was maruelous cunning in the Art, whose father had written two volumes of Commentaries or expositions vpon the precepts of the same Art, wherein whosoever hath exact skill, 30 is most highly esteemed of by all men. I my selfe neuer saw but three of this Profession, namely, one at Tunis, and two other at Fez: likewise I haue seene two Expositions vpon the precepts of the said Arte, together with a Commentarie of one Margian, father vnto the foresaid Cabalist which I saw at Tunis: and another written by Ibnu Caldun the Historiographer. And if any were desirous to see the Precepts and Commentaries of that Art, he might doe it with the expence of fiftie Duckats: for sayling to Tunis, a Towne neere vnto Italy, hee might haue a sight of all the particulars aforesaid. I my selfe had fit oportunitie of time, and a Teacher that offered to instruct me gratis in the same Art: howbeit, I thought good not to accept his offer, because the said Art is forbidden and accounted hereticall by the Law of Mahumet: for Mahumet's Law affirmeth all kind of Diuinations to be vaine, and that God onely knoweth secrets, and things to 40 come: wherefore sometimes the said Cabalists are imprisoned by the Mahumetan Inquisitors, who cease not to persecute the Professors of that Art.

World,

Here also you may find certaine learned men, which will haue themselves called Wizards, and Morall Philosophers. They obserue certaine Rules which Mahumet neuer prescribed. By some they are accounted Catholique, or true Mahumetans, and by others they are holden for heretiks: howbeit, the greatest part of the common people reuerence them as if they were Gods, notwithstanding they commit many things vnlawfull and forbidden by the Mahumetan Law; as namely, whereas the said Law forbiddeth any loue-matters to be expressed in any muscicall Ditties, or Songs, these Morallists affirme the contrary. In the foresaid Mahumetan Religion are a great number of Rules or Sects, euery of which hath most learned Patrons and Protectors. The 50 foresaid Sect sprang vp fourescore yeares after Mahumet, the first Author thereof being called Elhesen Ibnu Abilhasen, and being borne in the Towne of Basora: this man taught his Disciples and followers certaine Precepts, but Writings hee left none behind him. About an hundred yeares after there came another notable Doctor of that Sect from Bagaded, called Elharit Ibnu Esed, who left volumes of Writings vnto his Disciples. Afterward those that were found to be his followers, were all condemned by the Mahumetan Patriarkes and Lawyers. Howbeit, fourescore yeares after, that Sect began to reuiue againe vnder a certaine famous Professor, who drew after him many Disciples, vnto whom he published his Doctrine. This man at length, and 60 all his followers, were by the Patriarke and Lawyers condemned to die. Which he vnderstanding, wrote forthwith vnto the Patriarke, requesting that he might be licenced to dispute with the Lawyers, as touching his Doctrine, of whom if he were conuicted, he would most willingly suffer death; otherwise that it would be against al equity, that so many innocents should perish vpon an vniust accusation. The Patriarke thinking his demand to be reasonable, condescended wholly thereunto. But when the matter came to disputation, the partie condemned, soone put all the Lawyers to silence. Which when the Patriarke perceiued, he reuoked the sentence as vniust, and caused many Colledges and Monasteries to be erected for the said partie and his followers. After which time this Sect continued about an hundred yeeres, till the Emperour Malicfah of the Turkish race came thither out of Asia the greater, and destroyed all the maintainers thereof. Whereupon some of them fled vnto Cairo, and the rest into Arabia, being disperfed here and there for the space of twenty yeeres, till the reigne of Caselsah, Nephew vnto Malicfah, Nidam Elmule, one of his Counsellors, and a man of an high spirit, being addicted vnto the said Sect, so restored, erected, and confirmed the same, that by the helpe of one Elgazzuli, a most learned man (who had written of the same argument a notable Worke, diuided into seuen parts) he reconciled the Lawyers with the Disciples of this Sect, conditionally, that the Lawyers should be called Conseruers of the Prophet Mahumet his Lawes, and the Sectaries Reformers of the same. This concord lasted betweene them, till Bagaded was sacked by the Tartars; which befell in the yeare of the Hegeira 756. at what time those Sectaries so increased, that they swarmed almost ouer all Africa and Asia. Neither would they admit any into their societie, but such as were very learned, and trained vp in all kind of liberall Sciences; to the end they might the better defend their owne opinions, and confute their aduersaries: but now adayes they admit all kind of rude and ignorant persons, affirming all sorts of learning to be needlesse; for the holy spirit (say they) reuealeth the knowledge of the truth vnto such as are of a cleane heart; and they alleage many reasons for the confirmation of this their opinion, though not very forcible. Wherefore despising their ancestors Rites, and the strict obseruations of the Law, they addit themselves to nought else but delights and pleasures, feasting often, and singing lasciuious Songs. Sometimes they will rend their garments, either alluding thereby to the Verses that they sing, or being moued thereunto by their corrupt and vile disposition, saying falsely, That they are then rauished with a fit of diuine loue: but rather impute it to their abundance of meat, and gluttony. For each one of them will deuoure as much meate, as may well suffice three. Or (which is more likely) they vtter those passionate clamours and out-cries, because they are inflamed with vnlawfull and filthy lust. For sometimes it happeneth that some one of the principal of them, with all his Scholers and Disciples, is inuited to the marriage of some Gentleman, and at the beginning of the banquet they will rehearse their deuout Orizons and Songs, but so soone as they are risen from the Table, the elder of the companie being about to dance, teare their garments: and if any one in the midst of their dancing, that hath drunke immoderately, chanceth to fall downe, he is taken vp forthwith by one of the Scholers, and too too lasciuiously kissed. Whereupon this Prouerbe grew among the people of Fez, The Hermits banquet. Which they vse in reproch of those Matters, that make their Scholers their Minions.

Amongst these Sects there are some, that haue not onely a diuers Law, but also a different beliefe from the residue; whereupon by some others they are called Heretikes. Some there are also which hold, that a man by good Works, by Fasting, and Abstinence, may attaine vnto the nature of an Angell, which good Works, Fastings, &c. doe (say they) so purge and free the mind from all contagion of euill, that by no meanes it can sinne any more, though it would neuer so faine. Howbeit, they thinke themselves not capable of this felicitie, before they ascended thereunto by the degrees of fiftie Disciplines or Sciences: and although they fall into sinne before they be come to the fiftieth degree, yet they say that God wil not impute that sinne vnto them. These fellowes indeed in the beginning led a most strict life, and do euen macerate and consume themselves with fasting: but afterward they giue themselves to all licentiousnesse and pleasure. They haue also a most seuer forme of liuing set downe in foure Bookes, by a certaine learned man of their faction, called Essebranaur de Sebrauard, and borne in the Citie of Corasan. Likewise there was another Authour called Ibnul Farid, that described all their Religion in witty Verses, which being fraught with Allegories, seemed to intreate of nought but Loue: wherefore one Elfargani expounded the said Verses with a Commentarie, and thereout gathered the Canons and Orders of the Sect, and shewed the degrees to the attainment of felicitie. Moreouer, the said Verses are so sweet and elegant, that the maintainers of this Sect will sing and repeate none other in their Banquets: for these three hundred yeeres no Author hath so adorned their language as the said Ibnul. These Sectaries take the Heauens, the Elements, the Planets, and the fixed Starres to be one God, and that no Law nor Religion is erroneous: for euery man (say they) may lawfully worship that which his mind is most addicted to worship. They thinke that all the knowledge of God was infused into one man, whom they call in the language Elcorb; this man, they say, was elect by God, and was made equall in knowledge to him. Forty there are among them called all by the name of Elanted, which signifieth in our language, a block, or stock of a tree: out of this number, when their Elcorb deceaseth, they create another in his roome, namely, seuentie persons that haue the authority of election committed vnto them. There are likewise seuen hundred sixty five others (whose names I doe not well remember) who are chosen into the said electors roomes, when any of them decease. These seuen hundred sixtie five being bound thereunto by a certaine Canon or Rule of their Order, are constrained alwaies to goe vnknowne vnknowne, and they range almost all the world ouer in a most vile and beggerly habite, so that a man would take them for mad men, and estranged from all sense of humanitie: for these lewde miscreants vnder pretence of their religion, run like rogues naked and sauage throughout all Africa, hauing so little regard of honestie or shame, that they will like brute beasts rauish women in publike places; and yet forsooth the grosse common people reuerence them as men of wonderfull holinesse. Great swarmes of these filthie Vagabonds you may see in Tunis, but many more in Egypt, and especially at Alcair, where as in the Market called Bain Elcafrain, I saw one of these Villaines with mine owne eyes, in the presence of much people, defloure a most beautifull woman as she was comming forth of the Bath: which being done, the fond people came flocking about the said woman, struiuing to touch her garment as a most holy thing, saying, That the Adulterer was a man of great sanctitie, and that he did not commit the sin, but onely seemed to commit it: which when the silly cuckold her husband vnderstood, he shewed himselfe thankfull to his false God with a solemne Banquet, and with liberall giuing of Almes. The Magistrates of the Citie would haue punished the Adulterer, but they were in hazard to be flaine of the people for their labours, who (as is before said) adore these Varlets for Saints, and men of singular holinesse. Other more vilanous acts I saw committed by them, which I am ashamed to report.

Horrible villany, and more horrible blindness.

Likewise there is another sort of men, which wee may fitly call Cabalists. These fast most strictly, neither doe they eate the flesh of any liuing creature, but haue certaine meates and garments allotted vnto them: they rehearse likewise certaine set-prayers appointed for euery houre of the day and for the night, according to the varietie of dayes and moneths, and they vse to carrie about certaine square Tables with characters and numbers engrauen therein. They faine themselves to haue daily conference with the Angels, of whom they learne (they say) the knowledge of all things. They had once a famous Doctor of their Sect, called Boni, who was Author of their Canons, Prayers, and square Tables. Which when I saw, mee thought their Profession had more affinitie with Magique then with Cabala. Their Art was diuided into eight parts, whereof the first was called Elumha Enormita, that is, the demonstration of light, the which contained Prayers and Fastings. The second called Semful Meharif, that is, the Sunne of Sciences, contained the foresaid square Tables, together with their vse and profit. The third part they call Sirru Lafmei Elchusne; this part contained a catalogue of those ninetie nine Vertues, which (they say) are contained in the names of God, which I remember I saw at Rome in the custodie of a certaine Venetian Jew. They haue also a certaine other Rule, called Suvach, that is, the Rule of Hermites: the Professors and followers whereof inhabit Woods, and solitarie places; neither haue they any other food, but such as those wild Desarts will afford: the conuersation of these Heremites no man is able exactly to describe, because they are estranged from all humane societie. But if I should take vpon me to describe the varietie of Mahumetan Sects, I should digresse too farre from my present purpose. He that desireth to know more of this matter, let him reade ouer the booke of Elefacni, who discourseth at large of the Sects belonging to the Mahumetan Religion, the principall whereof are seuentie two, euery one of which defend their opinions to be true and good, and such as a man may attaine saluation by. At this day you shall find but two principall Sects onely, the one of Leshari being dispersed ouer all Africa, Egypt, Syria, Arabia, and Turkie: the other of Imamia, which is authorized throughout the whole Kingdome of Persia, and in certaine Townes of Corasan; and this Sect the great Sophi of Persia maintaineth, insomuch that all Asia had like to been destroyed thereabout. For whereas before they followed the sect of Leshari, the great Sophi by force of Armes established his owne of Imamia: and yet one onely Sect stretcheth ouer all the Mahumetans Dominions.

Moreouer, in the Citie of Fez there are certaine men called Elcanesin, who supposin gto finde treasure vnder the foundations of old houses, doe perpetually search and delue. These grosse fellows vse to resort vnto certaine dennes and caues without the Citie-walles, certainly perswading themselves, that when the Romans were chased out of Africa, and driuen into Batica or Granada in Spaine, they hid great abundance of treasure in the bowels of the earth, which they could not carry with them, and so enchanted the same by Art-Magique, that it can by no meanes be attained vnto but by the same Art; wherefore they seeke vnto Inchanters to teach them the Art of digging vp the said treasures. Some of them there are that will stedfastly affirme, that they saw Gold in this or that Caue: others, that they saw Siluer, but could not digge it out, by reason that they were destitute of Perfumes and Enchantments fit for the purpose; so that being seduced with this vaine opinion, and deeply deluing into the earth, they turne vpside-downe the foundations of Houses and Sepulchers, and sometimes they proceede in this manner tenne or twelue dayes iourney from Fez: yea, so fond they are, and so besotted, that they esteeme those Bookes that profess the Art of digging of Gold, as diuine Oracles. Before my departure from Fez, these fantastick people had chosen them a Consull, and getting licence of certaine owners to digge their grounds, when they had digged as much as they thought good, they paid the said owners for all dammages committed.

Of such as search for treasures in Fez.

In this Citie likewise there are great store of Alchymists, which are mightily addicted to that vaine practice: they are most base fellowes, and contaminate themselves with the steame of Sulphur,

Sulphur, & other stinking smels. In the euening they vse to assemble themselues at the great Temple, where they dispute of their false opinions. They haue of their Arte of Alchymie many Bookes written by learned men, amongst which one Geber is of principall account, who liued an hundred yeeres after Mahomet, and being a Greeke borne, is said to haue renounced his owne Religion. This Geber his workes and all his precepts are full of Allegories or darke borrowed speeches. Likewise they haue another Author, that wrote an huge Volume of the same Arte, intituled by the name of Attogrehi: this man was secretary vnto the Soldan of Bagaded, of whom we haue written in the liues of the Arabian Philosophers. Also the Songs or Articles of the said Science were written by one Mugairibi of Granada, whereupon a most learned Mamuluch of Damasco wrote a Commentary: yet so, that a man may much more easily vnderstand the Text 10 then the exposition thereof. Of Alchymists here are two sorts; whereof the one seeke for the Elisir, that is, the matter which coloureth brasse and other Metals; and the other are conuersant about multiplication of the quantities of Metals, whereby they may conueniently temper the same. But their chiefeft drift is to coine counterfeit money; for which cause you shall see most of them in Fez with their hands cut off.

In this City likewise there is a great swarme of base people, such as there Italians commonly call Ciurmatori: these sing foolish Songs & Rimes in all the streets of the City, & broching meere trifles with the Musicke of Drums, Harpes, and Citterns, they sell vnto the rude people certaine scrowles or brieft Charms in stead of preseruatiues. Vnto these you may adde another kinde of reffuse people of one Family and disposition with the former, who carry dauncing 20 Apes vp and downe, and haue their Neckes and Armes all entwined with crawling Snakes. These also professe Geomancy, and perswade women that they can foretell them their fortune. Likewise they carry stone-horses about with them, which for a certaine Fee, they will let others haue to couer their Mares. Their Gentlemen are very stately and high minded, and will haue little or no familiarity at all with the Citizens: so likewise the Doctors and Iudges of princi-pall account will admit but few vnto their acquaintance. This City it selfe is most beautiful and right commodiously situate; where albeit in winter time the streets are so mirie, that you cannot walke in them without startups, yet they let passe such abundance of water out of their Conduits, that all the filth is washed cleane away. Where Conduits are wanting, they carry all the durt in Carts vnto the next part of the Riuer. 30

Without the wals of this City Westward standeth a Suburbe containing almost fise hundred Families, the houses whereof are but meane, and the Inhabitants base, as namely, diuers of Camels, Water-bearers, and Cleauers of Wood for the Kings Palace. Yet heere you may finde diuers shops, and all kinds of Artificers. Heere likewise dwell all the Charmers and Roguish Minstrels before named; as also great swarmes of fluttish and filthie harlots. In the principall street of this Suburbe, you shall find certaine Caues most Artificially hewen out of excellent Marble, wherein the Noble men of Fez were wont to lay vp their Corne: for the least of them will containe more then a thousand Measures of Corne, there being aboue an hundred and fifty of them in all, but now they lie waste and open, insomuch that diuers fall into them at vna-wares, for which cause their brims are inuironed with wals. Heere euery one may play the Vintner and the Bawd; so that this Suburbe may iustly be called the sinke of Fez. From the 40 twentieth houre you shall see none at all in their shops: for then euery man runs to the Tauerne to disport, to spend riotously, and to be drunken. Another Suburbe there is allotted vnto the Lepers, of whom there are two hundred Families: these leprous persons haue a Gouvernour, which gathereth certaine yeerely Reuenues from the Noble men, and taketh such care of the said Lepers, that they want no necessary thing. He is bound by his Office to discharge the City of all leprous persons, and to compell all such as hee vnderstands to be infected with that disease, to depart into the foresaid Suburbs. If any Leper chanceth to die without issue, part of his goods are imployed to the common benefite of the Lepers, and part fall to the Gouvernours share: but if he hath children, they inioy his goods. 50

Many fields there are without the City, which haue beene giuen by certaine Noblemen for the buriall of the dead. Vpon their Sepulchers for the most part they lay a long three-square stone. When any Noble man or any principall Citizen deceaseth, they lay one stone ouer his head, and another ouer his feet, whereon vsed to be engrauen some Epitaph, with the day and yeere when the party deceased. I my selfe bestowed much labour in gathering of Epitaphs, which I saw both about Fez and in other places of Barbary; all which being set downe in a Booke, I gaue vnto the Kings Brother. The manner of their Epitaphs is diuers, some tending to consolation, and others to sorrow.

Northward of the City vpon a certaine high Hill stands a Palace, wherein are the Monuments of diuers Marin Kings, being most Artificially hewen out of Marble with Epitaphs vp- 60 on them, so that I cannot condignely expresse the Maiestie and Beauty thereof.

King Iacob the Founder diuided New Fez into three parts, whereof the first contained his Royall Palace, and diuers Noblemens houses, vnto euery one of which he allotted a most pleasant Garden. Not farre from his Palace he built a most stately and sumptuous Temple. In another part of this Citie hee built a large and faire Stable for the Kings Horses to stand in. Then also he caused other Palaces to be erected for his Captaines and principall Courtiers. From the West gate to the East he appointed the Market place, the distance betweene which Gates is a mile and an halfe, and on both sides he placed Artificers and Merchants shops.

In Fez, neither Ring nor any other Jewell or Commoditie can bee made of Siluer or Gold, before the Metall be sealed, for the Offenders are most severely punished. And the Metall being sealed, whatsoever is made thereof is weighed as if it were money. The greatest part of Gold-smiths dwelling in new Fez are Jewes, who carry their Vessels of Gold and Siluer vnto a certaine place of old Fez, neere vnto the Grocers shops, and there sell them. For in olde Fez neither Gold nor Siluer is coyned; nor any Mahumetans are suffered to bee Gold-smiths, because they haue Vsurers among them, which will sell any piece of wrought Siluer or Gold dearer then the waight requireth; albeit the same priuiledge is by the Gouvernours of the Citie granted vnto the Jewes. Some there are also that onely make Plate for the Citizens, who are payed hire onely for their worke. That part of the Citie which the Kings Attendants or Guard once possessed, is now inhabited by Jewes: for now a dayes the Kings vse no such Guard.

The Jewes indeed first dwelt in old Fez, but vpon the death of a certaine King they were all robbed by the Moores: whereupon King Abusabid caused them to remooue into new Fez, and by that meanes doubled their yearely Tribute. They therefore euen till this day doe occupie a long street in the said new Citie, wherein they haue their Shoppes and Synagogues, and their number is maruellously increased euer since they were driuen out of Spain. These Jewes are had in great contempt by all men, neytlier are any of them permitted to weare shooes, but they make them certaine Sockes of Sea-rushes. On their heads they weare a blacke * Dulipan, and if any will goe in a Cap, he must fasten a Red cloth thereunto. They pay vnto the King of Fez monethly foure hundred Duckats.

At length, within the space of an hundred and forty yeares this new Citie was enuironed with most impregnable wals, and adorned with Temples, Colledges, Palaces, and other such building as serue to beautifie a Citie, so that I thinke there was more bestowed in garnishing of the Citie, then in building of the wals. Without the Citie-wals are built many huge Wheelles or Engins, for the conuaying of Riuer-water ouer the said wals into Cisternes, from whence it is conuayed in certayne Channels and Pipes vnto the Temples, Gardens, and Palaces. The said Wheelles were built not fully an hundred yeares past, before which time water was brought vnto the Citie by a certayne Conduit, from a Fountayne ten miles distant. Of which artificiall Conduit a certaine Genouese, being then in great fauour with the King, is reported to haue beene the Author: but the Wheelles (they say) were intuented by a Spaniard: and in them there is maruellous cunning Workmanship: for to the conuayance of so huge a quantitie of water, each Wheele is turned about but foure and twentie times onely in a day and a night. To conclude, here are but few Gentlemen in this Citie, except such as attend vpon the Court, for the residue are base and Mechanicall people: but such as carry any shew of honestie, doe so hate and disdain the Kings Courtiers and Gentlemen, that they will by no meanes vouchsafe to marrie their Daughters vnto them.

Amongst all the Princes of Africa, I neuer read of any that was created by the common suffrages and consent of the people vnto his Kingdome or Princedome, or that was called from any strange Prouince or Citie to beare rule. Also by the Law of Mahumet no man may beare any Secular Authoritie, which may be called lawfull, saue onely the Mahumetan Patriarkes and Prelates: howbeit the said Patriarkes Authoritie decreasing daily more and more, the Ring-leaders of such people as ranged vp and downe the Desarts, began to invade places inhabited and ciuiled, and by force of Armes, against Mahumets Law, and maugre his Prelates, to ordayne sundry Princes: As for example in the East, whereas the Turkes, Cordians, and Tartars, haue vsurped dominion ouer such as were not able to repell them. So likewise in West parts first the Families of Zeneta and Luntuna, then the seditious Mahumetan Preachers, and afterward the Family of Marin got the vpper hand. Howbeit, the Family of Luntuna is reported to haue ayded the Westerne Regions, and to haue released them from the furie of the seditious Heretikes, wherein they shewed themselves Friends and not Enemies: but afterward their tyranny began to shew it selfe. And this is the reason why they doe not now a dayes attayne vnto Government by Hereditarie Succession or by Election of the people, or of the Nobilitie.

But the Prince himselfe when he feelles death seazing vpon him, calleth about him all his Peeres and Nobles, and bindeth them by Oath, to establish his Sonne, Brother, or any other whom he most fauoureth, in his Kingdome. But they after the Princes decease neglecting their Oath, will choose any other whom they list. And this is ordinarily the Election of the King of Fez, who, so soone as he is proclaymed King, chooseth forth with some one of his Nobles to be his Chiefe Counsellour, and on him he bestoweth the third part of all his Kingly Reuenues. Then chooseth another to be his Secretarie, Treasurer, and High Steward of his Household. Then is created the Captaine of the Horsemen appointed for the Kings Guard, and these Horsemen with their Horses liue most commonly in the fields.

The fashions and customes used in the Kings Court. No Electiue Princes in Africa; chosen by the people. No Rulers Mahumetan but Prelates.

This was before the Xeriffe Family preuayled. The manner of choosing Officers in the Court of Fez.

Lastly, he appointeth a new Gouernour ouer euery Citie, vnto whom all the Tributes and Reuenues of the same place redound, with condition that as often as any warres betyde, hee shall maintayne a certayne company of Horses to the Kings seruice. After a while also hee placeth certayne Deputies and Commissioners ouer his people inhabiting the Mountaynes, and ouer the Arabians subiect vnto him. The Gouernours of Cities diuersly administer Iustice, according to the custome of the place. Some there are also appointed by the King to collect all the Tributes and Reuenues of his Kingdome, and duly to pay the same vnto him. Likewise there are others chosen, whom they call in their Language, Keepers or Guardians, and vnto euery one of these the King giueth some Castle or Village, whereby hee may procure his owne mayntenance, and be able to serue the King in time of warre.

Moreover, the King of Fez mayntayneth a Troupe of Light Horsemen, who so long as they serue the King in his Campe, haue their Dyet allowed them out of the Kings Prouision: but in time of peace, he findeth them Corne, Butter, and pouldered flesh for the whole yeare, but money they haue very seldome. Once a yeare they are apparellled at the Kings cost; neither doe they prouide for their Horses either within the Citie or without, for the King furnisheth them with all necessities. Those that giue attendance to their Horses are Christian Captiues, which go shackled in great Chaines and Fetters. But when the Armie remooueth any whither, the said Christians are carryed vpon Camels backes. Another Officer there is that giueth attendance onely to the Camels, assigning certayne Pastures vnto the Heardsmen, and diuiding fields among them, and making such prouision for the Kings Camels, as himselfe shall thinke expedient. Each Camel-driuer hath two Camels, which are laden with the Kings Furniture, according to the appointment of the Gouernour. Likewise the King hath a certayne Purueyor or Steward, whose office is to prouide, keepe, and distribute Corne both to the Kings Household and to his Army. This man in time of warre hath ten or twelue Tents to lay vp Corne in, and euery day with change of Camels he sendeth for new Corne, least the Army should be vnprouided of victuals: he hath also Cookes at his command.

Moreover, there is a Gouernour, or Master Groome of the Stables, who prouideth for the Kings Horses, Mules, and Camels, and is furnished with all necessities by the Steward. There is another also appointed, Over-seer of the Corne, whose dutie it is to prouide Barley and other Prouender for the beasts: and this man hath his Scribes and Notaries about him, who diligently set downe all particular expenses, for they must giue vp a perfect account vnto the chiefe Steward. They haue also a certayne Captaine ouer fittie Horsemen, which Horsemen may well be called Pursuants, for they are sent by the Secretarie in the Kings name to doe his businesse. Likewise the Fez King hath another Captaine of great name, being as it were, Gouernour of his Guard, who in the Kings name, may compell the Iudges to doe Iustice, and to put their sentences in execution. This mans authoritie is so great, that sometimes he may commit principall Noblemen to Ward, and may seuerely punish them, according to the Kings commandement.

Moreover, the said King hath a most trusty Chancellor, who keepeth the great Seale, and writeth and signeth the Kings Letters. He hath also a great number of Footmen, the Gouernour of whom accepteth and dismisseth whom hee thinkes good, and giueth to euery one wages according to his agilitie and desert. And whensoever the King commeth in place of Iudgement, the said Gouernour alwayes attendeth vpon him, and is in a manner his High Chamberlaine. Also there is another that taketh charge of the Carriages and Baggage of the Armie, and causeth the Tents of the Light Horsemen to be carryed vp and downe on Mules, and the Tents of the other Souldiers on Camels. There are likewise a Company of Ensigne-bearers, who in marching on a Iourney carry their Colours wrapped vp: but he that goeth before the Armie hath his Banner displayed, and of a great height. And euery one of the said Standard-bearers knoweth most exactly alwayes, fords of Riuers, and passages thorow Woods, wherefore they are for the most part appointed to guide the Army.

The Drummers (of whom there are great store in the Kings Host) play vpon certayne Drums of Brasse as bigge as a great Kettle, the lower part whereof is narrow, and the vpper broad, being couered with a skinne. These Drummers ride on Horseback, hauing alwayes on the one side of their Horses a great waight hanging downe, to counterpoize the heauinesse of their Drums on the other side. They are allowed most swift Horses, because the Moors account it a great disgrace to loose a Drumme. The said Drummes make such a loude and horrible noyse, that they are not onely heard a farre off, but also strike exceeding terroure both vpon men and Horses, and they are beaten onely with a Bull-pizzle. The Musicians are not maintayned at the Kings charge, for the Cities are bound at their costs to send a certayne number of them to the warres, who, according to their demeanour in the warres, are admitted or not admitted vnto the Kings Table. This King hath also a certayne Master of Ceremonies, who sitteth at his feet in the Senate House, and commandeth each man to sit downe, and to speake according to his dignitie.

All the Mayde seruants in the Kings Family are Negro-slaues, which are partly Chamberlaines, and partly Wayting Maydes. And yet his Queene is alwayes of a white skinne. Likewise wife in the King of Fez his Court are certaine Christian Captiues, being partly Spanish, and partly Portugall women, who are most circumspectly kept by certaine Eunuches, that are Negro slaues.

The King of Fez hath very large Dominions, but his Reuenues are small, to wit, scarce three hundred thousand Duckats, the fift part whereof redoundeth not to the King: for the remainder is diuided into sundry portions, as wee haue before signified. Yea, the greater part of the said Reuenues is payd in Corne, Cattle, Oyle and Butter, all which yeeld but small store of money. In some place they pay a Duckat and one fourth part, Tribute for euery Acre; but in other places a whole Family payeth but so much. In some other Regions each man aboue fifteen years of age payeth as much Tribute also. Neither are the people of this great Citie more vexed with any thing then with paying of their Tributes and Impositions: Heere also is to be noted, that the Mahumetan Gouvernours (the Priests onely excepted) may not exact greater Reuenues then those that Mahumet hath allotted vnto them, namely, of euery of their subjects which possesseth an hundred Duckats in ready money, they are to haue two Duckats and an halfe for yeerely Tribute.

Euery husbandman likewise is bound to pay for Tribute the tenth part of all his Corne. And all the said Tributes he appointed to be paid vnto the Patriarke, who should bestow that which was superfluous for the Prince to haue, vpon common vses; namely, for the releewing of poore impotent people and widowes, and for maintaining of warres against the enemie. But since the Patriarkes began to decay, the Princes (as we haue before-said) exercised tyranny. For it was not sufficient for them to exact all the forenamed Tributes, and riotously to consume the same, but also to vrge people vnto greater contributions; so that all the Inhabitants of Africa are so oppressed with daily exactions, that they haue scarcely wherewithall to feed and apparel themselves: for which cause there is almost no man of learning or honesty, that will seeke any acquaintance with Courtiers, or will inuite them to his Table, or accept any gifts (bee they neuer so pretious) at their hands: thinking that whatsoeuer goods they haue, are gotten by theft and bribery.

The King of Fez continually maintaineth sixe thousand Horsemen, five hundred Crosse-bowes, and as many Harquebusiers, being at all assayes prepared for the warres, who in time of peace, when the King goeth on Progresse, lie within a mile of his person: for being at home in Fez, he needeth not so strong a Guard. When he wageth warre against the Arabians that bee his enemies, because the fore-named Garison is not sufficient, he requireth ayde of the Arabians his Subjects, who at their owne costs find him a great army of men better trained to the wars, then his owne Souldiers before-mentioned. The pompe and Ceremonies of this King are but meane, neither doth he willingly vse them, but onely vpon Festiuall dayes, and when meere necessitie requireth. When the King is to ride forth, the master of Ceremonies signifieth so much vnto certaine Herbengers or Postes, whereupon the Herbengers giue notice thereof vnto the Kings * Parents, vnto his Nobilitie, his Senators, Captaines, Guardians, and Gentlemen, who presently arrange themselves before the Palace gate. At the Kings comming forth of the Palace, the Herbengers appoint vnto each man his place and order of riding. First and fore-most go the Standard-bearers, next the Drummers, then followeth the chiefe Groome of the Stable with his seruants and family; after him comes the Kings pensioners, his Guard, his master of Ceremonies, his Secretaries, his Treasurer, and last of all his chiefe Iudge and his Captaine Generall, at length comes the King accompanied with his principall Counseller, or with some other great Peere. Before the King also ride certaine Officers belonging to his person, whereof one carries his Sword-royall, another his Shield, and the third his Crosse-bow. On each side of him march his Foot-men, one carrying a payre of Stirups, another the Kings Partizan, the third a couering for his Saddle, and the fourth a halter for his horse. And so soone as the King is dismounted, they forthwith couer the Saddle, and put the foresaid halter vpon his Horse-head. Likewise there is another footman that carrieth the Kings Pantofles most Artificially wrought. After the King followeth the Captaine of the footmen, then the Eunuches, the Kings Family, the light Horsemen, and last of all the Crosse-bowes and Harquebusiers. The apparell of the King is then very moderate and plaine: insomuch that a man knew him not, he would thinke him to be absent: for the attendants be farre more sumptuously attired. Moreouer no Mahumetan King or Prince may weare a Crowne, Diademne, or any such like ornament vpon his head, for that is forbidden by the law of Mahumet. When the King lyeth with his army in the fields, first his owne great tent is pitched in a foure-square forme like vnto a Castle, each side of the said square being fifty elles in length. At euery of the foure corners standeth a little sharpe Turret made of Cloth, and a gallant Spheare on the top which glistereth like gold. This Royall Pauilion hath foure gates, euery one of which is kept by Eunuches. Within the said Pauilion are contained diuers other tents, among which is the Kings lodging, being framed in such wise, that it may easily bee remooued from place to place. Next vnto it stand the Tents of the Noblemen, and of such as are most in the Kings fauour; then the lodgings of the principall Guard being made of Goats-skinnes, after the Arabian fashion; and in the midst of all stands the Kings Kitchen and his Pantry. Not farre from hence the light Horsemen haue their abode, who all of them are victualled out of the Kings Store-house; notwithstanding their attire be very base. Next of all are the Stables, wherein their Horses are maruelous well tended. Without this circuit keepe such as carry the Tents and the Kings Furniture from place to place. Here are also Butchers, Victualers, and such like, All Merchants and Artificers that resort hither, take vp their abode next vnto the Tent-carriers: so that the Kings Pauillion is pitched like a strong City, for it is so enuironed with the lodgings of the Guard, and with other Tents adioyning, that there is very difficult passage to the King. Round about the said Royall Pauillion, there are certaine appointed to watch and ward all night long, howbeit, they are base and vnarmed people. In like sort there is a watch kept about the Stables, but sometime so negligently, that not onely some Horses haue beene stolne, but there haue beene found enemies in the Kings owne Pauillion, that came to murther him. The King liueth the greatest part of the yeere in the fields, both for the safegard of his Kingdome, and also that he may keepe his Arabian subiects in obedience, and sometimes he recreateth himselfe with hunting, and sometime with playing at Chesse. I know right well how tedious I haue beene in the description of this Citie: but because it is the Metropolitan not onely of Barbarie, but of Africa, I thought good most particularly to decypher euery parcell and member thereof.

The occasion of a prouerbe.

This Mountaine beginneth from the Plaine of Esais lying ten miles distant from the Citie of Fez; Westward it extendeth thirty miles, and is almost ten miles broad. This Mountaine is all couered with waste and Desert woods, being otherwise still stored with Oliues. In this Mountaine there are of Sheepe-folds and Castles, to the number of fiftie, and the Inhabitants are very wealthy, for it standeth betweene two flourishing Cities, that is to say, Fez on the East, and Mecnase on the West. The women weaue Woollen cloth, according to the custome of that place, and are adorned with many siluer Rings and Bracelets. The men of this Mountaine are most valiant, and are much giuen to pursue and take Lyons, whereof they send great store vnto the King of Fez. And the King hunteth the said Lyons in manner following: In a large field, there are certaine little Cels made, being so high, that a man may stand vpright in them: each one of these Cells is shut fast with a little doore; and containe within euery of them an armed man, who opening the doore presents himselfe to the view of the Lyon: then the Lyon seeing the doores open, comes running toward them with great furie, but the doores being shut againe, he waxeth more furious then before: then bring they forth a Bull to combate with the Lyon, who enter a fierce and bloody conflict, wherein if the Bull kill the Lyon, that dayes sport is at an end; but if the Lyon get the victory, then all the armed men, being ordinarily twelue, leape forth of their Cels, and inuade the Lyon: each one of them hauing a lauelin with a pike of a cubite and a halfe long. And if these armed men seeme to be too hard for the Lyon, the King causeth their number to be diminished: but perceiuing them too weake, the King with his company from a certaine high place, where he standeth to behold the sport, kill the Lyon with their Crosse-bowes. And oftentimes it falleth out, that before the Lyon be slaine, some one of the men dies for it, the residue being sore wounded. The reward of those that encounter the Lyon is ten Ducats apeece, and a new garment: neither are any admitted vnto this combat but men of redoubted valour, and such as come from Mount Zelagi: but those that take the Lyons first are inhabitants of Mount Zarhon.

This Towne when the Scismatike Idris came into this Region, he began to repaire Gualili, and to replant it so with Inhabitants, that within short time it grew very populous: howbeit after his decease it was neglected by his sonne, being wholly addicted (as is before said) vnto the building of Fez. And yet Idris lieth buried in this Towne, whose Sepulchre is visited with great reuerence almost by all the people of Barbary, for he is as highly esteemed as if he had been some Patriarke, because he was of the lineage of Mahumet.

Pietra Rossa, is a small Towne built by the Romanes vpon the side of the foresaid Mountaine, beeing so neere the Forrest, that the Lyons will come daily into the Towne and gather vp bones in the streets, yea, they are so tame and familiar, that neither women nor children are afraid of them.

Shame is an ancient Castle built at the foot of the said Mountaine neere vnto the high way from Fez to Mecnase: and it was called by this name, because the Inhabitants are most shamefully addicted to couetise, like vnto all the people thereabouts. In old time it is reported that a certaine King passed by, whom the Inhabitants of the Castle inuited to dinner, requesting him to change the ignominious name of the place: which when the King had condescended vnto, they caused, according to their custome, a company of Rams to be slaine, and certaine bladders and vessels to be filled with milke, to serue for the Kings breakfast the morrow after. But because the said vessels were very large, they consulted together to put in halfe milke and halfe water, hoping that the King should neuer perceiue it. The day following, albeit the King was not very hasty of his breakfast, yet, his seruants vrging him thereunto, he perceiued the milke to be halfe water; whereat smiling, he said: Friends, that which nature hath giuen, no man can take away.

About Agla keepe great store of Lyons, but they are by nature so tearefull, that they will flee at the voyce of a child: hence commeth the Prouerbe so rife in Fez, A Lyon of Agla, which they they apply vnto such a one as maketh great bragges, and is but a meere Daftard.

The great Citie of Arzilla called by the Africans Azella, was built by the Romanes vpon the Ocean Sea shoare, about seuentie miles from the Streights of Gibraltar, and an hundred and fortie miles from Fez. It was in times past subiect vnto the Prince of Septa or Centa, who was tributary to the Romanes, and was afterward taken by the Gothes, who established the said Prince in his former Government: but the Mahumetans wanne it in the yeere of the Hegeira 94. and held the same for two hundred and twenty yeeres, till such time as the English at the perswasion of the Gothes besieged it with an huge Armie; and albeit the Gothes were Enemies to the English, because themselves were Christians, and the English worshippers of Idols, yet 10 the Gothes perswaded them to this attempt, hoping by that meanes to draw the Mahumetans out of Europe. The English hauing good successe tooke the Citie, and so wasted it with fire and sword, that scarce one Citizen escaped, so that it remayned almost thirtie yeeres void of Inhabitants.

A description of the Citie of Arzilla.

But afterward when the Mahumetan Patriarkes of Cordona were Lords of Mauritania, it was againe re-edified, and by all meanes augmented, enriched and fortified. The Inhabitants were rich, learned, and valiant. The fields adiacent yeeld Graine and Pulse of all sorts in great abundance, but because the Towne standeth almost ten miles from the Mountaynes, it sustayneth great want of wood; howbeit, they haue coles brought them from Harais, as is aforesaid. In the yeere of the Hegera 882. this Citie was suddenly surprized and taken by the Portugals, and all the Inhabitants carried prisoners into Portugall, amongst whom was Mahumet the King of Fez that now is, who together with his Sister being both children of seuen yeeres old, were taken and led captiue. For the Father of this Mahumet seeing the Prouince of Habat reuolt from him, went and dwelt at Arzilla, the very same time, when Esserif a great Citizen of Fez, hauing slaine Habdulac the last King of the Marin Family, was by the fauour of the people aduanced vnto the Fezzan Kingdom. Afterward, one Saie Abra being pricked forward with ambition, went about to conquer the Citie of Fez, and to make himselfe King; howbeit, Esserif by the aduise of a certaine Connfessor of his, being Cousin vnto Saie, vanquished and put to flight the said Saie to his great disgrace.

Moreouer, while Esserif had sent his said Counsellor to Temesna, to pacifie the people of that 30 Prouince being about to rebell, Saie returned, and hauing for one whole yeere besieged new Fez with eight thousand men, at length by Treason of the Townesmen hee easily wanne it, and compelled Esserif with all his Family, to flye vnto the Kingdome of Tunis. The same time therefore that Saie besieged Fez, the King of Portugall (as is aforesaid) sending a Fleet into A- frica, took Arzilla, and then was the King of Fez that now is with his yong Sister, carryed cap-tue into Portugall, where he remayned seuen yeeres, in which space hee learned the Portugall Language most exactly. At length, with a great summe of money his Father ransomed him out of Portugall, who afterward being aduanced to the Kingdome, was by reason of his long continuance in Portugall, called King Mahumet the Portugall. This King afterward attempted very often to be auenged of the Portugals, and to recouer Arzilla. Wherefore suddenly encountering 40 the said Citie, he beate downe a great part of the wall, and entring the breach, set all the cap-tue Moores at libertie. The Christians retyred into the Castle, promising within two dayes to yeeld vnto the King. But Pedro de Nauarro comming in the mean season with a great Fleet, they compelled the King with continuall discharging of their Ordnance, not onely to relinquish the Citie, but also to depart quite away with his whole Armie: afterward it was so fortified on all sides by the Portugals, that the said King attempting often the recouerie thereof, had alwayes the repulse. I my selfe seruing the King in the foresaid expedition, could find but five hundred of our company slaine. But the warre against Arzilla continued from the yeere of the Hegeira 914. to the yeere 921.

The great and ancient Citie of Tangia, called by the Portugals, Tangiara, according to the fond 50 opinion of some Historiographers, was founded by one Sedded the sonne of Had, who (as they say) was Emperour over the whole World. This man (say they) determined to build a Citie, which for beautie might match the Earthly Paradise. Wherefore, hee compassed the same with wals of Brasse, and the Roofe of the Houses hee couered with Gold and Siluer, for the bulding whereof he exacted great Tributes of all the Cities in the World. But the Classial and approved Authours affirme, that it was built by the Romanes vpon the Ocean Sea shoare, at the same time when they subdued the Kingdome of * Granada.

The Citie of Tangia.

Septa, called by the Latines, Ciuitas, and by the Portugals, Seupta, was (according to our most approved Authors) built by the Romanes vpon the Streights of Gibraltar, beeing in olde time the head Citie of all Mawritania; wherefore the Romanes made great account thereof, insomuch that it became very ciuill, and was throughly inhabited. Afterward it was wonne by the Gothes, who appointed a Gouernour there, and it continued in their possession, till the Mahumetans inuading Mawritania surprized it also. The occasion whereof was one Iulian Earle of Septa; who being greatly iniured by Roderigo King of the Gothes and of Spaine, ioyned with the Infidels, conducted them into Granada, and caused Roderigo to lose both his life and his Kingdome.

The Mahumetians therefore hauing taken Septa, kept possession thereof on the behalfe of one Elgnalid, Sonne of Habdulmalic their Patriarke, who then was resident at Damasco, in the yeere of the Hegera 92. From thence-forth till within these few yeeres, this Citie grew so ciuill and so well stored with Inhabitants, that it proued the most worthy and famous Citie of all Mauritania. It contayned many Temples & Colledges of Students, with great numbers of Artizans, and men of Learning and of high spirit. Their Artizens excelled especially in Workes of Brasle, as namely, in making of Candlestickes, Basons, Standishes, and such like Commodities, which were as pleasant to the eye, as if they had beene made of Siluer or Gold. The Italians haue great cunning in making of the like, but their Workmanship is nothing comparable to theirs of * Septa.

* Or Ceuta.

The Streights of Gibraltar from Septa, but twelue miles broad.

Septa taken by the Portugals. Abu Sahid King of Fez and his sixe Sonnes slaine all in one night.

Without the Citie are diuers faire Villages and Granges, especially in that place which for the abundance of Vines is called, The Vineyards: howbeit, the fields are very barren and fruitles, for which cause their Corne is exceeding deere. Both without and within the Citie there is a pleasant and beautifull prospect to the shoare of Granada vpon the Streights of Gibraltar, from whence you may discern living creatures, the distance being but twelue miles. Howbeit, this famous Citie noe many yeeres since was greatly afflicted by Habdulmumen the King and Patriarke: who hauing surprized it, razed the buildings, and banished the principall Inhabitants thereof. And not long after it sustayned as great damage by the King of Granada, who (besides the foresaid harmes) carried the Nobles & chiefe Citizens Captiues into Granada. And lastly, in the yeere of Mahumet his Hegera 818. being taken by a Portugall Armada, all the Citizens did abandon it. Abu Sahid being then King of Fez, and a man of no valour, neglected the recouerie thereof: but in the midst of his dancing and disport being aduertised that it was lost, he would not so much as interrupt his vaine pastime: wherefore by Gods iust iudgement, both himselfe and his sixe Sonne were all slaine in one night by his Secretarie, in whom hee reposed singular trust, because he would haue deflowered the said Secretaries Wife. These things came to passe in the yeere of the Hegera 824.

Afterward, the Kingdome of Fez being eight yeeres destitute of a King, a Sonne of the murdered King whom he begot of a Christian woman, and who the same night that his Father was slaine fled vnto Tunis, succeeded in the Government: this was Habdulac, the last King of the Marin Family, who likewise (as is aforesaid) was slaine by the people.

Quadres.

Threescore thousand Moors slaine.

Vpon the Mountaine Quadres, was borne one called by them Hellul: this Hellul atchieued many worthy exploits against the Spaniards; the History whereof is set downe partly in verse and partly in prose, and is as rise in Africa and Granada, as is the Storie of Orlando in Itale. But at length in the Spanish warre (wherein Ioseph Enesir King and Patriarke of Maroco was vanquished) this Hellul was slaine in a Castle of Catalonia, called by the Moors, The Castle of the Eagle. In the same battell were slaine threescore thousand Moors, so that none of them escaped saue the King and a few of his Nobles. This was done in the yeere of the Hegera 609. which was in the yeere of our Lord 1160. From thenceforth the Spaniards had alwayes good successe in their warres, so that they recovered all those Cities which the Moors had before taken from them.

Bedis, otherwise called Velles de Gumer.

This ancient Towne built vpon the Meditteran Sea shoare, and called by the Spaniards, Velles de Gumer, contayneth about sixe hundred Families. Heere is also a very stately Temple to bee seene. Water for drinke is exceeding scarce among them, for they are all constrained to resort vnto one Pit or Well, being in the Suburbs, neere vnto the Sepulchre of a certayne man, that was in times past very famous among them. Howbeit in the night it is dangerous to fetch water from thence, because it is so full of Bloud-suckers or Horse-leeches. They haue such abundance of fish, that one man alone is not able to draw vp a Net; wherefore whosoeuer will assist the Fishermen in that businesse, are rewarded with good store of fishes for their labour: yea, sometimes they will freely bestow fishes vpon such as passe by. They salt the foresaid Sardelli, and send them to the Mountaines to be sold. In this Towne there is a long street inhabited with Iewes, wherein dwell sundry Vintners that sell excellent Wines. So that in calme euening the Citizens vse to carry Wine aboard their Barks in the Sea, and to spend their time in drinking and singing.

Ferdinando King of Spaine taking a certaine Iland within a mile of the Towne, built a Fort thereon, and so planted it with Ordnance and Souldiers, that neyther their Temples nor themselves walking in the streets were free there from, but were daily slaine. Wherefore the Gouvernour of the Towne was constrained to craue aide from the King of Fez, who sent out a great Armie against the Christians; but they were partly taken, and partly slaine, so that very few escaped backe vnto Fez. The Christians kept this Ile almost two yeeres and then it was betrayed by a false trecherous Spaniard (who slue the Gouvernour of the Ile, because hee had taken his Wife from him) into the Moors possession, and all the Christians were slaine: not a man of them escaped, saue onely the Spanish Traytor, who in regard of his Treason was greatly rewarded, both by the Gouvernour of Bedis, and also by the King of Fez. Being at Naples I heard the whole relation of this matter from a certaine man that was present at all the former Exploits, who said, that they were done about the yeere of our Lord 1520.

In Mount Benigual, there is a certaine Towne indifferently well peopled, and furnished with all kind of Artificers; whereunto the fields belonging maruellously abound with Grapes, Quinces, and Pome-citrons, all which are sold at Fez; heere are likewise great store of Linnen Weauers, and many Iudges and Lawyers. They haue also a good Market, whereunto the Inhabitants of the Neighbour Mountaynes resort. Vpon the top of this Mountayne there is a certaine Caue or hole that perpetually casteth vp fire. Some wondring greatly at the matter, haue cast in wood, which was suddenly consumed to ashes: I my selfe neuer saw the like Miracle in any other place, so that a great many thinke it to be hel-mouth.

A caue or hole that perpetually casteth vp fire.

In Mount Beni Masgald are many Doctors of the Mahumetan Law, and diuers inferiour Students: who put the Inhabitants to great damage. Themselues forsooth, will drinke wine, and yet they perswade the people that it is vnlawfull for them to drinke it, albeit some doe giue them little credit. The Inhabitants of this Mountayne pay in respect of others no great Tribute, and that perhaps, because they maintayne the foresaid Doctors and Students.

In my time the King of Spaine sent a great Armie against Melela in Garet: before the arriual whereof, the Townesmen sent vnto the King of Fez for ayde, who making warre as then against the people of Temefna, could send but small forces to succour them. Which the Townesmen being aduertised of, and fearing least their small forces would proue too weake for the Spaniards great Armada, they tooke all the bagge and baggage that they could carrie, and fled vnto the Mountaynes of Buthoia. Howbeit, the Captaine of the Fessan Souldiers, both to bee reuenged vpon the Townesmens cowardize, and also to leaue nothing for the Spaniards to enioy, burnt downe all the Houses, Temples, and Buildings. This was done in the yeere of the Hegira 896. which was in the yeere of our Lord 1487. But the Spaniards, for all they found the Citie so wasted, would not depart thereupon, but first built a strong Castle, and afterward by little and little repayred the Towne wals, and by that meanes haue kept possession thereof euen till this day. They tooke also Chasafa.

Melela enioied and re-edified by the Spaniards.

The Prouince of Garet is diuided into three parts: the first whereof containeth the Cities and Townes, the second the foresaid Mountaynes, (the Inhabitants whereof are called Bottoia) and the third comprehendeth the Desarts, which beginning Northward at the Mediterranean Sea, and extending South to the Desart of Chauz, are bounded Westward with the foresaid Mountaynes, and Eastward with the Riuer of Muluia. The length of these Desarts is sixtie miles, and the breadth thirtie. They are vnpleasant and dry, hauing no water but that of the Riuer Muluia. There are many kinds of beasts in this Desart, such as are in the Lybian Desart next vnto Numidia. In Summer time many Arabians take vp their abode neere vnto the Riuer Muluia; and so doe another kind of fierce people called Batalisa, who possesse great abundance of Horses, Camels, and other Cattell, and maintayne continuall warre against the Arabians that border vpon them.

The extreme part of the Desart of Garet.

The Towne of Dubdu was in possession of one Mahumet who beautified it exceedingly with store of faire houses and buildings: likewise, he greatly altered and reformed the gouernment of this Towne; and shewed such extraordinary courtesie vnto all Strangers, that hee grew very famous.

Moreouer, the said Mahumet consulted how to get Tezza from the King of Fez, and offered great matters to the performance of his intent: and that he might the easilier attayne his purpose, he determined to goe to the Market of Tezza in a simple habite, and so to make an assault vpon the Captaine of the Towne: for he hoped that a great part of the Townesmen, whom hee knew to bee his friends, would assist him in that enterprize. Howbeit this practice was at length discovered vnto the King of Fez (which King was called Saich, and was the first of the Family of Quattas, and Father vnto the King that now reigneth) who presently assembled an huge Armie, and marched of purpose against Dubdu, vtterly to destroy it: and so comming vnto the foot of the Mountayne hee there encamped. The people of the Mountayne hauing gathered an Armie of sixe thousand men, hid themselues craftily behind the Rockes, suffering their Enemies to ascend by certayne difficult and strait passages, from whence they were sure they could hardly escape, and so at length they brake forth on the sodaine and encountred their said Enemies being weary of ascending; and because the way was very troublesome and narrow, the King of Fez his Souldiers could not endure their assaults, but being constrained to giue backe, were moe then a thousand of them throwne downe head-long and slaine. In this skirmish were slaine in all to the number of three thousand Fessan Souldiers: and yet the King not being dismayed with so great an ouerthrow, prepared forth-with a band of five hundred Crosse-bowes, and three hundred Harquebuziers, and determined to make a new assault vpon the Towne. But Mahumet seeing that he could no longer withstand the King, resolved to go himselfe vnto him, that he might, if it were possible, obtaine peace, & to release his Country from the fury of the Enemy. Wherefore putting on the habit of an Ambassador, he went & deliuered a Letter with his own hand vnto the King. Which the King hauing perused, asked him what he thought concerning the Gouernor of Dubdu? Mary I thinke (quoth Mahumet) he is not well in his wits, in that he goeth about to resist your Maiestie. Then said the King, if I had conquered him, (as I hope to do within these few daies) I would cause him to be dismembred and torne in peeces. But what if he should come hither (saith Mahumet) to submit himselfe; and to acknowledge his offence; might it then please the King to admit him into fauour? Then the King answered: I sweare vnto thee by this my head, that if he will come and acknowledge his fault in manner as thou hast said, I will not onely receiue him into fauour, but will espoule my daughters vnto his sonnes, and will bestow most ample and Princely dowries vpon them. But I am sure, being distracted of his wits (as thou hast said) that he will by no meanes come, and submit himselfe. Then said Mahumet: he would soone come (I assure you) if it pleased the King to protest this for a certaintie vnto the Nobles. I thinke (said the King) it hath bene sufficiently protested 10 and affirmed, sithence I haue bound it with a solemne oath in the presence of these foure; for here stand my chiefe Secretary, the Generall of my Forces, my Father in-law, and the chiefe Iudge and Patriarke of Fez; the testimony of which foure may well satisfie you. Whereupon Mahumet humbly falling at the Kings feete: loe, heere the man (quoth he) that submissely acknowledged his fault, and craueth the King gracious pardon. With that the King himselfe lifted him from the ground, embraced him, and saluted him with friendly speeches. Then caused he both his daughters to be called, which he bestowed vpon Mahumets sonnes: all which being done, he remooued his armie from that Mountaine, and returned conquerour vnto Fez. This was done in the yeere of the Hegeira 904. which was in the yeere of our Lord 1495. And in the yeere of the Hegeira 921. I my selfe was at the City of Dubdu, where I was most curteously 20 entertained by the foresaid Mahumet.

The Citie of Teza or Tezza.

Teza was built by the Africans, five miles from Mount Atlas, being distant from Fez fiftie, from the Ocean an hundred and thirty, and from the Mediterran Sea seuten miles, and standing in the way from Garet to Chasafar. It contained in times past about five thousand families: the buildings of this Towne are not very stately, except Noblemens Palaces, Colledges, and Temples, which are somewhat beautifull. Out of Atlas springeth a little Riuer which runneth through the chiefe Temple of this Citie: and sometimes it falleth out, that certaine people bordering vpon the Citie: vpon some quarrel with the Citizens will cut off this Riuer from the Citie, and turne the course thereof some other way, which breedeth great inconueniences vnto the Citizens: for then they can neither build houses, nor get any water to drinke, but onely 30 corrupt water which they take out of certaine Cisternes, for which cause they are often constrained to make a league with those borderers. This Citie both for wealth, ciuilitie, and abundance of people, is the third Citie of all the Kingdome, and hath a greater Temple then that of Fez: heere are likewise three Colledges, with diuers Bath-stoues, and a great number of Hospitals. Each trade and occupation hath a seuerall place in this Citie, like as they haue in Fez: the Inhabitants are of a more valiant and liberall disposition, then they of Fez: here are also great store of learned and rich men: and the fields adiacent are exceeding fruitfull. Without the Citie walls are very large Plaines, and many pleasant streames, that serue to water their Gardens which are replenished with all kind of fruits: here are abundance of Vines also yeelding very sweet Grapes, whereof the Iewes (being five hundreth Families) make excellent wine, such as 40 I thinke all Africa scarce affordeth better. I my selfe was acquainted in this Citie with a certaine aged fire, whom the Townesmen adored as if he had bene a god: he was merueilous rich both in Fruits, Grounds, and other Commodities, which the people bestowed vpon him in great abundance. The Citizens of Fez vsed to come fiftie miles (for so farre is Fez distant) onely to visite the said old man. My selfe conceived some great opinion of this aged fire: but after I had scene him, I could find no such superexcellency in him, saue onely that he deluded the fond people with strange deuises.

Mount Beni Iesseten.

The Mountaine of Beni Iesseten is subiect vnto the Gouvernour of Dubdu, being inhabited with most base and beggerly people. Their houses are made of Sea-rushes, and so likewise are their shooes made of such rushes when they trauell any Iourney, where by a man may conie- 50 cture the miserable estate of this people. The Mountaine yeedeth nought but panicke, whereof they make bread and other victuals: but at the foot thereof are certaine Gardens replenished with Grapes, Dates, and Peaches. Their Peaches they cut into foure quarters, and casting away the Nuts or Stones, they dry them in the Sunne, and keepe them an whole yeere, which they esteeme for great dainties. Vpon this Mountaine are Iron-mines: and they frame their Iron in manner of horse-shooes, which serueth them sometimes in stead of money, whereof they haue great want in this Mountaine, vnlesse the Smithes by their Arte keepe this money in store: who, besides horse-shooes, make certaine daggers with blunt points. Their women weare Iron-rings vpon their fingers and eares for a great brauery, but they are more basely apparelled then the men, and remaine continually in the woods, both to keepe Goats, and to gather fewell. They haue neither ciuilitie nor learning, but liue after a brutish manner without all discretion 60 and humanitie.

Iron-mines.

Mount Selego.

This woodie Mountaine is full of Pine-trees and Fountaines. Their houses are not made of stone, but of Sea-rushes, so that they may easily be remooued from place to place, which is very commmo-

commodious to the Inhabitants, for euery spring they leaue the Mountaine and descend into the Vallies, from whence about the end of May they are expelled by the Arabians, which inhabit the Desarts: who by reason of their abundance of Goats and other Cartell, forsaking the said Desarts, seeke vnto the Fountaines and moist places: but in winter, because their Camels are so impatient of cold, they resort vnto the woods, and warme Regions. In this Mountaine are great store of Lyons, Leopards, and Apes. And from the said Mountaine runneth a certaine streame of water with such violence, that I haue seene a stone of an hundred pound weight carried with the force thereof: and here Subu taketh his beginning, which is the greatest Riuer of all Mauritania.

Lyons, Leopards, and Apes.

10 The Inhabitants of Mount Beni Isaga are rich, and ciuill people: it standeth so neere the Mountaine Seletgo, that they are onely separated with the foresaid Riuer: and to the end they may easilier passe from one Mountaine to another, they haue made a certaine strange bridge in the midst, and that in manner following: on either side stand certaine Posts, through the which runneth a rope vpon a truckle or pulley, vnto which rope is fastened a great basket; that will containe ten persons, and that in such sort, that so often as they will passe ouer to the opposite Mountaine, they enter into the basket, and drawing the rope whereon it hangeth, they are easily carried aloft in the aire ouer the Riuer by the helpe of the foresaid pulleyes, but sometimes with great hazard of their liues, especially if the basket or the rope be worne in any place: yea, and the distance of place is often an occasion of great terrour. In this Mountaine there is 20 great store of cattell, but little wood. It aboundeth likewise with most excellent fine wooll, whereof their women make cloth comparable vnto silke, which is sold at Fez for a great price. Here also is great plenty of oyle.

Mount Beni Isaga.
A wonderfull bridge.

There is no memorable thing in all Sofroi Towne, saue onely a certaine Temple, through the midst whereof runneth a large Riuer; and at the doores standeth a Fountaine of most pure water.

In the Forrests about this Towne, as also about Mezdaga, are marueilous store of Lyons, being not very hurtfull, for any man may driue them away with a little sticke.

Tame Lyons.

At the same time while the Africans were as yet Idolaters, they had a Temple standing neere vnto Ham Lisnan, whither at certaine times of the yeere, resorted in the night great multitudes of people both men and women: where hauing ended their sacrifices, they vsed to put 30 out their lights, and euery man to commit adultery with that woman which he first touched. But the women which were present at this abominable sport, were forbidden to lie with any man for a yeere after: and the children begotten in the said adultery, were kept and brought vp by the Priest of the Temple, as being dedicated to sacred vses.

The Towne called Ham Lisnan.

Sacerrima sacra.

Vpon Mount Centopozzi are great store of most ancient buildings, neere vnto the which there is a hole or drie pit of so great a depth, that the bottome thereof can in no wise be seene. Into this pit some mad fellowes will haue themselues let downe by ropes, carrying a Candle or Torch in their hands: and beneath, they say, it is diuided into many roomes, and as it were, chambers; and last of all, they come to a most large place hewen out of the Rocke with Instruments, and 40 compassed about as it were with a wall, in which wall are foure doores, which lead to other more narrow places, where, they say, that Fountaines of Springing water are. And sometimes it falleth out that some miserably end their liues here: for if their lights chance to be blowen out with any sudden blast of wind, they can by no meanes find the place where the rope hangeth, but are there constrained to die for extreame famine. It was told me by a certaine Nobleman of Fez, that there were ten persons, who being desirous to see the wonders of this pit, and being prepared for the same purpose, went first three of them downe, who when they were come to the foresaid foure doors, two of them went one way, & the third went alone another way. And being thus diuided, after they had proceeded almost a quarter of a mile, there came great swarmes, of Bats flying about their lights, insomuch that one light was put out; at length being come
50 to the springing fountaines, they found there certaine white bones of men, and five or sixe Candles, whereof some were new, and others were old and worne with long lying there: but hauing found nothing but water in the said Fountaines, they returned backe againe the same way that they came: and they had scarce gone halfe way, but their owne light also was blowen out with a sudden blast. Afterward seeking earnestly vp and downe, and being weary of many falles that they caught among the Rockes, they found that there was no hope of returne: wherefore in this desperate case committing themselues with teares into the hands of God, they vowed, if they once escaped this danger, neuer to aduenture any more. They that stood at the Caves mouth being ignorant of their companions mishap, expected their returne, and hauing staid ouer long, at length they let downe themselues by the rope, and began with lights to seeke their fellowes, making a great noise, and at length found them heavy and sad. But the 60 third, who was wandring vp and downe those darke places, they could by no meanes finde, wherefore leauing him, they returned foorth of the Cae. And he that was left behind heard at length a noyse like the barking of little dogges, and shaping his course toward them, he found immediatly foure strange, and (as it should seeme) new-borne beasts, after which followed the

And so at length, after long seeking, he found the holes mouth with great ioy, and escaped the danger : for within a while he said, that he began to see some glimmering of light, as they doe which haue long been in the darke. But after a certaine time this Caue was filled with water vp to the top.

The Mountaine of Rauens called Gunnaigell Gherben.

Gunnai-gell Gherben, standeth very neere the former, and is full of Woods and Lions. Here is no Citie, nor any other place of habitation, perhaps by reason of the extreme coldnesse of the place. From this Mountaine runneth a certaine little Riuer : and here is a Rocke of an exceeding height, whereupon keepe infinite swarmes of Crowes and Rauens, which some thinke to haue been the occasion of the name of this Mountaine. Sometime the terrible Northerly winds bring such abundance of Snow vpon this Mountaine, that such as trauell from Numidia towards Fez loose their liues thereby, as hath been signified in the first Booke. Euery Summer, the Arabians next inhabiting, being called Beni Essen, vsually resort vnto this Mountaine, in regard of the coole water and pleasant shadowes, notwithstanding they know it to bee haunted with great store of Lions and Leopards.

Dancing way.

There lyeth a way neere the towne of Vmen Giunnaibe, which a man may not passe without dancing and leaping, vnlesse he will fall into an Ague: the certainty whereof I haue heard many auouch.

Of Mount Ziz.

The Inhabitants are a most lewde and villanous generation, being wholly addicted to theft and robbie. They are at continuall dissension with the Arabians, and practise daily mischiefs and inconueniences against them, and to the end they may prouoke them to greater furie, they will sometimes throw their Camels downe headlong from the top of some high Mountaine. In these Mountaines there happeneth a certain strange and incredible matter, for there are Serpents so familiar with men, that at dinner-time they wil come like Dogs and Cats, and gather vp the crumbs vnder the Table, neither will they hurt any body, vnlesse they bee offered some iniurie.

the Historie of Africa.

A description of the Kingdome of Telensin, or Tremizea.
Casaria.

THis Kingdome beginneth Westward from the Riuers of Zha and Muluia: Eastward it bordereth vpon the great Riuer, Southward vpon the Desart of Numidia, and Northward vpon the Meditteran Sea. This Region was called by the Romans, Casaria, and was by them inhabited : howbeit, after the Romans were expelled, it was fully possessed by the ancient Gouernours thereof, called Bien Habdulnauad, and being a generation of the Family of Magraua. And it remained vnto them and their successors three hundred yeeres, vntill such time as a certaine mighty man, called Ghamrazen, the sonne of Zeijen, tooke possession thereof. His posteritie changing at length their ancient name, were called Beni Zeijen, that is, the Sons of Zeijen : and they enioyed this Kingdome for the space almost of three hundred and eighty yeeres. At length the Kings of Fez of the Marin Family greatly molested them, so that those ten Kings which succeeded Zeijen were some of them vnfortunate in battell, some slaine, some taken Captiue, and others expelled their Kingdome, and chased to the next Mountaines. Neither were they free from vexation of the Kings of Tunis : howbeit, the Kingdome of Telenfin remained still to this Familie, and they continued in peace for almost an hundred and twenty yeeres, being endamaged by no forren power ; sauing that one Abu Feris King of Tunis, and his sonne Hutmen, made them to pay tribute for certaine yeeres vnto Tunis, till the decease of the said Hutmen. This Kingdome stretcheth in length from East to West three hundred and eighty miles ; but in breadth from North to South, that is, from the Meditteran sea, to the Desarts of Numidia not aboue fise and twenty miles: which is the occasion that it is so often oppressed by the Arabians inhabiting the Numidian Desarts. The Kings of Telenfin haue alwaies endeouored by great gifts to gaine the good will and friendship of the Numidians, but they could neuer satisfie their insatiable couetise. A man shall seldome trauell safely through this Kingdome : howbeit, here are great store of Merchants, perhaps either because it adioyneth to Numidia, or else for that the way to the land of Negros lieth through it. It hath two most famous and frequented Hauens-townes, the one called Horam, and the other Marsa Elcabir, whither vse to resort great store of Genoueses, and Venetians. But afterward both these Townes were taken by Don Ferdinando the Catholike King, to the great inconuenience of all this Kingdome : for which cause the King then reigning, called Abuchemmen, was expelled his Kingdome, and put to flight by his owne subiects : afterward Abuzeijen was restored to the Kingdome, who had for certaine yeeres been imprisoned by his Nephew Abuchemmen : howbeit, he enioyed the Kingdome but a very short space : for he was at length miserably slaine by Barbarossa.

Whereof Abuchemmen, that was expelled by his owne subiects, hauing intelligence, sent to craue aide of the Emperour Charles the fifth, whereby he hoped to recouer his Kingdome. Which request being granted, he leuied a puissant Armie, and made warre against Barbarossa, and hauing druen him out, he recouered his Kingdome, and seuerely punished them that had conspired his banishment. And then he gaue the Spanish souldiers their pay, sent the Captaines home with great rewards, and allowed Charles the Emperour a large yearely reuenue so long as he liued. After his decease succeeded his brother Haddulla, who neglecting the league made before betweene the Emperour and his brother, and relying vpon Solymán the great Turke, refused to pay any more tribute vnto the Emperour Charles, and hath kept possession of the Kingdome, till * this present. The greater part of this Region is vntilled, drie, and barren, especially towards the South. Howbeit, the sea coast is somewhat more fertill. The territorie adiacent to the Citie of Telenfin is full of woods, sauing that the Westerne part towards the Sea is mountainous. Likewise, the Regions of Tenez and Alger containe Mountaines abounding with all kind of commodities. In this part are but few Cities and Castles; howbeit, it is a most fruitfull and blessed place, as we will hereafter declare in particular.

This barren, dry, and vntilled Desart, being vtterly destitute of Water and Wood, is situate vpon the Westerne frontier of the Kingdome of Telenfin, and extendeth in length fourescore, and in breadth almost fiftie miles. Here are great store of Roes, Deere, and Ostriches. This ancient Towne built by the Romans, while they were Lords of Africa, standeth vpon a large Plaine, almost two miles from a certaine Mountaine, and about twelue miles from the Mediterranean Sea, and neere vnto it runneth a little Riuer. The Historiographers of those times report, that this Towne was in all respects built after the fashion of Rome, whereupon they say, it borrowed the name: for Ned in the Arabian tongue signifieth, like. The Wall of this Towne is as yet to be seene: but all the ancient buildings of the Romans are so destroyed, that now there scarcely remaine any ruines thereof. It began in some places to be repaired and reedified anew, but nothing comparable to the former buildings. The fields adiacent are exceeding fruitfull, and containe many Gardens replenished with such trees as beare Carobs (being a fruite like vnto Cassia Pistula) which in the Suburbs they vse for food. This Towne is indifferently well inhabited, especially with Weauers, who make great store of Cotton-cloth, and are free from all tribute.

Telenfin, is a great Citie, and the Royall seate of the King; and then it was an honourable and well-gouerned Citie: howbeit, Ioseph King of Fez continually molested it, and with an huge Armie besieged it for seuen yeares together. This Ioseph hauing built a Fort vpon the East side of the Towne, put the besieged Citizens to such distresse, that they could no longer endure the extreme famine: wherefore with one accord they all went vnto their King, beseeching him to haue compassion vpon their want. The King, to make them acquainted with his daintie fare, which he had to supper, shewed them a dish of sodden Horse-flesh and Barly. And then they well perceiued, how little the Kings estate was better then the estate of the meanest Citizen of them all. Soone after the King hauing procured an assembly, perswaded his people that it was much more honourable to die in battell for the defence of their Countrie, then to liue so miserable a life. Which words of the King so inflamed all their minds to the battell, that the day following they resolued to encounter the enemye, and valiantly to fight it out. But it fell out farre better for them then they expected; for the same night King Ioseph was slaine by one of his owne people: which newes being brought vnto the Citizens, with greater courage they marched all out of the Towne, easily vanquishing and killing the confused multitude of their enemies; after which vnexpected victorie, they found victuals sufficient in the enemies Campe to relieue their long and tedious famine. About fortie yeares after, the fourth King of Fez of the Marin Familie, called Abulhesen, built a Towne within two miles Westward of the Citie of Telenfin. Then hee besieged Telenfin for thirty moneths together, making daily and fierce assaults against it, and euery night erecting some new Fort, so that at length the Fezzan forces next vnto Telenfin easily entred the Citie, and hauing conquered it, carried home the King thereof Captiue vnto Fez, where he was by the King of Fez beheaded, and his carcase was cast forth among the filth of the Citie: and this was the second and the greater damage that Telenfin sustained. After the decay of the Marin Familie Telenfin began in many places to be repaired, and replenished with new inhabitants, insomuch that it increased to twelue thousand Families. Here each Trade and Occupation hath a peculiar place, after the manner of Fez, sauing that the buildings of Fez are somewhat more stately. Here are also many, and beautifull Temples, hauing their Mahumetan Priests and Preachers. Likewise here are five Colledges most sumptuously built, some by the King of Telenfin, and some by the King of Fez. Here also are store of goodly Bathes and Hot-houses, albeit they haue not such plentie of water as is at Fez. Also here are very many Innes built after the manner of Africa: vnto two of which Innes the Merchants of Genoa and Venice doe vsually resort.

A great part of this Citie is inhabited with Iewes, who were in times past all of them exceeding

* Or Turbant. ding rich : vpon their heads they weare a * Dulipan, to distinguish them from other Citizens : but in the yeare of the Hegeira 923. vpon the death of King Abuhabdilla, they were all so robbed and spoyled, that they are now brought almost vnto beggerie. Moreouer, in this Citie there are many Conduits, the Fountaines whereof are not farre from the Citie walles, so that they may easily be stopped by any forren Enemy. The Citie wall is very high and impregnable, hauing five great Gates vpon it, at euerie one of which there is placed a guard of Souldiers, and certaine Receiuers of the Kings Custome. On the South-side of the Citie standeth the Kings Palace, enuironed with most high Walls, and containing many other Palaces within it, which are none of them destitute of their Fountaines and pleasant Gardens : This Royall Palace hath two Gates, one leading into the Fields, and the other into the Citie, and at this Gate standeth the Captaine of the Guard. The Territorie of Telenfin containeth most pleasant habitations, whither the Citizens in Summer-time vse to retire themselves : for besides the beautifull Pastures and cleare Fountaines, there is such abundance of all kind of fruits to delight both the eyes and taste, that to my remembrance I neuer saw a more pleasant place : their Figges they vse to drie in the Sunne, and to keepe vntill Winter : and as for Almonds, Peaches, Melons, and Pome-citrons, they grow here in great plentie. Three miles Eastward of this Citie are diuers Mills vpon the Riuer of Seffif; and some other there are also not far from the Citie vpon the Mountaine of Elcalba. The South part of the Citie is inhabited by Iemes, Lawyers, and Notaries : here are also very many Students, and Professors of diuers Arts, which haue maintenance allowed them out of the five forenamed Colledges. The Citizens are of foure sorts, to wit, some Artificers, some Merchants, other Schollers and Doctors, and all the residue Souldiers. The Merchants are men most iust, trustie, liberall, and most zealous of the common good, who for the most part exercise traffique with the Negros. The Artificers liue a secure, quiet, and merrie life. The Kings Souldiers being all of a comely personage, and of great valour, receiue verie large and liberall pay, for they are monthly allowed three pieces of the Gold-coyne of Telenfin, which are worth three Italian Duckats, and one second part. All Students before they attaine to the degree of a Doctor, liue a bare and miserable life : but hauing attained thereunto, they are made either Professors, or Notaries, or Priests. The Citizens and Merchants of this Citie are so neate & curious in their apparel, that sometimes they excel the Citizens of Fez in brauerie.

Pleasant place. A Wonder it is to see how stately and magnificently the King of Telenfin behaueth himselfe: for no man may see him, nor be admitted to parle with him, but onely the principall Nobles of his Court, each one of whom are assigned to beare Offices according to their place and dignitie. In this Court are sundry Offices and dignities, and the Kings Lieutenant being principall Officer, allotteth vnto each one such places of dignitie, as may bee correspondent to their honour : and this Lieutenant leuieth the Kings Armies, and sometime conducteth them against the Enemy. The second Officer is the Kings chiefe Secretarie, who writeth and recordeth all things pertaining to the King. The third, is the High Treasurer, who is bound by his Office to receiue Tributes and Customes, The fourth, is the Kings Dispensator or Almoner, who bestoweth such liberalitie as the King vouchsafeth. The fifth, is the Captaine of the Kings Guard, who so often as any Nobles are admitted to the Kings presence, conducteth the garde vnto the Palace Gate. Then are there other meaner Officers, as namely, the Master of the Kings Stable, the Quer-seer of his Saddles and Stirrops, and his Chiefe Chamberlaine, who giueth attendance onely at such times as any Courtiers are admitted vnto the Kings audience. For at other times the Kings Wiues, with certaine Christian Captiues, and Eunuches doe performe that dutie. The King sometimes in sumptuous and costly apparell rideth vpon a stately Steed richly trapped and furnished. In riding hee obserueth not much pompe, nor many ceremonies ; neither indeed doth hee carrie so great a traine ; for you shall scarcely see a thousand Horsemen in his company, except perhaps in time of Warre, when as the Arabians and other people giue attendance. His dominions are but slenderly inhabited : howbeit, because the way from Europe to Ethiopia lieth through his Kingdome, he reapeth much benefit by the wares that passe by, especially since the time that Oran was surprised by the Christians.

Schollers. Hubbed containeth store of Inhabitants, who are for the most part Dyers of Cloath. In this Towne was buried one Sidi Bu Median, being reputed a man of singular holinesse, whom they adore like a God, ascending vp to his Monument by certaine steps. Here is likewise a stately Colledge, and a faire Hospitall to entertaine strangers in ; both which were built by a King of Fez of the Marin Family, as I find recorded vpon a certaine Marble stone.

The customes and rites obserued in the King of Telenfin his Court. The Plaine of Batha was vtterly destitute of Inhabitants, till a certaine Hermite with his followers, whom they reuerenced as a man of singular holinesse, repaired thither. This Hermite in short time grew so rich in Oxen, Horses, and other Cattell, that no man almost throughout the whole Region was comparable vnto him. Neither he nor his followers pay any tribute at all, when as notwithstanding (as I heard of his Disciples) he reapeth yearly eight thousand bushels of Corne, and at this time possesseth five hundred Horses, tenne thousand small Cattell, and two thousand Oxen ; and besides all the former hath yearly sent vnto him from diuers parts of the world foure or five thousand Duckats : so greatly hath the fame of his false holines spread spread ouer all Africa and Asia. Disciples he hath to the number of five hundred, whom hee maintaineth at his owne cost: neither imployeth he them to ought else, but daily to read a few prayers: for which cause many resort vnto him, desiring to be of the number of his Disciples, whom after he hath instructed in certaine Ceremonies, he sendeth them thither from whence they first came. He hath about an hundred Tents pitched, whereof some are for strangers, others for Shepheards, and the residue for his owne Family. This holy Heremite hath foure wiues, and a great many women-slaves, wearing most sumptuous apparell. His sonnes likewise haue their wiues and Families: insomuch that the whole Familie of this Heremite and of his sonnes containeth five hundred persons. He is greatly honoured by all the Arabians, and by the King of Telenfin himselfe. My selfe was once desirous to trie what manner of man this Heremite was: and for threedayes I was entertained by him in the most secret places of his habitation, where amongst other things, he shewed me certaine Bookes intreating of Art-Magique, and of Alchymie: and hee endeouored by all meanes to perswade me, that Magique was a most true and vndoubted Arte, whereby I perceiued that himselfe was a Magician, albeit he neuer vsed nor regarded the Arte, except it were in inuocating of God by certaine names.

Oran containing about fixe thousand Families, and built many yeeres agoe by the Africans vpon the Mediterran Sea shoare, is distant from Telenfin an hundred and fortie miles. Heere may you see great store of stately buildings, as namely of Temples, Colledges, Hospitals, Bath-stoues, and Innes. The Towne is compassed with most high and impregnable walles, hauing on the one side a faire plaine, and on the other side diuers Mountaines. The greatest part of the Inhabitants were Weauers, and the residue liued of their yeerely Reuenues. The Territorie of this Towne yeeldeth but small store of Corne, so that the Townesmen make all their bread of Barley: howbeit, they are most courteous and friendly to all strangers. This Towne was greatly frequented with Merchants of Catalonia, and of Genoa: and one street thereof is at this present called, the streete of the Genoueses. They were at perpetuall enmitie with the King of Telenfin, neither would they euer accept of any Gouvernour, but one which receiued the Kings Tribute. But the Townsman chose one of their chiefe Burgo-masters to iudge of Cases Ciuil and Criminall. The Merchants of the Towne, maintained at their owne costs, certaine Foists and Brigandines of warre, which committed many Piracies vpon the coast of Catalonia, Genusa, Maierica, and Minorica, insomuch, that Oran was full of Christian Captiues. Afterward, Don Ferdinando King of Spaine encountering Oran with a great Armada, determined to release the said Christians out of Captiuitie: but he had very hard successe. Howbeit, within a few moneths after being ayded by the Biscaines and the Cardinall of Spaine, he tooke Oran. For the Moores issuing forth with great furie vpon the Christians armie, left the Towne vtterly destitute of Souldiers, which the Spaniards perceiuing, began to assaile the Towne on the other side; where being resisted by none but by women, they had easie entrance. Whereupon the Moores seeing the Christians Banners aduanced vpon their wals, they returned backe into the Towne, and were there put to so great a slaughter, that few of them escaped. Thus was Oran taken by the Spaniards in the yeere of Mahumet his Hegeira 916.

Mersalcabir in the Moores language signifieth, a great or large Hauen; for I thinke there is not the like Hauen to be found in the whole world besides: so that here infinite numbers of Ships and Gallies may finde most safe harbour in any tempestuous weather. Hither the Venetians ships made often resort, when they perceiued any tempest to approach: and from hence they would cause all their wares to be transported to Oran in other vessels. This Towne also was at length taken by the Spaniards as well as Oran.

Bresch standeth many miles distant from Mustaganin. It containeth great store of Inhabitants, which are many of them Weauers. The people of this Towne vse to paint a blacke crosse vpon their cheeke, and two other blacke crosses vpon the Palmes of their hands: and the like custome is obserued by all the Inhabitants of the Mountaines of Alger, and Bugia: the occasion whereof is thought to be this, namely, that the Goths when they first began to invade these Regions, released all those from paying of Tribute (as our African Historiographers affirme) that would imbrace the Christian Religion. But so often as any Tribute was demaunded, every man to eschew the payment thereof, would not sticke to professe himselfe a Christian: wherefore it was then determined, that such as were Christians indeed, should be distinguished from others by the foresaid crosses. At length the Goths being expelled, they all reuolted vnto the Mahumetan Religion; howbeit, this custome of painting crosses remained still among them neither doe they know the reason thereof. Likewise the meaner sort of people in Mauritania vse to make such crosses vpon their faces, as we see vsed by some people of Europe.

Sersell, built by the Romanes vpon the Mediterran Sea, was afterward taken by the Goths; and lastly by the Mahumetans. The wall of this Towne is exceeding high, strong, and stately built, and containeth about eight miles in circuit. In that part of the Towne next vnto the Mediterran Sea, standeth a most beautifull and magnificent Temple built by the Romanes, the inward part whereof consisteth of Marble.

Gezeir, in the Moores language signifieth an Iland, which name is thought to haue beene giuen gar.

uen vnto this Citie, because it lyeth neere vnto the Iles of Maiorica, Minorica, and Ieuiza: howbeit, the Spaniards call it Alger. It was founded by the Africans of the Family of Mesgana, wherefore in old time it was called by the name of Mesgana. It is a large Towne, containing Families to the number of foure thousand, and is enuironed with most stately and impregnable walles. The buildings thereof are very Artificiall and sumptuous: and euery trade and occupation hath heere a seuerall place. Innes, Bath-stoues, and Temples heere are very beautifull; but the stateliest Temple of all standeth vpon the Sea-shoare. Next vnto the Sea there is a most pleasant walke vpon that part of the Towne wall, which the waues of the Sea beat vpon. In the Suburbs are many Gardens replenished with all kind of Fruits. On the East side of the Towne runneth a certaine Riuer hauing many mills thereupon: and out of this Riuer 10 they draw water fit for drinke, and for the seruices of the Kitchen. It hath most beautifull Plaines adioyning vpon it, and especially one called Metteggia, which extendeth forty fiue miles in length, and almost thirty miles in breadth, and aboundeth mightily with all kinds of Graine. This Towne for many yeeres was subiect vnto the Kingdome of Telenfin: but hearing that Bugia was also gouerned by a King, and being neerer thereunto, they submitted themselues vnto the King of Bugia. For they saw that the King of Telenfin could not sufficiently defend them against their enemies, and also that the King of Bugia might doe them great damage, wherefore they offered vnto him a yeerly Tribute of their own accord, and yet remained almost free from all exaction. But certaine yeeres after, the inhabitants of this Citie building for themselues Gallies, began to play the Pirats, and greatly to molest the foresaid Ilands. Whereupon King 20 Ferdinando prouided a mighty Armada, hoping thereby to become Lord of the Citie. Likewise vpon a certaine high Rocke standing opposite against the Towne, he caused a strong Fort to be built, and that within Gun-shot of the Citie, albeit the Citie walles could not bee endamaged thereby. Wherefore the Citizens immediately sent Ambassadors into Spaine, to craue a league for ten yeeres, vpon condition that they should pay certaine yeerely Tribute; which request was granted by King Ferdinando. And so they remained for certaine Moneths free from the danger of warre: but at length, Barbarossa hastning to the siege of Bugia, and hauing wonne one Fort built by the Spaniards, determined to encounter another, hoping if he could obtaine that also, that he should soone conquer the whole Kingdome of Bugia. Howbeit, all matters fell not out according to his expectation: for a great part of his Souldiers being husbandmen, 30 when they perceiued the time of sowing corne to approach, without any leaue or licence they forsooke their Generall, and returned home to the Plough-taile. And many Turkes also did the like, so that Barbarossa failing of his purpose, was constrained to breake vp the siege. Howbeit, before his departure, he set on fire with his owne hands twelue Gallies, which lay in a Riuer but three miles from Bugia. And then with forty of his Souldiers, he retired himselfe to the Castle of Gegel, being from Bugia aboute sixtie miles distant, where hee remained for certaine dayes. In the meane while, King Ferdinando deceasing, the people of Alger released themselues from paying any more Tribute: for seeing Barbarossa to be a most valiant warriour, and a deadly enemy vnto Christians, they sent for him, and chose him Captaine ouer all their Forces; who presently encountred the Fort, but to little effect. Afterward, this Barbarossa secretly mur- 40 red the Gouvernour of the Citie in a certaine Bath. The said Gouvernour was Prince of the Arabians dwelling on the Plaines of Metteggia; his name was Selim Etteumi, descended of the Familie of Telaliba, and created Gouvernour of Alger, at the same time when Bugia was taken by the Spaniards: this man was slaine by Barbarossa, after he had gouerned many yeeres. And then Barbarossa vsurped the whole gouernment of the Citie vnto himselfe, and coined money, and this was the first entrance into his great and princely estate. At all the foresaid accidents I my selfe was present, as I trauelled from Fex to Tunis, and was entertained by one that was sent Ambassadour from the people of Alger into Spaine, from whence he brought three thousand bookes written in the Arabian tongue. Then I passed on to Bugia, where I found Barbarossa besieging the foresaid Fort: afterward I proceeded to Constantina, and next to Tunis. In the 50 meane while I heard that Barbarossa was slaine at Tremizen, and that his brother called Carradin succeeded in the gouernment of Alger. Then we heard also that the Emperour Charles the fift had sent two armies to surprize Alger; the first whereof was destroyed vpon the plaine of Alger, and the second hauing assailed the Towne three dayes together, was partly slaine, and partly taken by Barbarossa, in somuch, that very few escaped backe into Spaine. This was done in the yeere of the Hegira 922. The Inhabitants of Medua being themselues vnlearned, so often as any learned man comes amongst them, they entertaine him with great honour, and cause him to decide all their contro- uersies. For the space of two moneths, while I remained with them, I gained aboute two hundred Ducats, and was so allured with the pleasantness of the place, that had not my dutie enforced me 60 to depart, I had remained there all the residue of my life. Vnto Temendrust belongeth a faire Hauen, where the Ships of Alger are safely harboured, for they haue no other Hauen so commodious. This Towne was at length destroyed by the Goths, and the greatest part of the wall of Alger was built with the stones which came from the wall of this Towne.

Q. V.

The most remarkable things in Iohn Leo his fifth Booke of the Historie of Africa, and a description of the Kingdomes of Bugia and Tunis.

10 Bugia was subiect to the King of Tunis, and albeit, for certaine yeares the King of Telenfin was Lord thereof, yet was it at length recovered againe by the King of Tunis, who committed the Gouvernment of the Citie vnto one of his Sonnes, both for the tranquillitie of Bugia, and also that no discord might happen among his Sonnes after his decease. Hee left behind him three Sonnes, the eldest whereof was called Habdulbaziz, and vnto him he bequeathed the Kingdome of Bugia, as is aforesaid: vnto the second, whose name was Hutmen, hee left the Kingdome of Tunis: and the third, called Hammare, he made Gouvernour of the Region of Dates. This Ham- mare began forth-with to wage warre against his Brother Hutmen, by whom beeing at length taken in the Towne of Asfacos, and deprived of both his eyes, hee was carryed Captiue vnto Tunis, where he liued many yeares blind: but his Brother Hutmen gouerned the Kingdome of Tunis full forty yeares. The Prince of Bugia beeing most louing and dutifull to his Brother, 20 raigned for many yeares with great tranquillitie, till at length hee was by King Ferdinand of Spaine, and by the meanes of one Pedro de Nauarra, cast out of his Kingdome.

This ancient Citie of Bugia was built (as some think) by the Romans, vpon the side of an high Mountayne, neere vnto the Mediterran Sea, is enuironed with wals of great height, and most stately in regard of their Antiquitie. The part thereof now peopled contayneth aboue eight thousand Families: but if it were all replenished with buildings, it were capeable of more then four and twentie thousand Housholds, for it is of a great length. The Houses, Temples, and Colledges of this Citie are most sumptuously built. Professors of liberall Sciences heere are great store, whereof some teach matters pertayning to the Law, and others professe naturall Philosophie. Neyther Monasteries, Innes, nor Hospitalls erected after their manner are heere wanting: and their Market place is very large and fayre: their streetes either descend or ascend, 30 which is very troublesome to them that haue any businesse in the Towne. In that part of the Citie next vnto the top of the Mountayne standeth a strong Castle, most sumptuously and beautifully walled: and there are such notable Letters and Pictures most artificially earned vpon the Playster-worke and Timber, that they are thought to haue cost much more then the building of the wall it selfe.

The Citizens were exceeding rich, and vsed with their Warlike Gallies continually to molest the Coasts of Spaine; which was the occasion of the vtter ouerthrow of their Citie. For Pedro de Nauarra was sent against them with a Fleet of foureene Sayles onely. The Citizens being addicted wholly to pleasure and ease, and being terrified with the rumour of Warre, be-40 cause they were neuer exercised therein, were no sooner aduertised of Pedro de Nauarra his ap-proch, but all of them together with their King betooke themselues to flight, and left their Ci-tie abounding with all kind of riches and wealth, to be spoyled by the Spaniards, so that it was easily taken, in the yeere of Mahumet his Hegeira 917. Soone after Pedro de Nauarra hauing sacked the Citie, built a strong Fort vpon the Sea shoare, and repayed another which had lien a long time waste, furnishing them both with Souldiers and Munition.

The Inhabitants of Gegel, haue in despight of the Kings of Bugia and Tunis continued alwayes free from Tribute: for that impregnable Mountayne can be surprized by no siege nor encounter of the Enemy. At length they yeelded themselues vnto Barbarossa, who demanded none other Tribute of them, but onely the tenths of certaine Fruits and Corne.

50 The Inhabitants of Necans are very rich, liberall, and curious in their apparell. Heere is an Hospitall maintayned at the common charges of the Towne, to entertayne Strangers that passe by. Here is a Colledge also, the Students whereof are allowed their Dyet and apparell. Neither is this Towne destitute of a most stately and wel-furnished Temple. Their women are white, hauing blacke haies and a most delicate skinne, because they frequent the Bath-stones so often. Most of their houses are but of one story high, yet are they very decent, and haue each one a Garden thereto belonging, replenished with Damaske Roses, Myrtles, Cammomill, and other herbs and flowers, and beeing watred with most pleasant Fountaines. In these Gardens likewise there are most stately Arbours and Bowres, the coole shaddow whereof in Summer time is most acceptable.

60 No man can deny the Romanes to haue beene Founders of this Citie, that shall consider the great strength, height and antiquitie of the wals, and how curiously they are beset and adorned with blacke stones. This Citie standeth vpon the South side of an exceeding high Mountayne, and is enuironed with steepe Rockes, vnder which Rockes and within the compasse whereof runneth the River called Sufegmare, so that the said deepe River with the Rockes on either side, serueth in stead of a Towne-ditch to Constantina. The North part is compassed with a wall of great thicknesse : and there are two extreme narrow passages onely to enter into the Citie, one on the East part, and another on the West. The Citie gates are very large and stately. The Citie it selfe containeth aboue eight thousand Families. Buildings it hath very sumptuous, as namely, the Chiefe Temple, two Colledges, three or foure Monasteries, and other such like. Here euery Trade and Occupation hath a seuerall place assigned : and the Inhabitants are right honest and valiant people. Here is likewise a great Company of Merchants, whereof some sell Cloth and Wooll, others send Oyle and Silke into Numidia, and the residue exchange Linnen-cloth and other Wares for Slaues and Dates. Neyther are Dates so cheape in any Region of all Barbarie besides. The Kings of Tunis vsually commit the Gouernment of Constantina vnto their eldest Sonnes. 10

Triumphall
Arch.

Also without the Citie stand many fayre and ancient buildings. About a mile and a halfe from the Citie standeth a ceraine triumphall Arch, like vnto the triumphall Arches at Rome, which the grosse common people thinke to haue bene a Castle, where innumerable Deuils remayned, which (they say) were expelled by the Mahumetans, when they came first to inhabit Constantina. From the Citie to the Riuer they descend by certaine staires hewen out of the Rocke: and neere vnto the Riuer standeth a little house so artificially cut out of the mayne Rock, that the Roofe, Pillars and Wals are all of one continued substance, and here the women of Constantina wash their Linnen. Neere vnto the Citie likewise there is a certaine Bath of hot water dispersing it selfe among the Rockes : in this Bath are great store of Snails, which the fond women of the Citie call Deuils : and when any one falleth into a Feuer or any other Disease, they suppose the Snails to be the Authours thereof. And the onely remedie that they can apply vpon such an occasion, is this : first, they kill a white Hen, putting her into a Platter with her feathers on, and then very solemnely with Wax-candles they carry her to the Bath, and there leaue her : and many good fellowes there are, which so soone as the filly women haue set downe their Hens at the Bath, will come secretly thither, and conuay away the Hens to their owne Kitchens. Somewhat farther from the Citie Eastward, there is a Fountayne of extreme cold water, and neere vnto it standeth a certaine building of Marble adorned with sundry Hieroglyphicall Pictures or Emblemes, such as I haue seene at Rome, and at many other places of Europe. But the common people imagine that it was in times past a Grammar Schoole, and because both the Masters and Schollers thereof were most vicious, they were transformed (say they) into Marble. 20

Bona, was in ancient times called Hippo, where the Reuerend Father Saint Augustine was once Bishop. It was in proesse of time subdued by the Gothes, and was afterward surprized and burnt to ashes by Hutmen the third Patriarke after Mahumet. And many yeeres after they built a new Towne within two miles, of the stones that were brought from the ruines of Bona: which new Towne they called Beld Ethuneb, that is, the Citie of the fruit called Ziziphus or Inuba, by reason of the great abundance of that fruit : the which they vse to dry in the Sunne, and to keepe till Winter. It containeth almost three hundred Families, and all the houses and buildings thereof are very base, saue one onely Temple which standeth next the Sea. The Inhabitants are all of an ingenuous disposition, some of them being Merchants, and the residue Artizans. Here is great store of Linnen-cloth wouen, the greatest part whereof is carryed to Numidia. 30

Great store of Corall.

Euery Friday they haue neere vnto the Towne wals a Market, which is well frequented euen till night. Not farre from hence there is a certaine place in the Sea, abounding with great store of Corall : and because the Townesmen know not how to fish for the same, the King of Tunis licensed certaine Merchants of Genoa to fish for it : who in regard of the continuall assaults of Pirates, because they could not speed of their purpose, they obtayned leaue also of the King to build a Castle neere vnto the place : but that the Townesmen would in no case permit, saying, that the Genoueses in times past tooke their Towne by such a wile, and that it was afterward recovered againe by the King of Tunis. 40

Tebessa.

Tebessa, compassed with an high wall made of such stones, as are to be seene vpon the Colosso at Rome : neither saw I, to my remembrance, any such wals in all Africa or Europe; and yet the houses and other buildings are very base. Through part of this Citie runneth a great Riuer : and in the Market, and diuers other places stand certaine Marble Pillars, hauing Epigrams and Sentences with Latine Letters engrauen vpon them : there are also other square Pillars of Marble couered with Roofes. The Plaines adjacent, albeit, very dry, yet are they most fruitfull for Corne. Fiue miles from hence, grow such abundance of Wall-nut-trees, as you would take them to be some thicke Forrest. Neere vnto this Towne standeth a certaine hill full of mighty Caues, wherein the common people say, that Giants inhabited of old : but it is most eident, that those Caues were digged by the Romanes at the same time, when they built the Citie : for certaine it is that the stones whereof the Citie wals consist, were taken out of those Rockes. The Inhabitants are people of a couetous, inhumane, and beastly disposition ; neither will they vouchsafe to looke vpon a stranger in somuch, that Eldabag a famous Poet of the Citie of Malaga 50

in Granada, having in his travell this way receiued some discourtesie, wrote in disgrace of Tebessa certaine Satyricall Verses, which my selfe likewise haue thought good here to set downe in the dispraise thereof.

*Within this place here's nought of any worth, Sane worthlesse Nuts, which Tebessa affords.
Soft, I mistake, the Marble walles are worth
Your earnest view, so are the Christall Foords:
But hence are banisht vertues all diuine,
The place is Hell, the People worse then Swine.*

10 This Eldabag was a most learned and elegant Poet in the Arabian Tongue, and out of measure Satyricall, and bitter in his inuectiues. But to returne to our former purpose, these Tebessians haue alwaies rebelled against the King of Tunis, and haue slaine all the Gouernours that he hath sent. Wherefore the King that now is, traueiling vpon a time towards Numidia, sent certaine Ambassadors into the Citie, to know how the Citizens stood affected towards him: vnto whom they (in stead of God save the King) made answer; God save our Citie walles. Whereat the King waxing wroth, sacked the Citie forthwith, beheaded and hanged diuers of the inhabitants, and made such hauock, that euer since it hath remained desolate. This was done in the yeare of the Hegeira 915.

In the Towne of Urbs, are to be seene sundry Monuments of the Romans, as namely, Images of Marble, and euery where vpon the Walles are sentences in Latin letters engrauen: the Towne Walles are most artificially and sumptuously built. This Towne the Goths, being assisted by the Moors, surprised, when as it contained the chiefe treasure and wealth that the Romans enioyed in all Africa. Afterward, it remained for certaine yeares desolate, being at length notwithstanding inhabited anew; yet so, that it deserueth rather the name of a Village, then of a Towne.

The Towne called Urbs. Urbs full of Roman antiquities.

We haue here given the Reader, with a small generall Map of Barbary and Egypt, a description of the Ruines of Carthage, with the Goletta and Bay of Tunis.

A description of the mighty Citie of Tunis.

The famous and ancient City Carthage was built at the first by a certaine people that came out of Syria. But others say that it was founded by a * Queene. The African Chronicler Ibnu Rachich is of opinion, that it was built by a certaine people that came from Barca. Tripolis of Barbaria and Capis being taken by the Mahumetans, the Inhabitants of them both went vnto Carthage, whither the principall Romans and Goths had retired themselves, who endeauored by all meanes to withstand the Mahumetans: and after many skirmishes the Romans fled to Bona, and the Goths left Carthage for a pray vnto the Mahumetans; so that it remained desolate many yeares after, till a certaine Mahumetan Patriarke, called Elmahdi brought in new Colonies: howbeit, he could scarce furnish the twentieth part with Inhabitants. There are to be seene at this day certaine ruines of the Citie walls, till you come to a deepe and large Cisterne. And there remaineth as yet also a certaine Conduit, which conueyeth water to the Citie from a Mountaine thirtie miles distant, being like vnto the Conduit of the great Palace at Rome. Neere vnto Carthage likewise are certaine great and ancient buildings, the description whereof is out of my remembrance. On the West and South part of this Citie, are diuers Gardens replenished with all kind of fruits, which are carried from thence to Tunis in great abundance. The plaines adioyning to this Citie are exceeding fruitfull, though not very large: for vpon the North part thereof lieth a Mountaine, the Sea, and the Gulfe of Tunis: on the East and South parts it ioyneth to the Plaines of Benfart. But * now this Citie is fallen into extreme decay and misery: Merchants Shops there are not aboue twenty or five and twenty at the most: and all the houses of the Towne being scarce five hundred, are most base and beggerly. In my time here was a stately Temple, and a faire Colledge also, but no Students were therein. The Townesman, though verie miserable, yet are they exceeding proud withall, and seeme to pretend a great shew of Religion. And the greater part of them are either Gardiners or Husbandmen, and are grievously oppressed with the Kings daily exactions.

This Citie is called by the Latines, Tunetum, and by the Arabians Tunus, which name they thinke to be corrupt, because it signifieth nought in their language: but in old time it was called Tarfis, after the name of a Citie in Asia. At the first it was a small Towne built by the Africans vpon a certaine Lake, about twelue miles distant from the Mediterranean Sea. And vpon the decay of Carthage, Tunis began to increase both in buildings and inhabitants: for the inhabitants of Carthage were loth to remaine any longer in their owne Towne, fearing least some Armie would haue been sent out of Europe: wherefore they repaired vnto Tunis, and greatly enlarged the buildings thereof. Afterward came thither one Hueba Vimen, the fourth Mahumetan Patriarke, who perswaded the Citizens, that no Armie or Garrison ought to remaine in any Sea Townes: wherefore he built another Citie, called Cairaoan, being distant from the Mediterranean Sea thirtie, and from Tunis almost an hundred miles: vnto which Citie the Armie marched from Tunis, and in the roome thereof other people were sent to inhabite. About an hundred and fiftie yeares after, Cairaoan being sacked by the Arabians, the Prince thereof was expelled, and became Governour of the Kingdome of Bugia: howbeit, he left certaine Kinsmen of his at Tunis, who governed that Citie. And ten yeares after, Bugia was taken by Ioseph, the sonne of Tesfin, who seeing the humanitie of the foresaid Prince, would not expell him out of his Kingdome: but so long as it remained to the said Prince and his posteritie, Ioseph caused it to be free from all molestation. Afterward, Abdul Mumen, King of Marocco, hauing recovered Mahdia from the Christians, marched toward Tunis, and got possession thereof also. And so Tunis remained peaceably vnder the Dominion of the Kings of Marocco, so long as the Kingdome was gouerned by the said Abdul, and his sonne Ioseph, and their successors Iacob and Mansor. But after the decease of Mansor, his sonne Mahumet Ennasir made warre against the King of Spaine, by whom being vanquished, he fled to Marocco, and there within few yeares ended his life. After him succeeded his brother Ioseph, who was slaine by certaine souldiers of the King of Telenfin. An so vpon the death of Mahumet, and of his brother Ioseph, the Arabians began to inhabite the Territorie of Tunis, and to make often sidges, and assaults against the Citie it selfe: whereupon the Governour of Tunis aduertised the King of Marocco, that vnlesse present aide were sent, he must be constrained to yeeld Tunis vnto the Arabians. The King therefore sent a certaine valiant Captaine, called Habduhabidi, and borne in Simill, a Citie of Granada, with a Fleete of twentie Sayles vnto Tunis, which he found halfe destroyed by the Arabians: but so great was his eloquence and wisdom, that he restored all things to their former estate, and receiued the yearely tribute. After Habduhabidi succeeded his sonne Abu Zachheria, who in learning and dexteritie of wit, excelled his father. This Abu built a Castle vpon a certaine high place of the West part of Tunis, which he adorned with faire buildings, and with a most beautifull Temple. Afterward, taking his iourney vnto the Kingdome of Tripolis, and returning home by the Southerne regions, he gathered tribute in all those places: so that after his decease, he left great treasure vnto his sonne. And after Abu succeeded his sonne, who grew so insolent, that hee would not be subject to the King of Marocco, because hee perceiued his Kingdome to decay: at the same time also had the Marin Family gotten possession of the Kingdome of Fez, and so was the Familie of Beni Zeijen possessed of the Kingdomes of Telenfin and Granada. And so while all those Regions were at

at mutuall dissention, the Dominions of Tunis began mightily to encrease; insomuch, that the King of Tunis marched vnto Telensin, and demanded tribute of the inhabitants. Wherefore the King of Fez, who as then laid siege against Maroco, craued by his Ambassadors the King of Tunis his friendship, and with great gifts obtained the same. Then the King of Tunis returning home Conquerour from Telensin, was receiued with great triumph, and was saluted King of all Africa, because indeed there was no Prince of Africa at the same time comparable vnto him. Wherefore he began to ordaine a Royall Court, and to choose Secretaries, Counsellors, Captaines, and other Officers appertaining to a King; after the very same manner that was vsed in the Court of Maroco. And from the time of this King euen till our times, the Kingdome of Tunis hath so prospered, that now it is accounted the richest Kingdome in all Africa. The said Kings sonne reigning after his fathers death, enlarged the Suburbs of Tunis with most stately buildings. Without the Gate called Bed Suwaica he built a freete, containing to the number of three hundred Families: and he built another street at the Gate, called Bed el Manera, consisting of more then a thousand Families. In both of these streetes dwell great store of Artificers, and in the street last mentioned, all the Christians of Tunis, which are of the Kings Guard, haue their abode. Likewise, there is a third freete built at the Gate next vnto the Sea, called Beb el Bahar, and being but halfe a mile distant from the Gulfe of Tunis. Hither doe the Genoueses, Venetians, and all other Christian Merchants resort, and here they repose themselues out of the tumult and concourse of the Moores: and this street is of so great bignesse, that it containeth three hundred Families of Christians and Moores; but the houses are very low, and of small receipt. The Families of the Citie, together with them of the Suburbs, amount almost to the number of ten thousand. This stately and populous Citie hath a peculiar place assigned for each Trade and Occupation. Here dwell great store of Linnen-weauers, and the Linnen that they weaue is exceeding fine, and sold at a great price ouer all Africa. The women of this Towne vse a strange kind of spinning: for standing vpon an high place, or on the vpper part of the house, they let downe their Spindles at a window, or through a hole of the plancher into a lower roome, so that the weight of the Spindle makes the thread very equall and euen. The apparell of their Merchants, Priests, and Doctors is very decent. Vpon their heads they were a Dulipan, which is couered with a great Linnen-cloath: the Courtiers likewise and the Souldiers weare all of them Dulipans, but not couered with Linnen. Rich men here are but few, by reason of the exceeding scarcitie of all kind of graine: for a man cannot till a piece of ground, be it neuer so neere the Citie, in regard of the manifold inuasions of the Arabians. Corne is brought vnto them from other Regions and Cities, as namely, from Vrbs, from Beggi, and from Bona. Some of the Citizens of Tunis haue certaine Fields in the Suburbs walled round about, where they sow some quantitie of Barley, and of other Corne: howbeit, the soyle is marueilous dry, and standeth in need of much watring: for which purpose euery man hath a pit, whereout with a certaine wheele turned about by a Mule or a Camell, and through certaine conueyances and passages made for the nonce, they water all the vpper part of their ground. Now consider (I pray you) what great crop of Corne can be reaped out of so little a Field, walled round about, and watred by such cunning and industrie. Bread they make very excellent, albeit they leaue the Bran still among the Flower, and they bake their Loaves in certaine Mortars, such as the Egyptians vse to beate Flaxe in. In this Citie they haue no Fountaines, Riuers, nor Wells of fresh water: but they all vse raine water taken out of Cisterns, sauing that there is a Fountaine in the Suburbs, from whence certaine Porters bring salt water into the Citie to sell, which they thinke to bee more wholesome and fit for drinke then raine water. Other Wells there are that affoord most excellent water, which is reserued only for the King and his Courtiers. In this Citie there is one most stately Temple, furnished with sufficient number of Priests, and with rich reuenues. Other Temples there be also, but not endowed with so ample reuenues: here are Colledges likewise and Monasteries built after their manner, all which are maintained vpon the common beneuolence of the Citie. There are certaine people in this Citie, whom a man would take to bee distracted, which goe bare-headed and bare-footed, carrying stones about with them, and these are reuerenced by the common people for men of singular holinesse. Moreouer, on the behalfe of one of these mad fellowes, called Sidi el Dabi; and for the residue of his fond Societie, the King of Tunis built one of the foresaid Monasteries, and endowed the same with most ample reuenues. All the houses of this Citie are indifferently beautifull, being built of excellent stones, and adorned with much painting and caruing. They haue very artificiall pargettings or plaister-works, which they beautifie with Orient colours; for Wood to carue vpon is very scarce at Tunis. The floores of their Chambers are paued with certaine shining and faire stones: and most of their houses are but of one storie high: and almost euery house hath two Gates or entrances; one towards the street, and another towards the Kitchin and other back-rooms, betweene which Gates they haue a faire Court, where they may walke and conferre with their friends. Povertie constraineth some of their women to leade an vnchast life: they are decently apparellled, and going forth of the house, they weare vailles or maskes before their faces, like vnto the women of Fez: for with one Linnen-cloth they couer their fore-heads, and ioyned thereto another which they call Setfari: but about their heads they lap such fardels of Linnen, as they seeme comparable to the heads of Giants. Most part of their substance and labour they bestow vpon Perfumes and other such vanities. They haue here a Compound, called Lhasis, whereof whosoever eateth but one Ounce, falleth a laughing, disporting, and dallying, as if he were halfe drunken, and is by the said Confection maruellously prouoked vnto lust.

Of the King of Tunis his Court, and of the Rites and Ceremonies
there vsed.

So soone as the King of Tunis hath by inheritance attained to his Kingdome, all his Nobles, Doctors, Priests, and Iudges, bind themselves by solemne Oath vnto him. Immediately after any Kings death, his sonne and heire apparent succeedeth in the Kingdome: then the chiefe Officer of the Court (called the Munafid, because he is the Kings Vice-Roy or High Deputie) presenteth himselfe forthwith vnto the new King, and giueth vp an account of all things which hee did while the old King liued: and then at the Kings appointment, euerie of the Nobles receiue Offices from the Munafid according to their seuerall places of dignitie. Another principall Officer there is, called the Mesnare, that is, the Great Commander and Gouvernour of the warlike forces: who hath authority to increase or diminish the number of Souldiers, to giue them their pay, to leuie Armies, and to conduct the same whither he thinketh good. The third Officer in dignitie, is the Castellan, who with his Souldiers taketh charge of the Castle, and looketh to the safeguard of the Kings owne person: and he allotteth punishments vnto such prisoners, as are brought into the said Castle, as if he were the King himselfe. The fourth Officer, is the Gouvernour of the Citie, whose dutie is to administer Iustice in the Common-wealth, and to punish Malefactors. The fifth Officer, is the Kings Secretarie, who hath authoritie to write, and to giue answer in the Kings name: he may open also, and reade any Letters whatsoever, except such as are sent vnto the Castellan and Gouvernour of the Citie. The sixth, is the Kings Chiefe Chamberlaine, who is to furnish the Walles with Hangings, to appoint vnto euery man his place, and by a Messenger to assemble the Kings Counsellors; and this man hath great familiaritie with the King, and hath access to speake with him, as often as he pleaseth. The seuenth in dignitie, is the Kings Treasurer, who receiueth all Customes, Tributes, and yearely reuenues, and payeth them, with the Kings consent, vnto the Munafid. These are the chiefe Officers vnder the King; of the residue (lest I should seeme tedious to the Reader) I haue of purpose omitted to intreate of. I could here make a large discourse of the Kings vices that now reigneth (at whose hands I confesse my selfe to haue receiued great benefits) but that is not my purpose at this present: this one thing I can affirme, that he is marvellous cunning to procure money out of his subiects purses. But he himselfe liueth sometimes in his Palace, and sometimes in Gardens, in the company of his Concubines, Musicians, Stage-plaiers, and such like. When he calleth for any Musician, he is brought in blindfold or hoodwinked in manner of a Hawke.

The Towne of El Mahdia, otherwise called Africa.

El Mahdia, founded in our time by Mahdi the first Patriarke of Cairaoan vpon the Mediterranean sea, and fortified with strong Walls, Towers, and Gates, hath a most noble Hauens belonging thereto. Mahdi when he first entred into this Region, fained himselfe in an vnknowne habite to be descended of the lineage of Mahumet, whereby growing into great fauour of the people, hee was by their assistance made Prince of Cairaoan, and was called El Mahdi Califa: afterward trauellling fortie dayes iourney Westward into Numidia to receiue tribute due vnto him, he was taken by the Prince of Segelmesse, and put in prison; howbeit, the said Prince of Segelmesse being presently moued with compassion toward him, restored him to his former libertie, and was for his good will not long after slaine by him: afterward tyrannizing ouer the people, and perceiving some to conspire against him, he erected this Towne of Mahdia, to the end hee might there find safe refuge when need required. At length one Beiezid, a Mahumetan Prelate (whom they called the Canalleir, or Knight of the Asse, because that riding continually vpon an Asse, hee conducted an Armie of fortie thousand men) came vnto Cairaoan: but Mahdi fled vnto his new Towne, where with thirtie Sayle of ships, sent him by a Mahumetan Prince of Cordona, he so valiantly encountred the Enemy, that Beiezid and his sonne were both slaine in that battell; afterward returning to Cairaoan, hee grew in league and amitie with the Citizens, and so the government remained vnto his posteritie for many yeares.

Of the great Citie of Cairaoan.

The famous Citie of Cairaoan, otherwise called Caroen, was founded by Hucba, who was sent generall of an Armie out of Arabia Deserta by Hutmen, the third Mahumetan Califa. From the Mediterranean Sea, this Citie is distant fixe and thirtie, and from Tunis almost an hundred miles: neither was it built (they say) for any other purpose, but onely that the Arabian Armie might securely rest therein with all such spoiles, as they wonne from the Barbarians, and the Numidians. He enuironed it with most impregnable Walls, and built therein a sumptuous Temple, supported with stately Pillars. The said Hucba after the death of Hutmen was ordained Prince of Muchania, and gouerned the same till the time of Qualid Califa, the sonne of Habdul Malic, who as then reigned in Damasco. This Qualid sent a certaine Captaine, called Muse, the sonne of Nosair, with an huge Armie vnto Cairaoan; who hauing staid a few dayes with his Armie not farre from Cairaoan, marched Westward, sacking and spoyling Townes and Cities, till hee came to the Ocean Sea shore, and then hee returned towards Cairaoan againe. From whence hee sent as his Deputie a certaine Captaine into Mauritania, who there also conquered many many Regions and Cities: insomuch that Muse being moued with a iealous emulation, commanded him to stay till himselfe came. His said Deputie therefore, called Tarich, encamped himselfe not farre from Andaluzia, whither Muse within foure moneths came vnto him with an huge Armie; from whence both of them with their Armies crossing the Seas, arriued in Granada, and so marched by land against the Goths. Against whom Theodoricus, the King of Goths, opposing himselfe in battaile, was miserably vanquished. Then the foresaid two Captaines with all good successe proceeded euen to Castilia, and sacked the Citie of Toledo, where amongst much other treasure, they found many Reliques of the Saints, and the very same Table whereat Christ sate with his blessed Apostles; which being couered with pure Gold, and adorned with great store of precious stones, was esteemed to bee worth halfe a million of Ducats, and this Table, Muse carrying with him, as if it had been all the Treasure in Spaine, returned with his Armie ouer the Sea, and bent his course toward Cairoan. And being in the meane space sent for by the Letters of Qualid Califa, hee sayled into Egypt: but arriuing at Alexandria, it was told him by one Hescian, brother vnto the said Califa, that the Califa his brother was fallen into a most dangerous disease: wherefore hee wilhed him not to goe presently vnto Damasco, for feare least if the Califa died in the meane season, those rich and sumptuous Spoyles should be wasted and dispersed to no end. But Muse little regarding this counsell, proceeded on to Damasco, and presented all his Spoyles to the Califa, who within five dayes after deceased. After whom his brother succeeding Califa, deprived Muse of his dignitie, and substituted one Iezul into his roome, whose sonne, brother, and nephewes succeeding, gouerned the Citie of Cairoan, till such time as the Familie of Qualid was deprived of that dignitie, and one Elagleb was appointed Lieutenant, who gouerned not the Towne as a Califa: from that time the Mahumetan Califas leauing Damasco, remoued vnto Bagaded, as wee find recorded in a certaine Chronicle. After the decease of Elagleb, succeeded his sonne, and the gouernment remained vnto his posteritie for an hundred threescore and tenne yeares, till such time as they were deprived thereof by one Mabdi Califa. But at the same time when Elagleb was Gouernour, the Citie of Cairoan was so increased, both with inhabitants and buildings, that a Towne, called Recheda, was built next vnto it, where the Prince with his Nobles vsed to remaine. In his time also the Ile of Sicilia was wonne: for Elagleb sent thither a certaine Captaine, called Halcama, who built vpon the said Iland a Towne in stead of a Fort, calling it according to his owne name, Halcama; which name is vsed by the Sicilians euen till this present. Afterward this new Towne was besieged by certaine people that came to aide the Sicilians. Whereupon one Ased was sent with an Armie, and to the *Moore*s Forces being augmented, they conquered the residue of Sicilia, by which meanes the Dominions of Cairoan began wonderfully to increase. The Citie of Cairoan standeth vpon a Sandie and Desart Plaine, which beareth no Trees, nor yet any Corne at all. In this Citie for certaine yeares the studie of the Mahumetan Law mightily flourished, so that here were the most famous Lawyers in all Africa. It was at length destroyed, and replanted againe with new inhabitants, but it could neuer attaine vnto the former estate. At this present it is inhabited by none but Leatherdressers, who send their Leather vnto the Cities of Numidia, and exchange it also for Cloath of Europe.

A Riuer of hot water.

The Lake of Leapers.

A mile and a half to the South of El Hamma beginneth a certain Riuer of hot water to Spring, which being brought through the midst of the Citie by certaine Channells, is so deepe that it will reach vp to a mans nauell: howbeit, by reason of the extreme heate of the water, there are but few that wil enter thereinto. And yet the inhabitants vse it for drinke, hauing set it a cooling almost an whole day. At length this Riuer not far from the Towne maketh a certain Lake, which is called the Lake of Leapers: for it is of wonderfull force to heale the disease of leprosie, and to cure leprous sores: wherefore neere vnto it are diuers Cottages of Leapers, some of whom are restored to their health. The said water tasteth in a manner like Brimstone, so that it will nothing at all quench a mans thirst, whereof I my selfe haue had often triall.

Gerbi being neere vnto the firme land of Africa, and consisting of a Plaine and Sandy ground, aboundeth exceedingly with Dates, Vines, Oliues, and other fruits, and containeth about eightene miles in compasse.

Old Tripolis built also by the Romans, was after wonne by the Goths, and lastly by the Mahumetans, in the time of Califa Hemar the second. Which Mahumetans hauing besieged the Gouernour of Tripolis sixe moneths together, compelled him at length to flee vnto Carthage. The Citizens were partly slaine, and partly carried captiue into Egypt and Arabia, as the most famous African Historiographer, Ibnu Rachich reporteth.

After the destruction of old Tripolis, there was built another Citie of that name: which Citie being inuironed with most high and beautifull walls, but not very strong, is situate vpon a Sandy Plaine, which yeeldeth great store of Dates. The houses of this City are most stately, in respect of the Houses of Tunis; and here also euery trade and occupation hath a seuerall place. Weauers here are many. They haue no Wells nor Fountaines; but all their water is taken out of Cisterns. Corne in this Citie is at an exceeding rate; for all the Fields of Tripolis are as sandy and barren as the fields of Numidia. In this Citie were many faire Temples and Col-ledges built, and an Hospitall also for the maintenance of their owne poore people, and for the entertainment of strangers. Their fare is very base and homely, being onely Belis, or Dumplings made of Barley meale: for that Region affoordeth so small quantitie euen of Barley, that he is accounted a wealthy man that hath a bushell or two of corne in store. The Citizens are most of them Merchants; for Tripolis standeth neere vnto Numidia and Tunis, neither is there any Citie or Towne of account betweene it and Alexandria: neither is it farre distant from the Iles of Sicilia and Malta: and vnto the Port of Tripolis Venetian Ships yeerely resort, and bring thither great store of Merchandize. This Citie hath alwayes beene subiect vnto the King of Tunis: but when Abulhasen the King of Fez besieged Tunis, the King of Tunis was constrained 10 with his Arabians to flee into the Desarts. Howbeit, when Abulhasen was conquered, the King of Tunis returned to his Kingdome: but his subiects began to oppose themselves against him:

and so that Common-wealth was afterward grievously turmoyled with ciuill dissensions and warres. Whereof the King of Fez hauing intelligence, marched the fifth yeere of the said ciuill warre with an armie against the Citie of Tunis, and hauing vanquished the King thereof, and constrained him to flee vnto Constantina, he so straitly besieged him, that the Citizens of Constantina seeing themselves not able to withstand the King of Fez, opened their Citie gates to him and to all his armie. Whereupon the King of Tunis was carried captiue vnto Fez, and was afterward kept a while prisoner in the Castle of Septa. In the meane season Tripolis was by a Genouese Fleete of twenty sailes surprised and sacked, and the Inhabitants carried a- 20 way captiue. Whereof the King of Fez being aduertised, gaue the Genoueses fiftie thousand Ducats, vpon condition, that he might enioy the Towne in peace. But the Genoueses hauing surrendred the Towne, perceiued after their departure, that most part of their Ducats were counterfeit. Afterward, the King of Tunis beeing restored vnto his former libertie by A- buselim King of Fez, returned home vnto his Kingdome, and so the gouernement thereof remained vnto him and his posteritie, till Abubar the sonne of Hutmen together with his young sonne was slaine in the Castle of Tripolis by a nephew of his, who afterward vsurped the Kingdome: but he was slaine in a battell which he fought against Habdul Mumen, who presently thereupon became Lord of Tripolis. After him succeeded his sonne Zacharias, who within a 30 few moneths dyed of the pestilence. After Zacharias, Mucamen the sonne of Hesen, and cousin to Zacharias was chosen King; who beginning to tyrannize ouer the Citizens was by them expelled out of his Kingdome: and afterward a certaine Citizen was aduanced vnto the Royall Throne, who gouerned very modestly. But the King which was before expelled, sent an army of Souldiers against Tripolis, who loosing the field, were all of them put to flight. Afterward, the King that began to Raigne so modestly, prooued a very tyrant, and being murdered by his kinsmen, the people made choise of a certaine Nobleman, leading as then a Heremits life, and in a manner against his will appointed him their Gouverneur: and so the gouernment of the Citie of Tripolis remained vnto him and his posteritie, till such time as King Ferdinando sent Don Pedro de Nauarra against it: who on the sudden encountring this City, carried away many captiues with him. The Gouverneur of Tripolis and his sonne in-law were sent prisoners vn- 40 to Messina. Where, after certaine yeeres imprisonment, they were restored by the Emperour Charles the fift, vnto their former liberty, and returned vnto Tripolis, which Towne was afterward destroyed by the Christians. The Castle of Tripolis being enuironed with most strong walles, begin (as I vnderstand) to be replanted with new Inhabitants.

LIB. VI.

Collections taken out of IOHN LEO his sixt Booke of the Historie of Africa.

IN Barca they haue not any Corne growing at all. But Corne and other necessities are brought vnto them by Sea from Sicilia, which that euery of them may purchase, they are constrained to lay their sonnes to gage, and then goe rob and rife trauellers to redeeme them againe. Neuer did you heare of more cruell and bloody theeues:
for after they haue robbed Merchants of all their goods and apparell, they powre warme milke downe their throats, hanging them vp by the heeles vpon some tree, and forcing them to cast their gorge, wherein the lewd varlets search diligently for gold, suspecting that the Merchants swallowed vp their Crownes before they entred that dangerous Desart.

Being about to describe all the Cities and Townes of Numidia, I will first begin with Tesset: 60 which ancient Towne built by the Numidians, neere vnto the Libyan Desarts, and enuironed with walles of Sun-dried Bricke, deserueth scarcely the name of a Towne; and yet containeth four hundred Families. It is compassed round about with sandy Plaines, sauing that neere vnto the Towne grow some store of Dates, of Mill-seed, and of Barley, which the miserable Towni-

Townesmen vse for food. They are constrained also to pay large Tribute vnto the Arabians Inhabiting the next Desarts. They exercise traffique in the land of Negroes and in Guzula, insomuch, that they spend most of their time in forren Regions. They are of a blacke colour, and destitute of all learning. The women indeed teach their young children the first rudiments of learning, but before they can attaine to any perfection, they are put to labour, and to the Plough-tayle. The said women are somewhat whiter then other women: some of them get their liuing by spinning and carding of wooll, and the residue spend their time in idlenesse. Such as are accounted richest in this Region, possesse but very few Cattell. They Till their ground with an Horse and a Camell, which kind of Plowing is obserued throughout all Numidia.

10 Guaden situate vpon the Numidian Desart, neere vnto Libia, is Inhabited by most miserable and grosse people. Heere groweth nothing but Dates: and the Inhabitants are at such enmitie with their neighbours, that it is dangerous for them to goe abroad. Howbeit, they giue themselues to hunting, and take certaine wilde Beasts called Elamth, and Ostriches, neither doe they eate any other flesh. All their Goats they reserue for milke. And these people also are blacke of colour.

The Prouince of Dara beginneth at Mount Atlas, extendeth it selfe Southward by the Desarts of Libia, almost two hundred and fiftie miles, and the breadth thereof is very narrow. All the Inhabitants dwell vpon a certaine Riuer which is called by the name of the Prouince.
This Riuer sometime so ouerfloweth, that a man would thinke it to be a Sea, but in Summer it so diminisheth, that any one may passe ouer it on foot. If so be it ouerfloweth about the beginning of Aprill, it bringeth great plenty vnto the whole Region: if not, there followeth great 20 scarcitie of Corne. Vpon the banke of this Riuer there are sundry Villages and Hamlets, and diuers Castles also, which are enuironed with walles made of Sunne-dried Bricke and Mortar.
All their Beames and Planchers consist of Date-trees, being notwithstanding vsit for the purpose; for the wood of Date-trees is not solid, but flexible and spungie. On either side of the said Riuer for the space of fise or sixe miles, the fields abound exceedingly with Dates, which with good keeping will last many yeeres: and as heere are diuers kinds of Dates, so they are sold at sundry prices: for a bushell of some is woorth a Ducat, but others wherewith they feede their Horses and Camels, are scarce of a quarter so much value. Of Date-trees some are male and female: the male bring forth flowers onely, and the female fruit: but the flowers of the female will not open, vnlesse the boughes and flowers of the male be ioyned vnto them: And if they 30 bee not ioyned, the Dates will prooue starke naught, and containe great stones. The Inhabitants of Dara liue vpon Barley and other grosse meate: neither may they eate no bread but one-ly vpon Festiuall dayes. Their Castles are Inhabited by Gold-smithes and other Artificers, and so are all the Regions lying in the way from Tombuto to Fez: in this Prouince also there are three or foure proper Townes, frequented Merchants and strangers, and containing many Shops and Temples. But the principall Towne called Beni Sabih, and Inhabited with most valiant and liberall people, is diuided into two parts, either part hauing a seuerall Captaine or Gouernour: which Gouernours are oftentimes at great dissension, and especially when they moisten their arable Grounds, by reason that they are so skanted of water. A Merchant they will most courteously entertaine a whole yeere together, and then friendly dismissing him, they 40 require nought at his hands, but will accept such liberality as he thinkes good to bestow vpon them. The said Gouernours so often as they fall a skirmishing, hire the next Arabians to aide them, allowing them daily halfe a Ducat for their pay, and sometimes more, and giuing them their allowance euery day. In time of peace they trim their Harquebuzes, Hand-guns, and other weapons: neither saw I euer (to my remembrance) more cunning Harquebuziers then at this place. In this Prouince groweth great store of Indico, being an herbe like vnto the wilde woad, and this herbe they exchange with the Merchants of Fez and Tremisen for other wares.
Corne is very scarce among them, and is brought thither from Fez and other Regions, neither haue they any great store of Goats or Horses, vnto whom in stead of Prouender they giue Dates, and a kind of herbe also which groweth in the Kingdome of Naples, and is called by the 50 Neapolitans Farfa. They feed their Goats with the Nuts or Stones of their Dates beaten to powder, whereby they grow exceeding fat, and yeeld great quantity of milke. Their owne food is the flesh of Camels and Goats, being vnsauory and displeasing in taste. Likewise they kill and eate Ostriches, the flesh whereof tasteth not much vnlike to the flesh of a dunghill-cocke, sauing that it is more tough and made of a stronger smell, especially the Ostriches legges:

which consisteth of slime fleshi. Their women are faire, fat, and courteous: and they keepe diuers slaves which are brought out of the land of Negroes.

This Territory extending it selfe along the Riuer of Ziz from North to South almost twentie 60 miles, containeth about three hundred and fiftie Castles, besides Villages and Hamlets: three of which Castles are more principall then the rest. The first called Tenegent, and consisting of a thousand and moe Families, standeth neere vnto the Citie of Segelmesse, and is inhabited with great store of Artificers. The second called Tebuhasan, standeth about eight miles to the South of Tenegent, being furnished also with great numbers of Inhabitants, and so frequented with

Merchants, that there is not in that respect the like place to bee found in all the whole Region besides. The third called Mammun, is resorted vnto by sundry Merchants, both Jewes and Moores.

Infinite numbers of Scorpions.

These three Castles haue three seuerall Gouvernours, who are at great dissention among themselves. They will oftentimes destroy one anothers Channells, whereby their fields are watered, which cannot without great cost be repayed againe. They will stow the Palme-trees also to the very stockes: and vnto them a company of lewd Arabians associate themselves. They Coyne both Silver and Gold money: but their Gold is not very speciall. Their Silver Coyne weigheth foure graines a piece, eightie of which pieces are esteemed to bee worth one piece of their Gold Coyne. The Jewes and Arabians pay excessive Tribute here. Some of their principall men are exceeding rich, and vse great Traffique vnto the Land of Negros: whither they transport Wares of Barbarie, exchanging the same for Gold and Slaues. The Territory of Segelmesse liue vpon Dates, except it be in certaine places where some Corne grew. Here are infinite numbers of Scorpions, but no Flies at all. In Summer time this Region is extremely hot, and then are the Riuer so destitute of water, that the people are constrained to draw salt water out of certaine Pits. The said Territory containeth in circuit about eighty miles, all which, after the destruction of Segelmesse, the Inhabitants with small cost walled round about, to the end they might not be molested by continuall inrodes of Horsemen. While they liued all at vnitie and concord, they retayned their libertie: but since they fell to mutuall debate, their wall was razed, and each faction inuited the Arabians to helpe them, vnder whom by little and little they were brought in subiection.

The Towne or Citie of Segelmesse.

The common people together with one of our African Cosmographers, called Bicri, suppose that the Towne of Segelmesse was built by Alexander the Great, for the reliefe of his sicke and wounded Souldiers. Which opinion seemeth not probable to me: for I could neuer reade that Alexander the Great came into any part of these Regions. This Towne was situate vpon a Plaine neere vnto the Riuer of Ziz, and was enuironed with most stately and high wals, euen as in many places it is to be seene at this present. When the Mahumetans came first into Africa, the Inhabitants of this Towne were subiect vnto the Family of Zeneta; which Family was at length dispossessed of that authority by King Ioseph the Sonne of Tesfin, of the Family of Luntuna. The Towne it selfe was very gallantly built, and the Inhabitants were rich, and had great Traffique vnto the Land of Negros. Here stood stately Temples and Colledges also, and great store of Conduits, the water whereof was drawne out of the Riuer by Wheelles. The Ayre in this place is most temperate and holesome, sauing that in Winter it aboundeth with ouermuch moysture.

The Castle of Ummelhesen.

Ummelhesen is a forlorne and base Castle, founded by the Arabians also, fise and twentie miles from Segelmesse vpon a Desert, directly in the way from Segelmesse to Dara. It is enuironed with blacke wals, and continually garded by the Arabians. All Merchants that passe by, pay one fourth part of a Duckat for euery Camels lode. My selfe traueiling this way vpon a time in the company of fourteene Jewes, and being demanded how many there were of vs, wee said thirteene, but after I began particularly to reckon, I found the fourteenth and the fifteenth man amongst vs, whom the Arabians would haue kept Prisoners, had wee not affirmed them to bee Mahumetans: howbeit not crediting our words, they examined them in the Law of Mahumet, which when they perceiued them indeed to vnderstand, they permitted them to depart.

The Castles of Fighig.

The three Castles of Fighig stand vpon a certaine Desert, maruellously abounding with Dates. The women of this place weaue a kind of cloth in forme of a Carpet, which is so fine, that a man would take it to be Silke, and this Cloth they sell at an excessive rate at Fez, Telsenin, and other places of Barbarie. The Inhabitants being men of an excellent wit, doe part of them vse Traffique to the Land of Negros, and the residue become Students at Fez: and so soone as they haue attayned to the degree of a Doctor, they returne to Numidia, where they are made either Priests or Senators, and proue most of them men of great wealth and reputation. From Segelmesse, the said Castles are distant almost an hundred and fiftie miles Eastward.

The Region of Tegarwin.

This great and large Region of Tegarwin in the Numidian Desert, standing about an hundred and twentie miles Eastward of Tesebit, containeth fiftie Castles, and aboue an hundred Villages; and yeeldeth great plentie of Dates. The Inhabitants are rich, and haue ordinarie Traffique to the Land of Negros. Their fields are very apt for Corne, and yet by reason of their extreme drought, they stand in need of continuall watering and dunging. They allow vnto strangers houses to dwell in, requiring no money for rent but onely their dung, which they keepe most charily: yea, they take it in ill part if any stranger easeth himselfe without the doores. Flesh is very scarce among them: for their soyle is so dry, that it will scarce nourish any Cattell at all: they keepe a few Goats indeed for their Milkes sake: but the flesh that they eate is of Camels, which the Arabians bring vnto their Markets to sell: they mingle their meate with salt Tallow, which is brought into this Region from Fez and Tremizen. There were in times past many rich Jewes in this Region, who by the meanes of a certaine Mahumetan Preacher, were at length expelled, and a great part of them slaine by the seditious people; and that in the very same year when the Jewes were expelled out of Spaine and Sicily. The Jewes expelled.

The ancient Towne of Techort was built by the Numidians vpon a certaine Hill, by the foot whereof runneth a Riuer, vpon which Riuer standeth a draw-bridge. The wall of this Towne was made of free stone and lime, but that part which is next vnto the Mountayne hath instead of a wall an impregnable Rocke opposite against it: this Towne is distant fve hundred miles Southward from the Mediterran Sea, and about three hundred miles from Tegorarin. Families it containeth to the number of fve and twenty hundred: all the houses are built of Sunne dried Bricks, except their Temple which is somewhat more stately. Heere dwell great store both of Gentlemen and Artificers: and because they haue great abundance of Dates, and are destitute of Corne, the Merchants of Constantina exchange Corne with them for their Dates. All strangers they fauour exceedingly, and friendly difmiffe them without paying of ought. They had rather match their Daughters vnto strangers, then to their owne Citizens: and for a Dowry they giue some certaine portion of Land, as it is accustomed in some places of Europe. So great and surpassing is their liberalitie, that they will heape many gifts vpon strangers, albeit they are sure neuer to see them againe.

The Towne of Techort.Hospitalitie and loue to strangers.

The Gouvernour at this present called Habdulla, is a valiant and liberall yong Prince, and most courteous vnto strangers, whereof I my selfe conuersing with him for certayne dayes, had good experience.

This Region is extremely hot, sandie and destitute both of Water and Corne: which wants are partly supplied by their abundance of Dates. It containeth to the number of fve Townes and many Villages, all which we purpose in order to describe.

Their soyle in Pescara, yeeldeth nought but Dates. They haue beene governed by diuers Princes; for they were a while subiect vnto the Kings of Tunis, and that to the death of King Hutmen, after whom succeeded a Mahumetan Priest: neyther could the Kings of Tunis euer since that time recouer the Dominion of Pescara. Here are great abundance of Scorpions, and it is present death to bee stung by them: wherefore all the Townelmen in a manner depart into the Countrey in Summer time, where they remayn till the moneth of Nouember.

The Towne of Pescara.Deadly Scorpions.Densen.

Not farre from Densen are diuers Monuments of Antiquitie like vnto Sepulchres, wherein are found sundry pieces of Siluer Coyne, adorned with certayne Letters and Hieroglyphicall Figures, the interpretation whereof I could neuer find out.

The ancient Towne of Caphsa built also by the Romanes, had for certayne yeeres a Gouvernour of their owne: but afterward being sacked by one Hucha a Captaine of Hutmen Califa, the wals thereof were razed to the ground; but the Castle as yet remayneth, and is of great force; for the wall thereof being fve and twentie Cubits high, and fve Cubits thicke, is made of excellent stones, like vnto the stones of Vespasians Amphitheatre at Rome. Afterward the Towne wals were re-edified, and were destroyed againe by Mansor, who hauing slaine the Gouvernour of the Towne and all the Inhabitants, appointed a new Gouvernour ouer the same place. Now this Towne is very populous, all the houses thereof, except the Temple and a few other buildings, being very deformed and base, and the streets are paved with blacke stones, like vnto the streets of Naples and Florence. The poore Inhabitants are continually oppressed with the exactions of the King of Tunis. In the middest of the Towne are certaine square, large, and deepe Fountaines walled round about, the water whereof is hot and vnfit to be drunke, vnlesse it be set an houre or two a cooling. The Ayre of this place is very vnwholesome, insomuch that the greatest part of the Inhabitants are continually sicke of Feuers. People they are of a rude and illiberall disposition, and vnkind vnto strangers: wherefore they are had in great contempt by all other Africans. Not farre from this Towne are fields abounding with Dates, Oliues, and Pome-citrons: and the Dates and Oliues there are the best in all the whole Prouince: heere is likewise most excellent Oyle. The Inhabitants make themselves Shooes of Buckes Leather.

The Towne of Caphsa.The Towne of Caphsa.

Hauing hitherto described all the Regions of Numidia, let vs now proceed vnto the description of Libya; which is diuided into fve parts, as we signified in the beginning of this our Discourse. We will therefore beginne at the dry and forlorne Defart of Zanhaga, which bordereth Westward vpon the Ocean Sea, and extendeth Eastward to the Salt-pits of Tegaza, Northward it abutteth vpon Sus, Haccha, and Dara, Regions of Numidia; and Southward it stretcheth to the Land of Negros, adioyning it selfe vnto the Kingdomes of Gualata and Tombuto. Water is here to be found scarce in an hundred miles trauell, beeing salt and vnfaourie, and drawne out of deepe Wels, especially in the way from Segelmesse to Tombuto. Heere are great store of wilde beasts and creeping things, whereof wee will make mention in place conuenient. In this Region there is a barren Defart called Azaoad, wherein neyther water nor any Habitations are to be found in the space of an hundred miles; beginning from the Well of Azaoad, to the Well of Araoan, which is distant from Tombuto about one hundred and fiftie miles. Here both for lacke of water and extremitie of heate, great numbers of men and beast daily perish.

Water scarce.

Heate and drought.

Not farre from Agadez, there is found great store of Manna, which the Inhabitants gather in certaine little Vessels, carrying it while it is new vnto the Market of Agadez: and this

Great store of Manna.Manna

Manna beeing mingled with water they esteeme very daintie and precious Drinke. They put it also into their Pottage, and beeing so taken, it hath a marvellous force of refrigerating or cooling, which is the cause that here are so few Diseases; albeit, the Ayre of Tombuto and Agadez be most vnholosome and corrupt. This Desert stretcheth from North to South almost three hundred miles.

Leuata, Berdoa, and others are omitted.

The residue of the Libyan Desert, that is to say, from Augela to the Riuer of Nilus is inhabited by certayne Arabians and Africans, commonly called Lenata: and this is the extreme Easterly part of the Deserts of Libya.

The Region
of Nun.

This Region bordering vpon the Ocean Sea, containeth many Villages and Hamlets, and is inhabited with most beggerly people. It standeth betweene Numidia and Libya, but somewhat neerer vnto Libya. Here groweth neyther Barley nor any other Corne. Some Dates heere are, but very vnfaourie. The Inhabitants are continually molested by the Arabians inuasions: and some of them traffique in the Kingdome of Gualata.

The Region of Tegaza.
Salt Mines.
Tombuto.

In the Region of Tegaza, is great store of Salt digged, being whiter then any Marble. This Salt is taken out of certaine Caues or Pits, at the entrance whereof stand their Cottages that worke in the Salt Mines. And these Workmen are all strangers, who sell the Salt which they digge vnto certaine Merchants, that carrie the same vpon Camels to the Kingdome of Tombuto, where there would otherwise be extreme scarcitie of Salt. Neyther haue the said Diggers of Salt any victuals but such as the Merchants bring vnto them: for they are distant from all inhabited places, almost twentie dayes Iourney, insomuch, that oftentimes they perish for lacke of food, when as the Merchants come not in due time vnto them: Moreover, the South-east wind doth so often blind them, that they cannot liue here without great perill. I my selfe continued three dayes amongst them, all which time I was constrained to drinke Salt water drawne out of certaine Wels not farre from the Salt Pits.

The Region

at this present

Deserts to Tom-buto.

Berdeoa, a Region situate in the midst of the Libyan Desert, and standing almost five hundred miles from Nilus, containeth three Castles and five or sixe Villages, abounding with most excellent Dates. And the said three Castles were discovered eightene yeeres agoe, by one Hammar, in manner following: the Carauan of Merchants wandring out of the direct way, had a certaine blind man in their company which was acquainted with all those Regions: this blind Guide riding foremost vpon his Camell, commanded some Sand to be giuen him at euery miles end, by the smell whereof hee declared the situation of the place: but when they were come within fortie miles of this Region, the blind man smelling of the Sand, affirmed, that they were not farre from some places inhabited; which some beleeued not, for they knew that they were distant from Egypt foure hundred and eightie miles, so that they tooke themselves to bee neerer vnto Augela. Howbeit, within three dayes they found the said three Castles, the Inhabitants whereof wondering at the approach of strangers, and being greatly astonied, presently shut all their Gates, and would giue the Merchants no water to quenck their extreme thirst. But the Merchants by mayne force entred, and hauing gotten water sufficient, betooke themselves againe to their Iourney.

Algnechet.

Algnechet also being a Region of the Libyan Desert, is from Egypt an hundred and twentie miles distant. Here are three Castles and many Villages abounding with Dates. The Inhabitants are blacke, vile, and couetous people, and yet exceeding rich: for they dwell in the mid-way betweene Egypt and Gaoga. They haue a Gouvernour of their owne, notwithstanding they pay Tribute vnto the next Arabians.

¶ VII.

Extracts taken out of IOHN LEO his seventh Booke of the Historie of Africa, wherein he intreateth of the Land of Negros, and of the Confines of Egypt.

Bichri and Mesludi.

Vr ancient Chroniclers of Africa, to wit, Bichri and Mesludi, knew nothing in the Land of Negros, but onely the Regions of Guechet and Cano: for in their time all other places of the Land of Negros were vndiscovered. But in the yeere of the Hegeira three hundred and eightie, by the meanes of a certaine Mahumetan which came into Barbarie, the residue of the said Land was found out, beeing as then inhabited by great numbers of people, which liued a brutish and sauage life, without any King, Gouvernour, Common-wealth, or knowledge of Husbandry. Clad they were in skinnies of beasts, neither had they any peculiar wiues: in the day time they kept their Cattell; and when night came they resorted ten or twelue, both men and women into one Cottage together, vsing hayrie skinnies in stead of beds, and each man choosing his Leman which hee had most fancie vnto. Countrey. Some of them performe great adoration vnto the Sunne-rising : others, namely the people of Gualata, worship the fire : and some others, to wit, the Inhabitants of Gaoga, approach (after the Egyptians manner) neerer vnto the Christian Faith. These Negros were first subiect vnto King Ioseph the Founder of Maroco, and afterward vnto the five Nations of Libya ; of whom they learned the Mahumetan Law, and diuers needfull handi-crafts : a while after when the Merchants of Barbarie began to resort vnto them with Merchandize, they learned the Barbarian language also. But the foresaid five People or Nations of Libya diuided this land so among themselves, that euery third part of each Nation possessed one Region. Howbeit, the King of Tombuto that now reigneth, called Abuacre Izchia, is a Negro by birth : this

10 Abuacre after the decease of the former King, who was a Lybian borne, slue all his sonnes, and so vsurped the Kingdome. And hauing by warres for the space of fifteene yeere conquered many large Dominions, hee then concluded a league with all Nations, and went on Pilgrimage to Mecca, in which Journey hee so consumed his Treasure, that he was constrained to borrow great summes of money of other Princes. Moreouer, the fifteene Kingdomes of the land of Negros knowen to vs, are all situate vpon the Riuer of Niger, and vpon other Riuer which fall therinto. And all the land of Negros standeth betweene two vast Desarts, for on the one side lyeth the maine Desart betweene Numidia and it, which extendeth it selfe vnto this very land : and the South side thereof adioyneth vpon another Desart, which stretcheth from thence to the maine Ocean : in which Desart are infinite Nations vnknownen to vs, both by reason of the huge

20 distance of place, and also in regard of the diuersitie of Languages and Religions. They haue no traffique at all with our people, but we haue heard oftentimes of their traffique with the Inhabitants of the Ocean Sea shoare.

The Region of Gualata in regard of others is very small : for it containeth onely three great Villages, with certaine Granges and fields of Dates. From Nun it is distant Southward about three hundred, from Tombuto Northward five hundred, and from the Ocean Sea about two hundred miles. In this Region the people of Libya, while they were Lords of the land of Negros, ordained their chiefe Princely seate : and then great store of Barbarie Merchants frequented Gualata : but afterward in the Raigne of the Mightie and rich Prince Heli, the said Merchants leauing Gualata, began to resort vnto Tombuto and Gago, which was the occasion that the Region of Gualata grew extreme beggerly. The language of this Region is called Sungai, and the Inhabitants are blacke people, and most friendly vnto strangers. In my time this Region was conquered by the King of Tombuto, and the Prince thereof fled into the Desarts, whereof the King of Tombuto hauing intelligence, and fearing least the Prince would returne with all the people of the Desarts, graunted him peace, conditionally that he should pay a great yeerely Tribute vnto him, and so the said Prince hath remained Tributarie to the King of Tombuto vntill this present. The people agree in manners and fashions with the Inhabitants of the next Desart. Heere groweth some quantity of Mil-seed, and great store of a round and white kinde of pulse, the like whereof I neuer saw in Europe ; but flesh is extreme scarce among them. Both the men and the women doe so couer their heads, that all their countenance is almost hidden. Heere

30 is no forme of a Common-wealth, nor yet any Gouvernours or Iudges, but the people lead a most miserable life.

The Kingdome called by the Merchants of our Nation Gbeneoa, by the naturall Inhabitants thereof Genni, and by the Portugals and other people of Europe Ghinea, standeth in the midst betweene Gualata on the North, Tombuto on the East, and the Kingdome of Melli on the South. In length it containeth almost five hundred miles, and extended two hundred and fifty miles along the Riuer of Niger, and bordereth vpon the Ocean Sea in the same place, where Niger falleth into the said Sea. This place exceedingly aboundeth with Barley, Rice, Cattell, Fishes, and Cotten : and their Cotten they sell vnto the Merchants of Barbarie, for cloth of Europe, for Brazen vessels, for Armour, and other such commodities. Their Coine is of Gold without any stampe or inscription at all : they haue certaine Iron-money also, which they vse about matters of small value, some peeces whereof weigh a pound, some halfe a pound, and some one quarter of a pound. In all this Kingdome there is no fruit to be found but only Dates, which are brought hither either out of Gualata or Numidia. Heere is neither Towne nor Castle, but a certaine great Village onely, wherein the Prince of Ghinea, together with his Priests, Doctors, Merchants, and all the principall men of the Region inhabite. The walles of their houses are built of Chalke, and the roofes are couered with Strawe : the Inhabitants are clad in blacke or blew Cotten, wherewith they couer their heads also : but the Priests and Doctors of their Law goe apparelled in white Cotten. This Region during the three moneths of July, August, and September, is yeerely enuironed with the ouerflowings of Niger in manner of an Iland ; all which time the Merchants of Tombuto conueigh their Merchandize hither in certaine Canoas or narrow Boats made of one tree, which they rowe all the day long, but at night they binde them to the shoare, and lodge themselves vpon the land. This Kingdome was subiect in times past vnto a certaine people of Libya, and became afterward Tributarie vnto King Soni Heli, after whom succeeded Soni Heli Izchia, who kept the Prince of this Region prisoner

The Region of Melli extending it selfe almost three hundred miles along the side of a Riuer which falleth into Niger, bordereth Northward vpon the Region last described, Southward vpon certaine Desarts and drie Mountaines, Westward, vpon huge Woods and Forrests, stretching to the Ocean Sea shoare, And Eastward vpon the Territorie of Gago. In this Kingdome there is a large and ample Village containing to the number of fixe thousand or moe Families, and called Melli, whereof the whole Kingdome is so named. And heere the King hath his place of Residence. The Region it selfe yeeldeth great abundance of Corne, Fleth, and Cotton. Heere are many Artificers and Merchants in all places: and yet the King honorably entertaineth all strangers. The Inhabitants are rich, and haue plenty of wares. Heere are great store of Temples, Priests, and Professors, which Professors read their Lectures onely in the Temples, because they haue no Colledges at all. The people of this Region excell all other Negros in wit, ciuility, and industry; and were the first that embraced the Law of Mahumet, at the same time when the Vncle of Ioseph the King of Maroco was their Prince, and the Gouvernment remained for a while vnto his posteritie: at length Izchia subdued the Prince of this Region, and made him his Tributarie, and so oppressed him with grieuous exactions, that he was scarce able to maintaine his Family.

Tombuto is so called of a certaine Towne so called, which (they say) King Mense Suleiman founded in the yeere of the Hegeira 610. and it is situate within twelue miles of a certaine branch of Niger, all the houses whereof are now changed into Cottages built of Chalke, and couered with Thatch. Howbeit, there is a most stately Temple to be seene, the walles whereof are made of stone and lime; and a Princely Palace also built by a most excellent workeman of Granada. Heere are many shops of Artificers, and Merchants, and especially of such as weaue Linnen or Cotten cloth. And hither doe the Barbarie Merchants bring cloth of Europe. All the women of this Region except Maid-seruants goe with their faces couered, and sell all necessary victuals. The Inhabitants, and especially strangers there residing, are exceeding rich, in somuch, that the King that now is, married both his daughters vnto two rich Merchants. Heere are many welles, containing most sweet water; and so often as the Riuer Niger ouerfloweth, they conueigh the water thereof by certaine sluces into the Towne. Corne, Cattell, Milke, and Butter, this Region yeeldeth in great abundance: but salt is very scarce heere; for it is brought hither by land from Tegaza, which is fise hundred miles distant. When I my selfe was heere, I saw one Camels load of Salt sold for eightie Duckats. The rich King of Tombuto hath many Plates and Scepters of Gold, some whereof weigh one thousand and three hundred pounds: and he keepes a magnificent and well furnished Court. When he trauellet any whither he rideth vpon a Camell, which is lead by some of his Noblemen; and so he doth likewise when hee goeth to warfare, and all his Souldiers ride vpon Horses. Whosoeuer will speake vnto this King must first fall downe before his feet, and then taking vp earth, must sprinkle it vpon his owne head and shoulders: which custome is ordinarily obserued by them that neuer saluted the King before, or come as Ambassadors from other Princes. He hath alwayes three thousand Horsemen, and a great number of footmen that shoot poysoned arrowes, attending vpon him. He so deadly hateth all Jewes, that he will not admit any into his Citie: and whatsoeuer Barbarie Merchants he vnderstandeth to haue any dealings with the Jewes, he presently causeth their goods to be confiscate. Heere are great store of Doctors, Iudges, Priests, and other learned men, that are bountifully maintained at the Kings cost and charges. And hither are brought diuers Manuscripts or written Bookes out of Barbarie, which are sold for more money then any other Merchandize. The Coine of Tombuto is of Gold without any stampe or superscription: but in matters of small value they vse certaiue shels brought hither out of the Kingdome of Persia, foure hundred of which shels are woorth a Duckat: and fixe peeces of their Golden Coine with two third parts weigh an ounce. The Inhabitants are people of a gentle and cheerefull disposition, and spend a great part of the night in singing and dancing through all the streets of the Citie: they keepe great store of men and women-slaues, and their Towne is much in danger of fire: at my second being there halfe the Towne almost was burnt in fise houres space. Without the Suburbs there are no Gardens nor Orchards at all.

Cabra a large Towne built without walles in manner of a Village, standeth about twelue miles from Tombuto vpon the Riuer Niger: and heere such Merchants as trauell vnto the Kingdomes of Ghinea and Melli embarke themselves. Neither are the people or buildings of this Towne any whit inferiour to the people and buildings of Tombuto: and hither the Negros resort in great numbers by water. In this Towne the King of Tombuto appointeth a Iudge to decide all controuersies: for it was tedious to goe thither so oft as need should require. I my selfe am acquainted with Abu Bacr, surnamed Pargama, the Kings Brother, who is blacke in colour, but most beautifull in mind and conditions. Heere breed many diseases which exceedingly diminish the people; that by reason of the fond and loathsome mixture of their meates; for they mingle Fish, Milke, Butter, and Fleth altogether. And this is the ordinary food also in Tombuto.

- The great Towne of Gago being vnwalled also, is distant Southward of Tombuto almost foure hundred miles, and enclineth somewhat to the South-East. The houses thereof are but meane; except those wherein the King and his Courtiers remaine. Here are exceeding rich Merchants: and hither continually resort great store of Negros; which buy Cloath here brought out of Barbarie and Europe. This Towne aboundeth with Corne and Flesh, but is much destitute of Wine, Trees, and Fruites. Howbeit, here is plenty of Melons, Citrons, and Rice: here are many Wells also containing most sweet and wholsome water. Here is likewise a certaine place where slaues are to be sold, especially vpon such dayes as the Merchants vse to assemble; and a young slaue of fifteen years age is sold for sixe Duckats, and so are children sold also. The King of this Region hath a certaine priuate Palace, wherein hee maintaineth a great number of Concubines and Slaues, which are kept by Eunuches: and for the guard of his owne person, he keepeth a sufficient troope of Horsemen and Footmen. Betweene the first Gate of the Palace and the inner part thereof, there is a place walled round about, wherein the King himselfe decideth all his subjects controuerfies: and albeit, the King be in this function most diligent, and performeth all things thereto appertaining, yet hath he about him his Counsellors, and other Officers; as namely, his Secretaries, Treasurers, Factors, and Auditors. It is a wonder to see what plenty of Merchandize is daily brought hither, and how costly and sumptuous all things be. Horses bought in Europe for ten Duckats, are here sold againe for forty, and sometimes for fifty Duckats a peece. There is not any Cloath of Europe so coarse, which will not here be sold for foure Ducats an ell; and if it be any thing fine, they will giue fifteen Duckats for an ell: and an ell of the Scarlet of Venice, or of Turkie Cloath is here worth thirty Duckats. A Sword is here valued at three or foure Crownes, and so likewise are Spurs, Bridles, with other like commodities; and Spices also are sold at an high rate: but of all other commodities, Salt is most extremely deare. The residue of this Kingdome containeth nought but Villages and Hamlets inhabited by Husbandmen and Shepherds, who in Winter couer their bodies with beasts skins; but in Summer they goe all naked saue their priue members: and sometimes, they weare vpon their feete certaine shooes made of Camels Leather. They are ignorant and rude people, and you shall scarce find one learned man in the space of an hundred miles. They are continually burthened with grieuous exactions, so that they haue scarce any thing remaining to liue vpon.
- Guber* standeth Eastward of the Kingdom of Gago almost three hundred miles; between which two Kingdomes lieth a vast Desart, being much destitute of water, for it is about forty miles distant from Niger. The Kingdom of Guber is enuironed with high Mountaines, and containeth many Villages inhabited by Shepherds, and other Heardsmen. Abundance of Cattell here are both great and small: but of a lower stature then the Cattell in other places. At the inundation of Niger all the fields of this Region are ouerflowed, and then the inhabitants cast their seed into the water onely. In this Region there is a certaine great Village containing almost sixe thousand Families, being inhabited with all kind of Merchants; and here was in times past the Court of a certaine King, who in my time was slaine by Izchia the King of Tombuto, and his sonnes were gale, and accounted among the number of the Kings Eunuchs.
- He which pleaseth the inhabitants of the Desart best, is sure to be King of Agadez. The residue of this Kingdome lying Southward is inhabited by Shepherds and Heardsmen, who dwell in certaine Cottages made of boughes, which cottages they carrie about vpon Oxen from place to place. They erect their Cottages alwaies in the same field where they determine to feede their cattell; like as the Arabians also doe.
- The great Prouince of Cano standeth Eastward of the Riuer Niger almost fve hundred miles. The greatest part of the inhabitants dwelling in Villages are some of them Heardsmen, and others Husbandmen. Here groweth abundance of Corne, of Rice, and of Cotton. Also here are many Desarts and wild woodie Mountaines containing many Springs of water. In these Woods grow plenty of wild Citrons and Lemons, which differ not much in taste from the best of all. In the midst of this Prouince standeth a Towne called by the same name, the walles and houses whereof are built for the most part of a kind of Chalke. The inhabitants are rich Merchants, and most ciuill people. Their King was in times past of great puissance, and had mighty troopes of Horsemen at his command; but he hath since been constrained to pay tribute vnto the Kings of Zegzeg and Casena. Afterward, Ischia the King of Tombuto faining friendship vnto the two foresaid Kings treacherously slew them both. And then hee waged warre against the King of Cano, whom after a long sledge he took, and compelled him to marrie one of his daughters, restoring him againe to his Kingdome, conditionally that he should pay vnto him the third part of all his tribute: and the said King of Tombuto hath some of his Courtiers perpetually residing at Cano for the receipt thereof.
- Casena* bordering Eastward vpon the Kingdome last described, is full of Mountaines, and drie fields, which yeeld notwithstanding great store of Barlie and Mill-seed. The inhabitants are all extremely blacke, hauing great noses and blabber lips. They dwell in most forlorne and base Cottages: neither shall you find any of their Villages containing aboue three hundred Families. And besides, their base estate they are mightily oppressed with famine: a King they had in times past whom the foresaid Izchia slew, since whose death they haue all beene tributarie vnto Izchia.

The South-east part of Zegzeg bordereth vpon Cano, and it is distant from Casena almost an hundred and fiftie miles. The inhabitants are rich, and haue great traffique vnto other Nations. Some part of this Kingdome is plaine, and the residue Mountainous, but the Mountaines are extremely colde, and the Plaines intollerably hot. And because they can hardly indure the sharpnesse of Winter, they kindle great fires in the midst of their houses, laying the coles thereof vnder their high bedsteads, and so betaking themselues to sleepe. Their fields abounding with water, are exceeding fruitfull, and their houses are built like the houses of the Kingdome of Casena. They had a King of their owne in times past, who being slaine by Izchia (as is aforesaid) they haue euer since beene subiect vnto the said Izchia.

Izchia.

The Region of Zanfara bordering Eastward vpon Zegzeg, is inhabited by most base and Rusticall people. Their fields abound with Rice, Mill, and Cotton. The Inhabitants are tall in stature and extremely blacke, their visages are broad, and their dispositions most saluage and brutish. Their King also was slaine by Izchia, and themselues made tributarie.

These Kingdomes of Guangara adioyneth South-easterly vpon Zanfara. Southward thereof lyeth a Region greatly abounding with gold. But now they can haue no traffique with foreign Nations, for they are molested on both sides with most cruell enemies. For Westward they are opposed by Izchia, and Eastward, by the King of Borno. When I my selfe was in Borno, King Abraham hauing leuied an huge Armie, determined to expell the Prince of Guangara out of his Kingdome, had hee not been hindred by Homar the Prince of Gaoga, which beganne to assaile the Kingdome of Borno. Wherefore the King of Borno being drawne home into his owne Countrey, was enforced to giue ouer the conquest of Guangara. So often as the Merchants of Guangara trauell into the foresaid Region abounding with gold, because the wayes are so rough and difficult that their Camels cannot goe vpon them, they carry their wares vpon slaues backs; who being laden with great burthens, doe vsually trauell ten or twelue miles a day. Yea, some I saw that made two of those iournies in one day: a wonder it is to see what heauy burthens these poore slaues are charged withall; for besides the Merchandize, they carry victuals also for their Masters, and for the Souldiers that goe to guard them.

The Kingdom of Borno.

Where no religious set Ceremonies are, men are said to haue no religion: yet vpon better notice of such parts, alway an obseruation of, and communication with the Deuil is found, where men acknowledge no God, as in Brasil, &c.

Also Sauages are said to haue no religion, hauing no Temples, &c. The Desart of Sen.

The Kingdom
of Gaoga.

The large Prouince of Borno, bordering Westward vpon the Prouince of Guangara, and from thence extending Eastward fise hundred miles, is distant from the Fountaine of Niger almost an hundred and fiftie miles, the South part whereof adioyning vnto the Desart of Set, and the North part vnto that Desart which lyeth towards Barca. The Inhabitants, in Summer goe all naked saue their priue members which they couer with a peece of leather: but all Winter they are clad in skinnies, and haue beds of skinnies also. They embrace no Religion at all, being neither Christians, Mahumetans, nor Iewes, nor of any other Profession, but liuing after a brutish manner, and hauing wiues and children in common: and (as I vnderstood of a certaine Merchant that abode a long time among them) they haue no proper names at all, but euery one is nicknamed according to his length, his fatnesse, or some other qualitie. They haue a most puissant Prince, being lineally descended from the Libyan people called Bardoa. He is at perpetuall enmitie with a certaine people inhabiting beyond the Desart of Sen; who in times past, marching with an huge army of footemen ouer the said Desart, wasted a great part of the Kingdome of Borno. Whereupon the King of Borno sent for the Merchants of Barbarie, and willed them to bring him great store of Horses: for in this Countrey they vse to exchange Horses for slaues, and to giue fifteene, and sometimes twenty slaues for one horse. And by this meanes there were abundance of horses brought: howbeit, the Merchants were constrained to stay for their slaues till the King returned home conquerour with a great number of Captiues, and satisfied his creditors for their Horses. The King seemeth to be marvellous rich; for his Spurres, his bridles, platters, dishes, pots, and other vessels wherein his meate and drinke are brought to the table, are all of pure gold: yea, and the chaines of his Dogs and Houndes are of gold also. Howbeit, this King is extremely couetous, for he had much rather pay his debts in slaues then in gold.

Gaoga bordering Westward vpon the Kingdome of Borno, and extending Eastward to the Confinies of Nubia, adioyneth Southward vnto a certaine Desart, situate vpon a crooked and winding part of Nilus, and is enclosed Northward with the frontiers of Egypt. It stretcheth from East to West, in length fise hundred miles, and as much in breadth. They haue neither humanitie nor learning among them, but are most rusticall and sauage people, and especially those that inhabite the Mountaines, who goe all naked sauing their priuities: Their houses are made of boughes and rafts, and are much subiect to burning, and they haue great abundance of Cattell, whereunto they giue diligent attendance. This Prince greatly honoreth all learned men, and especially such as are of the lineage of Mahumet. I my selfe being in his Court, a certaine Noble-man of Damiata brought him very rich and royall gifts; as namely, a gallant Horse, a Turkish Sword, and a Kingly robe, with certaine other particulars, that cost about an hundred and fiftie Duckats at Carro: in recompence whereof, the King gaue him fise slaues, fise Camels,

five hundred Ducats of that Region, and an hundred Elephants teeth of wonderfull bignesse. Nubia bordering Westward vpon the Kingdome last described, and stretching from thence vnto Nilus, is enclosed on the South-side with the Desart of Goran, and on the North-side with the Confinnes of Egypt. Howbeit they cannot passe by water from this Kingdome into Egypt: for the Riuer of Nilus is in some places no deeper then a man may wade ouer on foot. The principall Towne of this Kingdome called Dangala, is exceeding populous, and contayneth to the number of ten thousand Families. The Kingdome of Nubia is most rich in Corne and Sugar, which notwithstanding they know not how to vse. Also in the Citie of Dangala there is great plentie of Ciuet and Sandal-wood. This Region aboundeth with Iuory likewise, because heere are so many Elephants taken. Heere is also a most strong and deadly poyson, one graine whereof being diuided amongst ten persons, will kill them all within lesse then a quarter of an houre: but if one man taketh a grain, he dyeth thereof out of hand. An ounce of this Poyson is sold for an hundred Duckats; neyther may it be sold to any but to forraine Merchants, and whosoever buyeth it is bound by an Oath not to vse it in the Kingdome of Nubia. All such as buy of this Poyson are constrayned to pay as much vnto the King, as to the Merchant: but if any man selleth Poyson without the Princes knowledge, he is presently put to death. The people themselves are called Bugiha, and are most base and miserable, and liue onely vpon Milke, Camels flesh, and the flesh of such beasts as are taken in those Desarts. Some times they receiue Tribute of the Gouvernour of Suachen, and sometimes of the Gouvernours of Dangala. They had once a rich Towne situate vpon the Red Sea called Zibid, whereunto belonged a commodious Hauen, being opposite vnto the Hauen of Zidem, which is fortie miles distant from Mecca. But an hundred yeares since it was destroyed by the Soldan, because the Inhabitants receiued certaine Wares which should haue beene carried to Mecca, and at the sametime the famous Port of Zibid was destroyed, from whence notwithstanding was gathered a great yeerely Tribute.

He most noble and famous Prouince of Egypt bordering Westward vpon the Desarts of Barca, Numidia, and Libya; Eastward vpon the Desarts lying betweene Egypt it selfe and the Red Sea; and Northward vpon the Mediterran Sea; is inclosed Southward with the Land of the foresaid people called Bugha, and with the Riuer of Nilus. It stretcheth in length from the Mediterran Sea to the Land of the people called Bugha, about foure hundred and fiftie miles: but in breadth it is very narrow; so that it containeth nought but a small distance betweene both the bankes of Nilus, and the barren Mountaynes bordering vpon the foresaid Desarts, being inhabited onely in that place where Nilus is separate from the said Mountaynes: albeit, towards the Mediterran Sea it extendeth it selfe somewhat broader. For Nilus about fourescore miles from the great Citie of Cairo is diuided into two branches, one whereof running in his Chanell Westward, returneth at length into the mayne streame from whence hee tooke his originall, and hauing passed about threecore miles beyond Cairo, it diuideth it selfe into two other branches, whereof the one runneth to Damiata, and the other to Rosetto. And out of that which trendeth to Damiata issueth another branch, which discharging it selfe into a Lake, passeth through a certaine gullet or strait into the Mediterran Sea, vpon the banke whereof standeth the most ancient Citie of Tenesse: and this diuision of Nilus into so many streames and branches causeth Egypt (as I haue before said) to bee so narrow. All this Prouince is plaine, and is most fruitfull for all kind of Graine and Pulse. There are most pleasant and greene Medowes, and great store of Geese and other Fowles. The Countrey people are of a swart and browne colour: but the Citizens are white. Garments they weare which are strait downe to their waistes, and broad beneath, and the sleeues likewise are strait. They couer their heads with a round and high habit, called by the Italians a Dulipan. Their shooes are made according to the ancient fashion. In Summer they weare Garments of parti-coloured Cotton: but in Winter they vse a certayne Garment lined with Cotton, which they call Chebre: but the chiefe Citizens and Merchants are apparelled in cloth of Europe. The Inhabitants are of an honest, cheerefull, and liberall disposition. For their victuals they vse a kind of new and extreme salt Cheeses, and sowre Milke also artificially congealed: which fare albeit they account very daintie, yet cannot strangers digest it, and into euery Dish almost they put sowre Milke.

Since the Mahumetans were Lords of Egypt, it hath bene diuided into three parts. For the Region from Cairo to Rosetto is called the shoare of Errif: and from Cairo to the Land of Bugha, it is called Sahid, that is to say, The firme Land: but the Region adioyning vpon that branch of Nilus, which runneth towards Damiata and Tenesse, they call by the name of Bechria or Maremma. All Egypt is exceeding fertile: but the Prouince of Sahid excelleth the two other parts for abundance of Corne, Cattle, Fowles and Flaxe: and Maremma aboundeth with Cotton and Sugar. Howbeit, the Inhabitants of Maremma, and Errif are farre more ciuill then the people of Sahid: because those two Prouinces lye neerer vnto the Sea, and are more frequented by European, Barbarian, and Assyrian Merchants: but the people of Sahid haue no conuersation with strangers, except it be with a few Ethiopians.

The Egyptians (as Moses writeth) fetch their originall from * Mesraim the Sonne of Chus, the Sonne of Cham, the Sonne of Noe; and the Hebrewes call both the Countrey and the Inhabitants of Egypt by the name of Mesraim. The Arabians call Egypt it selfe Mesre, but the Inhabitants Chibith. And Chibith (they say) was the man, that first tooke vpon him the Gouvernement of this Region, and beganne first to build houses thereon. Also the Inhabitants call themselves by the same name: neither are there left any true Egyptians, besides a few Christians, which are at this present remayning. The residue embracing the Mahumetan Religion, haue mingled themselves amongst the Arabians and the Moores. This Kingdome was gouerned many yeares by the Egyptians themselves, as namely, by the Kings that were called Pharao, (who by their Monuments and admirable Buildings, seeme to haue bene mightie Princes) and also by the Kings called Ptolomei. Afterward, being subdued vnto the Romane Empire, this Kingdome since the comming of Christ was conuerred vnto the Christian Religion, vnder the said Romane Government: since the decay of which Empire, it fell into the possession of the Emperours of Constantinople; who being very carefull to maintayne this Kingdome, were at length depriued thereof by the Mahumetans, vnder the conduct of Hamrus the Sonne of Hasi, being appointed Captaine Generall ouer the Arabian Armie of Homar, the second Califa or Mahumetan Patriarke of that name: who permitting all men to haue their owne Religion, required nought but Tribute at their hands. The said Captaine built vpon the banke of Nilus, a certaine Towne called by the Arabians Fustato, which word signifieth in their Language a Tabernacle: for when he first vndertooke this Expedition, he marched through wild and desart places void of Inhabitants, so that his Armie was constrained to lye in Tents. The common people call this Towne Mesre Hatichi, that is to say, the ancient Citie; in comparison of which Cairo may not vnfittly be called the New Citie.

Neither Cairo nor any place neere vnto it, can by any likelihood challenge that they were at any time inhabited by the ancient Pharaos. But heere it is to be noted, that the Nobilitie of the ancient

ancient Egyptians dwelt in times past in the Region of Sabid beyond Cairo, in the Cities of Fium, of Manfichmin, and in other such famous Cities. Howbeit, after Egypt was conquered by the Romanes, the Egyptian Nobilitie planted themselves in the Region of Errif, vpon the Sea shoare thereof, namely, about the Cities of Alexandria, Rosetto, and other famous Townes retayning as yet the Latine names. Also when the Romane Empire was translated into Greece, the said Nobilitie still inhabited vpon the Sea shoare, the Emperours Lieutenant residing at Alexandria: but after the Mahumetans got the Dominion of Egypt, the foresaid Nobilitie retyned themselves into the in-land, hoping thereby to reape a double commoditie: namely, first, in that they might bee a meanes to pacifie the Kingdome on both sides of them; and secondly, that they might bee free from the inuasions of the Christians, whereof they should haue beene in danger, had they remayned any longer vpon the Sea Coast.

The Ayre of this Countrey is hot and vnwholesome: and it rayneth heere very seldome or neuer. And Raine is the cause of many Diseases in Egypt: for in raynie weather some of the Egyptians are subiect vnto dangerous Rheumes, and Feuers; and others vnto a strange kinde of swelling in ther priuy Members: which swelling the Physicians impute vnto Salt Cheese and Beefe, which are the common Dyet of the Egyptians. In Sommer time this Countrey is most extremely hot, for a remedie of which heat they build in euery Towne certaine high Towres, hauing one doore aloft, another beneath, right ouer against the houses, through the tops whereof the wind passing down-ward, doth somewhat coole and refresh the Ayre: otherwise in regard of the intolerable heat of the Sunne it were impossible for any man to liue there. Sometime the Pestilence is so hot among them, especially at Cairo, that sometimes there dye twelue thousand persons thereof on a day. But with the French Poxe, I thinke, that no other Countrey vnder Heauen is so molested, nor that contayneth so many people infected therewith. About the beginning of Aprill, they reape their Corne, and hauing reaped it, they presently thrash the same; neyther shall you see one eate of their Corne standing till the twentieth of May.

The inundation or overflow of Nilus beginneth about the middest of Iune, increasing afterward for the space of fortie dayes, and for the space of other fortie dayes also decreasing: during which time all the Cities and Townes of Egypt are like vnto Ilands, which none can come vnto but by Boats and Barges. At this time also Nilus is very fit to be sailed vpon with vessels of burthen; some whereof are so bigge that they will contayne fixe or seuen thousand bushels of Corne: and some hundreds of Cattell together: and in these Vessels they sayle onely downe the streame: for against the streame or without the ouer-flowing time they would scarcely passe emptie. The Egyptians according to the increase of Nilus, doe foresee the plentie or dearth of the yeere following: as wee will more at large declare, when wee come to speake of the Iland of Nilus ouer against the olde Citie, where the inundation of Nilus is measured. Neither is it our purpose in this place particularly to describe all the Cities of Egypt, because our African Writers are of diuers opinions thereabout; for some would haue Egypt to bee a part of Africa, but others are of a contray minde. Diuers there are that affirme, that part of Egypt adioyning vpon the Desarts of Barbarie, Numidia and Libya, to belong vnto Africa. Some others ascribe vnto Africa all those places that border vpon the principall and mayne Channell of Nilus: but as for other places, as namely, Manf, Fium, Semenud, Damanhore, Berelles, Tenesse, and Damiata, they thinke them not to be situate in Africa: which opinion, I my selfe, also vpon many and great reasons take to be true. Wherefore my purpose is to describe none other Cities but such as stand neere the mayne and principall Channell of Nilus.

The ancient Citie of Bosiri built by the Egyptians vpon the Mediterran Sea, and standing twentie miles Westward from Alexandria, was in times past enuironed with most strong wals, and adorned with most beautifull and stately Buildings. At this present, it is compassed with many possessions or grounds bearing Dates, whereof no man taketh charge nor reapeeth any commoditie: for when Alexandria was wonne by the Christians, the Inhabitants abandoned this Citie, and fled towards the Lake called Buchaira.

The great Citie of Alexandria in Egypt, founded by Alexander the Great, not without the aduise of most famous and skilfull Architects, vpon a beautifull point of Land stretching into the Mediterran Sea, and being distant fortie miles Westward of Nilus, was in times past, till it grew subiect vnto the Mahumetans, most sumptuously and strongly built, as diuers and sundry Authors beare record. Afterward this Citie decaying, many yeares together, was depriued of the ancient renowne and honour, and remayned in manner desolate, because no Merchants of Greece nor of any other part of Europe exercised any longer Traffique therein. Howbeit, a certaine craftie Mahumetan Patriarke made the rude people beleue, that by the Prophecie of Mahumet, most ample Indulgences were granted vnto all such as would inhabit the Citie or guard it for certaine dayes, and would bestow some Almes for a publike benefit: by which wily stratageme the Citie was in short time filled with forraine people, which from all places resorted thereunto: by whom were built many houses neere vnto the Citie wals, and many Colledges of Students, and diuers Monasteries for the reliefe of Pilgrims.

The Citie it selfe is foure square, and hath foure Gates to enter in at: one standing on the East side towards Nilus, another on the South side towards the Lake of Buchaira, the third Westward towards the Desert of Barca, and the fourth towards the Mediterranean Sea and the Hauen; whereat stand the Searchers and Customers, which ranfacke strangers euen to their very shirts: for they demand custome, not onely for wares and Merchandize, but also some allowance in the hundred for all kinde of money. Neere vnto this Citie-walles there are two other Gates also, being diuided asunder by a faire walke, and a most impregnable Castle, which standeth vpon the Scrand or Wharfe of the Port, commonly called Marfa el Bargi, that is to say, the Port of the Castle: in which Port ride the principall and best ships, namely, such as come from Venice, Genoa, Ragusa, with other Ships of Europe. For hither resort the English, the Low Dutch, the Biscaines, the Portugals, and men of all other Nations in Europe for traffique sake. Howbeit, this Port is most vially frequented by the Ships of Appulia, Sicilia, and of Greece, which are Turkish Ships; all which resort into this Harbour to saue themselves from Pyrats, and from tempestuous weather. Another Port there is also, called Marfa Essil Sela, that is to say, the Port of the Chaine, wherein the Ships of Barbary, namely, those of Tunis and of the Ile of Gergi harbour themselves. The Christians are constrained to pay about the tenth part of all wares that they bring in and carry out, but the Mahumetans pay but the twentieth part: and whatsoever wares are carried by land to Cairo pay no custom at all. And at this present that part of the Citie which is next vnto Cairo, is the most famous and best furnished with Merchandize brought by Merchants from all places of the world. The other parts of this Citie are destitute both of Ciuility and Inhabitants: for except one long street, and that part of the Citie next the Hauen which is full of Merchants shops, and inhabited by Christians, the residue is void and desolate. Which desolation happened at that time, when Lewis the fourth, King of France, being restored to liberty by the Soldan, the King of Cyprus with a fleet, partly of Venetians, and partly of French-men suddenly assailed Alexandria, and with great slaughter surprized and sacked the same. But the Soldan comming with an huge armie to rescue Alexandria, so discouraged the Cyprians, that they burnt downe the houses thereof, and betooke themselves to flight. Whereupon the Soldan repairing the walles, and building a Castle neere vnto the Hauen, the Citie grew by little and little into that estate, wherein it standeth at this present.

In the Citie of Alexandria there is a certaine high Mount, fashioned like vnto the place called Testaccio at Rome, whereon, although it hath no naturall situation, are found diuers earthen Vessels of great antiquity. Vpon the top of the said Mount standeth a Turret, where a certaine officer is appointed to watch for such Ships as direct their course towards the Citie, who for every ship that he giueth notice of vnto the Customers, receiueth a certain fee: but if he chanceth to fall asleepe, or to be out of the way at the arriual of any Ship, whereof he certifieth not the Customers, he paieth double for his negligence into the Soldans Exchequer. Vnder each house of this Citie there is a great vaulted Cisterne built vpon mighty Pillars and Arches: whereinto the water of Nilus at euery inundation is conueied vnder the walles of the Citie, by a certaine wonderfull and most artificiall sluice standing without the Citie it selfe. But these Cisternes growing sometime corrupt and foule, are often in Summer the occasion of many diseases and infirmities. This Citie standeth in the midst of a sandy Desert, and is destitute of Gardens and Vines, neither is the soile round about it apt to beare Corne; so that their Corne is brought them from places forty miles distant. Howbeit, neere the foresaid sluice, whereby the water of Nilus is conueied into the Citie, are certaine little Gardens, the fruits whereof being grown to ripenesse, are so vnwholesome, that they breed Feuers and other noysome diseases among the Citizens. Sixe miles Westward of Alexandria, among certaine ancient buildings, standeth a pillar of a wonderfull height and thicknesse, which the Arabians call Hemadussaoar, that is to say, the pillar of trees. Of this pillar there is a Fable reported, that Ptolemey one of the Kings of Alexandria built it vpon an extreme point of land stretching from the Hauen, whereby to the end he might defend the Citie from the inuasion of forraine enemies, and make it inuincible, he placed a certaine Steele-glasse vpon the top thereof, by the hidden vertue of which glasse, as many Ships as passed by while the glasse was vncovered should immediately be set on fire: but the said glasse being broken by the Mahumetans, the secret vertue thereof vanished, and the great pillar whereon it stood was remooued out of the place. But this is a most ridiculous narration, and fit for babes to giue credite vnto: at this present there are amongst the ancient Inhabitants of Alexandria many Christians called Iacobites, being all of shem Artizans and Merchants: these Iacobites haue a Church of their owne to resort vnto, wherein the body of S. Marke the Euangelist lay in times past interred, which hath since beene priuily stolne by the Venetians, and carried vnto Venice. And the said Iacobites pay Tribute vnto the Gouvernour of Cairo. Neither is it to be passed ouer in silence, that in the midst of the ruinous Monuments of Alexandria, there remaineth as yet a certaine little house built in forme of a Chappell, and containing a Sepulchre much honoured by the Mahumetans, wherein they affirme, out of the authoritie of their Alcoron, that the body of the High Prophet and King (as they terme him) Alexander the great lieth buried. And thither resort yeerely great multitudes of Pilgrimes from forraine Nations, to adore and reuerence the said Sepulchre, and oftentimes do bestow large Almes thereupon.

The Citie of Rosetta was built by a slaue of a certaine Mahumetan Patriarke and Gouvernour of Egypt, vpon the Easterne banke of Nilus three miles from the Mediterran Sea, not far from the place where Nilus dischargeth his streames into the said Sea. Heere is a stately Bath-stoue also, hauing fountaines both of cold and hot water belonging thereunto, the like whereof for stately and commodious building is not to be found in all Egypt besides. I my selfe was in this Citie when Selim the great Turke returned this way from Alexandria, who with his priuate and familiar friends beholding the said Bath-stoue, seemed to take great delight and contentment therein.

The Citie of Rasid called by the Italians Rosetta. John Leo was at Rasid the same time when Selim the great Turke passed that way. Thebe.

Thebe, at this present, containeth but three hundred Families in all, being most of them very stately and sumptuously built. It aboundeth with Corne, Rice, and Sugar, and with certaine fruits of a most excellent taste, called Muse. It is also furnished with great store of Merchants and Artificers: but the most part of the Inhabitants are husbandmen: and if a man walke the streets in the day-time, he shall see none but trim and beautifull women. The Territorie adiacent aboundeth with Date-trees, which grow so thicke, that a man cannot see the Citie, till he approacheth nigh vnto the walles. Here grow likewise store of Grapes, Figs, and Peaches, which are carried in great plentie vnto Cairo. Without the Citie there are many ancient Monuments, as namely, pillars, inscriptions in Latine, Greeke, and Egyptian Characters, and wals of a great thicknesse, built of excellent stone, and such a number of ruinous places, that this Citie seemeth, in times past, to haue beene very large.

The fruits called Muse.

The women of Fuoa, fortie miles South from Rosetta, liue in so great libertie, that they may goe whither they will at the day-time, returning home at night, without any controlement of their husbands. The fields adiacent abound greatly with Dates, and neere vnto them there is a certaine Plaine which is very apt for Sugar and Corne: howbeit, the Sugar Canes there bring not forth perfect Sugar, but in stead thereof a certaine kinde of Honie like sope, which they vse throughout all Egypt, becaule there is but little other Honie in the whole Countrey.

Ouer against the foresaid Citie the Riuer of Nilus maketh an Ile, which being situate on an high place, bringeth forth all kinde of fruitfull trees except Oliues.

Gezirat Eddelheb, that is to say, the golden Ile.

They haue a most beautifull Temple at Deretto, and the Citizens are exceeding rich for their ground yeeldeth such abundance of Sugar, that they pay yeerely vnto the Soldan an hundred thousand peeces of Gold, called in their language Saraffi, for their libertie of making and refining thereof. In this Citie standeth a certaine great house like vnto a Castle, wherein are their Presses and Caldrons, for the boyling and preparing of their Sugar. Neither did I euer in all my life see so many workemen employed about that businesse, whose daily wages (as I vnderstood by a certaine publike officer) amounted to two hundred Saraffi.

Cairo is commonly reputed to be one of the greatest and most famous cities in all the whole world. But leauing the common reports and opinions thereof, I will exactly describe the forme and estate wherein it now standeth. And that I may begin with the Etymologie or deriuation of the name, Cairo is an Arabian word, corruptly pronounced by the people of Europe: for the true Arabian word is El Chahira, which signifieth an inforcing or imperious Mistresse. This City built in ancient times by one Geboar Chetib a Dalmatian slaue (as I haue before signified in the beginning of my Discourse) containeth within the walles not aboue eight thousand Families, being inhabited by Noblemen, Gentlemen, and Merchants that sell wares brought from all other places. The famous Temple of Cairo, commonly called, Gemih Hashare, that is to say, the glorious Temple, was built also by the foresaid slaue, whom we affirmed to be the Founder of the City, and whose surname was Hashare, that is to say, Famous, being giuen him by the Mahumetan Patriarke that was his Prince. This Citie standeth vpon a most beautifull Plaine, neere vnto a certaine Mountaine called Mucatum, about two miles distant from Nilus, and is enuironed with stately walles, and fortified with Iron-gates: the principall of which gates is called Babe Nansre, that is, the gate of Victory, which standeth Eastward towards the Desart of the Red Sea; and the gate called Beb Zuaila, being next vnto the old Citie and to Nilus; and also Bebel Futub, that is to say, the gate of Triumph, standing towards the lake and the fields.

A Description of the huge & admirable Citie of Cairo. * 1526.

The Founder.

The Temple.

And albeit, Cairo aboundeth euery where with all kind of Merchants and Artificers, yet that is the principall street of the whole Citie which stretcheth from the gate of Nansre, to the gate of Zuaila, for in it are built most stately and admirable Palaces and Colledges, and most sumptuous Temples, among which is the Temple of Gimih Elhechim, the third Schismaticall Califa of Cairo. Other Temples there are of a maruellous bignes, which to describe in particular. I thinke it superfluous. Heere are many Bath-stoues also very artificially built. Next of all is the street called Beinel Casrain, containing to the number of threescore Cookes or Victuallers shops, furnished with vessels of Tinne: there are certaine other shops also, wherein are to be sold delicate waters or drinckes made of all kinds of fruits, being for Noblemen to drinke of, and these waters they keepe most charily in fine vessels, partly of glasse, and partly of Tinne: next vnto these are shops where diuers confections of Honie and Sugar, vnlike vnto the confections of Europe, are to be sold: then follow the Fruiterers shops, who bring out-landish fruits out of Syria, to wit, Delicate drinckes made all kind of fruits.

Quinces,

Soldan Ghanri.

Quinces, Pomegranates, and other fruits which grow not in Egypt: next vnto them are the shops of such as sell Egges, Cheefe, and Pancakes fried with Oyle. And next of all there is a streete of the principall Artificers Shops. Beyond which streete standeth a Colledge built by the Soldan, called Ghanri, who was slaine in a battaile against Selim the great Turke. And next vnto the Colledge are diuers rankes of Drapers Shops. In the first ranke there is most excellent outlandish Linnen Cloth to be sold, as namely, fine Cloth of Cotten brought from Balabach, and Cloth called Mosall, that is, of Ninon, of a marvellous breadth and finenesse, whereof Noblemen and others of account, haue Shirts made them, and Scarffes to weare vpon their Dulipans. Besides these, there are certaine Mercers Shops where the rich Stuffles of Italy, namely, Silke, Damaske, Veluet, Cloth of Gold, and such like are to be bought, vnto which Stuffles I neuer saw any comparable (to my remembrance) in Italy, where they vse to be made. Next vnto the Mercers are the Woollen Drapers, which bring Cloth out of Europe, as namely, from Florence, Venice, Flanders, and other places. Next of all there are Chamblets to be sold: and from thence the way lieth to the Gate of Zuaila, at which Gate dwell great store of Artificers. Neere vnto the said way standeth the famous Burse, called Canen Halili, wherein the Persian Merchants dwell. It is built very stately in manner of a Kings Palace, and is of three stories high: beneath it are certaine conuenient roomes, whither Merchants for the exchange of rich and costly Wares doe resort: for here doe the principal and most wealthie Merchants abide, whose Wares are Spices, precious Stones, Cloth of India, & such like. Next vnto the Burse standeth a street of Shops, where all kind of Perfumes, namely, Ciuet, Muske, Amber, and such like are to be sold: which commodities are here in so great plenty, that if you ask for twenty pounds of Musk, they wil presently shew you an hundred. Next followeth the street of the Paper-Merchants, where you may buy most excellent and smooth Paper: here also are to be sold lewels and precious Stones of great value, which the Brokers carrie from one Shop to another. Then come you to the Gold-Smiths streete, being inhabited for the most part by Jewes, who deale for riches of great importance. And next vnto the Gold-Smithes are certaine streetes of Vpholsters or Brokers, who sell the apparell and rich furniture of Noblemen and other Citizens at the second hand, which are dot Cloakes, Coates, Napery, or such like, but things of exceeding price and value: amongst which I my selfe once saw a beautifull Pavilion embroydered with Needle-worke, and beset with Pearles that weighed fortie pounds, which Pearles being taken out of it, were sold for ten thousand Saraffi. In this Citie also there is a most stately Hospitall built by Piperis the first Soldan of the Mamaluks race: the yearely reuenues whereof amount vnto two hundred thousand Saraffi. Hither may any impotent or diseased persons resort, and bee well prouided of Physicians, and of all things necessarie for those that are sicke, who if they chance to die here, all their goods are due vnto the Hospitall.

A stately Hospitall.

The Suburbs.

The Suburbe, called Bed Zuaila, belonging vnto Cairo, and containing about twelue thousand Families, beginneth at the Gate of Zuaila, and extendeth Westward almost a mile and a halfe; Southward it bordereth vpon the Palace of the Soldan, and stretcheth Northward for the space of a mile vnto the Suburbe, called Beb Elloch. Here dwell as many Noblemen and Gentlemen almost, as within the Citie it selfe: and the Citizens haue Shops both here and in the Citie, as likewise many Inhabitants of this Suburbe maintaine Families in the Citie also. Amongst all the buildings of this Suburbe, the principall is that stately Colledge built by Soldan Hesen, being of such a wonderfull height and great strength, that oftentimes the Colledges haue presumed to rebell against the Soldan, and therein to fortifie themselves against the whole Citie, and to discharge Ordnance against the Soldans Castle, which is but halfe a Crosse-bow shot distant.

A stately Colledge.

Palace and Temple.

The Suburbe called Gemeh Tailon, confining Eastward vpon the foresaid Suburbe of Beb Zuaila, extendeth Westward to certaine ruinous places neere vnto the old Citie. Before the foundation of Cairo this Suburbe was erected by one Tailon, who was subiect vnto the Califa of Bagdet, and Gouvernour of Egypt, and was a most famous and prudent man. This Tailon leauing the old Citie, inhabited this Suburbe, and adorned the same with a most admirable Palace, and sumptuous Temple. Here dwell also great store of Merchants and Artificers, especially such as are Moores of Barbary.

Palace and Colledge.

The Suburbe, called Beb Elloch, being distant from the Wallles of Cairo about the space of a mile, and containing almost three thousand Families, is inhabited by Merchants and Artizans of diuers sorts, as well as the former. Vpon a certaine large place of this Suburbe standeth a great Palace, and a stately Colledge, built by a certaine Mammaluck, called Iazbach, being Counsellor vnto the Soldan of those times; and the place it selfe is called after his name, Iazbachia. Hither, after Mahumetan Sermons & deuotions, the common people of Cairo, together with the Bawds and Harlots, doe vsually resort; and many Stage-Players also, and such as teach Camels, Asies, and Dogs, to dance; which dancing is a thing very delightfull to behold, and especially that of the Asse: who hauing frisked and danced a while, his Master comes vnto him, and tells him with a loud voyce, That the Soldan being about to build some great Palace, must vse all the Asies of Cairo to carry Morter, Stones, and other necessary prouision. Then the Asse falling presently to the ground, and lying with his heeles vpward, maketh his belly to swell, and closeth his eyes as if

if he were starke dead. In the meane while his Master lamenting the misfortune of the Asse vnto the standersby, earnestly craueth their friendly assistance and liberalitie to buy him a new Asse. And hauing gathered of each one as much money as hee can get; You are much deceiued my Masters (quoth he) that thinke mine Asse to be dead: for the hungry Iade knowing his Masters necessity, hath wrought this sleight, to the end hee might get some money to buy him Prouender. Then turning about to the Asse, hee commandeth him with all speed to arise: but the Asse lyeth starke still, though hee command and beate him neuer so much: whereupon, turning againe to the people; Bee it knowne (quoth hee) vnto you all, that the Soldan hath published an Edict or Proclamation, that to morrow next all the people shall goe forth of the Citie to behold a Triumph, and that all the honourable and beautifull Ladies and Gentlewomen shall ride vpon the most comely Asses, and shall giue them Oates to eate, and Christall water of Nilus to drinke. Which words being scarce ended, the Asse suddenly starteth from the ground, prancing and leaping for ioy: then his Master prosecuting still his narration; But (saith he) the Warden of our streete hath borrowed this goodly Asse of mine for his deformed and old Wife to ride vpon. At these words the Asse, as though he were indued with humane reason, coucheth his eares, and limpeth with one of his legges, as if it were quite out of ioynt. Then saith his Master; What, sir Iade, are you so in loue with faire women? The Asse nodding his head seemeth to say, yea. Come on therefore Sirra (quoth his Master) and let vs see among all these pretty Damosels, which pleaseth your fancie best. Whereupon the Asse going about the company, and espying some woman more comely and beautifull then the rest, walketh directly vnto her and toucheth her with his head: and then the beholders laugh and crie out amaine: Loe, the Asses Paramour, the Paramour of the Asse. Whereupon, the fellow that shewed all this sport leaping vpon the backe of his Asse rideth to some other place. There is also another kind of Charmers or Iuglers, which keep certaine little Birds in Cages made after the fashion of Cupboords, which birds will reach vnto any man with their Beaks certaine skroules, containing either his good or euill successe in time to come. And whosoever desireth to know his fortune, must giue the Bird an half-penny; which shee taking in her bill, carrieth into a little Boxe, and then comming forth againe, bringeth the said skroule in her beake. I my selfe had once a skroule of ill fortune giuen me, which although I little regarded, yet had I more vnfortunate successe then was contained therein. Also, there are Masters of defence playing at all kind of weapons, and other that sing Songs of the Battels fought betweene the Arabians and Egyptians, when as the Arabians conquered Egypt, with diuers others that sing such Toyes and Ballads vnto the people.

South-saying Birds.

The Suburbe called Bulach, standing two miles distant from the Walles of the Citie vpon the banke of Nilus, containeth foure thousand Families. Vpon the way lying betweene the Suburbe and this Citie, stand diuers Houses, and Mills turned about by the strength of beasts. In this Suburbe dwell many Artificers and Merchants, especially such as sell Corne, Oyle and Sugar. Moreouer, it is full of stately Temples, Palaces, and Colledges: but the fairest buildings thereof stand along the Riuer of Nilus, for from thence there is a most beautifull prospect vpon the Riuer, and thither doe the Vessels and Barkes of Nilus resort vnto the common stathe of Cairo, being situate in this Suburbe: at which place you shall see at some times, and especially in the time of Haruest, aboue one thousand Barkes. And here the Officers appointed to receiue Custome for Wares, brought from Alexandria and Damiata haue their aboad: albeit, but little tribute be demanded for the said Wares, because it was paid before at the Port of their arriual: but those Wares that come out of the firme land of Egypt allow entire custome.

The Suburbe of Carafa built in manner of a Towne, and standing from Mount Muccatim a stones cast, and from the Walles of the Citie about two miles, containeth almost two thousand Households. But at this day the greatest part thereof lyeth waste and destroyed. Here are many Sepulchers built with high and stately Vaults and Arches, and adorned on the inner side with diuers Emblems and colours, which the fond people adore as the sacred Shrines and Monuments of Saints, spreading the pauement with sumptuous and rich Carpets. Hither euery Friday morning resort out of the Citie it selfe, and the Suburbs, great multitudes of people for deuotions sake, who bestow liberall and large almes.

The Suburbe called Charafa.

The Citie Misrabelich was the first that was built in Egypt in the time of the Mahumetans, founded by Hamre, Captaine Generall ouer the Forces of Homar, the second Mahumetan Patriarke vpon the banke of Nilus, resembling a Suburbe because it is vnwalled, and containing to the number of fise thousand Families. It is adorned, especially by the Riuer Nilus, with diuers Palaces and Houses of Noblemen, and also with the famous Temple of Hamre, being of an huge bignesse, and most stately built. It is also indifferently well provided of Tradesmen and Artificers. And here standeth the famous Sepulchre of a Woman, reputed most holy by the Mahumetans, and called by them Saint Nafissa, which was the daughter of one called Zennulbebidin, being the sonne of Husein, the sonne of Heli, who was Cousen-german vnto Mahumet. The said Nafissa seeing all of her Family to be depriued of the Mahumetan Patriarkship, left Cusa, a Citie of Arabia Felix, and came and dwelt in this Citie; vnto whom, partly because shee was of the Linage of Mahumet, and partly for that she liued an innocent and blamelesse life, the people after her death ascribed diuine honours, canonizing her for a Saint. Wherefore the Schismaticall Patriarcks of her Kindred hauing got the vpper hand in Egypt, began to build for Nafissa a most beautifull Shrine or Sepulchre, which they adorned also with Siluer Lamps, with Carpets of Silke, and such like precious ornaments. So great is the renowne of this Nafissa, that there commeth no Mahumetan either by Sea or Land vnto Cairo, but he adareth this Sepulchre, and bringeth his Offering thereunto, as likewise doe all the Mahumetans inhabiting thereabout: insomuch that the yearely Oblations and Almes offered at this Sepulchre, partly for the reliefe of the poore Kinsfolks of Mahumet, and partly for the maintenance of the Priests which keepe the said Sepulchre, amount vnto one hundred thousand Saraffi; which Priests by fained and counterfeit Miracles doe daily delude the minds of the simple, to the end they may the more enflame their blind deuotion, and may stirre them to greater liberalitie. When Selim the Great Turke wonne the Citie of Cairo, his Ianizaries rifling this Sepulchre, found there the summe of five hundred thousand Saraffi in ready money, besides the Siluer Lampes, the Chaines and Carpets: but Selim tooke away a great part of that treasure from them. Such as write the Liues of the Mahumetan Saints, making very honourable mention of this Nafissa, say, that she was descended of the noble Familie of Heli, and that she was most famous for her vertuous and chaste life: but the fond people and the Priest of that execrable Sepulchre, haue deuised many fained and superstitious Miracles. In this Suburbe also, neere vnto the Riuer of Nilus, is the Customers Office, for such wares as are brought out of the Prouince of Sabid. Without the walled Citie stand the Magnificent and stately Sepulchres of the Soldans, built with admirable and huge Arches. But in my time a certaine Soldan caused a Walke to be built betweene two high Walls, from the Gate of the Citie to the place of the aforesaid Sepulchres, and at the ends of both Walls caused two Turrets of an exceeding height to be erected, for Markes and Directions vnto such Merchants as came thither from the Port of Mount Sinai.

About a mile and an halfe from the said Sepulchres, in a certaine place called Amalthria, there is a Garden containing the onely Balme-tree, (for in the whole world besides there is not any other tree that beareth true Balme) which Balme-tree growing in the midst of a large Fountaine, and hauing a short Stocke or Body, beareth leaues like vnto Vine-leaues, but that they are not so long: and this Tree (they say) would vtterly wither and decay, if the water of the Fountaine should chance to be deminished. The Garden is enuironed with a strong Wall, whereinto no man may enter, without the speciall fauour and licence of the Gouvernour.

In the midst of Nilus, ouer against the old Citie, standeth the Ile called Michias, that is to say, The Ile of Measure; in which Ile (according to the Inundation of Nilus) they haue a kind of deuice, inuented by the ancient Egyptians, whereby they most certainly foresee the plentie or scarcitie of the yeare following throughout all the Land of Egypt. This Iland is well inhabited, and containeth about fiftene hundred Families; vpon the extreme point or ende whereof standeth a most beautiful Palace, built in my remembrance by a Soldan, & a large Temple also, which is very pleasant, in regard of the coole Streames of Nilus. Vpon another side of the Iland standeth an house alone by it selfe, in the midst whereof there is a fouresquare Cisterne or Chanell of eightene cubits deepe, whereinto the water of Nilus is conueyed by a certaine Sluce vnder the ground. And in the midst of the Cisterne there is erected a certaine Pillar, which is marked and diuided into so many cubits, as the Cisterne it selfe containeth in depth. And vpon the seauenteenth of Iune when Nilus beginneth to ouerflow, the water thereof conueyed by the said Sluce into the Chanell, increaseth daily, sometimes two, and sometimes three fingers, and sometimes halfe a cubit in height. Vnto this place there daily resort certaine Officers appointed by the Senate, who viewing and obseruing the increase of Nilus, declare vnto certaine Children how much it hath increased; which children wearing yellow Skarffes vpon their Heads, doe publish the said increase of Nilus in euery streete of the Citie and the Suburbs, and receiue gifts euery day of the Merchants, Artificers, and Women, so long as Nilus increaseth. The foresaid deuice or experiment of the increase of Nilus, is this that followeth: If the water reacheth onely to the fifteenth cubit of the foresaid Pillar, they hope for a fruitfull yeare following: but if it stayeth betweene the twelfth cubit and the fifteenth, then the increase of the yeare will prooue but meane: if it resteth betweene the tenth and twelfth cubits, then is it a signe that Corne will be sold ten Duckats the bushell: But if it ariseth to the eighteenth cubite, there is like to follow great scarcitie, in regard of too much moysture: and if the eighteenth cubite be surmounted, all Egypt is in danger to be swallowed vp by the inundation of Nilus. The Officers therefore declare vnto the Children the height of the Riuer, and the Children publish the same in all streets of the Citie, charging the people to feare God, and telling them how high Nilus is increased. And the people being astonied at the wonderfull increase of Nilus, wholly exercise themselves in Prayers, and giuing of Almes. And thus Nilus continueth fortie dayes increasing, and fortie dayes decreasing; all which time Corne is sold very deare, because while the Inundation lasteth, euery man may sell at his owne pleasure: but when the eightieth day is once past, the Clerke of the Market appointeth the price of all Victuals, and especially of Corne, according as hee knoweth by the foresaid experiment experiment, that the high and low grounds of Egypt haue receiued either too little, or too much or conuenient moysture: all which Customes and Ceremonies being duly performed, there followeth so great a Solemnitie, and such a thundering noyse of Drummes and Trumpets throughout all Cairo, that a man would suppose the whole Citie to be turned vpside downe. And then euery Family hath a Barge adorned with rich Couerings and Carpets, and with Torch-light, and furnished with most daintie meates and confections, wherewith they solace themselues. The SOLDAN also with all his Nobles and Courtiers resorteth vnto that Sluce or Conduit, which is called the great Conduit, and is compassed round about with a wall, who taking an Axe in his hand breaketh the said wall, and so doe his Nobles and Courtiers likewise: insomuch, that the same part of the wall being cast downe, which stopped the passage of the water, the River of Nilus is so swiftly and forcibly carryed through that Conduit, and through all other Conduits and Sluces in the Citie and the Suburbs, that Cairo at that time seemeth to be another Venice; and then may you row ouer all places of the Land of Egypt. Seuen dayes and seuen nights together the foresaid Festiuall Solemnitie continueth in Cairo; during which space the Merchants and Artificers of the Citie may (according to the custome of the ancient Egyptians) consume and spend in Torches, Perfumes, Confections, Musicke, and such like iollities, all their gaines that they haue gotten the whole yeere past. Without the Citie of Cairo, neere vnto the Suburbe of BebZuaila, standeth the Castle of the Soldan vpon the side of the Mountain called Mochattan. This Castle is enuironed with high and impregnable wals, and contayneth such stately and beautifull Palaces, that they can hardly be described. Paved they are with excellent Marble; on the Roofes they are gilt and curiously painted, their windowes are adorned with diuers colours, like to the windowes in some places of Enrope; and their gates be artificially carued and beautified with Gold and Azure. Some of these Palaces are for the Soldan and his Family; others for the Family of his Wife, and the residue for his Concubines, his Eunuches, and his Guard. Likewise the Soldan had one palace to keepe publike Feasts in; and another wherein to giue audience vnto forraine Ambassadors, and to exalt himselfe with great pompe and Ceremonies: and another also for the Gouvernours and Officials of his Court. But all these are at this present abolished by Selim the great Turke.

John Leo tooke these notes a little before the Turke had conquered Egypt, after which traueled thrice into Egypt. A solemne Feast of seuen dayes for Nilus.

The Inhabitants of Cairo are people of a merry, iocund; and cheerefull disposition, such as will promise much, but performe little. They exercise Merchandize and Mechanicall Arts, and yet trauell they not out of their owne native soyle. Many Students there are of the Lawes, but very few of other liberall Arts and Sciences. And their Colledges are continually full of Students, yet few of them attayne vnto perfection. The Citizens in Winter are clad in garments of cloth lined with Cotton: in Summer they weare fine shirts; ouer which shirts some put on linnen garments curiously wrought with silke, and others weare garments of Chamblet, and vpon their heads they carry great Turbants couered with cloth of India. The women goe costely attired, adorning their foreheads and neckes with frontlet and chaines of Pearle, and on their heads they weare a sharpe and slender bonet of a span high, being very precious and rich. Gownes they weare of woollen cloth with strait sleeues, being curiously imbroydered with needle-worke, ouer which they cast certaine veyles of most excellent fine cloth of India. They couer their heads and faces with a kind of blacke Skarfe, through which beholding others, they cannot bee seene themselues. Vpon their feet they weare fine shooes and pantofles, somewhat after the Turkish fashion. These women are so ambitious and proud, that all of them disdain eyther to spinne or to play the Cookes: wherefore their Husbands are constrained to buy victuals ready drest at the Cookes shops: for very few, except such as haue a great Family, vse to prepare and dresse their victuals in their owne houses. Also they vouchsafe great libertie vnto their Wiues: for the good man being gone to the Tauerne or Victualling house, his Wife tricking vp her selfe in costely apparell, and being perfumed with sweet and precious Odours, walketh about the Citie to solace her selfe, and parley with her kinsfolkes and friends.

The libertie of the women of Cairo.

They vse to ride vpon Asses more then horses, which are broken to such a gentle pace, that they goe easier then any ambling horse. These Asses they couer with most costely Furniture, and let them out vnto women to ride vpon, together with a Boy to lead the Ass, and certain Footmen to run by. In this City, like as in diuers others, great store of people carry about sundry kinds of victuals to be sold. Many there are also that sell water, which they carry vp and downe in certayne Leather bags vpon the backes of Camels: for the Citie (as I said before) is two miles distant from Nilus. Others carrie about a more fine and handsome Vessell with a Cocke or Spout of Brasse vpon it, hauing a Cup of Myrrhe or Christall in their hands, and these sell water for men to drinke, and for euery draught they take a farthing. Others sell young Chickens and other Fowles by measure, which they hatch after a wonderfull and strange manner. They put great numbers of Egges into certayne Ovens built vpon sundry lofts, which Ovens being moderately heat, will within seuen dayes conuert all the said Egges into Chickens. Their measures are bottomlesse, which being put into the basket of the buyer, and filled full of Chickens they lift it vp, and so let the Chickens fall into the basket. Likewise, such as buy those Chickens hauing kept them a few dayes, carry them about to sell againe. The Cookes shops stand open open very late: but the shops of other Artificers are shut vp before ten of the clocke, who then walke abroad for their solace and recreation from one Suburbe to another. The Citizens in their common talke vse ribald and filthy speeches: and (that I may passe ouer the rest in silence) it falleth out oftentimes that the Wife will complaine of her Husband vnto the Iudge, that he doth not his dutie nor contenteth her sufficiently in the night season, wherupon (as it is permitted by the Mahumetan Law) the women are diuorced and maryed vnto other Husbands.

Among the Artizans whosoever is the first Inuentor of any new and ingenuous Deuice, is clad in a Garment of cloth of Gold, and carryed with a noyse of Musicians after him, as it were in triumph from shop to shop, hauing some money giuen him at euery place. I my selfe once saw one carryed about with solemne Musicke and with great pompe and triumph, because hee had bound a Flea in a Chaine, which lay before him on a piece of Paper for all men to behold.

Amongst the sundry Sects of Religion in this Citie, there is one Sect of the *Moore*s called Chenesia: and this Sect liueth vpon Horse-flesh, so that their Butchers when they can heare of any halting or lame Iade, buy him forth-with, and set him vp a fattening, and hauing killed him, the said Sect of Chenesia come and buy vp his flesh hand-smooth. This Sect is rite also among the Turkes, the Mamaluks, and the people of Asia; and albeit, the Turkes might freely vse the food before-mentioned, yet doe they not inure themselues thereunto.

In Egypt and in the Citie of Cairo there are permitted foure seuerall Sects, differing each from other both in Canon and Ciuill Lawes: all which Sects haue their originall from the Religion of Mahumet. For there were in times past foure men of singular Learning, who by subtiltie and sharpnesse of wit, found out a way to make particular deductions out of Mahumets generall Precepts. So that each of them would interpret the opinions of Mahumet according to their owne fancie, and would euery man apply them to his owne proper sense; and therefore they must needs disagree much betweene themselues: howbeit, growing famous among the common people in regard of their diuers Canons and Precepts, they were the first Authours and Founders of the said foure Sects: any one of which whatsoever Mahumetan professeth, cannot renounce the same at his pleasure and embrace another Sect, vnlesse hee be a man of deepe Learning, and knoweth the Reasons and Allegations of both parts. Also there are in the Citie of Cairo foure principall Iudges, who giue sentence onely vpon matters of great importance: vnder which foure are substituted other inferiour Iudges, in euery street of the Citie, which decide pettie contentions and brabbles. And if the parties which are at controuersie chance to be of diuers Sects, the Plaintiffe may summon and conuent the Defendant before the Iudge of his street: howbeit, the Defendant may, if he will, appeale from him vnto the highest Iudge of all, being placed ouer the foure principall Iudges aforesaid, and being gouernour of the Sect, called Essafichia; and this high Iudge hath authoritie to dispense withall, or to disanull the Decrees of the foure principall, and of all the other inferiour Iudges, according as hee shall see cause. Whosoever attempteth ought against the Canons and Precepts of his owne Religion, is seuerely punished by the Iudge of the same Religion. Moreouer, albeit the Priests of the foresaid Sects differ very much, both in their formes of Lyturgie or Prayer, and also in many other respects, yet doe they not for that diuersitie of Ceremonies hate one another, neyther yet doe the common people of sundry Sects fall to mutinie and debate: but men indeed of singular Learning and much reading conferre oftentimes together, and as in priuate each man affirmeth his owne Sect to be the best, so likewise doe they confirme their opinions by subtile Arguments, neither may any man vnder paine of grieuous punishment reproch any of the said foure ancient Doctors. And in very deed they all of them follow one & the same Religion, to wit, that which is prescribed in the Canons of Hashari, the principall Doctor of the Mahumetans, which Canons goe for currant oter all Africa, and most part of Asia, except in the Dominions of the Great Sephi of Persia; who because he reiecteth the said Canons, is accounted by other Mahumetans an Heretike, and a Schismaticke. But how such varietie of opinions proceeded from the foure Doctors aforesaid, it were tedious and troublesome to rehearse: he that is desirous to know more of this matter, let him read my Commentaries which I haue written concerning the Law and Religion of Mahumet, according to the Doctrine of Malich, who was a man of profound Learning, and was borne at Medina Talnabi, where the bodie of Mahumet lyeth buried: which Doctrine of Malich is embraced throughout all Syria, Egypt, and Arabia: wherewith if any be delighted, let him peruse my foresaid Commentaries, and they will satisfie him to the full.

Vpon Malefactors they inflict most grieuous and horrible punishment, especially vpon such as haue committed any heynous crime in the Court. Theeues they condemne to the Halter. A murther committed treacherously they punish in manner following: the Executioners assistants take the Malefactor one by the head, and another by the feet, and then comes the chiefe Executioner with a Two-hand-sword, and cutteth his bodie in twaine, the one part whereof adioyning to the head is put into a fire full of vn-slaked Lime: and it is a most strange and dreadful thing to consider, how the same dismembred and halfe bodie will remayne a liue in the fire for the space of a quarter of an houre, speaking and making answere vnto the standers by. But rebels or seditious persons they flea aliue, stuffing their skins with bran till they resemble mans shape, which being done, they carry the said stuffed skins vpon Camels backes through euery street

tion.

streete of the Citie, and there publish the crime of the partie executed: then which punishment I neuer sawe a more dreadfull, by reason that the condemned party liueth so long in torment: but if the tormenter once toucheth his nauell with the knife, he presently yeeldeth vp the Ghost: which he may not doe vntill he be commanded by the Magistrate standing by. If any be imprisoned for debt, not hauing where withall to satisfie the same, the Gouvernor of the prison payeth their creditors, and sendeth them, poore wretches, bound in chaines, and accompanied with certaine keepers, daily to begge almes from street to street, all which almes redoundeth to the Gouvernour, and hee alloweth the said prisoners very bare maintenance to liue vpon.

The Nauell being cut is present death.

- 10 Moreouer, there goe crying vp and downe this Citie certaine aged women, who (though that which they say in the streets cannot be vnderstood) are notwithstanding inioyned by their office to circumcise women according to the prescript of Mahumet: which Ceremonie is not obserued but in Egypt and Syria.

Women circumcised.

- The dignity and power of the Soldan was in times past exceeding great; but Selim the great Turke in the yeere of Christ (if I be not deceiued) 1517. vtterly abolished the saide dignity, and changed all the Customes and Lawes of the Soldan. And because it hath bene my hap thrise to trauell into Egypt since the said wonderfull alteration befell, I suppose, it will not bee much beside my purpole, if I set downe in this place such particulars as I know to be most certaine true concerning the Court of the Soldan. Vnto this high dignitie was wont to bee chosen some one of the most noble Mamaluks. These Mamaluks being all Christians at the first, and stolne in their child-hood by the Tartars out of the Prouince of Circassia, which bordereth vpon the Euxin Sea, and being sold at Cussa, a Towne of Taurica Chersonesus, were brought from thence by certaine Merchants vnto the Citie of Cairo, and were there bought by the Soldan; who constraining them forthwith to abiure and renounce their baptisme, caused them to bee instructed in the Arabian and Turkish Languages, and to bee trained vp in Militarie Discipline, to the end they might ascend from one degree of Honour to another, till at last they were aduanced vnto the high dignity of the Soldan. But this Custome whereby it was enacted: that the Soldan should be cholen out of the number of such as were Mamaluks and slaues by their condition, began about two hundred and fifty yeers sithence, when as the Family of the valiant Saladin (whose name was so terrible vnto Christians) being supported but by a few of the kindred, fell to vtter decay and ruine.

The manner of creating the Soldan, and of the orders, degrees, and offices in his Court.

John Leo was thrise in Egypt. The Mamaluks.

- At the same time when the last King of Ierusalem was determined to sacke the Citie of Cairo, which also in regard of the sloth and cowardize of the Mahumetan Califa then raigning ouer it, intended to make it selfe tributarie vnto the same King, the Iudges and Lawyers of the Citie with the consent of the Califa, sent for a certaine Prince of Asia, called Azedudin, of the Nation of Curdu (the people whereof liue in tents like the Arabians) which Azedudin together with his sonne Saladin, came with an armie of fiftie thousand horsemen. And albeit, Saladin was inferiour in age vnto his Father, yet in regard of his redoubted valour, and singular knowledge in Military affaires, they created him Generall of the field, and gaue him free liberty to bestow all the Tributes and Reuenues of Egypt, as himselfe should thinke expedient. And so marching at length against the Christians, he got the Victory of them without any bloodshed, and draue them out of Ierusalem and out of all Syria. Then Saladin returning backe with triumph vnto Cairo, had an intent to vsurpe the Gouvernement thereof: whereupon hauing slaine the Califa his guard (who bare principall sway ouer the Egyptians) hee procured the death also of the Califa himselfe, being thus bereft of his guard, with a poysoned cup, and then forthwith submitted himselfe vnto the patronage of the Califa of Bagdet, who was the true and lawfull Mahumetan Prelate of Cairo. Thus the iurisdiction of the Califas of Cairo (who had continued Lords of that Citie by perpetuall succession for the space of two hundred and thirty yeeres) surceased, and returned againe vnto the Califa of Bagdet, who was the true and lawfull Gouvernour thereof. And so the Schismaticall Califas and Patriarkes being suppressed, there grew a contention betweene Saladin and the Soldan of Bagdet, and Saladin made himselfe a soueraigne of Cairo, because the said Soldan of Bagdet being in times past Prince of the Prouinces of Mazandran and Euarixin situate vpon the Riuer of Ganges, and being borne in a certaine Countrey of Asia, laid claime notwithstanding vnto the Dominion of Cairo, and intending to wage warre against Saladin, hee was restrained by the Tartars of Corasan; who made inuasions and inrodes vpon him. Saladin on the other side fearing least the Christians in reuenge of the foresaid injury would make an expedition into Syria, and considering that his forces were partly slaine in the former warres, and partly consumed by pestilence, except a few which remained for the defence and lauegard of his Kingdome, began to imploy himselfe about buying of slaues that came from Circassia, whom the King of Armenia by those dayes tooke and sent vnto Cairo to be sold: which slaues he caused to abiure the Christian faith, and to be trained vp in feats of warre and in the Turkish Language, and being the proper Language of Saladin himselfe: and so the said slaues within a while increased so exceedingly both in valour and number, that they became not onely valiant Souldiers, and skilfull Commanders, but also Gouvernours of the whole

The original of the Mamaluks.

Kingdome. After the decease of Saladin, the Dominion remained vnto his Family one hundred and fifty yeeres, and all his successors obserued the Custome of buying slaues of Circassia: but the Family of Saladin growing at length to decay, the slaues by a generall consent elected one Piperis a valiant Mamuluk of their owne companie to be their Soueraigne Lord and Soldan: which Custome they afterward so inuiolably kept, that not the Soldans owne sonne nor any other Mamuluk could attaine vnto that high dignity, vnlesse first he had beene a Christian, and had abiured his faith, and had learned also exactly to speak the Circassian and Turkish Languages. Infomuch, that many Soldans sent their sonnes in their childhood into Circassia, that by learning the Language and fashions of the Countrey, they might proue in processe of time fit to beare Soueraigne authority; but by the dissension of Mamalukes, they were alwayes defeated of their purpose. 10

Peere next vnder the Soldan called Eddagnadare.
The Soldans officer, called Amir Caber.

The Eddagnadare being in dignitie second vnto the Soldan, and being as it were, his Vice-roy or Lieutenant, had authoritie to place or displace any Magistrates or Officers; and maintained a Family almost as great as the Family of the Soldan himselfe.

The Amir Cabir hauing the third place of honour, was Lord Generall ouer the Soldans Militarie Forces; who was by office bound to leauy armies against the forraigne enemye, especially against the next Arabians, and to furnish the Castles and Cities with conuenient Garisons: and also had authoritie to dispend the Soldans Treasure, vpon such necessary affaires as hee thought good.

Nai Bessan.

The fourth in dignity after the Soldan called Nai Bessan, beeing the Soldan his Lieutenant in Syria, and gathering vp all the Tributes of Assiria, bestowed them at his owne discretion, and yet the Soldan himselfe was to place Garisons in the Castles and Forts of those Prouinces. This Nai Bessan was bound yeerely to pay certaine thousands of Saraffi vnto the Soldan. 20

The Ostadar.

The fift Magistrate called the Ostadar, was the great Master or Steward of the Palaces; whose duetie was to prouide apparell for the Soldan, with Victuals and other necessities for his whole family. And vnto this dignity the Soldan vsed to aduance some one of his most ancient, Honourable, and Vertuous Nobles, vnder whose tuition himselfe had in times past beene trained vp.

The Amiri A-chor.

The sixt called the Amiri Achor, was Master of the Horse and Camels; and distributed them vnto each man in Court, according to his degree. 30

The Amirals.

The seuenth Office was performed by certaine principall Mamalukes, being like vnto the Colonels of Europe: euery of whom was Captaine of a thousand inferiour Mamalukes; and their Office was to conduct the Soldans Forces against the enemye, and to take charge of his armour.

The Amirmda.

The eight degree of Honour was allotted vnto certaine Centurions ouer the Mamalukes; who were continually to attend vpon the Soldan, either when he rood any whither, or when he exercised himselfe in armes.

The Chazendare.

The ninth person was the Treasurer, who made an account vnto the Soldan of all the Tributes and Customes of his Kingdome, disbursing money for the daily and necessary expenses of the Soldans Household, and laying vp the rest in the Soldans Castle. 40

The Amirfleh.

The tenth called the Amirfleh, had the armour of the Soldan committed to his charge, which being contained in a great Armory was to be scoured, furbished, and renewed at his direction, for which purpose he had sundry Mamalukes placed vnder him.

The Testecana.

The eleuenth called the Testecana was Master of the Soldans Wardrobe, and tooke charge of all such Robes and Apparell as were deliuered vnto him by the Ostadar or high Steward of the Household; which Robes he distributed according to the appointment of the Soldan; for whomsoever the Soldan promoted vnto any dignity, him he apparelled also. All the said garments were of cloth of Gold, of Veluet, or of silke.

The Citie of Chanca.

The great Citie of Chanca situate about fixe miles from Cairo, at the very entrance of the Desert lying in the way to Mount Sinai, is replenished with most stately Houses, Temples, and Colledges. All the fields betweene Cairo and this Citie abound with great plenty of Dates: but from Chanca to Mount Sinai, which is an hundred and fortie miles, there are no places of habitation at all. Through this Citie lie two maine road-ways, the one leading to Syria, and the other to Arabia. This Citie hath no other water but such as remaine in certaine Channels after the inundation of Nilus; which channels being broken, the water runneth forth into the plaines, and there maketh a number of small lakes, from whence it is conueighed backe by certaine sluices into the Cisternes of the Citie. 50

Munia.

Vpon the same side of Nilus, standeth the faire Citie of Munia, which was built in the time of the Mahumetans by one Chasib, a Lieutenant and Courtier of the Califa of Bagdet, vpon an high place. Heere are most excellent Grapes, and abundance of all kind of fruit, which albeit they are carried to Cairo, yet can they not come thither fresh and new, by reason that this City is distant from Cairo one hundred and fourescore miles. It is adorned with most stately Temples and other buildings: and here are to be seene at this present, sundry ruines of the ancient Egyptian. 60 rian buildings. The Inhabitants are rich, for they trauell for their gaine as farre as Gaoga, a Kingdome of the Land of Negros.

At this present there are found at Manf-Loth, certaine huge and high Pillars and Porches, whereon are Verses engrauen in the Egyptian Tongue. Neere vnto Nilus stand the ruines of a stately building, which seemeth to haue been a Temple in times past; among which ruines the Citizens find sometimes Coyne of Siluer, sometimes of Gold, and sometimes of Lead; hauing on the one side Hielygraphick notes, and on the other side the pictures of ancient Kings. The fields adiacent being very fruitfull, are extremely scorched by the heate of the Sunne, and much haunted with Crocodiles, which was the occasion (as some thinke) why the Romans abandoned this 10 Citie. The Inhabitants are men of indifferent wealth, for they exercise Traffick in the Land of Negros.

Axiath founded by the Egyptians vpon the banke of Nilus, two hundred and fifty miles from Cairo, is most admirable in regard of the hugeness, and of the varietie of old buildings, and of Epitaphies engrauen in Egyptian Letters; although at this present the greatest part thereof lieth desolate. When the Mahumetans were first Lords of this Citie, it was inhabited by honourable personages, and continueth as yet famous, in regard of the Nobility and great wealth of the Citizens. There are in this Citie almost an hundred Families of Christians, and three or foure Churches still remaining: and without the Citie standeth a Monasterie, containing moe then an hundred Monks, who eat neither Flesh nor Fish, but onely Hearbs, Bread and Oliues. And yet haue 20 they dainty Cates without any fat among them. This Monasterie is very rich, and giueth three dayes entertainment to all strangers that resort thither, for the welcomming of whom they bring vp great store of Doves, of Chickens, and of such like commodities.

Ichmin being the most ancient Citie in all Egypt, was built by Ichmin, the sonne of * Misraim, the sonne of Chus, which was the sonne of * Hen, vpon the Banke of Nilus, next vnto Asia, and three hundred miles Eastward from Cairo. This Citie the Mahumetans, when they first began to vsurpe ouer Egypt, so wasted and destroyed, for certaine causes mentioned in Histories, that besides the foundations and rubbish, they left nought remaining: for, transporting the Pillars and principall Stones vnto the other side of Nilus, they built thereof the Citie called Munfia, euen as we will now declare.

30 Georgia was in times past a famous Monasterie of Christians, called after the name of Saint George, and being sixe miles distant from Munfia. It was inhabited by more then two hundred Monks, who enioying large Territories, Possessions and Reuenues, shewed themselves curteous and beneficiall vnto strangers; and the ouerplus of their yearly reuenues was sent vnto the Patriarke of Cairo, who caused the same to be distributed amongst the poore Christians: but about an hundred yeares agoe, all the Monkes of this Monasterie died of a Pestilence, which 40 spred it selfe ouer all the Land of Egypt. Whereupon the Prince of Munfia compassed the said Monasterie with a Wall, and erected diuers houses for Artificers and Merchants to dwell in. And being allured by the pleasant Gardens situate amidst the beautifull Hills, hee himselfe went thither to inhabite: but the Patriarke of the Iacobites making his mone vnto the Soldan, the Soldan caused another Monasterie to bee built in the same place, where in times past the old Citie stood; and assigned so much allowance thereunto, as might maintaine thirtie Monkes.

This little Citie of Chian was built in times past neere vnto Nilus by the Mahumetans, which notwithstanding is not now inhabited by them, but by the Christians called Iacobites, who employ themselves either in Husbandrie, or in bringing vp of Chickens, Geese, and Doves. There remaine as yet certaine Monasteries of Christians, that giue entertainment to Strangers. But Mahumetans (besides the Gouvernour and his Family) there are none at all.

Barbanda founded by the Egyptians vpon Nilus, about foure hundred miles from Cairo, was laid so waste by the Romans, that nothing but the ruines thereof remained, most of which ruines were carried vnto Asna, whereof wee will forthwith intreate. Amongst the said ruines are to 50 be found many pieces of Gold and Siluer Coyne, and sundry fragments of Smaragds or Emeralds.

The ancient Citie of Cana, built by the Egyptians vpon the banke of Nilus ouer against Barbanda, and enuironed with Walls of Sunne-dried Bricke, is inhabited with people of base condition, applying themselves vnto Husbandrie, by which meanes the Citie aboundeth with corne. Hither are the Merchandise brought against the streame of Nilus, which are sent from Cairo to Mecca: for the distance from hence ouer the wildernesse vnto the Red Sea, is at least 120 miles, all which way there is no water at all to bee found. And at the Hauen of Chossir vpon the shoare of the Red Sea, are diuers Cottages, whereinto the said Merchandises are vnladen. And ouer against Chossir on the side of Asia lieth Iambub, another Hauen of the Red Sea, where huge buildings, and admirable Sepulchres, together with sundry Epitaphes engrauen both in Egyptian and Latine Letters.

The great, ancient, and populous Citie of Assuan was built by the Egyptians vpon the Riuer of Nilus, about fourescore miles Eastward from Asna. The soyle adiacent is most apt and fruitfull for Corne. And the Citizens are exceedingly addicted vnto the Trade of Merchandise, because they dwell so neere vnto the Kingdome of Nubia, vpon the confines whereof standeth their Citie: beyond which Citie, Nilus dispersing himselfe ouer the Plaines through many small Lakes, becommeth innaugable. Also, the said Citie standeth neere vnto that Desart, ouer which they trauell vnto the Port of Snachen vpon the Red Sea, and it adioyneth likewise vpon the frontiers of Ethiopia. And here in Summer time the Inhabitants are extremely scorched with the heate of the Sunne, being of a swart or browne colour, and being mingled with the people of Nubia and Ethiopia. Here are to be seene also many buildings of the ancient Egyptians, and most high Towers, which they call in the language of that Countrey Barba. Beyond this place there is neither Citie nor habitation of any account, besides a few Villages of black people, whose speech is compounded of the Arabian, Egyptian, and Ethiopian languages. These being subiect vnto the people, called * Bugiba, liue in the Fields after the Arabian manner, being free from the Soldans iurisdiction, for there his Dominions are limited.

And thus much concerning the principall Cities standing along the maine Chanell of Nilus: Some whereof I saw, others I entred into, and passed by the residue: but I had most certaine intelligence of them all, either by the Inhabitants themselves, or by the Mariners which carried me by water from Cairo to Assuan, with whom returning backe vnto Chana, I trauelled thence ouer the Desart vnto the Red Sea, ouer which Sea I crossed vnto Iambuth, and Ziddem, two Hauens Townes of Arabia Desarta; of which two Townes, because they belong vnto Asia, I will not here discourse, lest I should seeme to transgresse the limits of Africa. But if it shall please God to vouchsafe me longer life, I purpose to describe all the Regions of Asia which I haue trauelled; to wit, Arabia Desarta, Arabia Felix, Arabia Petraea, the Asian part of Egypt, Armenia, and some part of Tartaria; all which Countries I saw and passed through in the time of my youth. Likewise, I will let downe my last Voyages from Fez to Constantinople, from Constantinople to Egypt, and from thence into Italie, in which I saw diuers and sundry Ilands. All which my Trauels I meane (by Gods assistance) being returned forth of Europe into mine owne Country, particularly to describe; deciphrring first the Religion of Europe and Asia which I haue seene, and thereunto annexing this my Discourse of Africa, to the end that I may promote the endeauours of such as are desirous to know the state of forraigne Countries.

The Camell.

THe Elephant keepeth in the Woods, and is found in great numbers in the Forrests of the Land of Negros. They vse to go many in one company, & if they chance to meet with any man, they either shun him, or giue place vnto him. But if the Elephant intendeth to hurt anyman, he casteth him on the ground with his long snout or trunke, and neuer ceaseth trampling vpon him till he be dead. And although it be a mighty and fierce beast, yet are there great store of them caught by the Ethiopian Hunters, in manner following. These Hunters being acquainted with the Woods and Thickets where they keepe, vse to make among the trees a round hedge of strong boughes and rafts, leauing a space open on the one side thereof, and likewise a doore standing vpon the plaine ground which may be lift vp with ropes, where with they can easily stoppe the said open place or passage. The Elephant therefore coming to take his rest vnder the shady boughes, entreth the hedge or inclosure, where the Hunters by drawing the said rope, and fastening the doore, hauing imprisoned him, descend downe from the trees, and kill him with their Arrowes, to the end they may get his Teeth, and make sale of them. But if the Elephant chanceth to breake through the hedge, he murthereth as many men as he can find. In Ethiopia the higher, and India, they haue other deuices * to take the Elephant, which, least I should seeme ouer-tedious, I passe ouer in silence.

The Giraffa so sauage and wild, that it is a very rare matter to see any of them: for they hide themselves among the Desarts and Woods, where no other beasts vse to come; and so soone as one of them espieth a man, it flieth forthwith, though not very swiftly. It is headed like a Camell, eared like an Oxe, and footed like a * : neither are any taken by Hunters, but while they are very young.

Camels are gentle and domesticall beasts, and are found in Africa in great numbers, especially in the Desarts of Libya, Numidia, and Barbaria. And these the Arabians esteeme to bee their principall possessions and riches: so that speaking of the wealth of any of their Princes, or Gouvernours, he bath (say they) so many thousands Camels, and not so many thousand Duckets.

Moreouer,

Moreover, the Arabians that possesse Camels liue like Lords and Potentates in great liberty, because they can remaine with their Camels in barren Desarts, whither no Kings nor Princes can bring armies to subdue them.

African Camels farre excell them of Asia; for traueilling fortie or fifty dayes together, without any prouender at all, they are vnladen in the euening, and turned loose into the next fields, where they feed vpon Grasse, Brambles, and the boughes of trees; which hardnesse the Camels of Asia cannot endure, but when they set forth any iourney, they must be well pampered and full of flesh. Experience hath taught, that our Camels hauing trauelled laden fifty dayes together without any prouender; haue so wasted; first, the flesh of their bunches; secondly, of

The African Camels are the best.

10 their bellies, and lastly, of their hips, that they haue scarce beene able to carry the weight of one hundred pounds. But the Merchants of Asia giue their Camels prouender, halfe of them being laden with wares, and the other halfe with prouender, and so their whole Carouan of Camels goeth forth and returneth home laden: by which meanes they keepe them in good plight. Of Camels there are three kinds; whereof the first being called Huginn, are grosse, and of a tall stature, and most fit to carrie burthens, but ere foure yeeres end they grow vnprofitable: after which time euery Camell but of meane stature will carry a thousand pounds of Italian weight. When any of the said Camels is to bee laden, being beaten vpon his knees and necke with a wand, he kneeleth downe, and when he feeleth his load sufficient, he riseth vp againe. And the Africans vse to geld their Camels which they keepe for the burthen, putting but one male

Three kinds of Camels.

20 Camell among ten femals. The second kinde of Camels called Becheti, and hauing a double bunch, are fit both to carrie burthens, and to ride vpon: and these are bred onely in Asia.

The third kind called Raguabill, are Camels of a slender and low stature, which albeit they are vnfit to carry burthens, yet doe they not excell the two other kinds in swiftnesse, that in the space of one day they will trauell one hundred miles, and will so continue ouer the Desarts for eight or ten dayes together with very little prouender: and these doe the principall Arabians of Numidia, and the Moores of Libya vsually ride vpon. When the King of Tombuto is desirous to send any message of importance vnto the Numidian Merchants with great celeritie, his post or messenger riding vpon one of these Camels, will runne from Tombuto to Darba or Segelmesse, beeing nine hundred miles distant, in the space of eight dayes at the farthest: but

30 such as trauell must be expert in the way through the Desarts, neither will they demand lesse then five hundred Duckats for euery iourney. The said Camels about the beginning of the spring inclining to their lust and venerie, doe not onely lust one another, but also will deadly wound such persons as haue done them any iniury in times past, not forgetting light and easie stripes: and whomsoeuer they lay hold on with their teeth, they lift vp on high, and cast him downe againe, trampling vpon him with their feete, and in this madde moode they continue fortie dayes together. Neither are they so patient of hunger as of thirst; for they will abstaine from drinke, without any inconuenience, for fifteene dayes together: and if their guides water them once in three dayes, they doe them great hurt, for they are not vsually watered but once in five or nine dayes, or at an vrgent necessity once in fifteene dayes. Moreover,

The Camels great abstinence from drinke.

40 the said Camels are of a gentle disposition, and are indued as it were with a kinde of humane reason: for when as betweene Ethiopia and Barbarie they haue a dayes iourney to trauell more then their woont, their masters cannot driue them on, being so tired, with whips, but are faine to sing certaine songs vnto them, wherewith being exceedingly delighted, they performe their iourney with such swiftnesse, that their said masters are scarce able to follow them. At my beeing in Cairo I saw a Camell dance; which arte of dancing how he learned of his master I will heere in few words report. They take a young Camell, and put him for halfe an houre together in a place like a Bath-stoue prepared for the same purpose, the floore whereof is heret with fire: then play they without vpon a drumme, whereat the Camell not so much in regard of the noyse, as of the hot pauement which offendeth his feet, and lifteth vp one legge after another in manner of a dance, and hauing beene accustomed vnto this exercise for the space

How the Camels of Cairo learne to dance.

50 of a yeere or ten moneths, they then present him vnto the publike view of the people, when as hearing the noyse of a drum, and remembring the time when he trode vpon the hot floore, he presently falleth a dancing and leaping: and so, vse being turned into a kind of nature, he perpetually obserueth the same custome.

The Horses of Barbary differ not in any respect from other Horses: but Horses of the same swiftnesse and agilitie are in the Arabian tongue called throughout all Egypt, Syria, Asia, Arabia Felix, and Deserta, by the name of Arabian Horses: and the Historiographers affirme, that this kind of wilde Horses ranging vp and downe the Arabian Desarts, and being broken and managed by the Arabians euer since the time of Ismael, haue so exceedingly multiplied and increased, that they haue replenished the most part of Africa: which opinion fauoureth of truth, for euen at this present there are great store of wild Horses found both in the African and Arabian Desarts. And I my selfe sawe in the Numidian Desart a wild Colt of a white colour, and hauing a curled maine. The most certaine triall of these Horses is when they can ouertake the beast called Lant, or the Ostrich in a race: which two, if they be able to performe, they are esteemed worth a thousand Duckats or an hundred Camels. Howbeit, very few of these Horses are brought vp in Barbarie, but the Arabians that inhabite the Desarts, and the people of Lybia bring vp great numbers of them, vsing them not for trauell or warfare, but onely for hunting, neither doe they giue them any other meate but the milke of Camels, and that twice e- uery day and night, to the end they may keepe them nimble, liuely, and of spare flesh; and in the time of Grasse they suffer them to feede in Pastures, but then they ride not vpon them.

The wilde

Lant.

The wilde Horse is one of those beasts that come seldome in sight. The Arabians of the Desarts take the wild Horse and eate him, saying, that the younger the Horse be, the sweeter is his flesh: but he will hardly be taken either with Horses or Dogs. In the waters where this 10 beast keepeth, they lay certaine snares, couering them ouer with sand, wherein his foot being caught, he is intangled and slaine.

Targets made of a skin.

The beast called Lant or Dant in shape resembleth an Oxe, sauing that he hath smaller legs, and comlier hornes. His haire is white, and his hoofs are as blacke as Iet, and he is so exceeding swift, that no beast can ouertake him, but onely the Barberie Horse, as is before said. He is easlier caught in Summer then in Winter, because that in regard of the extreme fretting heat of the sand his hoofs are then strained and set awry, by which meanes his swiftnesse is abated, like as the swiftnesse of Stagges and Roe-Deere. Of the hide of this beast are made Shields and Targets of great defence, which will not be pierced, but onely with the forcible shot of a bullet, but they are sold at an extreme price.

The wild Oxe.

The wild Oxe resembleth the tame Oxe, saue that it is lesse in stature, being of a gray or ash-colour, and of great swiftnesse. It haunteth either the Desarts, or the confines of the Desarts. And the flesh thereof (they say) is very sauoury.

The wild Asse.

The wilde Asse being found either in the Desarts, or vpon the borders thereof, is of an ash-colour. In swiftnesse they are surpassed onely by the Barbarie Horses, and when they see a man, they bray out aloud, kicking and wincing with their heeles, and standing stone-still, till one approacheth so neare them, that he may touch them with his hand, and then they betake themselues to flight. By the Arabians of the Desarts they are caught with Snares, and other Engins. They goe in companies either when they feede or water themselues. Their flesh is hot and vn sauoury, and hath a wilde taste: but being set a cooling two dayes after it is sodden, it be- 30 commeth very sauory and pleasant.

The Oxen vpon
the Mountaines
of Africa.

All the Oxen vpon the Mountaines of Africa being tame cattell, are of so meane a stature, that in comparison of other Oxen they seeme to be but Heifers of two yeeres old: but the Mountainers vsing them to the plough, say, that they are strong, and will indure much labour.

The beast called Adimmain.

Adimmain, is a tame beast, beeing shaped like a Ramme, and of the stature of an Asse, and hauing long and dangle eares. The Libyans vse these beasts in stead of Kine, and make of their milke great store of Cheese and Butter. They haue some Wooll, though it bee but short. I my selfe vpon a time beeing merrily disposed, roade a quarter of a mile vpon the backe of one of these beastes. Very many of them there are in the Desarts of Libya, and but fewe in other places: and it is a rare matter to see one of them in the Numidian 40 fields.

The African Ramme.

There is no difference betweene these Rammes of Africa and others, saue onely in their tayles, which are of a great thicknesse, being by so much the grosser, by how much they are more fat, so that some of their tayles weigh ten, and other twenty pounds a peece, and they become fat of their owne naturall inclination: but in Egypt there are diuers that feed them fat with Bran and Barley, vntill their tayles growe so bigge that they cannot remouue themselues from place to place: insomuch that those which take charge of them are faine to bind little carts vnder their tayles, to the end they may haue strength to walke. I my selfe saw at a City in Egypt called Asiot, and standing vpon Nilus, about an hundred and fifty miles 50 from Cairo, one of the said Rams tayles that weighed foure-score pounds, and others affirmed, that they had seene one of those tayles of an hundred and fifty pounds weight. All the fat therefore of this beast consisteth in his tayle; neither is there any of them to be found but onely in Tunis and in Egypt.

Huge sayle.

The Lyon.

The Lion is a most fierce and cruell beast, being hurtfull vnto all other beasts, and excelling them both in strength, courage, and crueltie, neither is he onely a deuourer of beasts, but of men also. In some places one Lyon will boldly encounter two hundred Horsemen. They range without all feare among the flockes and droues of Cattell, and whatsoever beast they can lay hold on, they carry it into the next Wood vnto their Whelpes: yea, some Lyons there are (as I haue before said) that will vanquish and kill fise or sixe Horsemen in one Company. Howbeit, such 60
Lyons as liue vpon the cold mountaynes are not so outrageous and cruell: but the hotter the places be where they keepe, the more rauenous and bold are they, as namely, vpon the Frontiers of Temefna, and of the Kingdome of Fez, in the Desart of Angad neere Telenfin, and betweene the Citie of Bona and Tunis, all which are accounted the most famous and fierce Lyons in all Africa.

frica. In the Spring, while they are giuen to Lust and Venerie, they haue most fierce and bloudie conflicts one with an other, eight or twelue Lyons following after one Lyonesse. I haue heard many both men and women report, that if a woman chanceth to meet with a Lyon, and sheweth him her priuie parts, hee will with crying and roaring, cast his eyes vpon the ground and so depart. Beleeue it they that list. But this I am well assured of, that whatsoeuer a Lyon getteth in his pawes, though it be a Camell, he will carry it away.

The Leopard liuing in the Woods of Barbarie, will not for all their great strength and crueltye hurt any man, vnlesse it be very seldome, when as they meete with a man in a narrow passage, and cannot shunne him, or when they are checked and prouoked vnto fury: for then they will flye vpon a man, laying hold vpon his visage with their talents, and plucking off so much flesh as they can catch, insomuch that sometimes they will crush his braines in pieces. They inuade not any flockes or droues of tame Cattell, but are at deadly feude with Dogges, whom they will kill and deuoure.

The Mountayners of the Region of Constantina hunt them on Horse-backe, stopping all passages, where they might escape. The Leopard ranging vp and downe, and finding euery place so beset with Horsemen that he cannot get away, windeth and turneth himselfe on all sides, and so becommeth a fit marke for the Hunters to discharge their Darts and Arrowes vpon. But if the Leopard chanceth to escape, that man that lets him passe, is bound by an vsuall custome to inuite the residue of the Hunters vnto a Banquet.

The beast called by the Arabians, Dabub, and by the Africans, Iesef, in bignesse and shape resembleth a Woolfe, sauing that his legges and feet are like to the legges and feet of a man. It is not hurtfull vnto any other beast, but will rake the carkasses of men out of their graues, and will deuoure them, being otherwise an abiect and silly creature. The Hunters being acquainted with his Den, come before it singing and playing vpon a Drum, by which Melodie beeing allured forth, his legs are intrapped in a strong Rope, and so he is drawne out and slaine.

The Ciuet Cats are naturally wilde, and are found in the Woods of Ethiopia. The Merchants taking their young Whelpes or Kittes, feed them with Milke, Branne, and Flesh, and keepe them in Cages or Grates. But their odoriferous Excrement (which is nought else but their sweat) they gather twice or thrice euery day in manner following: first, they driue them vp and downe the Grate with a Wand, till they sweat, and then they take the said sweat from vnder their flankes, their shoulders, their neckes, and their tayles: which Excrement of sweat is commonly called Ciuet.

Of Apes there are diuers and sundry kinds, those which haue tayles, being called in the African Tongue, Monne, and those which haue none, Babuni. They are found in the Woods of Mauritania, and vpon the Mountaynes of Bugia and Constantina. They liue vpon Grasse and Corne, and goe in great companies to feed in the Corne fields, and one of their company which standeth Centinell, or keepeth watch and ward vpon the borders, when hee espyeth the Husbandman comming, he cryeth out and giueth, as it were, an alarme to his fellows, who euery one of them flee immediately into the next Woods, and betake themselues to the trees. The shee Apes carrie their Whelpes vpon their shoulders, and will leape with them in that sort from one tree to another.

The Sea Horse is commonly found in the Riuer of Niger and Nilus. In shape it resembleth an Horse, and in stature an Asse, but it is altogether destitute of haire. It liueth both in the water and vpon the Land, and swimmeth to the shoare in the night season. Barkes and Boates laden with Wares and sayling downe the Riuer of Niger, are greatly endangered by this Sea Horse, for often times he ouerwhelmeth and sinketh them.

The Sea Oxe being couered with an exceeding hard skinne, is shaped in all respects like vnto the Land Oxe; saue that in bignesse it exceedeth not a Calfe of sixe monethes old. It is found in both the Riuer of Niger and Nilus, and being taken by Fishers, is kept a long time alieue out of the water. I my selfe saw one at Cairo lead vp and downe by the necke in a Chaine, which (they say) was taken at the Citie of Asna, standing vpon the banke of Nilus, about foure hundred miles from Cairo.

In the Libyan Desarts are found very many Tortoyse as bigge as a Tunne. And Bicri the Cosmographer in his Booke of the Regions and Iournies of Africa reporteth, that a certaine man being weary of traouelling, ascended to his thinking, vpon an high stone lying in the Desart, to the end he might free himselfe from the danger of Serpents and venemous beasts; who hauing slept soundly thereupon all night, found himselfe in the morning remooued three miles from the place where he first lay downe, and thereby vnderstood that it was not a stone but a Tortoyse whereon he reposed himselfe, which lying still all the day long creepeth for food in the night-season, but so slowly, that her pace can hardly be perceiued.

The Crocodile commonly frequenteth the Riuer of Niger and Nilus, and containeth in length twelue Cubits and aboue, the tayle thereof being as long as the whole bodie besides, albeit, there are but few of so huge a bignesse. It goeth vpon foure feet like a Lizard, neither is it aboue a Cubit and an halfe high. The tayle of this beast is full of knots, and the skinne thereof of is so exceeding hard, that no Crosse-bow will enter it. Some prey vpon fishes onely, but others vpon beasts and men. Which lurking about the bankes of the Riuer, doe craftily lay wait for men and beasts that come the same way, about whom suddenly winding their tayles, they draw them into the water, and there deuoure them. Howbeit, some of them are not so cruell by nature: for if they were, no Inhabitants could liue neere vnto the Riuer of Nilus and Niger. In eating they moue the vpper Iaw onely, their neather Iaw being ioyned vnto their brest-bone. Not many yeeres sithence, passing vp the Riuer of Nilus towards the Citie of Cana, standing in the vpper part of Egypt, foure hundred miles from Cairo, on a certaine night whilest we were in the midst of our Iourney, the Moone being ouer-shadowed with Clouds, the Mariners and Passengers all fast a sleepe, and the Barke vnder sayles, I my selfe studying by Candle-light in my Cabben, was called vpon by a deuout old man in the Barke, who bestowed the same night in watching and prayer, and said vnto me, call (I pray you) some of your company, who may helpe me to draw vp this piece of wood floting vpon the water, which will serue to morrow for the dressing of our Dinner. My selfe, Sir (quoth I) will come and helpe you, rather then wake any of our company in the dead of the night. Nay (quoth the old man) I will try whether I bee able to draw it vp alone or no. And so when the Barke was neere vnto the Wood, as he supposed, holding a Rope in his hand to cast into the water, hee was suddainly intangled with a Crocodiles long tayle, and was in a moment drawne vnder the water. Whereupon, I making a shoute, all the people in the Barke arose, and striking sayles we stayed for the space of an houre, diuers in the meane time leaping into the water to seeke the man, but altogether in vaine: and therefore all of them affirmed, that he was caught by a Crocodile. As we sayled further, we saw great numbers of Crocodiles vpon the bankes of the Ilands in the midst of Nilus lye beaking them in the Sunne with their Iawes wide open, whereinto certaine little Birds about the bignesse of a Thrush entring, came flying forth againe presently after. The occasion whereof was told me to be this: The Crocodiles by reason of their continuall deuouring of beasts and fishes, haue certaine pieces of flesh sticking fast betweene their forked teeth, which flesh being putrified, breedeth a kind of Worme wherewith they are cruelly tormented. Wherefore the said Birds flying about, and seeing the Wormes, enter into the Crocodiles Iawes, to satisfie their hunger therewith. But the Crocodile perceiuing himselfe freed from the Wormes of his teeth, offereth to shut his mouth, and to deuoure the little Bird that did him so good a turne, but being hindred from his vngratefull attempt by a pricke which groweth vpon the Birds head, hee is constrained to open his Iawes and to let her depart. The shee Crocodile laying Egges vpon the shoare couereth them with sand; and so soone as the young Crocodiles are hatched, they crawle into the Riuer. Those Crocodiles that forsake the Riuer and haunt the Desarts become venomous; but such as continue in Nilus, are destitute of Poyson. Of these beasts I saw about three hundred heads placed vpon the wals of Cana, with their Iawes wide open, being of so monstrous and incredible a bignesse, that they were sufficient to haue swallowed vp a whole Cow at once, and their teeth were great and sharpe.

Little Birds flying into the Crocodiles mouth to pick wormes from betweene their teeth.

The Dragon.

In the Caues of Atlas are found many huge and monstrous Dragons, which are heauie, of a slow motion, because the midst of their body is grosse, but their neckes and tayles are slender. They are most venomous creatures, insomuch, that whosoever is bitten or touched by them, his flesh presently waxeth soft and weake, neither can he by any meanes escape death.

The Hydra.

The Hydra being short in proportion of body, and hauing a slender tayle and necke, liueth in the Libyan Desarts. The poyson thereof is most deadly, so that if a man be bitten by this beast, he hath none other remedy, but to cut off the wounded part, before the Poyson disperseth it selfe into the other members.

The creature called Dub.

The Dub liuing also in the Desarts, resembleth in shape a Lizzard, sauing that it is somewhat bigger, and containeth in length a Cubite, and in breadth foure fingers. It drinketh no water at all, and if a man poure any water into the mouth thereof, it presently dieth. It layeth egges in manner of a Tortoyse, and is destitute of poyson. The Arabians take it in the Desarts: and I my selfe cut the throat of one which I tooke, but it bled a very little. Being flayed and roasted, it tasteth somewhat like a frogge. In swiftnesse it is comparable to a Lizzard, and being hunted, if it chanceth to thrust the head into a hole, it can by no force be drawn out, except the hole be digged wider by the hunters. Hauing bene slaine three dayes together, and then being put to the fire, it stirreth it selfe as if it were newly dead.

The Guarall.

The Guaral is like vnto the former, sauing that it is somewhat bigger, and hath poyson both in the head and tayle, which two parts being cut off, the Arabians will eate it, notwithstanding it be of a deformed shape and vgly colour, in which respects I loathed alwayes to eate the flesh thereof.

The Camelion

The Camelion being of the shape and bignesse of a Lizzard, is a deformed, crooked, and leane creature, hauing a long and slender tayle like a Mouse, and being of a slow pace. It is nourished by the Element of Ayre, and the Sun-beames, at the rising whereof it gapeth, and turneth it selfe vp and downe. It changeth the colour according to the varietie of places where it cometh, being sometimes blacke and sometimes greene, as I my selfe haue seene it. It is at great enmi-enmitie with venomous Serpents, for when it seeth any lie sleeping vnder a tree, it presently climeth vp the same tree, and looking downe vpon the Serpents head, it voydeth out of the mouth, as it were, a long thread of spittle, with a round drop like a Pearle hanging at the end, which drop falling wrong, the Camelion changeth his place, till it may light directly vpon the Serpents head, by the vertue whereof he presently dieth.

How the Camelion killeth the Serpent.

The Ostrich in shape resembleth a Goose, but that the neck and legges are somewhat longer, so that some of them exceede the length of two cubites. The body of this Bird is large, and the wings thereof are full of great feathers both white and blacke, which wings and feathers being vnfit to flie withall, doe helpe the Ostrich, with the motion of her traine, to runne a swift pace. This Fowle liueth in drie Desarts, and layeth to the number of ten or twelue Egges in the Sands, which being about the bignesse of great Bullets, weigh fiftene pounds a piece; but the Ostrich is of so weak of memorie, that she presently forgetteth the place where her Egges were laid. And afterward the same, or some other Ostrich-hen finding the said eggs by chance, hatcheth and fostereth them as if they were certainly her owne: the Chickens are no sooner crept out of the shell, but they prowle vp and downe the Desarts for their food: and before their feathers be growne, they are so swift, that a man shall hardly ouertake them. The Ostrich is a silly and deafe creature, feeding vpon any thing which it findeth, be it as hard and vndigestable as yron. The flesh, especially of their legs, is of a slymie and strong taste: and yet the Numidians vse it for food, for they take young Ostriches, and set them vp a fattening. The Ostriches wander vp and downe the Desarts in orderly troopes, so that a farre off a man would take them to be so many Horsemen, which illusion hath often dismaied whole Carouans.

The Ostrich.

Of Eagles there are diuers kinds, according to their naturall properties, the proportion of their bodies, or the diuersitie of their colours: and the greatest kind of Eagles are called in the Arabian Tongue, Nesir. The Africans teach their Eagles to prey vpon Foxes and Wolves, which in their encounter ceaze vpon the heads of the said Beasts with their bills, and vpon the backs with their talents, to auoid the danger of biting. But if the Beast turne his belly vpward, the Eagle will not forsake him, till she hath either peckt out his eyes, or slaine him. Many of our African Writers affirme, that the male Eagle oftentimes ingendring with a shee-Wolfe, begetteth a Dragon, hauing the beake and wings of a Bird, a Serpents taile, the feete of a Wolfe, and a skin speckled and partie coloured like the skin of a Serpent; neither can it open the eye-lids, and it liueth in Caves. This Monster, albeit my selfe haue not seene, yet the common report ouer all Africa affirmeth, that there is such an one.

Of Fowles, and first of the Eagle.

A strange narration.

The Nesir is the greatest Fowle in all Africa, and exceedeth a Crane in bignesse, though the bill, necke, and legs are somewhat shorter. In flying, this Bird mounteth vp so high into the Aire, that it cannot be discerned: but at the sight of a dead carcasse it will immediately descend. This Bird liueth a long time, and I my selfe haue seene many of them vnfeathered by reason of extreme old age: wherefore hauing cast all their feathers, they returne vnto their nest, as if they were newly hatched, and are there nourished by the younger Birds of the same kind. The Italians call it by the name of a Vulture: but I thinke it to be of another kind. They nestle vpon high Rocks, and vpon the tops of wilde and desert Mountaines, especially vpon mount Atlas: and they are taken by such as are acquainted with those places.

The Fowle called Nesir.

The best African Hawkes are white, being taken vpon certaine Mountaines of the Numidian Desarts, and with these Hawkes they pursue the Crane. Of these Hawkes there are diuers kinds, some being vsed to flie at Partridges and Quails, and others at the Hare.

Hawkes.

Parrats there are as big as a Doue of diuers colors, some red, some black, and some ash-coloured, which albeit they cannot so fitly expresse mans speech, yet haue they most sweet & shrill voices.

Parats or Poppiniay.

Of Locusts there are sometimes seene such monstrous swarmes in Africa, that in flying they intercept the Sunne-beames like a thicke Cloud. They deuoure trees, leaues, fruites, and all greene things growing out of the earth. At their departure they leaue egges behind them, whereof other young Locusts breede, which in the places where they are left, will eate and consume all things euen to the very barke of trees, procuring thereby extreme dearth of Corne, especially in Mauritania. Howbeit, the Inhabitants of Arabia Desarta, and of Libya, esteeme the comming of these Locusts as a fortunate boading: for, seething or drying them in the Sunne, they bruse them to powder, and so eate them.

The Locusts.

The greater part of Africa hath none other Salt but such as is digged out of Quarries and Mines, after the manner of Marble or Free-stone, being of a white, red, and gray colour. Barbarie aboundeth with Salt, and Numidia is indifferently furnished therewith: but the Land of Negros, and especially the inner part of Ethiopia, is so destitute thereof, that a pound of Salt is there sold for halfe a Duckat. And the people of the said Regions vse not to set Salt vpon their tables; but holding a crum of Salt in their hands, they lick the same at euery morsell of meate which they put in their mouthes. In certaine Lakes of Barbarie all the Summer time, there is faire and white salt congealed or kernalled, as namely, in diuers places neere vnto the Citie of Fez.

Of Minerals, and Fruits, Rootes, and first of Minerall Salt. One pound of Salt for halfe a Duckat.

Antimonie growing in many places of Africa in the Lead-mines, is separated from the Lead by the helpe of Brimstone. Great plenty of this Minerall is digged out of the bottome of Mount Atlas.

The Minerall called Antimonie.

- Atlas*, especially where Numidia bordereth vpon the Kingdome of Fez. Brimstone likewise is digged in great abundance out of other places of Africa.
- Of Euphorbium. Euphorbium is the Iuyce or Gumme of a certaine Hearbe, growing like the head of a wilde Thistle, betweene the branches whereof grow certaine fruites as big in compasse as a greene cucumber; after which shape or likenesse, it beareth certaine little graines or seedes; and some of the said fruites are an elle long, and some are longer. They grow not out of the branches of the Herbe, but spring out of the firme ground, and out of one flag you shall see sometimes twentie, and sometimes thirtie of them issue forth. The people of the same Region, when the said fruites are once ripe, doe prick them with their knives, and out of the holes proceedeth a Liquor, or Iuyce much like vnto milke, which by little and little groweth thick and slimy. And so being growne thick, they take it off with their knives, putting it in Bladders, and drying it. And the Plant or Hearbe it selfe is full of sharpe prickles.
- Of Pitch. Of Pitch there are two kinds, the one being naturall, and taken out of certaine Stones, which are in Fountaines; the water whereof retained the vsauorie smell and taste of the same; and the other being artificiall, and proceeding out of the Iuniper or Pine-tree: and this artificiall Pitch I saw made vpon Mount Atlas, in manner following. They make a deepe and round furnace with an hole in the bottome, through which hole the Pitch may fall downe into an hollow place within the ground, being made in forme of a little vessell: and putting into the said furnace the boughes of the foresaid trees broken into small pieces, they close vp the mouth of the furnace, and make a fire vnder it, by the heate whereof the Pitch distilleth forth of the wood, through the bottome of the furnace into the foresaid hollow place; and so it is taken vp and put in bladders or bags.
- The Fruit called Musa. Musa is a fruit growing vpon a small tree, which beareth large and broad leaues of a cubit long, hath a most excellent and delicate taste, and springeth forth about the bignesse of a small Cucumber. The Mahumetan Doctors affirme, that this was the fruit which God forbad our first Parents to eat in Paradise, which when they had eaten they couered their nakednesse with leaues of the same fruit, as being of all other leaues most meete for that purpose. They grow in great abundance at Sela, a Towne of the Kingdome of Fez; but in farre greater plenty in the land of Egypt, and especially at Damiata.
- Of Cassia. The trees bearing Cassia are of great thicknesse, hauing leaues like vnto the Mulberie tree. They beare a broad and white Blossome, and are so laden with fruits, that they are constrained to gather great store before they be ripe, least the tree should breake with ouermuch weight. And this kind of tree groweth onely in Egypt.
- The Roote called Taurarghente. The Roote Taurarghente growing in the Westerne part of Africa vpon the Ocean Sea shore, yeeldeth a fragrant and odoriferous smell. And the Merchants of Mauritania carry the same into the Land of Negros, where the people vse it for a most excellent Perfume, and yet they neither burne it, nor put any fire at all thereto: for being kept onely in an house, it yeeldeth a naturall sent of it selfe. In Mauritania they sell a bunch of these Rootes for halfe a Duckat, which being carried to the Land of Negros, is sold againe for eighty, or one hundred Duckats, and sometimes for more.
- The Roote called Addad. The Hearbe Addad is bitter, and the Roote it selfe is so venemous, that one drop of the water distilled thereout, will kill a man within the space of an houre, which is commonly knowne euen to the Women of Africa.
- The Roote called Surnag. The Roote Surnag growing also vpon the Westerne part of Mount Atlas, is said to be very comfortable and preseruatue vnto the priue parts of man, and being drunke in an Electuary, to stirre vp venereall lust, &c. Neither must I here omit that, which the Inhabitants of Mount Atlas doe commonly report, that many of those Damosels which keepe Cattell vpon the said Mountaines, haue lost their Virginitie by none other occasion, but by making water vpon the said Roote: vnto whom I would in merriment answere, that I beleued all which experience had taught, concerning the secret vertue of the same Roote, yea, they affirmed moreouer, that some of their Maidens were so infected with this roote, that they were not onely deflowered of their Virginitie, but had also their whole bodies puffed vp and swolne.
- These are the things memorable and worthy of knowledge, seene and obserued by me John Leo, throughout all Africa, which Country I haue in * all places trauelled quite ouer: wherein whatsoeuer I saw worthy the obseruation, I presently committed to writing; and those things which I saw not, I procured to bee at large declared vnto mee by most credible and substantiall persons, which were themselves eye-witnesses of the same: and so hauing gotten a fit oportunitie, I thought good to reduce these my Trauels and Studies into this one Volume.
- * That is, in Barbarie, Numidia, Libya, and the Land of Negros, and Egypt.
- Forasmuch, as men desire to reade later occurrents, and these my Labours are intended not to the profit and pleasure alone, but to the honour also of the English Name and Nation, I haue added this following Discourse of the late Warres in Barbarie: not yet pursuing them to these Times, but contenting my selfe with the beginnings, and some yeares proceedings thereof, the English hauing (as you shall see) yea, being no small part therein; Quae regio in terris nostri non plena laboris; The voluntarie English aduentures in the Ciuill vnciuill broiles of Ice-frozen Muscovia, of Sunne-scorched Barbarie, of Turkish and Persian Persian fights by Sea, the Mogols by Land, the Sweden, Polish, Germane, Bohemian, Belgian, and many-headed-Italian Broyles neerer home; the Easterne and Westerne Indies, the Artike Northerne Circle, and Southermost Africa remote, haue really exceeded the fabulous Denices of deuising Fblers, in Knight-Aduentures, the Issues and Occupations of idle braines. As for the manner of the Seriffian Family, attayning at first to the Barbarian Scepter, and the monstrous Saint-ship and portentuous power of Side Hamet, getting the Kingdome from the Brethren, and of Side Hia which dispossessed him of it and his life, you haue more full Relations in my Pilgrimage, with other Occurrents. Here it is more fit to let you heare others speake then my selfe.

Collections of things most remarkeable in the History of Barbarie, written by R. O. C.

§. I.

How the Kingdome of Barbarie came to MULEY HAMET XARIF, the late deceased King, and the course of his gouernment; of his Sonnes and their behauiour: SHECK's misgouernment and imprisonment: HAMET's death.

THe Family of the Mareines, being Larbies, were long times Kings of Barbarie: vntill a plaine Hali some hundred yeeres ago, calling himselfe Muley Hamet Xarif, came out of the Countrey of Dara, (lying beyond the Mountaynes of Atlas) with a great number of Mountayners, called in their owne Language Brebers: these with their strength got Mornecos from the Mareins. And going forward following the fertillnesse of the soyle, draue the Mareins out of Fez: getting into his power all the flat Countreyes comprized vnder the Titles of Sus, Mornecos and Fez, from the hills of Atlas to the Streights of Gibraltar. Being thus growne great, hee would proue himselfe a Xarif, that is, one of the Kindred of the Prophet Mahomet, desiring his birth might be held answerable to his new acquired fortunes: But within a little time after this his sodaine inuasion, Sus rebelling, refused his Gouernment, wherefore hee sent to the bordering Turkes for ayde, who fulfilled therein his request. Ayded with these Turkish auxiliary forces, he set forward, and at his entrance into that Kingdome, the Turkish Souldiers through Treason killed him, and cut off his head; sacked Taradant, and running ouer the whole Countrey, spoyled it by the space of two monethes, which done, they would gladly haue returned to Trimasine: yet fearing their owne strength to returne the same way Hamet had brought them; it was held their better course and shorter Iourney, to passe ouer the Mountaynes: but the Mountayners knowing this their new done bloudie fact, and seeing them haue good flore of pillage, set vpon them, so that few or none escaped their hands, but were all slaine. After this Hamet Xarifs death, who raigned some eight yeeres, succeeded his Brother Muley Abdela, hauing all his life time great warre with the Mareins, to keepe that his Brother had conquered: he hauing raigned some fiftene yeeres dyed, leauing behind him thirteene Sonnes, the eldest Muley Abdela (who at his entrance to the Kingdome, commanded all his Brethren to be killed:) but the second Brother Abdelmelech fearing hard measure, fled presently vpon the death of his Father into Turkie, and so saued his life. The third Brother Muley Hamet of whom wee are hereafter to entreate, being held a great Church-man, simple and humble spirited, not any way addicted vnto armes, was spared aliue as lesse feared. The other ten were all put to death in one day at Taradant in Sus, where they were kept in their Fathers life time. This Abdela raigned fortie yeeres, and dying, left behind him three Sonnes, Muley Mehamet, Muley Sheck, Muley Nassar, Muley Mehamet being King, his two young Brethren ranne away into Spaine, the elder whereof named Muley Sheck is yet liuing, and there turned Christian. The younger Brother called Muley Nassar returned into Barbarie, in the fourteenth yeere of Muley Hamets Raigne, who dyed at last. At this Muley Nassars landing in the Countrey of Fez, much people fauoured him and his Title, and two thousand of Muley Shecks Souldiers (who now liueth, and then gouerned Fez, for his Father reuolted from him to Nassar; insomuch, as Muley Sheck was in minde to haue fled vnto his Father. But that Alkeyd Hamet Ben Ian, being a very wise Captaine, and there placed to helpe Muley Sheck by his counsell, who was very young,) kept him from running away: and Muley Nassar with a dilatorie warre, with whom if the Souldiers had stayed, hee might peraduenture haue gotten the Countrey. But their Lent approaching, the Souldiers told Nassar, they would

This is that Seriffe or Xeriffe so often mentioned by Leo, which then began (vnder colour of warring against the Christians both Spaniards and Portugals which had made (as you see in Leo) large entries into Barbary) to vsurpe the State and dispossesse the former Kings. So that euen in order of time and affaires, this Historie fitly succeeds the former of Leo, for Barbary. Of their manner of getting the Kingdome, and the rest of the story, see my Pilgrimage, l. 6. c. 11. §. 2.

would goe keepe their Easter at their owne houses. Whereupon Nassar, thinking if they were once gone, they would neuer returne to him againe, would giue present battaile, and so was this Nassar slaine. Abdelmelech being second Brother to Abdela, got such fauour in Turkie where he liued, as entering Barbarie with foure thousand Turkish Souldiers, he got the Kingdome from his Nephew Mehamet the eldest Sonne of Abdela, and there raigned two yeeres. Muley Mehamet thus depriued of his Kingdome, fled for succour to Sebastian then King of Portugall, who came in person into Barbarie, to helpe him with thirtie thousand men; giuing battaile, the Moores fled, and the Christians retyred, hoping the Moores would returne, that so the Christians might make the greater slaughter of them. According to this expectation Abdelmelech with his Armie returned, and the Christians charged the foremost of their Horse-men very hotly, 10 who would haue fled. But such was the abundance of Abdelmelechs Horse-men, following the foreward which were discomfited, as they could not haue field-roume to flye, but were forced to fight it out. This was a bloudie battaile wherein three Kings lost their liues, Don Sebastian King of Portugall: Muley Mehamet vnto whose ayde Sebastian came ouer: And Abdelmelech who came out of Turkie being second Brother to Abdela; This Abdelmelech left behind him a Sonne yet liuing at this day in Turkie, whose name is Muley Smime. After the death of these two, *Abdela*s third Brother, Muley Hamet Xarif, was made King, raigned about seuen and twentie yeeres in great peace and felicitie, vntill he went to take his Sonne Muley Sheck at Fez, where the Father dyed, whose death hath caused all these Warres, as yee may reade hereafter.

Touching this Muley Hamet, I thought good, to insert this Letter of Master Bernhere, the Sonne 20 of that worthy Augustine Bernhere (as I haue heard) which is so commended by Master Foxe for his zeale in Queene Maries dayes, in the Historie of Bradford, Carelesse, Glouer, &c.

To his louing Brother Master Edward Wright.

THIS King Muley Hamet is much delighted in the studie of Astronomie and Astrologie, and va- 30 lueth Instruments seruing for the course of the Sunne and Moone, that are of rare deuice, exceedingly. Wherefore your Spheare, your Watch, your Mundane Diall, and your Sextans, your new Magneticall Instrument for Declination, or any Astrolable that hath somewhat extraordinarie in it will be accepted: and you might sell the same at good prices. Now with the Eagle, there goe from hence certaine Ambassadors, and one of them is the Kings Secretarie, named Abdala Wahed Anoone, who hath some insight in such matters. This Bearer my friend Master Pate, and Robert Kitchen the Master of the Ship, I thinke, will bring him vnto you, vnto whom I would haue you shew all the varieties of Instruments that you haue either in your owne hands, or haue sold and lent to others; that hee may choose some for the Kings vse and his owne. You may shew them also the Draughts and Lineaments of whatsoeuer you haue in Paper, all which I know, will make them admire and be desirous to haue some that they can vnderstand how to vse. You may cause to be framed some Instruments in Brasse or Sil- 40 uer, leauing the spaces for Arabique words and figures, yet drawing the Pictures of them in Paper exactly, and setting downe the Latine figures, and the words in Latine, or Spanish, which is farre better: there will be found here that can graue the same in Arabique vpon the Instruments hauing some direction from you about the matter. Or Abdala Wahed being a perfect Pen-man, can set the Arabique Letters, figures, and words downe very faire; and so any of your Grauers can worke the same in Metall, hauing his Writing before them. Master Cyprian would be a good Interpreter betweene you and them, or some that vnderstandeth and speaketh both Latine and Spanish, and knoweth what the words of Arte meane.

The experiments Mathematicall of the Load-stone, will content the Ambassadors much. Make no scruple to shew them what you can; for it may redound to your good. I desire to heare more of Mag- 50 neticall workes, and the discovery of the North passage. Write to me thereof, and send any Maps or draughts of instruments, or what you thinke fit about Dyalling, or the course of time, and the motion of the Heauens, which you thinke I can vnderstand: but direct the same either to me, or to one Master Iohn Wakeman, seruant to Master Alderman Hamden; who, though he haue small skill in such things, yet is desirous to see and learne, and can preferre such matters to the view of the King, and his sonnes, who all are exceeding strictious of matters tending this way: so that if I had skill my selfe, or but some of your Instruments, whereof I could make demonstration for their vse, I could giue great content, and be a meane to pleasure you much. But conferre with Master Pate, and Master Kitchen, who will direct you in this businesse, and from whom you may receiue money before hand, for making any instruments that the Ambassadors would haue for themselves or the King.

Your Magneticall Instrument of Declination, would be commodious for a yeerely Voyage, which 60 a Voyage ouer a Landy Sea to some make for the King ouer a Sandy Sea (wherein they must vse Needle and Compasse) to Gago. Gago for Gold. If you question about the matter, and shew them some instrument seruing for this purpose, it will giue great content. Other directions I might adde vnto you; but from the parties aboue named, you may re- ceine ceiue the same fully. And thus with my good will, hoping and wishing to see you shortly, I take my leaue.

This 24. of Iune, 1600. From the Citie of Maroco.

From Maroco in Barbary.

Your louing Brother in-law,
Thomas Bernhere.

Obtaining the Scepter, hee first provided himselfe of the grauest men hee could find in his Kingdomes, to be Counsellors of estate; then of the most experienced, and valiant Souldiers, for Commanders ouer his Campe, and Garrison Townes. And whereas he was Monarch ouer two Nations, the Larbies, and Brebers, he found it requisite to vse a two-fold gouernment. The Larbies dwelling in the most plaine Champion Countrey of his three Kingdomes, Moruecos, Sus, and Fez, were easily gouerned, being of mild and peaceable nature, giuen to thrift and tillage of the ground, sought no alterations, but receiuing from him a due forme of iustice, executed by his Ministers: protecting them from the Montaneirs which are robbers, willingly obeyed his Regall authoritie, and yeerely payed their tenths toward their Kings maintenance. As for the Brebers, or Montaneirs, being of an vntamed and fierce disposition, speaking the Tamiset tongue, which is as much different from the Larbce, as Welch is from our English, dwelling in places by nature defencible, and almost inaccessible: He could not so well gouerne, neither had euer such absolute power ouer them, nor receiued the fift pennie of profite from them, as he did from the Alarbies. Therefore he sought by all meanes to diminish their strength of people, drawing them alwayes into forraigne expeditions, especially into that warre, against the Negros, which continued a long time, thereby extending his Empire so farre that way, as by Camell it was fixe moneths iourney from Moruecos, to the farthest parts of his Dominion. Likewise, he vsed this people to goe with the Carauans to Gago, to fetch home his yeerely Tribute and Custome, whereby many were consumed in traouelling ouer the Saharas: for any offence or robbery committed by them, his sword should punish seuerely, that the rest might feare: diuiding their Countrey into seuerall diuisions or Cantons, in euery of which he placed an Alkeid, with Souldiers to suppress any sudden uproares, much like our Lieutenant set ouer our seuerall Counties, but that the Alkeid is continually resident, and hath greater power in executing Marshall law. And lastly, as pledges of their loyalties, he would get their chiefeest mens sonnes into his hands, bringing them vp in his Court to a more ciuill and delicate kind of life. He was alwaies of mind to keepe peace with Christendome; with Spain, who was his next Potent neighbour; but aboue all loued the English Nation, and admired the late Queenes happie Gouernment, willing to entertaine trading with vs, witnesse his many Letters written to that worthy Lady of happie Memorie, and his Embassage sent vnto her, Anno 1601. Performed by Abdala Wabad Anowne, and Hamet Albadg, their great traouailer to Mecha, and other places.

Toward his subiects he was not too tyrannicall, but sweetned his absolute power and will, with much clemencie. By diuers wayes he got excessiue store of gold. First, by seeing his tenths truly payd from the Larbces: Secondly, by trading with the Negro, taking vp the salt at Tegazza, and selling it at Gago, hauing from thence returne in good gold. Thirdly, by husbanding his Maseraws, or Ingenewes, where his Sugar Canes did grow, (though now all spoyled with these warres) for it is sufficiently knowen, all of them about Moruecos, Taradant, and Magador, were yeerely worth vnto him, fixe hundred thousand ounces at the least. I omit his loue he tooke in entertaining forraigne Artizans, the reedifying of his house in Moruecos, getting Italian Marbles, the richest that could bee bought for money, and workemen hired from thence at great wages. His sumptuous prouisions for the Sarraile, and maintenance of his women, not so much delighting in the sinne, as his predecessors had done before, as to shew his glory, because the fashion of the Countrey is such, to shew their riches and greatnesse vpon that fraile sexe, and their attendances. For his chiefeest pleasures were to see the Gallantrie of his kingdomes, managing their good Barbarian Steeds, and the Falchons vpon their wing, making faire flights after the Heron: for these sports he was provided, no man better, from which he was recalled by certaine discontents, which as clouds fore-ran his owne Sun-set.

At the time of his death, he left fve sonnes aliue. The eldest Muley Mahemet, commonly called Muley Sheck, a Title giuen alwayes to the eldest of the Kings sonnes: The second, Muley Boferes, which two sonnes were both by one woman, a Negra, one of his Concubines: The third son Muley Sidan, whom he had by one of his wiues: The fourth sonne Muley Nassar, who was about the age of nineteene yeers: And the fift, Muley Abdela, about fourteene yeers old at the time of the old Kings death, and these two last were the sons of two seuerall Concubines. This deceased King in his life time, had placed his three elder sonnes in seuerall parts of his Kingdomes, to gouerne for him in them, to Muley Sheck his eldest he had giuen the Kingdome of Fez, which Kingdome hath in former times continually bene allotted by the late Kings of Barbary to their eldest sonnes: Muley Boferes he placed in his Kingdome of Sus, to Muley Sidan he gaue the Prouine of Tedula, which lyeth in the mid-way betweene Moruecos and Fez: his two younger sonnes Muley Nassar, and Abdela remained with him in his house, whom by reason of their young yeeres, he had not as yet placed in any part of his Kingdome. The eldest sonne Muley Sheck in his younger yeeres gouerned Fez, and thole parts of Barbarie, with great approbation of his Father, through the Counsell of Basha Mustepha a Spanish Renegado: which Basha in continuance of time, grew into such fauour with him, that the whole Gouernment of the Kingdome of Fez was wholly by Muley Sheck put in his hands: Whereupon, the Alkieds of the Countrey that were naturall borne Moores, and continuall attendants vpon the old King, enuying the greatnesse of the said Basha, raised diuers accusations against him: Complaining to the King that he learned Muley Sheck to drinke wine (a thing vnlawfull to the Moores, being forbidden them by their Prophet Mahomet) and that now hauing the whole Gouernment of the Kingdome of Fez in his hands, vnder the Kings son, he purposed after he had possessed himself of Muley Shecks Treasure, to flie, and carrie it with him to some parts of Christendome. Which accusations, the old King vpon some probabilities and likelihoods, conceiuing to be true, these Alkieds procured at last with him, that he should send to his sonne Muley Sheck, commanding him to send the head of the said Basha, which command; howsoeuer, Muley Sheck (who greatly loued, and fauoured the said Basha) at the first delayed to performe, yet after diuers messages, the old King sending at the last a principall seruant of his, to see the execution done, he was forced much against his will, to see fulfilled.

In these younger yeeres of Muley Sheck, whilest this Basha was aliue, none of the Kings sonnes was more dutifull to their father then he, neither any of their actions so contented the old King as his; insomuch, as the whole Kingdome hope for a successor after the old Kings decease, was onely in Muley Sheck. Whereupon, and by the Kings voluntary motion, all the principall Alkieds, and men of Command that were in the Kingdome, by solemne oath vowed allegiance to Muley Sheck, after the old Kings decease. And at that time Boferes the second sonne, by reason of the great plague in Sma, and other discontents, he receiued from that rebellious people, stayed not long there, but returned againe to his Father in Moruecos, where he stayed with him vntill his Fathers departure to Fez in September, 1602. Muley Sidan the third sonne, continued in Tedula, (a Prouince fruitfull and scituate in the flat of Barbarie, the mid-way betweene Fez and Moruecos, as I haue told you) who gouerned those parts in great peace and quietnesse, euen in the chiefe times of the tumults that were in the bordering Dominions of his eldest Brother Sheck, (whereof you shall read hereafter) insomuch, that hee was generally commended and liked both of his Father and of all the Kingdome for his gouernment, being strict in seeing the execution of Iustice to be done in those parts that hee gouerned, not sparing his Kindred or neereft Followers in those cases: From his infancy hee naturally hated all maner of Theeues whatsoeuer, especially those his robbed by the high-ways, and without any fauour or mercy severely punished them. Howsoeuer, he carryed himselfe very dutifull to his Father, whilest hee was liuing, yet from his child-hood he was alwayes of an aspiring and ambitious nature, which could neuer be brought to subiect it selfe to giue any awfull respect to his elder Brethren, but to hazard his whole estate in obtayning the Kingdome, accounting himselfe his Fathers lawfull heire, in that he was his Fathers eldest Sonne, which he had by any of his married Wiues: In this point, not regarding the custome & Law of the Moores, who in title of Inheritance or succession, respect not the mother, whether she be married Wife or Concubine bought with money, so that her Sonne be the eldest in birth.

But to returne againe to Muley Sheck the Kings eldest Sonne, who after the death of his Basha Mustepha, (beheaded by his Fathers command) soone shewed vnto all men the want of gouernment that was in him; for in his latter times, giuing himselfe ouer to drunkenesse, and other detestable vices, which amongst the Moores commonly accompanieth that sinne, regarded not at all the gouernment of his Kingdome, but suffered his seruants, followers, and Souldiers to doe what they would in robbing and spoyling the goods of his honest minded Subiects, without controlment: And through want of Iustice duely executed, his whole Countrey in a short time swarmed so with theeues and robbers by the high wayes, that there was no traouelling through his Dominions, but in Cassilas or companies of three hundred & foure hundred persons at a time, and they hardly sometimes escaped the hands of theeues. The Alarbies, who continue to this day, in Tribes and kindreds, beeing the husbandmen of the Countrey, liuing in the fields in Tents, by Tilling of the Ground, and breeding vp of Cattell, when as they could not quietly gather in, and peaceably enioy the Corne and Fruits of the Ground, denied to pay the King their accustomed duetie: and in the fields followed the courses of Muley Shecks seruants in the Citie, in robbing of all passengers that came within their power. And such was the lawlesse manner of spending and consuming of his Treasure, that in his humours, hee neither regarded what he gaue, nor to whom: in so much, that a Iew who was a Musician, and vsed to play before him in his drunken fits, (what with the gifts giuen him by the Prince, and what else he got out of his house) had gotten together in money and Iewels, (in the space of foure or five yeeres) to the value of foure hundred thousand Duckats, which is about fortie thousand pound sterling.

This dissolute life and carelesse gouernment of Muley Sheck, grieved the old King not a little, especially especially to see such a change or alteration in him, whose forwardnesse in former times had been the stay of his age, and had mooued him to cause the Alkeids of the Kingdome, by oath to confirme their alleageance after his owne death. Many wayes he sought to amend what was amisse in those parts, and to draw his sonne to a more strict course of life, and more carefull kind of gouernment, as well by his Lettets, as by sending diuers principall Alkeids to be Counsellors vnto him. Yet such was the small account he made either of the one or the other, that the old King in the end seeing no amendment, but the estate of that Kingdome to grow daily worse and worse, determined to goe to Fez in his owne person with an Armie, aswell to displace his sonne who had denied to come vnto him, vpon his sending for: as also to put in order all matters in those parts, which through the ill gouernment of his sonne, were all out of frame. And so about the beginning of October, 1602. hee set forwards from Mornecos with an Army of eight thousand Shot, and some five thousand Horse towards Fez, leauing his second sonne Muley Boferes to gouerne Mornecos and Sis in his absence, vntill his returne; making such speedy iourneys, that hee was with his Forces within one dayes iourney of Fez, before his sonne Muley Sheck was certainly aduised of his setting forth from Mornecos. Who, when he vnderstood of his Fathers being so neere, and himselfe euery way vnprouided to resist him, would haue fled towards Tafilat; but being followed by Basha Mustepha, he was constrained to take Sanctuary, with five hundred of his best souldiers, being very good Shot and well provided. The old King the Father, seeing his sonne take the Priuiledge of the place (which is much respected in that Country) willed him to come forth, and submit himselfe to his mercy: But Muley Sheck refused, either obstinate in not obeying, or fearefull he could not render a good account of his five and twentie yeares gouernment in Fez. Wherefore Muley Hamet commanded Mustepha, a Basha of Sidans, though then in the old Muleys seruice, to take three thousand men, and perforce to enter the place; which he performed, bringing Sheck prisoner, and the rest of his company which were left aliue after the conflict. The old man would in no wise admit him into his presence, but committed him to the charge and custodie of Basha Iudar, one of greatest place about the King, who carried Sheck to Mickanes, a strong Garrison Towne, and there remained vntill the time of his Fathers death, which was some five moneths after.

The old King in his iourney to Fez, against his eldest sonne, passed by the Prouince of Tedula, and from thence tooke along with him his third sonne, Muley Sidan, whom he commanded to remoue his household to Fez, from Sidania (a Citie which he had begun to build in Tedula, and called it after his owne name) intending to leaue him Vice-roy of those parts, in the roome of his eldest sonne, whom he purposed to carry with him from Mickanes, where he was prisoner to Mornecos; which he had also performed, if hee had not been preuented by sudden death. For in August, 1603. he hauing set all matters in order in those parts of Fez, prouiding for his returne to Mornecos, put out his Tents without Fez Gates; but being abroad, he suddenly fell sicke, and his sicknesse so sore increased, that on Thursday falling sicke, on Sunday morning being the fourteenth of August, 1603. he died.

Muley Sidan, by reason his Mother Lilla Isha gouerned the old Kings House, vnderstood of his Fathers death, before it was noysed abroad; whereupon hee presently went forth into his Fathers Camp and Tents, from whence he carried away all such Iewels and treasure as he found there. And after his Fathers death, hee caused himselfe in Fez to be proclaimed King of Barbarie, as lawfull Heyre of his deceased Father. Lilla Iohora, Mother to Muley Sheck, and Muley Boferes, seeing her eldest Sonne in prison, and void of all meanes to helpe himselfe at that instant, was not vnmindfull of her second Sonne Boferes, whom the old King had left to gouerne Mornecos during his absence. To whom shee dispeeded presently Letters by one of the Kings Eunuchs; who made such haste, that in foure dayes hee came from Fez to his Tents, which were some two leagues from Mornecos, where hee had lien all the Summer before (to auoide the infection of the Plague, which had been that Summer in Mornecos) and with him was his younger Brother Muley Nassar, and his eldest Brothers Sonne Muley Abdela. Muley Boferes vnderstanding of his Fathers death, presently entred Mornecos, and gat possession of the Alcasana, his Fathers House, before the newes of his Fathers death was noysed noysed abroad, and generally knowne, fearing how the Alkeids, and people of Morruecos might stand affected vnto him, and knowing that if he had once possession of the Alcasana, and of his Fathers treasure, he had the best part of the Kingdome. And the next day after his entrance, he caused to be published generally thorow the whole Citie, the newes of his Fathers death; and withall, himselfe to be proclaimed King: writing Letters to the Vice-roy of Sus to doe the like in Taradant, the chiefe Citie of that Kingdome; the which he accordingly performed. Muley Nassar, the fourth sonne of the deceased King, hauing been all the Summer abroad with his brother Boseres, when now he vnderstood of his Fathers death, followed his brother a faire off, as though he meant to haue entred Morruecos with him: but comming to the Gates of the Citie, in company with Muley Abdela his Nephew, being sonne to Muley Sheck, with whom he was familiar, conferred with him about their flying into the Mountaines, perswading Muley Abdela, that he might no waies put any trust in Boseres, since his father and hee were the chiefe impediments, that hindred Boseres from claiming the Kingdome by course of iustice; his Father, Muley Sheck being the old Kings eldest sonne, and he the eldest Sonne of his Father. Besides, his Father being in prison so neare Fez, where Muley Sidan was, it was to bee doubted, that Muley Sidan had already gotten him into his power, and it might be, had made some agreement with him already, to ioyne both against Muley Boseres: which if it should so fall out, would cause Boseres to deale more cruelly with him. But these perswasions moued not Abdela, who rather chose to enter the Citie, and follow his Vncle, on whose curtesie he would relie. Though Nassar fearing how Boseres would deale with him, with all speed fled into the Mountaines to the Kindred of his Mother, from whence after a few dayes with some eight hundred, or a thousand of those people whom he ioined together, he passed into the Plaines of Sus, sending to the Alkeid in Taradant to proclaime him King, or else to suffer him quietly to depart. But the Alkeid hauing already proclaimed Muley Boseres, withstood him, and hee hauing no meanes wherewith to pay his souldiers and people that he had gathered together, was soone left of all, and so returned againe to his Mothers Kindred, and liued priuately there about seuen moneths, and then died of the plague, or as some reported, secretly poysoned, was brought to Morruecos, and there buried.

But to returne to Fez and those parts: after the death of the old King (Sidan being now proclaimed King in Fez; Boseres in Morruecos and Sus; and Muley Sheck prisoner in Mickanes, in the keeping of Basha Iudar) the Souldiers being abroad in their Tents, without Fez Gates, began to be in a muteny, as well for sixteene moneths pay, which the old King owed them, as also about their returne to Morruecos, where the most part of them had left their wiues and children. To appease this mutenie, Muley Sidan sent out of Fez, vnto them Alkeid Hamet Monfore, their chiefe Commander in the old Kings time, to promise them as well content in payment, as also a speedy returne to Morruecos with Muley Sidan himselfe. But Monfore in stead of pacifying, laboured to increase their mutenous humours, and at last agreed with them suddenly in the night to take vp their tents, and to march with him to Morruecos, alleaging vnto them both the vncertaintie of Muley Sidans pay, and the small likelihood of any speedy iourney hee meant to take to Morruecos. And being to passe within a little of Mickanes, where the Basha kept Muley Sheck prisoner, he wrote vnto the said Basha to know his intent, whither he would goe to Morruecos or no with him. To whom the Basha came, and brought Muley Sheck with him, whom they brought along as prisoner to Morruecos, and deliuered him vp to his brother Boseres, who kept him close prisoner in his House, some foure or five moneths, vntill the coming of Muley Sidan against him in battell, by this meanes thinking to haue established the whole Kingdome to Muley Boseres; who now, besides the possession of the Citie of Morruecos, and his Fathers treasure, had brought vnto him the greatest part of his Fathers forces, and his elder brother put prisoner into his hands. Muley Sidan being thus deceiued by Monfore, and likewise by diuers other principall Alkeids (who had secretly departed from Fez, and left him) forthwith dispeeded one Mustefa, a Renegado of his owne, whom he had made a Basha, with two thousand Shot, and some Companies of Horse to Tedula, aswel to receiue from the Alarbies, those duties which they alwaies pay vnto their King, as also to stop, and returne to Fez, whomsoever he should find flying from thence to Morruecos, keeping possession of that Prouince for his vse. He made likewise great preparations both of Horse and Foot in Fez, to be alwaies readie to accompany himselfe in person if need should so require, hauing with him in Fez of principall Alkeids, Azus, chiefe Counsellor to the late deceased King, and Lord ouer his Bulemel: Bocrasia, Absadiks, and diuers others.

Muley Boseres likewise in Morruecos, fore-slacked no time in making preparation to send forth against him, sending first Alcaide Gowie with some sixe hundred men to make prouision of Corne, and other victuals amongst the Alarbies; and after he had certaine news of Muley Sidans forces to be in Tedula, he sent out his Basha Iudar with five thousand Shot, choyce men; foure Pieces of Artilerie, and certaine Companies of Horse to enter Tedula, and to giue battell to Mustefa the Generall of Sidans forces, or perforce to driue him out of that Country. At whose coming, ming thither, Mustefa seeing himselfe no waies strong enough to encounter with Indar, retyred backe againe with his Armie out of Tedula; and Indar destroyed the foundation of Sidania, (which Muley Sidan at his being in Tedula had begun to build vpon the Riuer of Morbaie, and called it Sidania, after his owne name) likewise waisted and destroyed the Country thereabout, at least so many of the Kindreds of the Alarbies as he knew to be friends to Muley Sidan, or those that would not acknowledge Boferes for King. Sidan vnderstanding what Indar had done in Tedula, and likewise of the great preparations that his brother in Mornecos daily made to send out against him, forthwith put forth his Tents, and ioyned together his whole forces, which were some eight or nine thousand Shot, and some twelue thousand Horse, with two and twentie Pieces of Artillerie, himselfe in person going along with them. And because hee was altogether vnprovided of skillfull Gunners for his Ordnances, he procured from Salie out of certaine English men of warre, who at that instant were there, two English Gunners, to whom he committed the charge of his Artillerie: but by reason of much raine that had fallen, it being in the moneth of Ianuarie, 1604. the ground in many places was so soft, that they could not march with their Artillerie so fast as need required; so that his Artillerie neuer came at the battell, which was thought to be a chiefe cause of his ouerthrow.

Sidania destroyed.

English Gunners.

Whilest these preparations were in hand on either side, Muley Boferes sent certaine Fokers, held of great estimation amongst the Moors, to his brother Muley Sidan, to treat conditions of peace: howbeit, after their dispeeding from Mornecos, hee omitted no time and diligence in sending forth new Armies and fresh supplies, both of souldiers and prouision, to Indar Bascha that was in Tedula, and vnderstanding for certaine that his brother Sidan was in the field in person (because he himselfe had neuer been inured to trauell, and knowing it would bee no small discouragement to his side, and encouragement to the other, that Sidan should be in person in the field, and no other his equall in Bloud in his Armie to withstand him) hee concluded a colourable Peace betweene himselfe and his eldest brother Muley Sheck, whom vntill that time hee kept close prisoner in his house, agreeing with him that hee should goe forth into his Armie, and ioyn with Indar to fight against Muley Sidan, whom if hee ouerthrew in battell, hee should enjoy the Kingdome of Fez, and so much of those Easterne parts of Barbarie, as hee inioyed in their Fathers time: on condition, that at his entrance into Fez, he should proclaim Muley Boferes King, and himselfe onely Vice-roy, and so still acknowledge his gouernment there, as deriued from Boferes. And to the intent Muley Sheck should the better obserue these conditions according to their agreement, hee was to leaue his eldest sonne in pawne with Muley Boferes in Mornecos. On these plausible conditions, Muley Sheck was set at libertie, a happy turne for himselfe as hee thought, who neuer looked for any better but perpetuall imprisonment, with much miserie. But the truth is, Bascha Indar had secret aduertisement from his Master Boferes (yet not so secret, but it was knowne to Muley Sheck, and closely carried of him by interception of Letters betwixt Mornecos and the Campe in Tedula), that hee should abridge Muley Sheck of any command in the Campe, or matter of counsell in ordering of the Fight; onely shew him to the Souldiers vnder his Canopie, that the Fezes who were the strength of *Sidan*s Armie, might know Sheck was in the Campe of Boferes, whom they loued in regard partly of his long abode amongst them, but especially of his great liberalitie, or rather prodigalitie, formerly shewed vnto them, which wrought much in their minds at the ensuing battell: and withall the Bascha had a speciall charge sent, and his Guard so to watch him, that (if hee got the battell) hee should bring Muley Sheck in Yrons as safe a prisoner from the Campe to Mornecos, as once hee had done from Mickanes. But this being discovered, Muley Sheck so shuffled his Game, that though Indar won the Field, Muley Sheck escaped vnto Fez, and was louingly entertained of the Citizens, proclaiming himselfe King of Barbarie.

Fokers are men of good life, which are only giuen to peace. Leo calls them Hermites; other call them Talbies and Saints: they are held in great reputation of sanctitie. M. Sheck set at libertie.

Policies.

But retorne we to the Fokers, treating about conditions of Peace in Fez with Muley Sidan, who by intelligence vnderstood from Mornecos of the fresh supplies of Souldiers, daily sent out by his brother to the Bascha, whereby hee greatly suspected thole offers of Peace, to bee but a deuice to prolong the time, whilest his whole forces were in a readinesse, and then suddenly to haue come vpon him vnawares, before he should be provided for him. And therefore hee returned the Fokers with denials of the offered conditions of Peace, and himselfe thinking to take the oportunitie and aduantage of the time, before either his brothers new forces should come to the Bascha, or Muley Sheck his eldest brother be set at libertie. He cauled with all diligence to be gotten together some two thousand Mules and Horses, and vpon euerie Mule to bee set two Souldiers with their furniture, and so (without any stay for the rehalling of Tents, or carrying along of his Artillerie with him) to bee with all haste possible, sent and ioyned to the Almohalla of Alkeid Mustefa which lay hard by the Riuer of Morbaie, in the sight of the Almohalla of Bascha Indar, the Riuer onely betweene them: hee himselfe likewise in person went along with some seuen or eight thousand of his Horsemen, thinking by this meanes to come with the chiefeest and best of his forces vpon Bascha Indar, before the Bascha should expect him, or before the comming of Muley Sheck, who for his liberalitie and bounty in former times, was greatly beloued of all the Souldiers both of Fez, and also of Moruecos. But this policie of his herein tooke no place, for Muley Sheck after hee was set at libertie, made such speedie Iournies that he came to the Almohalla of the Basha, before the Muley Sidan had certaine intelligence of his libertie, and yet hee entred the Almohalla but on the Tuesday, the battel being fought vpon the Friday following. Muley Sidan vnderstanding for certayne that his eldest Brother was come into the Basha his Almohalla, thought it no time for him to deferre giuing of Battayle, least it should be knowne amongst his Souldiers, (many of whom in former times had serued the said Muley Sheck.) And therefore on Friday the sixt of January 1604. the Forces of each side met and ioyned together, betweene whom there was no long fight, for vpon the discharging of foure Peeces of Artillery, (which Indar Basha had with him) some three or foure times, a great part of the Souldiers of Muley Sidan beganne to flye: except some choice men which were in that part of the Battayle where the Muley himselfe was: by reason of the resolution of their Commander, continued somewhat longer, but in the end fled when as the Canopie ouer Muley Sidans head was shot downe with a Piece of Ordnance. At which mischance, and not before, the Muley himselfe began to leaue the field; who in the managing of this battayle was some thing to be blamed; for being come to his Campe an houre before day, he should not haue delayed two houres and more the present on-set, gazing in his Enemies face, and giuing them time to ready themselves to fight, whom otherwise hee might haue taken at the disper-view, and his Fezzes whom he halfe mistrusted, no premeditation to reuolt or runne away. On Muley Shecks side few were slaine, and of Muley Sidans side the greatest number was some fixe hundred men.

Fokers suspected, and peace denied.

The three Brethren thus struiuing for the Golden Ball of Soueraigntie, Iustice was trodden downe. The Larbes robbed one another, the strongest carrying away all. Quarrels betwixt Families and Tribes, which durst not be talked of in old Muley Hamets time, came to be decided with the Sword. After this battaile all wayes were stopped with Robbers, no trading from the Port Townes to Moruecos, without great strength of men. Muley Boferes (who had the Imperiall seat) was neither so fit for action, or to doe Iustice, as Muley Sidan who had lost the day. And that the Kindred, called Weled Entid, well knew, which presuming vpon the soft nature of Boferes and their owne strength, which consisted of fiftene thousand horse, foraged vp to Moruecos gates, fore-closed all passages for Trauellers, making Merchants goods their prizes: Whereas an exemplary punishment executed vpon them for their robbing in Fez by Muley Sidan, whilest he reigned there, made them thinke the Countrey too hot: For Sidan commanded Alkeid German with two thousand Souldiers in hostile manner, to fall vpon the next Dwar of Tents belonging to that Tribe, to burne Man, Woman, Childe, Kine, Sheepe, and whatsoeuer belonged to them, not to spare it vpon his owne life from Fire and Sword, which fully executed and so bloudily, that Muley Sidan sighed hearing the true report, yet it made Fez the peaceablest part in Barbarie. But returne we to Sidans fortunes after he lost the field, hauing the ouerthrow, retyred backe to Fez, and forthwith was Alkeid Azus (the onely man in the latter dayes of the old King, fauored by the whole Countrey) dispeeded towards Moruecos, to treat of a peace, and himselfe beganne to make head againe to resist such forces as should follow him; but before he could bring his forces together againe, newes was brought vnto him that his Brother Muley Sheck, was neere at hand with certain companies of Horse-men, and that the whole Almohalla of the Basha was not farre behind. So that then hee was rather to consider of, and to prouide for his escaping by flight, then any wayes to resist: and hauing before put some nine hundred thousand Duckats in Allarocha, for the which money he had sent one of his Alkeids after his returne from the battayle; hee thought it his best course to passe that way, and to take that money along with him, but he was followed so hardly by Alkeid Abdela Wahad, and Alkeid Vmsoud Vmbily, Boferes Seruants, that he was forced to flye directly towards Trimisine, and to leaue that Treasure behind him which was taken by his Brother Mley Sheck.

In these his frowning fortunes, the most of his Alkeids left him, and amongst others Mumine Bocrasia flying to Moruecos, in whom he put no small trust: and more then the Seruants of his house, he had no man of account but forooke him, onely Alkeid Absadicke, Hado Tabid, and Mustepha; the two latter of them being his household Seruants, and belonging to him in his Fathers time, left him not in his aduersitie: So that any Alkeid of the Cassas or Castes in Barbarie, he had no more then Absadicke, who rather then he would leaue him (although allured by the perswasions of his Brother Alkeid Abdela Wahad, and entreated by the teares of his Sonne to returne, both of them then being in the pursuit of Muley Sidan, and in a Playne ouertooke the said Absadicke, yet he left his house and children at the mercie of Muley Boferes his Master and Enemy. The Alkeids who followed in pursuite of Muley Sidan, followed him so hard, that besides the treasure of Allarocha, they likewise tooke much of the Muleys Treasure that hee carryed along with him, although with that small company of Horses, which were no more then twentie Horse-men or thereabout, hee returned many times, and fought with those who pursued him, in person, being still one of the foremost in these Skirmishes, vntill Alkeid Vmbilie who pursued him, admiring his resolution, and pittying his miserable estate, requested his Ma-iestie iestie to keepe on his way, and saue himselfe by flight, he not purposing to pursue him any further. And so the Muley in this miserable estate (forsaken almost of all) kept on his way to Trimasine a Towne bordering vpon the Turkes, in the Frontiers of the Kingdome of Argiers: and the Alkeids who pursued him, returned againe to Fez.

§. III.

MVLEY SHECK proclaymeth himselfe King in Fez. SIDAN goeth to Tafilet, from thence into Sus. Peace concluded betweene MVLEY BOFERES, and MVLEY SIDAN. ABDELA SHECKS Sonne escapeth Sir ANTHONY SHERLEYS Embassage, Bountie and State.

After Muley Sidans flight in this manner, Muley Sheck entred Fez, where hee was ioyfully receiued of them, proclaymed himselfe King, and not Gouernour vnder his Brother Boferes. And it being in the time of Rummadan, all the Almohallas of Mornecos returned home against the Pascha: from whence after the celebration of the Feast, they were sent forth to all parts of the Country against the Larbies: among whom were as great Ciuill Warres, as among the Brethren, for in this time of so many Kings, they would acknowledge none, or pay duty to any of the three Brethren. Whereupon Hamet Monsore with three thousand Souldiers, was sent into Sus in the moneth of Aprill, 1604. but his men dying of the Plague (which was very hot at that time) and thereby the Larbies little regarding his power, would bring him no victuals, so that with the remaynder of his men, he was contrayned to returne towards Mornecos. Diuers other Almohallas were sent abroad into seuerall parts of the Countrey, but in the beginning of Iune, newes comming of Muley Sidans returne from Trimasine to Tafilet, they were all sent for by Boferes to returne to Mornecos, and be ioyned together the second time against Muley Sidan: who hauing some few monethes liued about Trimasine with some fiftie Souldiers, went towards Tafilet, about which part liued the Cassa or Caste of Alkeid Absadock (who was Master of the Hawkes to Muley Hamet) and brought to Sidan, of his Caste some twelue hundred Horses, with which force he entered Tafilet: The Alkeid of Muley Boferes flying to Dara or Draw with his Souldiers. In Tafilet, Muley Sidan stayed some forty dayes, where he vnderstood perfectly of the estate of Sus, and had Letters from diuers of his Wel-willers there: vnderstanding of Alkeid Hamet Monsores departure from thence: And that the Shebanites which is the greatest Cast in all Barbarie, and the Casse or Cast of the Muleys Mother, would not acknowledge Boferes for King, and likewise, how most of all the Casts in Sus desired his comming thither: Whereupon hee prepared what Forces he could there get, to goe into Sus. Muley Boferes vpon the first newes of his Brothers comming to Tafilet, called in all his Almohallas, and ioyning some foure thousand shot of them besides Horse, sent them from Mornecos to Dara, vnder the command of his Son Muley Abdelmelech, with whom went diuers principall Alkeids, as Alkeid Gowie, Umbilie, and Mumine Bocrasia, who in the first battayle of Muley Sidan was a principall man of command on his side, and after his ouerthrow fled from him to Mornecos, with diuers others. The chiefe intent of these Forces was to stop the passages from thence to Sus, which Muley Sidan perceiuing before the comming of their whole Forces, he passed by Alcatony, where the Horse-men on each side skirmished, the Footmen not being able to come vp, and some slaine of either side, but no man of account, saue onely Alkeid Mumine Bocrasia, who as some reported dyed with thirst, beeing ouer-heated (the battayle beeing fought in the middest of Iuly) or as others reported, beeing wounded, and returning to his Tent, calling for water, after hee had drunke it presently dyed; whose death was little lamented or pittied of the Moores, they saying, hee was iustly rewarded for being a Traytour to Muley Sidan his Master, who was not onely contented to leaue him in his misfortunes, and to flye to his Brother, but also to goe forth into the field against him.

Muley Sidans Forces were so small, that he was not able to match in strength the Forces of his Enemies, & therefore was contrayned to passe into Sus by the way of the Sahara, and durst not passe by Draw: In which Sands for want of water, both he and his whole company had almost perished, and after much misery indured in that Iourney, hee arriued at Aca, where Sidie Abdela Imbark the great Foker dwelleth, the friendship of whom obtayned, hee knew that all his Brothers Forces could not dispossesse him of the Kingdome of Sus, in such great reuerence is that Church-man held in those parts, that the people will obey none, but whom he commandeth them.

He being come hither, the Foker by letters to Muley Boferes, then at Mornecos, procured that there might be a Treaty of peace betweene the two brethren: Whereupon, in August following,

Anno

Rummadan, is Lent.

Ciuill combustions amongst the Larbies.

Death of Bocrasia.

Peace concluded betwixt Boferes and Sidan.

Anno 1604. Alkeyd Azus was sent to Muley Sidan to Aca, where by the endeouours of the said Alkeyd and the Foker, a peace was concluded, betweene Muley Boferes and his brother Muley Sidan, this to inioy the Kingdome of Sus, and the other the residue of the Empire, whereupon Sidan peaceably entered Taradant the chiefe City in that Kingdome: vpon whose entrance thither, Sus which in all former times had beene the most vnquiet and rebellious part of all Barbary, through his execution of Iustice, became the onely peaceable and well gouerned Countrey of that Kingdome, all other parts of Barbarie, that were vnder the gouernment, and belonging to the other two brethren, as then remaining very vnquiet, and full of all tumults: Neither was his gouernment any way to be misliked, but that scarce settled, he charged the Countrey with greater impositions then his Father euer demanded, insomuch as Sedie Abdela Imbark, who was the onely man that first brought him thither, reprooued his courtes: and the Mountainers of Atlas, being good Souldiers, excellent shot, and their dwelling by nature defencible, finding his yoke too heauy, the lesse regarded him or his power; which humour of theirs was nourished by secret practises of Boferes, loth that Sidan should either grow great in friends, or treasure. But the Inhabitants of the Plaine and lower Regions felt the smart of his rod, knowing their throats lay at his mercy, when as the Mountainers defended themselves with open armes, and oftentimes gaue the new king his hands full.

The peace concluded betwixt Boferes and Sidan, by the meanes of Abdela Imbark, and Azus, the wisest Counsellor that Barbary hath: we will leaue Sidan at Sus, seeking his owne end once more to become Master of Mornecos, and returne to Boferes, who was troubled which way to contriue the regaining of Muley Sheck: who like a Bird had broken cage, and was flowne to Fez, making a faire pretence to gouerne but as Vice-roy, yet secretly practised with forraine States, either to make them his friends, whereunto he might flie, if Muley Boferes by force should driue him out of Fez, or rather then he would lose footing in Afrike, determined to bring in forraine power, for his aid. Wherefore Boferes fearing a Christian storme which might haile bullets, was carefull to keepe Abdela, Muley Sheck his eldest son, the safer to keepe the father surer from doing mischief. But it happened the plague was sharpe in Mornecos, therefore Boferes sent his son Muley Abdelmelech some fife miles soorth of Mornecos with his Tents, and Muley Sheck sonne with him, but either his keepers were negligent and corrupted, or else young Abdela too wilie, for one night he made escape out of the Campe, and hauing horses ready layd, posted to his Father at Fez. This gallant being at liberty, sought all meanes to defend his Title, being the eldest brothers sonne: his stirring spirit and youthfull hope drew all the minds of the Fezzes vnto him: insomuch as Muley Boferes sore afflicted with his escape, but more with the newes of his preparations, dispeeded Azus vnto Muley Sidan then in Sus, with request he would goe personally to battaile against Sheck and Abdela his sonne: Muley Sidan well entertained this message, and with all conuenient speed drawing his owne forces together, came within halfe a dayes iourney of Mornecos, there pitching his Tents, but not determining to hazard his fortune, or trust the price of his owne head vnder his brothers hands, yet daily he sent letters by his seruants of great credite, wherein he was willing to vndertake the charge of warre against Abdela, so that he might make choise of Captaines and Commanders, and such proportion of Souldiers as he thought fit, to vndergoe an action of such import. This proposition was neither liked of Boferes or his Counsell, yet making faire weather to Muley Sidan, letters passed from him daily of great loue forced with many complements, much misliking his brothers mistrust, not daring to ieopard his person within Mornecos.

Muley Sidan meaning to proue what correspondency his brother Boferes heart carried with his hand, framed a letter which was sent as from the chiefeest man in those Mountaine Countreys of Atlas, to Muley Boferes, full of duety and seruices, offering withall to send him Sidan head, who was encamped within his Countrey, at the foot of the hilles. Answer to this letter was returned with great thanks, and a large reward of gold promised, if a businesse of that high and important seruice would be performed. When Sidan by this had construed his brothers meaning, he raysed Campe, went to Tafilet, and remained in the Countrey of Dara, gathering in of money and men, after two moneths spent with his brother to no effect at all. Boferes seeing Sidan departed, and destitute of his helpe for Fez, committed his Campe to Abdelmelech his owne son, who was to be aduised by the Counsels of Basha Iudar, Alkeyd Hamet Monfore, Sedy Gowie, and Alkeyd Bokerse (thorow whose hands passed all businesse of Christian Merchants, so well dispatched, and so good regard thereof taken, that he was well liked of euery man for his good dealing.) This Campe being come within a dayes iourney of Fez, which is twenty dayes march from Mornecos, there the Souldiers fell to a mutenie, and three thousand of them reuolted vnto Sheck, crying openly, Long liue Muley Sheck. Hereupon Abdelmelech called a Counsell of warre, wherein it was concluded, though their number were twice as many, to returne without blow giuen backe to Mornecos, perceiuing indeed their Souldiers hearts quite alienated from them.

S. Anth. Sherley an Englishman sent Ambassador from the Emperour.

About this time being the beginning of October, arriued at Saphia Sir Anthony Sherley, as Ambassadour from the Emperour of Germanie, to the King of Mornecos: his attendance was better better then a priuate man, though somewhat wanting of the person from whom he was sent, few of note were in his company, being in all about thirteene persons, of euery Christian language one, because he would be fitted for interpretation of tongues. Amongst these was Sir Edwin Rich, whose behaviour was good and well spoken of in euery place where he came, not straying his credite to borrow money, but well provided to serue his owne turne, answering to his birth, state, and disbursements for the time. Sir Anthony then taking the Title of Ambassador, during foure Moneths abroad in Saphie, kept open house, invited all Christian Merchants daily, both to dinner and supper: to supplie his owne turne for money, he got credite of Iemes to take vp money, and pay them in Morruecos, but at excessiue rate, almost fifty for a hundred.

Sir Edwin Rich.

The Ambassadors bounty.

10 He bought likewise of an English Merchants Factor, being at dinner with him, at two or three words, a ship of a hundred & sixty Tunne, with all her lading being Wheat, paying him in hand two thousand ounces, and if he were not paid the rest of his money within ten dayes after his arrivall in Morruecos, then the buyer to lose his earnest. But before he went vp, Abdelmelach returning from Fez, by reason of his Souldiers Treason, the King of Fez marched towards Morruecos, some foure dayes iourney, and there gaue siege vnto a Port Towne called Sally, and tooke it, but the Castle he could not win. So the Alkeyd of the Castle wrote to Muley Boferes, that though the Towne were lost, the Castle he would keepe for him, if he sent three hundred quarters of Corne to victuall his men, and a fresh supply for fifty Souldiers. Boferes loath to lose the place, and hearing Sir Anthony had bought a ship of Corne, writ to Saphie, and willed him to send his ship to Sally, and there to vnlade her Corne for the reliefe of the Castell, and his 20 Souldiers. Sir Anthony, willing to doe the King a fauour, sent for the Captaine and Merchant of the ship, willed them to goe for Sally, and paying them for three hundred quarters, dealt so that thither they went, but the Castell being yeelded before they came, the Captaine and Merchant landed neither men, nor corne, but returned to Saphie.

English ship of 100 Tunne.

By this time were sent for the Conduct of the Ambassador five hundred men, vnder the command of two Alkeyds: vnto euery Souldier Sir Anthony gaue a Turbith as a Livery of his loue, which made them respect and honour him exceedingly; insomuch as one of the two Alkeyds, not hastning to conduct the Ambassador vp to Morruecos, but to prouide himself of Corne, it being exceeding deare at Morruecos, Sir Anthony desirous to set forward, and the Souldiers willing to pleasure him, fell to mutenie, in regard of the Alkeyds slacknesse, killing two of his men to hasten their master forward. After his foure moneths abode in Saphie, wherein his bountie 30 was extraordinary, not to his Countrey-men onely, but to Flemish, French, and Spanish, admired of his Souldiers, he was receiued into Morruecos with great state, hauing by the way, as also during his abode in Saphie, diuers letters from the King, extolling his honourable endeouours, and approoued valiantnesse in his farre aduentures both by sea and land, not omitting any Courtship to win his loue, or make him doubt his welcome.

After two dayes stay in the Citie, the King made preparation for his entertainment at Court, whether he went, suting his followers as well as the shortnesse of time could suffer, and his credite with the Christian Merchants could afford, which was good, for two Spaniards were so rapt with admiration of his worth, and by his speeches allured with so strange hope, that they 40 fell in emulation, whether should doe him more seruices, or helpe him to more money: reasonably attended, he rode to Court, not lighting from his horse, where the Kings sonnes vsually doe, but rode thorow the Mushward, (which is the Kings great Hall, wherein most of his Lords, Gentlemen, and chiefe sort of people doe attend, when they come to Court) which none but the King himselfe doth. Being come into the Kings presence, his Letters of credite were receiued, with great shew of kindnesse, and himselfe entertained with all gracious respect, not onely at the Kings hands, but of the principallest men in office or fauour about the Court, and so for that time was dismissed, the chiefeest men attending him backe to the place where hee tooke horse. Some five dayes after, Sir Anthony Sherley comming to audience, and thinking to haue 50 ridden in as he did before, a chaine was hung crosse the entrance of the Mushward, which he perceiuing onely done to hinder his passage, would not alight from his Horse, but returned backe very discontented. This being certified to Boferes, presently three of his chiefeest Alkeyds were sent to qualifie the matter. But Sir Anthony tooke the disgrace not as his owne, but his whose person he represented, telling the Alkeyds, his master the Emperour, was able and would requite the iniury, neither did he feare, though now within the power of Boferes, knowing the greatness of him in whose seruice he was imployed, so farre surpassing the King of Morruecos, as maugre the proudest, he would be fetched from thence, and be fully reuenged of the least iniury done vnto him. The three Alkeyds layd the blame vpon the Kings Porter, offering Sir Anthony the Porters head, if he would haue it, so spending an houre to pacifie his choller, and bring 60 him backe, the Porter before his face was sore beaten and imprisoned, neither euer after was hee hindered of riding thorow the Mushward.

His state.

His affront and discontent.

During his abode in Morruecos, which was five moneths, Boferes and he had diuers priuate conferences, as it was generally thought, which way to keepe him in the Kingdome against his two brethren Sheck and Sidan; as also to giue the great Turke a blow to driue him out of Ar- giers giers and Tunes. From Moruecos Sir Anthony departed with great content to himselfe, and good liking of Boferes, of whom he bought two Portugall Gentlemen, for a hundred and fifty thousand ounces, which amounteth to some ten thousand pound sterling. These two had been Captives in Moruecos almost sixteene yeeres, the one, sonne to the Vice-roy of the East Indies, the other of a Noble house in Portugall. The first had his reigat thrise sent for to ransom him out of the East Indies, but twise it was taken by the English, once by Flemmings during our late warres with them: the other, his brethren drue him off for his reigat, either to saue so much money, or not able to pay so great a fine. To accompany him from the Court to Saphie, was sent one of the Kings Gentlemen Vshers, to whom at his parting, he threw him his Hat which he wore from his head, with a Jewell of great value, rewarding largely all the Vshers followers. For his Guard (the wayes being then very dangerous) was sent downe with him, foure hundred shot, vnder the Command of Alkeyd Abdela Sinko, a Portugall Renegado, (which is a Christian turned Moore.) This man, whether by perswasion, or voluntarily, desiring to see his native Countrey, in the night gat aboard of the ship Sir Edwin Rich was in, not Sir Anthony, the ship presently weighing Anchor, made saile for Spaine, but the other remaining with S. Anthony in the Harbour.

This dealing was taken in ill part, inso much that five of his men being sent to shoare for certaine prouision which they lacked, were clapped vp in prison, and sent in chaines to Moruecos, but afterward released. Sir Anthony writing to the King, both to cleare himselfe of the fact, and desiring remedie for these his new sustained grieuances, set a good shew vpon the matter, staid foure dayes after the other ship which had carried away the Alkeyd, and would haue tarried vntill he had his five men againe, but that he was written vnto to be gone from an especiall friend ashore, aduising him he did not wel to ride so long in the Port, diuers Flemmish-men of war being abroad, and if any should chance to come in there, as seldome it is without, they finding these two Gentlemen as prize would sease vpon them, and then was there lost thirty five thousand ounces, which a Merchants Factor had lent Sir Anthony Sherley to cleare him out of the Countrey, for which the Factor had the two Portugals bound to pay this debt at their arrinall in Lisbon. Vpon this aduertisement he departed, and the next day Boferes sent him a letter, to cleare his men. And so I returne to the file of my continued History.

§. III.

MVLEY ABDELA goeth in person against MVLEY BOFERES; driueth him out of Moruecos; putteth to death BASHA SIDAR, and other Noblemen; SIDAN expelleth him, and killeth three thousand Fezans perfideously, requited by ABDELA. SHRACIES trechery vniustly punished. SIDANS flight. Many English-men imployed in these warres, and slaine.

Mvley Sheck, putting his sonne Abdela forward to the whole Command of the armie, himselfe meaning to saue one, kept in Allaroca three Italian ships, purposing if matters prospered not well, with Treasure sufficient to goe to Florence: but the battell not fought, his determination altered, for he presently seized all strangers ships which came either to Laratch, Salie, or other parts, as also some Merchants ships of Fez, robbing them of their goods, making their Mariners land their Peece, and all the men either to serue him, or else to haue the Iron giuen them. Heereby he fitted himselfe of Captaines and Souldiers being English, French, and Dutch, with seuen and twentie Peece of Ordnance and shot threunto sufficient. And so fired the mind of his sonne Abdela, with hope of winning Moruecos (being of himselfe drunken with the ambitious desire of a Kingdome) that Abdela about the latter end of Nouember 1606. marched to Moruecos with his troupes being some ten thousand horse and foot, besides his Christian Mariners, whose helpe won him the field, fought some sixe miles Southeast from Moruecos, on the eight of December, 1606. Sheck bore his sonne company no farther then Salie, from whence three houres riding, is a Riuer called Mamora, into which Bay the Italian ships put in: Sheck went thither, and hard by the ships vpon the shoare pitched his Tent wherein he lay, part of his Treasure being shipped, himselfe determined there to stay, and expect the euent of his sonne, if it passed well with him, then Africke should hold him, otherwise to visite the great Duke of Thuscane, on whose curtesie he much rested. But the Christian Gunners so well obserued their times of shooting and placing their Ordnance, as they got Abdela the field, hoping thereby to haue obtained both liberty, and pillage, of which most of them poore men failed, as afterward you shall read.

Abdela, by help of English and other Christian Gunners, wins the field and Morocco.

When Sheck heard Abdela had got Moruecos, hee grew carelesse to send prouision or supplie the the wants of his three Italian ships, wherefore, they set sayle from Mamora homewards, taking such Treasure for their pay as were in their custodies. Boferes lost in this battayle about fixe hundred men, fled into the Citie to saue his Treasure and his women, but for feare of being surprized, durst not tarry to take his Treasure away with him, but in all haste posted toward the Mountaynes, willing the Alkeids and chiefeft men of his Court to bring it after him, with the rich Sword, the like whereof is not in the World: committing also to their conduct his Daughter, and the choyfett of his women, amongst whom was the Wife of Ben Wash the Kings Merchant. At the entry of the hills, a Kindred of the Larbies being five hundred Horse-men, seized vpon these people, pillaged their Carriages, rifled and dishonoured the women, not sparing Boferes Daughter, (whom Abdela determined to haue marryed, but hearing diuers Moors to haue lyen with her, and also that she was suspected to haue liued in Incest with her Father; after his entrance into Mornecos, he neuer enquired farther after her. The Alkeids beeing well mounted by the swiftnesse of their Horses, returned backe to Mornecos, and there tooke Sanctuary. Abdela vpon their submission promised them pardon, on whose Princely word they relying, came forth, the Foker of the place presenting them: But Muley Abdela, whether incited by enuious counsell, or on his owne bloody minde, putteth them so secretly to death, that sending all their heads in one Sacke to Fez, for a Present to his Father, Their deaths was not fully knowne in the Citie of Mornecos, before their heads were set vpon Fez gates. Here was the end of Bashia Indar a great Souldier in old Hamets time, a faithfull Commander during his life to Boferes, accompanied with Sadie Gowie, Alkeid Azus his Sonne, Alkeid Muden the Cassimie, and some foure great men more.

This tyranny of Abdela shewed vpon these valiant and worthy men; and the spoyle which the Fezees had made aswell in robbing the Alkeids houses, as in rifling the Citizens goods, and committing all outrages which follow Warre, caused many to flye to Muley Sidan, and the rest which remayned in Mornecos grew discontented, so that the Sunne-shine of Abdelas happinesse scarce lasted two monethes: for Sidan resting in the halfe way betweene Mornecos and Fez, taking oportunitie of this vproare of the Townesmen, marched toward Mornecos on the North-side of the Towne, determining to giue present battayle; hearing by the Scowts, that Muley Abdela his Campe was lodged in the great Garden or Orchard called the Almowetto, being some two English miles about. The first night of Sidans approach, the Prisoners were released, and Prisons broken open, so that these men getting libertie, ranne halfe madde vp and downe the Citie, crying, Long liue Sidan, which troubled the Citizens not a little: And in this vproare, Sidans Faction let into the Citie (at a secret gate) many of his Souldiers, which made a Sally vpon the Regiment of Zalee, meaning to haue surprized Abdelas Campe, but himselfe comming to the rescue with two thousand men, continued a hot Skirmish against the Sidians, in which the Christians fought valiantly to recouer their Peeeces of Artillery which were lost, vntill the Sidians were forced to retyre. The next day beeing the five and twentieth of Aprill, Stilo nono, Abdela remooued towards Muley Sidan, who was encamped on the North-side of the Citie, not daring to come on the South-side, for feare of the shot which galled his men from the Battlements of the Kings House. Therefore he hearing of Abdelas remoue, and intending to venture his fortune vpon a present battayle, set forward to meet him with a Regiment of his best Horle: Abdela perceiuing this, caused his Canoniers to march formost, which could but place five Peeeces of their Artillery in a brest, because the Orchards and Gardens made the passages very narrow and strait; where as the Armies should meete, Sidans Horle-men gaue a very gallant charge, but the Canoniers made them retyre: Which Abdelas Horle-men perceiuing, being encouraged, and too eager of the Chase, some thousand Horle galloped before their owne Ordnance, and followed their Enemie close to Sidans Campe, their Peeeces of Artillery being drawne after them. Muley Sidan well knowing the aduantage of the place, seeing his Enemies depriued of the benefit of their great Ordnance, which he most feared, encouraged his men to keepe their ground, and bringing with his owne person fresh supplies to second them, gaue his Aduersaries the Abdelians so hot a charge, that they were fayne to retyre in great disorder, vpon the mouthes of their owne Artillery. This dis-array perceiued by the Christian Gunners, it put them in minde to discharge vpon their owne men the Abdelians, holding it better to kill five or sixe hundred of their owne side, then to lose the battayle. But the Moore, who was Captayne ouer the Canoniers and other Commanders, would not suffer it: Wherefore the Sidians following in good order, and very close, fell to the execution with their Swords, surprized the Artillery, and slue the men. The slaughter continued some foure hoares, betwixt seven or eight thousand killed, and few to speake on left aliue, for what the Souldiers spared, the Citizens in reuenge of their Disorders, Pillages, and Villanies done to their women, bereaued them of their liues, who beeing dead were not suffered to bee buried, but lay about the ground as a prey to the Dogges and Fowles of the Ayre. Heauie likewise was the Conquerours hand vpon the Christians which tooke Abdelas part, most of them for their five monethes seruice to Abdela, were either slayne in the fury of battayle, or after had his throat cut. was the end of them, who had liued in the Streights of Gibraltar, and the Mediterranean Sea, not as Merchants by honest Trading, but hauing committed spoyle vpon diuers Sea-faring men, felt the bloudie hand of a barbarous Nation, (as a deserued punishment sent from God) to execute Justice for their manifold committed wrongs and out-rages.

This battayle being lost with the greatest bloud-shed that any hath beene since these Warres beganne, Muley Abdela fled to Fez, a hundred persons of his whole Army not left aliue to beare him company: And Sidan Master of the field, entred the Citie of Moruecos, hauing another taske to take in hand ere he could settle himselfe quietly in his owne Nest. For the Kings House being Castle-wise builded, and seuered from the Citie with a defencible and a strong wall, lacking no kind of Munition for the defence thereof, had within it, besides Souldiers of Moruecos, three thousand Fezees who were not at the last battayle, but left there to guard the place for Abdela.

These presuming on their owne valour and strength of the place, denyed to render it vpon any termes to Sidan, though they were sollicitated, during the space of two dayes, by all faire meanes thereunto: Sidan bringing his Artillery to the wals, yet delayed, as loth to deface a building so strong, costly, and beautifull; So that in the meane time a Captaine whose house ioyned to the wall, by stealth with five hundred men, scaled and wonne the top of the wall, crying, Victory for Muley Sidan, which so amazed the Souldiers within, thinking the Forces which were entered farre greater then they were, without more adoe or offering to resist, they tooke Sanctuary in the great Church belonging to the Kings House, euery man with his Peece and Furniture about him.

Muley Sidan vpon this, sent Basha Seleman, willing them to deliuer vp their Armes, with promise they should bee pardoned, which presently they did, yeelding and deliuering both Swords and Peeces. Thus disarmed, they, silly soules came forth, when presently after, message came from the King to butcher and cut the throats of them all, which was executed. A pittifull matter in my iudgement, so many men yeelding vpon good composition, after fury of battayle, vpon cold bloud to bee made so pittifull a spectacle: it was bootlesse for them to alleage eyther Law or reason in defence of their liues; such is the misery and slavery of that people, whose goods and liues lyeth alwayes in the will of the King, eyther to saue, or destroy at his pleasure.

Now is Sidan settled in Moruecos but scarce secure, for the chiefeest men in the Citie wished an alteration, because their King to get their money and wealth to maintayne his owne estate, beganne to picke quarrels with them, making some who began to speake and repine at his doings, lose their heads, Quoniam Canis mortuum non latrat: The common people whose naturall condition is alwayes to desire Nouelties, wished for a new King, feeling his oppression, and the Famine whereof many dyed, grew carelesse of peace, thinking euery change would bring a remedie, when indeed it was like the Incision of an vnskilfull Surgeon, not curing the Malady, but making the wound wider, Gangrened, and incurable. Sidan purposing to purge this male-contented humour of the Commonalty, rayfed an Army of twelue thousand Foot, and sixe thousand Horse, determining to take Fez. The chiefe men of command ouer this Army, were these, Basha Mustepha, Alkeid Hamet Benbreham, Alkeid Ally Tahila, Alkeid Gago, and Alkeid Hadoe Tobib, with diuers others. Muley Sidan not going in person with this Army, least in his absence Moruecos the Seat of the Empire should reuolt. Muley Sheek hearing these newes, went to All arocha, there tooke a great Flemmish ship from the Merchants, with all the goods in her, therein shipping his Treasure, determining to runne away, if his Sonne Abdela should lose Fez. Abdela omitted no time to gather new Forces, so that in small time he thought himselfe sufficient to meete the Sidanians in open field, and so he did neere to Mickanes, where the people on Sidans part, missing their King in the field, or any one of the Bloud Royall refused to fight, and in stead of striking, fell to parley; That if Abdela would pardon them, they would yeeld, and so they did, yet most of them ranne away, except threethousand Moruekyes, who presuming vpon Abdels gentle nature, staid with him, hoping kind entertaynement into his pay, in stead whereof, Muley Abdela commanded all their throats to be cut, granting them onely this fauour: first, to be stripped for fowling their clothes.

Thus we may see, mercilesse Sidan butcher poore soules at Moruecos, pittilesse Abdela murder these vnfortunate slaues at Mickanes, both verifying the old Prouerbe, Quicquid delirant Reges, plectuntur Achini. In this battayle were taken betwixt thirtie and fortie Englishmen, who serued Muley Sidan as Canoniers, yet not any of that company which serued Abdela at Moruecos, when he lost the Citie and field, but other Voluntaries, part of these fled with the bodie of the Army backe to Moruecos, part were taken, whom Abdela spared, as well in regard of former seruices the Nation had done him, as also for the present vse he was to employ them in. This Expedition of Sidans comming to so vnlooked a disaster, made him send forth his Commanders with diuers companyes, to the Alarbies, for fresh supply of Men and Treasure: amongst which as Chiefe was dispeeded Basha Seleman, Master of the old Kings Horse for Taslet, there to gouerne gouverne the Countrey, carrying with him some fiftene hundred Shot, of which fixe hundred were Shraceis, people of the King of Chaus, or Concoes Countrey, who hath alwaies warres with Algers or Argiers. These Shraceis were borne in the Mountaines at Atlas, being of a fierce and bloody nature, not respecting the Turkes might or government, no more then the Mountainers of Moruecos, will acknowledge the Soueraigntie of the Barbarian. Some twelue hundred of these had Sidan in his pay, halfe part whereof he kept at Moruecos, the other was sent with Solyman. These amongst themselves fell into a muteny, neither for want of pay, or ill vllage, but in desire to doe a milchiefe, by force cut off the Balkaes head, carrying it with them as a Trophy of their victorie, and a fit pretent to win Abdelas fauour, who was then at Fez, whither they went for intertainement, Sidan herewith moued, made Proclamation, that for three moneths what Shracee soeuer, Souldier, or any other, were to be found in Moruecos, or ellwhere in his Dominions, should be put to the Sword, and to haue it better & more fully executed, it was proclaimed, that the Man-killer should haue the goods of the Shracee so killed. Many rich men of this Nation or Kindred resiant in Moruecos, felt the furie of the Sword, for the folly and foule fault of their Tribe: such as could get packing, ran away; others of the better sort, their friends hid them in their houles, vntill Sidan scared with newes of Abdelas comming towards him, proclaimed generall pardon for the remainder left aliue, and free passage of trading or comerce for any Shracee, which would venture to Moruecos. Yet few durst come vpon these goodly termes, or those who lay hid in Moruecos, if they were worth any thing, shew themselves in publike, for feare this were a pretence to bring the residue vnto the halter. Those Shracees who were sole causers of this massacre, being with Abdelas at Fez, daily moued him to goe towards Moruecos, vowing euerie man to die in his cause, and for reuenge of their Wiues, Children, and Friends, who had smarted for their sakes. Abdelas something animated with their offers, yet delayed, knowing his Forces farre inferior vnto Sidans, vntill still vrged by the Shracee, which had brought from the Mountaines some store of their Kindred, very able and resolute men to his aide, he set forwards about the latter end of August, towards Moruecos, determining to giue battell once more to Muley Sidan. Of what strength Abdelas Armie consisted, the certaintie is not knowne, but gessed to bee very neere fiftene thousand Horse and Foote.

Bloody decree

Muley Sidan was very strong, for beside his owne Souldiers, the Moruecans aided him with eight thousand men, and diuers tribes sent supplies to augment his forces. He had two hundred English, the most of them voluntaries, sixtie field Pieces, with sufficient Shot and Powder.ouer the English and all the Christians, was Generall Captaine John Giffard, a Gentleman of a worthy spirit, and descended from the ancient and honourable stem of the Giffards in Buckingham-shire. Vpon his first entertainment and welcome into the Countrey, Sidan bestowed vpon him a rich Sword valued at a thousand Marks, and a Scarlet Cloake, richly imbroidered with Pearle, sent as a present to Muley Hamet, the Kings Father, from our late Soueraigne of famous memorie Queene Elizabeth, besides many other extraordinarie fauours of good value; and often conuersing familiarly; yea, sometimes visiting Captaine Giffard at his owne Tent. His entertainment was twentie five shillings per diem, besides many supplies proceeding from the Kings bounty. With him as secondary men in charge, was one Master Philip Giffard, his neere and very deare Kinsman; Captaine Iaques, a very valiant Souldier; Captaine Smith, one of the most exquisite Enginers in Europe; Captaine Baker, an ancient Britaine Souldier; Captaine Tailer, Captaine Faukes, Captaine Chambers, Captaine Isack, men euery way able to vndergoe their seuerall commands. These were daily stipendaries, at twelue shillings a man, except the two Sea Captaines, Isack, and Chambers, who had foure shillings a day, and euerie common Souldier twelue pence truly payd them. These preparations considered, Muley Sidan had small reason to leaue the field, or feare Abdelas forces, being nothing in respect of his. But certaine it is, the Muley sending for his Wizzards, Soothsayers, willing them to foretell, that he might foreknow the successe of his embattailed Armie. Their answer was; He should loose the battell, bee driuen into Sus, within five moneths should regaine Moruecos, and there during life enioy the Kingdome. Vpon this answer, the Muley giuing great credit thereunto, as the nature of a Barbarian is very suspicious, commanded Basha Mustepha, with three thousand Souldiers to conuey away his Mother, Wiues and Children. To Alkeid Hamet Benbreham and Hado Tabib, hee commended the charge of his Treasure, who laded sixtie Mules with Gold, garding them and the Muleters, with two thousand of his choysest Shot.

The battell

These dispeeded, it may appeare Sidan but howered, and would follow; yet the battels met the 26 of Nouember, 1607. some sixtene miles from the Citie of Moruecos, the Canoniers of Muley Sidan, part hauing in the forefront discharged, their Enemies being somewhat farre off; but before they could charge againe, the Enemie was with them. The Shraceis did not once discharge a Piece, great nor small, but ioyning themselves close to the Abdelians, charged the Sidans very fiercely with the r Sables, in reuenge of Sidans tyrannie shewed vpon their Kindred, enraging their minds and courages, or their faithfull promise (which they sought to make good) to Abdelas, made them put the Sidans to flight: or else it was Sidans feare, that hee should not make good his Soothsayers Prophecie, which made his men to runne away: For at the first encounter, his *Moore*s fell into a dis-array, and presently into a dishonorable flight: whereupon Muley Sidan fled, sent to the English Captaines to be gone, and to Captaine Giffard a good Horse to saue himselfe. The English returned word, that they came not thither to run, but rather die an honourable death. Captaine Giffard encouraged his men, telling them, there was no hope of victorie, but to prepare and die like men, like English men: and then asking for his Iaques, whom he loved dearly, and taking a Pike in his hand, thought to haue rode vnto him, being told hee was not sixefcore from him, and to haue died together; but in the way, Captaine Giffard being charged by eight Abdelians, one behind him shot him thorow, and so was he there slaine. Few of all the English Nation were left alieue, the number not exceeding thirtie, and none of the Commanders escaped, except Captaine Isack, and Captaine Faukes; of the *Moore*s were not slaine in all fortie persons. 10 part.

Sidan being gone, as loath to tarry, spend bloud, and win a Field, Abdela got the ground, his Enemies marched vpon, but no great victory, entred Moruecos without applause, or reioyce of the Citizens, some yet feeling his late done iniuries, sorie for the losse of Sidan, who had proued a Tyrant, nor welcomming Abdela vpon hope of amendment, but with policie and patience fitted themselues to the milerie of the time. Abdela once againe Master of Moruecos, got the Kings House, but found no treasure to relieue his wants. Great were his promises to reward the Shracies with bountie, and enrich his followers, when the Citie was recouered: now hee hauing it, there failed of his expectation, and his Souldiers lacking both meate and money: yet to keepe them still in hope, and so in gouernment, it was bruited, the young King had found a Well full of treasure within the House, which Muley Hamet Xarif had layed vp for a deare yeare: but this good newes quickly vanished, the Well not yeelding water to refresh their fainting stomacks. Therefore the Shracies hauing released their Kindred, recouered their Wiues and Children, which had escaped the fury and bloudie Decree of Sidan the last King, they tooke good words and kind vsages of Abdela, in lieu of payment, seeing Moruecos neither afforded them meate, nor Abdelas fortune further maintenance, and so three thousand of them departed at one time. Muley Abdela with the residue of his forces kept Moruecos, laboring by all possible meanes to giue his souldiers content, and keepe them together; so with much adoe hee liued in Moruecos some two moneths, during which time, Muley Sidan was gathering a fresh Army in Sus. 20

Muley Hamet
Bosonne.

BVt whilest Abdela and Sidan were contriuing their owne ends, there arose a storme in the Mountaines which fell in the Plaines of Moruecos. The tempest driuer was one Muley Hamet Bosonne, Cousin to the three Brethren which haue striuen for the Kingdome. This man gathering treasure, and temporising with them all three, so played their Game, that finding their weakenesse which these quarrels had brought them vnto, vpon a sudden seeing his time, went into the Mountaines to his Mothers Kindred, mustered verie neere twenty thousand able men. The Muley being well prouided of treasure, gaue them due pay and large, winning them to his respect and seruice, so that in lesse then two moneths space, he got all things in readinesse, descended from the Tessenon Mountaines towards Moruecos. 40

Fond feare.

How vaine is man? a fearefull armie of men.

This newes brought to Abdela was very vnwelcome, yet (calling his wits and Counsell together) it was concluded, considering the Shracees were gone, his remnant of Souldiers feeble and out of heart, and the Moruecans daily fled to Hamet Bosonne, whose vprising like a blazing Star drew their eyes vpon him, that Abdela should trauell to Fez, which hee might well doe without a guide, hauing heretofore vpon like necessities, often measured the miles: and though hee was determined so to do, yet a smal occasion hastned his iourney, for some mile from Abdelas Campe, vpon a Hill on the back-side of Moruecos, a man being seene with a Speare in his hand, and a white linnen vpon it as a Flagge. Abdela thought Hamet Bosonne to be with his whole Forces behind the Hill, when he was a full dayes march from Moruecos. Therefore in all haste he tooke vp some of his Tents, but the greater part left standing in a manner, being feared, ran away. And afterward when this matter was discovered, which Abdela held a token of his surpris, it was nothing els but a poore Moore washing his Napery, and for the speedier drying vsed this meanes, which terrified Abdela from the seate of his Empire, to Fez, the safest place for his abode. 50

Lylla Issa, Sidans Mother, hearing of Hamet Bosonnes approach, was perswaded, his mouements were onely to defend her Sonnes right, knowing Bosonne of late fauoured Sidans title, comming into 60

into his pay, and in person serving the Muley at the last battaile when Sidan fled into Sus. Heereupon she sent diuers Captaines, part of her owne Guard, others of her friends and kindred to his ayd, thinking he would haue taken Moruecos for Sidan. But Bosonne hauing entred the Citie peaceably, proclaimed him selfe King, dismissed all Sidans fauourers, which were not wil- to be his seruants, who returned to their Lady Mistresse, certifying her error and their successe: his Treasure he imparted largely to his followers, by strong hand desired no mans seruice, but those who were willing. Some thirty English-men remayning, weary of their sustained misery, and the state of the Countrey, he gaue them licence to imbarke, and writ to the Gouvernour of Saphia to giue them their passe, notice whereof being giuen to the Factor Marine for the English, he dispatched them into diuers ships with all conueniency, though to his cost and charges; charity to helpe the distressed soules, and loue to his native Countrey, moouing him thereunto. This Muley Hamet Bosonne, during the time of his gouernment was a very good and iust man, offered no discourtesie, or tooke away any mans goods, but paid the Merchants truly for the same, who liked well his current and true dealing.

*Bosonne*s mother hearing her sonne was settled in Moruecos, brought what strength she could from the Mountaines, and in her way knowing Boseres lodged in a fortresse, wherunto hee was fled, not to bee well guarded, she beset the house, meaning to take the Muley prisoner, who being void of meanes to resist in the night, made a hole through the wall and so escaped priuately to Salie, a Port Towne within the iurisdiction of his brother Sheck, where at this day he remaineth.

On the morrow betimes, *Bosonne*s mother with her men entered the Fort, missing Boseres, cut off the head of Umsed Benbela, one of his chiefeest seruants and Commanders: then went she forward to congratulate her sonnes comming to the Kingdome, being then in Moruecos. But an Empire ill got, is seldome scene of long continuance, for within lesse then two moneths, Muley Sidan came out of Sus with a great armie, for whose ayd Lylla Isha sold her Iewels, and Plate, to furnish her son with Swords, Pikes, Horsemen, Staues, and other War-like Munition.

On the other side Hamet Bosonne prepared to welcome his cousin the Muley Sidan; so about the beginning of Aprill, 1608. both their Forces met hard by Moruecos where a chiefe of a kindred one Gruse, which came out of Sus, a great wine drinker, alwayes a fauourer of Muley Sidan

(though little valuing any of the three Kings) presuming vpon his owne strength and valour, desired the honour, that hee might giue charge vpon the enemy with five hundred

Horse, which was his owne Regiment, and of his owne kindred: Sidan refused to grant him his request, therefore the Casima tooke his owne leaue and gaue the enemy a full charge vpon the body of his armie, which receiuing him very brauely, the Casima and his company were in great danger to be ouerthrowne: but Sidan to releue him, sent five hundred Horse-men of his owne: so with these thousand, the Casima broke the ranks of *Bosonne*s battalions, then with their sables fell to execution, vntill the whole campe seeing the field lost, fled towards the Mountaines: thus

Sidan without further resistance entering Moruecos, resting there in quiet three moneths, vntill

Hamet Boson recouering new Forces in Iuly following, presented himselfe before the Citie, trusting aswel vpon his own strength, as the loue of the Citizens: hoping his good and gentle vsage

when he was amongst them, would haue bred a liking in them, of his mild and gentle gouernment: but either the seruile mind of the multitude little respected his fore-passed kindnes, or the feare of Sidan made them loath to shew any signe of good will; for at his approach no man in the Citie was knowne to draw a sword in his defence. So on the eight of Iuly, Bosonne was discomfited with the losse of some thousand men, fled to the Mountaines, where within foure

dayes after Alkeid Azus got him poysoned, hoping thereby to win the fauour of Muley

Sidan.

This Azus is aged and subtile, by his long experience best knoweth the secrets of that state, was brought vp vnder Abdela, Muley Hamet Xarifs brother, and for his Counsell to Abdela, willing him either to put out the eyes of Hamet Xarif, or cut his throat, was in danger to haue lost his life when Hamet Xarif came to be King, but the wisdom of the man won such respect with Hamet, that of a prisoner, he made him his chiefeest Counsellor, and Master of his Treasure, during whose life time his behauiour was such, as he won great loue among the Commons, Nobility, and many of the blood Royall. When old Hamet died, he was in his Campe neere Fez, and after his death rested all his loue vpon Muley Sidan (holding him the prime man and fittest of the three brethren, to rule the Kingdome) vntill both he and Sidy Imbark could not counsell and rule Muley Sidan, for his owne good and benefit of the Common-weale being head-strong, and would take no mans counsell but to his owne liking and hurt. Therefore Sedy Abdela Im- bark went to his contemplation at Aca: And Azus to a Castle in the Mountaines, which he had stored with Treasure against a storme, or to refresh the winter of his age, from whence he will not come downe, vntill he see some hope of peace, hauing at this instant more Treasure in his Coffers, then all the three brethren besides, and hopeth to keepe it, being in the midst of his friends and kindred, and in a place as well fortified as any in Barbary.

John Etina.

Muley Sheck fearefull lest Sidans next enterprife would be to rowze him out of Fez, fell in conference with an Italian Merchant, named John Etina, making him his Agent to go into Spain, there to conclude, that if the Catholique King would ayde him with men and money to recover his right, there should be deliuered vp into his hands, Allaroche, Saly, Alcasar, and other Townes lying fit for his mouth: This negotiation was well entertained. And John Etina was promised for his labour in this businesse, and bringing it to effect, vpon the deliuerie of the Port Townes, to haue yeerely paid him two thousand Duckats during his life. In Iune, this matter was first mooued; in the latter end of August, seuen Gallions (as was reported) and the Gallies of Naples, in all a hundred sayle, well manned with store of Pioners to rayse Forts, went to Allaroche, thinking to be receiued, but thirty thousand Alarbes came downe to the shoare, not allowing any such neighbour-hood, though they hold the Andalusian halfe their blood.

Sir Anthony Sherleys pre-ferment.

Whether Sir Anthony Sherley was imployed in this seruice it is not certainly knowen: some are of opinion that hee was induced thereunto, because they haue formerly heard the King of Spaine hath royally rewarded him for his trauailes with Boferes, by giuing him the places and pay of two Captaines in the Indies, made him Admirall of the Leuant Seas, and next in place to the Vice-roy of Naples, hauing for his entertainment five hundred Duckats a moneth. Without question, he knoweth well the state of that vnciuill and barbarous Nation, hauing an apprehending and admirable wit to conceiue the disposition of any people with whom hee shall conuerse, whilest he was amongst them, he behaued himselfe very well toward the better sort, winning credite with them, and gaining the loue of the poorer sort exceedingly, by his larges (for if a Moore or slaue gaue him but a dish of Dates, he should receiue a reward as from an Emperour) and howsoeuer some may hold this a vice, counting him a lauiser: yet by this meanes he came to the knowledge of that which otherwise he neuer should haue attained vnto. The more credible fame is, Sir Anthonie was not with this Fleet, therefore they sped neuer the better, for had he beene in company, and had command, he would either haue taken footing, or ventured all, scorning to returne with doing nothing, and so be laughed at.

The Author added a discourse also of their Religion: but I omit it and referre the Reader to my Pilgrimage, and proceed to the reports of their Politic.

The Politic of Barbarie.

EVERY Kingdome consisteth of men, not of buildings, therefore the Kingdome of Barbary consisteth of bond and free men: the naturall bond men are such as are descended either from Christians or Negros; the free men are Larbies or Brebers, which may be termed the Valley and Mountaine men. Ouer all, as absolute Monarch is the King, who maintaineth his seat by the sword, and power of Iustice: the sword men according to their degrees are thus placed.

First, the Muleis, are the Kings children, and all other who are of the blood Royall, are termed by this name. Secondly, Basbas, are Captaine Generals ouer armies. Thirdly, Alkeids be the Lords, set aswell ouer Garrison Townes as Countreys, to rule and keepe the people in subiection. Fourthly, Ferres, Gentlemen who carrie armes, yet lesse Commanders then Alkeids. Fifthly, Babaia, Lieutenant to an Alkeid. Sixtly, Brakbashi, a Sergeant at armes. Seuenthly, Debushi, a Captaine ouer thirty. Eightly, Romie, the common Souldier of these men of warre, there were kept in daily pay in the old Kings time, to the number of fifty thousand Horsemen: part seruing with the Launce, others with the Speare called Spabaia, and some, especially the Horsemen of Fez, serue with the Crosse-bow on Horse-backe, bending it as they ride, shooting a strong shot and sure: and sixteene thousand foot-men, the Alarbies being fitter for the Horsemen, but the Brebers the stronger footmen, most of them shot.

The chiefeest men of Command in the latter times, were these.

First, Alkeid Azus, chiefe Counsellor of State. Secondly, Hamet ben Breham Sefiani, Master of the Horse, and ruler ouer the Alkeids. Thirdly, Sedi Hamet ben Bouker. Fourthly, Sedi Abdela Wahad Anonne: These two were Treasurers. Fifthly, Alkeid Hamet, a Capatho or Eunuchs, Gouvernour ouer the women and Eunuches. Sixtly, Alkeid Mustepha File Master of the Ordnance. Seuenthly, Rishanan, Admirall ouer the Gallies at Saly.

Note, though these be enobled, taking priority or precedency before others, yet is not this noblenesse hereditary, for the children of these men must claime no honour by birth-right, but what they get by their seruice and honour of their sword, liue vnrespected vnlesse they be valiant, and so proouing, the King will take them into his seruice, whereupon by desert, the sonne may obtaine his fathers fortune and honour.

Shecks of Families or Tribes.

There is another title of dignity termed Sheck, attributed to the chiefe man of euery Family or Cast, neither doth the Kings eldest sonne scorne the title, signifying that he is the prime or best blood of his Royall kindred. These Shecks are much respected, because it is the nature of the people, the whole kindred to follow their head: insomuch, as one of these Shecks can bring into the field ten thousand Horsemen of their owne Cast, or kindred, and some more. So that it it is a matter of great consequence, the King to haue an eye ouer such a man, and know how his affection resteth towards him, either in loue or hatred.

The King once in a moneth, on Fridayes in the afternoone after prayers, either in his house or Church sitteth to doe Iustice, hearing complaints or appeales from subalterne Ministers, from whom the grieved persons doe appeale to his Royall person: when the King sitteth, the stranger shall haue freer access to plead his cause before the King, then his owne borne subject.

All inferiour Iudges and Ministers are their Church-men or Talbies; and those are soonest chosen into offices which are of strickest life, being free from auarice, and such other sinnes as may peruert and hinder the course of equitie and iustice. The chiefeest man for iudgement vnder the King is Mustie, to whom the party grieved may appeale from any other ordinary Iudge. There be three of these men, one in Mornecos, another in Ex, the third at Taradant in Sus. The Mustie of Mornecos, sitteth with the King in Iudgement, and euery Friday in the afternoone by himselfe, to heare and determine causes of the subiect and stranger, though hee bee in eminent place, he is a poore man, in respect what he might be, if he would sell Iustice, and take bribes.

The ordinary Iudge sitteth all the yeere long two houres before noone, and two houres after noone: in euery great Towne throughout the three King domes in plades one of these Iudges, to whom not only the Inhabitants of euery Towne and Citie doe repaire, but the Countrey people or Larbes vpon differences come thither to haue their causes decided. Every one must tell his owne tale, and plead his owne matter. When both parties haue spoken, then giueth the Iudge sentence; so that in one day the cause is brought into Court, and the same day ended. If either part haue witnesse to produce, then the Iudge giueth three dayes respite to bring them in, which being brought, the aduerser party shall haue other three dayes respite to disproue them. And if he can prooue the witnesses either infamous in manners, or giuen to detestable sinne, as drunkenesse, adultery, or such like: And can prooue the witness saith not his prayers sixe times duely in foure and twenty houres, then shall he be vtterly disabled to heare witnesse, and thus in seuen dayes the longest sute shall be ended. If an Obligation or rather Bill of debt be brought into Court, the Obligee must either pay the debt, goe to prison, or to pawne the value of the debt, or better: which pawne may be kept in Deposito nine dayes vpon great reason, to see if the debtor can redeeme it at the nine dayes end, if he doth it not, then is it sold, and the party who should pay the money, must sustaine the losse.

As Coadiutors to these Iudges, and next in place to them be the Scriuanos, who vpon death or other remooue are commonly made Iudges. These are Talbies which make writings betweene partie and partie, short and plaine, without multiplication of words, and they are of opinion, Abundans cautela nocet: in their Obligatory Bills they put neither Forfeit nor Condition, hauing for the making thereof two pence English, and no more. They vse no long draughts in matters of purchase, or these tripartite Indentures, with such large and long implicite and explicite Couenants, but thus the people deale in matters of Contracts and Bargaines. I buy of you a Vineyard, House, Merchandize, at such a price, to be paid at such a time, calling two honest men, whereof one shall be a Talbie, if I can get him, to witnesse this our Bargaine. We foure goe to the Scriuener, who likewise is a Talbie, and haue this set downe in writing; and if our bargaine be for twenty thousand pounds, it is set downe in ten lines, and the Iustice of the Countrey will allow me my bargaine with as great reason, as if I had a great ingrossed Booke of Conueyance, as big as the Map of the whole world in the newest Edition.

Next in this nature to these, be the Steryes, which haue smal Fees to see the execution of Law an sentence of the Iudge fulfilled; these likewise fetch men to answere their Aduersary, which would delay, and not come before the Iudge, eyther vpon peruersenesse, or badnesse of their plea, or any other cause whatsoever. Wherefore to bee alwayes ready, these are continually attendant in the House of the Iudge, and wayting vpon him whethersoever he goeth.

The Hackam, is the Lord Marshall in euery City, who iudgeth vpon life and death, as soone as the party Delinquent is taken, and his offence proued, presently his throat is cut: Murder there is death, so is manifest Theft, Adultery, likewise proued by very good witnesse: And somtimes it is death for any man to weare a Sword who is not an Officer, yea, though hee bee a Souldier. Other offences according to the necessitie of the time and pleasure of the King, by Proclamation are made death, which the Hackam must see executed vpon losse of his owne head.

time to helpe the needy and distressed, comprimisng differences betwixt parties, and repressing all disorders, winning great loue and respect, for their Houses are held Sanctuaries, whose Priuiledges the King will not violate, but vpon great and weightie reason.

The King, Nobility, and Souldiers desire to serue on Horse-backe, which most commonly they doe, for in any Army there be three Horse for one foot: the King will seldome venture to fight out a battayle, but as you may perceiue by the precedent, it was and is the vsage amongst the three Brethren, when they meete in a field, whosoever getteth at the first on-set the aduantage, maketh the other presently leaue the field, and flye vnto some place of strength: they fight with no Armour except a Buffe Jerkin, for the better sort; and a Leather Hide tanned for the meaner, and some Coats of Male, their Armes is a Horse-mans Staffe, Target, and Sword, or a Horse-mans Peece and Sword.

Deadly feud with the Larbies.

The Alarbies serue all vpon Horse, will fight sorer battayles to maintayne their deadly feud, than in seruice of their King: Insomuch that vpon losse of any great Lord or Chiefe man of their Bloud, cruell battailes haue ensued, wherein ten thousand men haue beene slayne at one time, and it is their fashion, the fairest Virgin to ride vpon a Camell with a flagge in her hand decked in all pompe to sollicite her Kindred to reuenge, and goeth foremost in the field, encouraging them to follow; vpon which incitement much bloud is spilt, her Kindred as loth to lose their Virgin, and not reuenge their iniuries: the other side struiuing to winne her and the field, holding that a continuing glory to the seuenth Generation.

With the Bre-
bers.

When a man is killed, his Tribe seeketh not reuenge only vpon the man which killed the party, but the first man of that Tribe hee meeteth withall, him will hee kill if he can, and so thinketh he hath satisfied his Kinsmans death.

The Brebers or Mountayners likewise maintayne this feud, who are most shor and Sword-men, vpon the day of battayle their women follow hard behind them, with a colour in their hands, called Hanna: And if they see any of their side offer to runne away, or retyre, presently they will throw some of this Hanna vpon their clothes, which will stayne, and the party euer after is held for a Coward and a dishonoured Jew. For feare of this Infamy, few forsake the field, but eyther conquer their Enemies, or dye like men, who are presently stripped and buried by these women which follow them.

Mvley Hamet being at peace with his Neighbours, at quiet with his Subiects, determined to warre vpon the Negros, knowing the conquest easie, because the people are vndisciplined in warre, and the profit would be exceeding great by bringing their Gold into his Countrey, exchanging for it Salt, and other baser Commodities. And howsoever certayne Miners had found rich Mines of Gold in the Hills of Atlas, yet hee held it better policy to fetch his Gold farther off, then to digge that which was found in the Centre of his owne Kingdome, fearing if the Mines proued rich, the Golden Ore would draw thither Christian Armes, therefore he cut the throats of all such as were the Authors, and gaue the Masters of the Workes death for their hyre.

But to perfect his other Designe, he chose Iudar Basha, sent him with great store of Souldiers, who entred farre into the Negros Countrey, depriving them of a great City, called Gago, which standeth vpon the Riuer of Synega, three hundred Leagues within the firme Land, builded there an Alpandeca for Barbarian Merchants, and a Custome-house for the King. The Merchants make it fixe monethes Iourney from Mornecos thither, of which, two monethes they passe thorow the Sandy Desarts, where no people dwell, neyther any road way, but directed by Pilots, as ships at Sea, obserue the courses of Sunne, Moone, and Stars, for feare of missing their way: If they lose themselves, they meete with Famine, and dye for lacke of water, whose dead carcasses consume not, but maketh Mumma, or Otema flesh, euery way as Physicall or Medicinable, as that which cometh from Alexandria. They neuer trauell vnder two or three hundred in a company: it may be not meeting with water in twelue or fiftene dayes space, but carry water by Camels, both for them and their beasts to drinke, which failing, to saue their owne lines, they kill their Camels, and drinke the blood. If the wind blow at North-east, they cannot vnlade their Camels, least the Sands should couer them. The Merchandize carried from Mornecos to the Negros, is much Cloth, Amber Beads, Corall, but the chiefe Commodity is Salt, which is bought at Tegazza, and other places, for foure shillings a Camels lading, which is fixe hundred weight, and payeth at Gago five pounds for Custome to the King of Barbarie, afterward sold farre within the Countrey to a kind of deformed Negros, who will neuer be seene in the commerce of trading with the Barbarian, or any stranger: Wherefore they lay their Salt in the fields and leaueth it, then cometh the deformed Negro, and layeth against euery mans pricell of Salt, as much of his gold as he thinketh the Salt is worth, and goeth his way, leauing his gold with the Salt: Then returneth the Moore, if he like the gold, taketh it away, if not, detracteth tracteth so much from his heape, as he will sell to the Negro for his gold. The Negro returning, if he like the quantity, putteth too more gold, or else will not barter, but departeth. Yet they seldome mislike, for the Moore maketh a rich returne, and his King a full Treasure. Wherefore, the deformed Negro is prayd for the truest dealing man in the world: the gold which they haue is not coyned, but like small Grauell or Sand gathered after the gluts of raine, in the drie bankes of Mountaines and Riuer.

Touching Voyages of Englishmen to Barbarie, as also Embassages sent thither by Queene Elizabeth: likewise touching many English Voyages to Guinny, Benin, and other places on the Continent, and the Islands adioyning; with Patents also for those parts: the Reader may, if he please, certifie and satisfie himselfe in Master Edens, and Master Hackluyts Voyages. English Navigations are now aduanced to so great Aduenture, and new or remote Discoveries, that I rather haste to them: Yet because I thinke it meete to acquaint the Reader with the present State of the neerer parts of Africa: I haue added these following Discourses. And because Algier is the Whirle-pool of these Seas; the Throne of Pyracie, the Sinke of Trade and Stinke of Slavery; the Cage of uncleane Birds, of Prey, the Habitation of Sea-Deuils, the Receptacle of Renegadoes to God, and Traytors to their Countrey; I haue the longer stayed there: both to shew the place out of Nicholay; His Maiesties zealous Designe against them, and Gods goodnesse in two notable Deliuerances from them.

As for Ward, or other English, infesting the World from that Hel-mouth, I was loth to blot these Papers with so rotten Names.

CHAP. III.

The African Possessions of the King of Spaine, and the Turke.

S. I.

The Dominions and Fortresses * which the King of Spaine hath vpon the Iles and mayne Lands of Africa, and of the Great Turkes.

* Taken out of Botero, Perry, &c.

Besides Oran, Mersalquibir, Mililla and Pennon which the King of Spaine possesseth within the Streights; as likewise, Ceuta, Tanger, and Arzil, which by the Title of Portugall, he holdeth very neere the Streights of Gibraltar, and Mazagan in like sort without the Streights mouth, twenty miles to the South-ward of Arzil: he hath along the Coast of Africk, from Cape de Guer, to that of Guardafu, two sorts of States: for some are immediately vnder him; and others are as it were his Adherents. The Islands of Madera, Puerto Santo, the Canaries, the Iles of Arguin, of Cabo Verde, the Ile Del Principe, with that of Sant Thomas, and others neere adioyning, are immediately vnder his Dominion. These Islands are maintayned with their owne victuall, and prouision, and yet they haue also some out of Europe, as in like manner they send some thither: especially Sugars and Fruits, wherewith the Ile of Madera wonderfully aboundeth, as also with Wine. And the Island of Sant Thomas likewise hath great abundance of Sugars.

He hath since gotten Manora

These States haue no incumbrance, but by the English and Frenchmen of Warre. At the Islands of Arguin, and at Sant George de la Mina, the Portugals haue planted Fortresses in forme of Fortresses, by meanes of which, they trade with the bordering people of Gunny and Libya, and get into their hands the Gold of Mandinga, and other places neere about. Among the adherent Princes, the richest and most honourable, is the King of Congo, in that his Kingdome is one of the flourishing and plentifull Countreyes in all Ethiopia. The Portugals haue there two Colonies, one in the City of S. Saluador, and another in the Island Loanda. They haue diuers rich Commodities from this Kingdome, but the most important is euery yeere about five thousand Slaues, which they transport from thence, and sell them at good round prices in all the Iles and mayne Lands of the West Indies: and for the head of euery slaue so taken vp, there is a good tax payd to the Crowne of Portugall.

From this Kingdome one might easily goe to the Country of Prete Ianni, for it is not thought to be very farre off: and it doth so abound with Elephants, Victuall, and all other necessarie things, as would bring singular ease and commoditie to such an enterprise. Vpon the Kingdome of Congo confineth Angola, with whose Prince of late yeares, Paulo Dias, a Portugall Captaine, made warre. And the principall occasion of this warre are certaine Mines of Siluer, in the Mountaines taines of Cabambe, no whit inferior to those of Potosi; but by so much are they better, as fine Silver goeth beyond that which is base, and coarse. And out of doubt, if the Portugals had esteemed so well of things neere at hand, as they did of those farther off and remote, and had thither bent their forces wherewith they passed Capo de buena esperanza, and went to India, Malaca, and the Malucoes; they had more easily, and with lesse charge found greater wealth: for there are no Countries in the world richer in Gold and Silver, then the Kingdomes of Mandinga, Ethiopia, Congo, Angola, Butua, Toroa, Maticuo, Boro, Quiticui, Monomotapa, Casati, and Bobenimugi. But humane avarice esteemeth more of another mans, then his owne; and things remote appeare greater, then those neere at hand. Betweene Capo de buena esperanza, and Cape Guardafu, the Portugals haue the Fortresses of Sena, Cephala, and Mozambique. And by these they continue Masters of the Trade with the bordering Nations, all which abound in Gold and Iuorie. By these Fortresses they haue speciall commoditie for their Nauigation to the Indies, because their Fleetes sometimes winter, and otherwise victuall, and refresh themselves there. In these parts the King of Melinde is their greatest friend; and those of Quiloa, and other Neighbourlands, are their Tributaries. The Portugals want nothing but men: for besides other Ilands, which they leaue in a manner abandoned, there is that of Saint Laurence, one of the greatest in all the world (being a thousand two hundred miles long, and foure hundred and fourescore broad) the which, though it be not well tilled, yet for the goodnesse of the soyle, it is apt and fit to be manured, nature hauing distinguished it with Riuers, Harbours, and most commodious Bayes. These States belonging to the Crowne of Portugall, were wont to feare no other, but such Sea-forces as may be brought thither by the Turks. But the daily going to and fro of the Portugall Fleetes, which coast along vp and downe those Seas, altogether secureth them. In the yeare 1589. they tooke neere vnto Mombaza foure Gallies, and a Galliot, belonging to the Turkes, who were so bold as to come euen thither. But since the English and Hollanders haue traded the Indies, the Portugall affaires haue much decayed in those parts, their opposing them turning to such effect as you haue heard.

The Dominions of the Great Turke in Africa.

The great Turke possesseth in Africa all the Sea-coast from Velez de Gumer, or (as some hold opinion) from the Riuer Mutula, which is the Easterne limite of the Kingdome of Fez, euen to the Arabian Gulfe or Red Sea, except some few places (as namely, Mersalubir, Melilla, Oran, and Pennon) which the King of Spaine holdeth. In which space before mentioned, are situate sundry of the most famous Cities and Kingdomes in all Barbarie; that is to say, Tremizen, Alger, Tenez, Bugia, Constantina, Tunis, Tripolis, and all the Country of Egypt, from Alexandria to the Citie of Asna, called of old Siene, together with some part of Arabia Troglodytica, from the Towne of Suez to that of Suachen. Also in Africa the Grand Signior hath five Vice-royes, called by the names of Beglerbegs or Bassas, namely, at Alger, Tunis, Tripolis, at Missir for all Egypt, and at Suachen for those places which are chalenged by the Great Turke, in the Dominions of Prête Ianni. Finally, in this part at Suez, in the bottome of the Arabian Gulfe, is one of his foure principal Arseinals, or places for the building, repairing, docking, and harboring of his warlike Gallies, which may lie here vnder couert, to the number of five & twentie Bottoms.

CHAP. IIII.

The Description of the Citie of Alger, written by NICHOLAS NICHOLAY, and how it came into the possession of BARBAROSSA, and also of Malta and Tripolie.

Change of names of Alger.

Alger is a Citie in Africa very ancient, first builded by a people of Africa, called Messana, of whom she tooke her first name: afterwards was called Iol, and was the Seate Royall of Iuba, in the time when the Romans bare dominion in Africa, in honour of Cesar it was called Iulie Cesare; and since the Moors called it Gazair or Arab Eleagair, which in their Language signifieth Iles, because she is situated neere Mayorque, Minorque, Ieuise, and Fromentierre: but the Spaniards now doe call her Alger howbeit, shee is situated vpon the Mediterran Sea, vpon the hanging of a Mountaine enuironed with strong Walls, Ramperds, Ditches, Platformes, and Bulwarks, in forme almost three-square, the largenesse which goeth towards the Sea side stretcheth narrowly almost vnto the highest part, whereas there is a great building made in forme of a Citadell, to command the Towne and entrie of the Hauen. As for the buildings being beyond the Pallace Royall, are very faire Houses belonging too particular men, with a great number of Bathes and Cookes houses. The places and streetes are so well ordained, that euery one in his Occupation apart: there are about three thousand Hearth-peeds. At the bottome of the Citie which is towards the North ioyning to the Wallles, which are beaten with the Surges of the Sea in a great place, is by great Artifice and subtile Architecture builded their principall and head Mosquee; and a little below that is the Arcenall, which is the place into which are haled vp, and trimmed the the Gallies, and other vessels. This Citie is very Merchant-like, for that she is situated vpon the Sea, and for this cause marueilously peopled, for her bignesse: she is inhabited of Turkes, Moores, and Jewes in great number, which with marueilous gaine exercise the Trade of Merchandise, and lend out money at Vsury. They haue two Market dayes in euery weeke, to the which resort an infinite number of people of the Mountaines, Plaines and Vallies, being neighbours thereabouts, which do bring thither all sorts of Fruits, Corne and Foule, of very cheape price: for I haue seene a Partridge sold for a Iudit, which is a small piece of Siluer mony, in manner foure square, and is in value of our mony foure pence and a mite, but true it is that their Partridges be not so big nor delicate as ours are: the Hennes and Chickins be also very good cheape, for that they haue in most parts of their Houses Furnaces, made in manner like vnto the Hot-houses or Stoues of Germany, in the which with a small heate they doe breed and hatch their Eggs without helpe of the Hen, and therefore it is not to be marueiled at, though they haue great plentie of such Pullen. They also haue a great number of Camels and Oxen, which they doe shoo, lade, and ride vpon, as vpon Horses. And going through the streetes, because of the multitude of people, which there is marueilous, they goe crying with a loud voyce, Balue, Baluc; which is too say, Beware, beware. I haue also seene diuers Moores mounted on Barbarie Horses without Saddle, Bridle, Stirrups or Spurres, hauing onely a string in the mouth to stay them withall. And as for the men, they are altogether naked, hauing onely about their middle part to couer their priuities, some piece of a white Sarge or Blanket in manner of an apron, and about their head a Linnen cloth rowled, which they bring about and vnder their chin.

Furnaces fitly made for breeding of Chickins.

Camels and Oxen shod.

The Moores do ride their horses without saddle or bridle.

Weapons of the Moores.

Their weapons are three Darts or long Iauelins, which they carry in their right hand, and doe shoote and throw with wonderfull dexteritie, and vpon their left arme is fastned a large Dagger made a little crooked after the fashion of a Wood-knife, which they call Secquin, and vie to fight at hand strokes withall, and to annoy their Enemies comming to the close. The most part of the Turkes of Algier, whether they be of the Kings Household or the Gallies, are Christians renied, or Mahumetised, of all Nations, but most of them Spaniards, Italians, and of Prouence, of the Ilands and Coasts of the Sea Mediterran, giuen all to Whoredome, Sodometrie, Theft, and all other most detestable vices, liuing onely of rouings, spoyle, and pilling at the Seas, and the Iland, being about them: and with their practike Art bring daily to Algier a number of poore Christians which they sell vnto the Moores, and other Merchants of Barbarie for slaues, who afterward transport them, and sell them where they thinke good, or else beating them miserably with staues, doe imploy and constraime them to worke in the Fields, and in all other vile and abiect occupations and seruitude almost intollerable. And therefore it is not to be marueiled at, though these poore Christian Slaues made of it no scruple at all in putting of vs in danger, to set themselves at libertie.

Many renied Christians in Algier. A miserable life of the Christian slaues in Algier.

Pleasant Gardens.

Without the Citie towards the West are many faire and pleasant Gardens, set and adorned with diuers trees bringing forth fruits of all sorts. Amongst other things there be Milons of marueilous goodnesse, and incomparable sweetnesse: they haue also another fruite called Pateque, which the Italians call Anguries, being like in bignesse and colour to our greene Citrouilles in Winter, which they eate raw without Bread or Salt, and hath a taste so delicate and sweete, that it melteth in ones mouth, giuing a water as it were sugred, and serue greatly to refresh and digest. About their Gardens are many Wells full of good water, and the ground thereabouts, although it is Mountaines and Vallies, is very fertile for fruites and Vines. On the other part towards the East, without the Towne runneth into the Sea a small Riuer called Sano, which serueth aswell to drinke of, as other commodities, and also maketh many mills to grind. The course of the Sea from the Cape of Marfuz, (where as yet are seene the foundations of the ancient Citie Tipasa, which in times past was by the Emperours of Rome honoured in prayse of the Country Latine) doth bow and wind like vnto a Crofelow-lath, and all along the Riuer and the shoare the Moorish Women and Maiden Slaues of Algier doe goe to wash their Linnen, being commonly whole naked, sauing that they weare a piece of Cotten Cloth of some strange colour to couer their secret parts (which notwithstanding for a little piece of money they will willingly vncouer.) They weare also for an ornament about their necke, armes, and legges, great collers or bracelets of Latten, set with certaine false Stones. But as for the Wiues of the Turks or Moores, they are not seene go vncouered, for they weare a great Barnuche made of a blanket of white, blacke, or violet colour, which couereth their whole body and the head.

Sano a Riuer.

Tipasa an old Citie.

The second day after our arriuall at Algier, I found the meanes for money, and with faire word too hyre a renied Spaniard, to conduct and leade me thorow all places that I most desired to see. So as by his meanes, I saw and learned many things within foure or fve dayes that wee were there in quiet. And namely, brought mee vpon a high Mountayne being a mile from the Towne, to see and behold the situation of a very strong and great Tower, beeing builded vpon another Mountayne there neere about, and gently enquiring of him what strength the Tower might be of: he declared vnto me, that the breadth of the Ditches about the same, was seuentene brases, sauing about the gate and entry into it towards the North, it was only seuen fathomes broad, broad, and two Speares lengthis deepe. Moreouer, he said vnto mee, that within the Fortresse there were nine great cast Pieces, and eightene other, as well Mynions, as Fawconets, and other: and that in the middest of the Tower there was a Well of very good water, vpon the height thereof standing a wind-mill, and another standing without the gates. And that thirtie ordinary Souldiers are committed within it to keepe the same. And to make short, that this Tower was made to none other intent (as also others since haue confirmed) then for the garding and keeping of the Fountayne heads, which from thence are brought and conueyed vnder the water into the Citie.

Ferdinando King Catho- like con- stray- neth the Mores to a Truce.

Alger was long time vnder the Dominion of the King of Telensin, vntill such time as they of Bugie chose a new King, vnto whom they gaue and rendred themselves as his Tributarie, because he was neerer vnto them then the King of Telensin, and that hee could sooner helpe them (if need were.) But in proceesse of time, perceiuing themselves to be as it were free and out of all doubt: armed certayne ships to the Sea, with the which they became such Courfaires or Pirates, that in short time they annoyed by their Piracies and Robberies on the Sea, not onely the Coast of Spaine, but also all the Mediterrane Ilands. Which perceiuing, Ferdinando the King Catho- like sent to Alger a great Armie to assiege them, and for to keepe them in most distresse, caused with a maruellous readinesse a Fort to bee made in a small Iland, which lyeth before the Citie, keeping them by that meanes so straightly besieged, that in short time they were constrained to require a Truce for ten yeeres: Which was agreed vnto them vpon condition of a certayne Tribute, which they payed vntill the death of King Ferdinando, for then they espying a conue- nient time and meanes, to breake the Truce, and to set themselves at liberty, called vnto them Caradin Barbarosse, who after the siege of Bone, retyred to the Castle of Gegill, standing in the Coast of the Mediterran Sea, vpon the top of a high Rocke, seuentie miles from Bugie, who be- ing by them chosen to bee their chiefe Captayne, gaue many fierce assaults vnto the Fortresse, so as he put the Spaniards to flight, and incontinent after caused it to bee ruined and pulled downe euen to the foundation. He then seeing so happie successe of his Enterprize, could no longer abide to be as companion, but in a Bath trayterously slue a Prince of Arabie, called Selim: who declared himselfe to be Lord of the Citie.

Selim slaine by Treason.

Afterwards forsaking the name of a Captaine any longer, caused himselfe to bee called King, and coyned money vnder his name, and so well guided his Affaires that in short time after hee brought all his Neighbours about him to become contributory vnto him. Such was the begin- ning of the magnificent estate of Cariedin Barbarosse: after whose death, his Brother Haria- dene succeeded him in the Kingdome, and after him his Sonne Cassam, who raigned at the time we arriued there.

The King had not complete power: but they enioyed, as this Author saith, a kind of Common- wealth.

This Haviadene was the fa- mous Sea Captaine, Ad- mirall of the Turkes Nauie, mentioned in the Turkish Hi- storie, which aff- ighted Rome, and was terrible to Christendom, See my Pilgri- mage, l. 6. c. 9. S. 2.

To returne to the Discourse of our Nauigation, which I left at the Cape Matasuz, from whence (hauiing sojourned there a night) wee departed in the morning: the wind was so con- trary that it forced vs to come to an Anchor neere to the Cape Tedele: at which place wee saw within a great Rocke a deepe entrance, being two flight shot long, into the which the Sea en- treth euen to the very bottome, where we entred with our Skiffe, euen to the halfe way of it: and thinking to passe on further, we found so great a number of strange Mice, that we were con- strayed to turne backe: so were we persecuted. And so for feare they should pisse on our heads (their pisse being venomous) we were forced to couer vs, and to wrap our selues in our Clokes. This part of the Sea is very full of Mountaynes and great Rockes.

Teddell is a Citie contayning about two thousand Harth-steeds, situated vpon the Sea Medi- terrane, threescore miles from Alger at the bottome of a Mountayne, and on the hanging of a great Rocke. On the midst of the Mountayne is a little Castle, from the which along goeth a wall stretching to that of the Citie. The Africans first did edifie it, and at this present is inha- bited of a people very merry and pleasant. For, for the most part of them they are giuen to the exercise of the Harpe and Lute. Their principall Craft and Occupation is fishing, and dying of Wooles and Cloth, by reason of diuers small Brookes very fit for their dyings, which descending from the Mountaynes through diuers places of the Towne, issue into the Sea. The Inhabitants of the same place are vnder the same Obeysance and Iustice that they of Alger are. Leauing the Coast and Towne of Teddell, we bare roome to Sea-wards, and had so good speed, that the foure and twentieth of Iuly in the Euening, we discovered the Citie of Gigeri, but euen thinking to be neere it, within a moment arose such a sudden Borasque or Flaa, that if our Mariners had not nimblely bestirred themselves in taking in of their Sayles, wee had beene in great danger to haue beene all drowned, and immediately saw our Frigat (which was made fast to our Gally) lost before our eyes, because they had not quickly cut the Halser, but all our men were saued by swimming to our Gallies. These Borasques (engendred of a wind, called by the Gracians, Ty- phon; of Plinie, Vortex or Vortex, but vulgarly Tourbillon, or Whirlwind, proceed not out of the West, notwithstanding doe often happen in Winter) are very often and dangerous all along the Coast of Barbarie, and as they come very suddenly, so are againe soone appeased.

Porte of Bone.

The twentieth five in the Euening, we arriued at the Port of Bone: where wee being come to an Anker, the Ambassadour sent to salute the Caddy, which keepeth the towne vpon tribute vnder the King of Alger. This Caddy was a renyed Christian, and notwithstanding shewed himselfe very curteous and liberall towards vs, for ouer and aboue the refreshings of flesh, bread and fruits which he gaue vs, about supper time sent vnto the Ambassadour two great Platters of Marcolique, full of their kinde of meate, dressed according to their fashion, which was a kinde of Menudes made in Paste with Onions, and fat Pullets with certaine sawces of very good taste and sauour.

This Ambassadour was the Lord of Aramont sent 1551. by the French King to the Great Turke at Constantinople.

The Houses within it (hauing beene twice sacked and spoyled by the Spaniards) are euill builded, and this Towne doth not now containe aboue three hundred Harties. The Emperour Charles the fift, after he had subdued the Towne, caused vpon a height of one side towards the West, a great Castle to be builded: which commanded of all sides, and did accommodate it with a number of Cisternes to gather Water in, for that on this height there is neither Well nor Fountain.

Charles the fift builded there a Castle.

20 notwithstanding, shortly after it was rased by the Turkes and Moores, and the Spaniards driuen out of it: without the City towards the East, is seene a goodly and large Champaigne on Conntrey, inhabited and tilled by a kinde of People called Merdez; which Country, besides the great quantitie of Corne that it bringeth forth, nourisheth and pastureth in the Valley a great number of Oxen, Kine, Sheepe and other Cattell, so plentifully, that with their Milke and Butter, not onely the City of Bone is provided and furnished, but also Tunes and the Isle of Gerbes: there are also about it many faire Garden Plats, plentifully abounding with Dates, Figges, and sweet Mellons. At the beginning of the Valley passe two small Riuers, whereof, the next and greatest hath a Bridge of stone, vnder the which is a way to an old ruined Church, being betweene two Rocks, which the Moores doe say to haue beene the Church of Saint Augustine, which made me the more desirous to goe and see it: Notwithstanding, that a Jew, borne in Spaine, being then with me, vsed all the meanes he could to perswade mee from it: for the

By chance we found there a Ship of Marsellie conducted by a Curfane, to gather the same, who presented vnto the Ambassadour, many faire and great branches. The next day being the six and twentieth, after

And hauing doubled the Cape Bone, the twenty and eight day we arriued at the Ile of Pantalaree.

This Ile of Pantalaree, which by the Ancients was called Paconia, is very Hilly and full of great Rocks. There groweth great quantitie of Cotton, Capers, Figges, Mellons and Ricins: and throughout the Ilands is full of Cisternes. There are also many small Houses very 50 anciently builded within the ground (made like vnto Caues) made by the Moores in the time they possessed the Iland: along the Sea side are found Stones being blacke, and glistering like vnto fine Iet, and certaine rough Stones. They haue no Horses, but of Oxen great store, with the which they do labour and till the ground, how well there groweth no Corne. Of which they furnish themselves out of the Ile of Sicilia, vnto which they are subiect. But well there groweth certaine other Graine and Herbes of small estimation. There groweth a small Tree like vnto Nerte: which the Moores called, Vero; and the Sicilians, Stinco, bringing forth a small round fruit, which at the first is red, and being ripe, waxeth blacke. Of which, the Inhabitants of the Iland (which are very poore) make Oyle, which they vse as well to burne in their Lampes, as to eate: and the Women after hauing washed their heads, doe anoint their haire with it 60 to make it grow long and faire: As well the men as women are of nature good Swimmers, as by experience we saw by a woman of the Country, bringing a great Basket with Fruit, entered into the Sea, and swimming, brought the same to sell in our Galley. This Iland containeth thirty miles in length, and in breadth about ten miles.

The thirtieth day of the same moneth of Iuly, we departed from Pantalaree with such a fauourable wind : that the first day of August, being passed the Ile of Goze, we arriued about the eue-ning in the Road of Malta, where incontinent we were visited by the Knights Parifot and Villegaignon, and of many others of diuers Nations. And after the Ambassador had giuen to vnderstand to the great Master his comming, the chaines of the Hauen being opened with saluation accustomed of the one side and other, we entred into the Hauen, vpon the sides whereof were with the afore named, diuers other Knights come thither in the behalfe of the grand Master (of birth a Spaniard) named Omede, which receiued, the Ambassador, and presented vnto him a Mulet, on which he lighted, and accompanied him to the great Hall of the Castle, where the grand Master with diuers Knights attended him, and hauing done reuerence vnto him, and declared part of his authorisation, the night approaching, taking his leaue returned to his Gallies. The next day he was by the great Master bidden to a sumptuous dinner, vnto the which all the ancient and notable Knights of the Religion were also bidden and assembled, and there was openly rehearsed, how that certaine dayes before Sinan Basha, Captaine Generall of the Turkes army had taken and sacked the Castle of the Towne of Augusta in Sicilia, and that he from thence arriuing in a Port of Malta called Mechetto, neere vnto that of the Castle, put his men there on land to ouer-run, rauish and spoyle all whatsoeuer they should find for their aduantage, which they executed most cruelly, as such barbarous people in like affaires are accustomed to doe. But a most valiant and well aduised Knight a Spaniard, named Guimeran, Captaine of one of the Gallies of the Religion, who could not abide such insolency, and secretly assembling certaine number of Souldiers, did by ambushes and other meanes so distresse them, that after hauing taken and slaine such as fell into his laps, made them to remooue from that place : but notwithstanding did not desist of their enterprise : for from thence they went to the Road of S. Paul where they landed their Ordnance to assiege the City, whereof they got the Suburbs, and framed their Trenches to make the battery. And forsomuch, as they could not atchieue the end of their enterprise (by reason as well of the roughnesse of the place being full of Rocks, as seeing their men faile them, dying through extreme heat) they resolved to remoue their siege, and to imbarke themselves with their Ordnance, hauing slaine, taken and sacked all that they met withall at aduantage. From thence they went to the Ile of Goze, being very neere and subiect to the Ile of Malta, which they sacked, and by deceitfull composition tooke the Castle, leading the people both men, women and children as slaues into miserable captiuitie : being in number sixe thousand and three hundreth. The Knight de Villegaignon in his Treaty which he hath made of the warres of Malta, doth recite a History no lesse lamentable then full of dispaire, and vnaturall cruelty: and is of a Sicilian which in that place had dwelled of long time, and there married a wife, by whom he had two faire daughters then, being in state to be married, who seeing his last calamity approaching, because he would not in his presence see his wife and his daughters rauished and violated, and to be brought in shamefull seruitude, and to deliuer them from all shame and bondage, hauing called them into his house, first slew with his sword his two daughters, and afterwards their mother. And this done, with a Harquebuse and a Crosse-bow bent (as cleane bereft of fences) made towards his enemies, of whom he slew twaine at the first encounter, afterwards fighting a while with his sword, being inuironed with the multitude of the Turkes, brought himselfe to the end of his most vnhappy life. Behold the summary of the miseries happened through the Turkes in few dayes in the Iles of Sicila, Malta, and Goze. After which things the Bascha caused his army with the whole booty and prey to embarke, and remoued the seuen and twenty of Iuly towards Barbary, to assiege the Castle of Tripoli.

The sixt of August we came to Tripoli, a City which Charles the fifth had giuen in keeping to the Knights of Malta, and then besieged by Sinan Basha. Where hauing well considered the placing of the Campe, the Towne and Castle, we returned to the Bascha, with whom the Ambassador talked a while, and in the meane while I went to see the market of the Turkes (which they call Basar) being hard by where the poore Christians of Sicil, Malta, and Goze, were sold vnto those that most offered for them (and last inhaunfers, being permitted vnto those that bought them (as the ancient Custome of the Oriental Barbarians is) to strip them starke naked, and to make them goe, to the intent to see if they haue any naturall impediment in their bodies, visiting afterwards their teeth and eyes, as though they had beene horses, and standing there, I saw creeping vpon the ground a Scorpion of yellow colour, being of length more then a long finger. The same day the Turkes brought their Ordnance and Gabions vnto the Trenches, which Gabions are made of great Plankes of three inches, which they carry vpon their Gallies or Shippes to serue them when they haue need of them : for when they will batter any place, they set them in the ground in forme of Baskets, Afterwards being set in rankes, they fill them with earth, and is a very commodious inuention, for the shot which can but slippering passe ouer it, and can doe no hurt nor dammage. The Turkes hauing in the night placed their Gabions, and their Ordnance ready to the Battery, did the next day following being the eight of August, begin to shoot at the Castle with great furie, which was not left vnanswered, and euery houre some slaine.

The besieged sent to the Bascha, if he would receiue certaine of them to treat of some good accord touching the giuing ouer of the Castle, whereunto the Bascha lightly consenting, was in all diligence dispatched a braue Spaniard, named Guinare, and a Knight of Maïorque, to offer vnto the Bascha the Castle with the Artillery and Munition, so as he would furnish them of ships to bring them with bagge and baggage safely to Malta: to whom summarily was answered, that (forasmuch as, as yet they had not deserued any grace, presuming to be so bold as to keepe so small a place against the armie of the highest Prince on the earth) if they would pay the whole charges of the armie, he would gladly agree to the matter proponed, or if they would not thereunto consent (as it became them) that for their recompence, all they within the 10 Castle should continue slaues and prisoners: notwithstanding, if they incontinently and without delay, did surrender the place he would exempt out of them two hundred. Whereupon, the messengers returning in dispaire of any further grace, was stayed by Drogot and Salarais, with flattering words, and fayned promises, that they would endeavour so much as in any wise lay in them, to make the Bascha condescend to a better and more gracious composition: for they feared that the assieged through dispaire, would resolute (as their extreame refuge) to defend themselves even to the last man. And incontinent went to the Bascha, to declare vnto him his ouersight, in refusing those which of their owne voluntary came to surrender themselves into his hands, and that to put them out of doubt and dispayre, hee ought with all mildnesse to agree vnto all that they demanded. For after he had the Castle, and all the men vnder his au-
 20 thoritie, he might afterwards dispose of them, as he should thinke good. The Bascha finding this counsell good, caused the two messengers to be called againe vnto him, declaring vnto them with fayned and dissembling words, that at the instance and request of Drogot and Salarais there present, inclining vnto their request, he did discharge them of all their costs and charges of the armie, swearing vnto them (the better to deceiue them) by the head of his Lord and his owne, inuolably to obserue all that which he had promised vnto them, which they (too easily) beleueed, and forthwith went to declare the same vnto the Gouvernour and others within the Castle.

The Bascha the better to atchieue to his enterprise, sent forth after the Deputie aforesaid, a Turke (one of the most subtil to his mind, that he could choose) to whom he gaue expresse
 30 charge to perswade the Gouvernour to come with him, to conclude and treat concerning the giuing ouer, and for the vessels which should bee necessary for their conduct to Malta, and that if hee made difficultie to come, he should make a semblance as though hee would remaine there in hostage for him, and that about all things hee should haue an eye to consider of the strength and assurance of the assieged, and of the disposition of all things there, which the Turke could execute so finely, that the Gouvernour by the counsell of those that had perswaded him to surrender, notwithstanding the reasons of warres, and duetie of his office, forbade him in such manner to abandon the place of his charge, resolved vpon so small an assurance of the 40 Bascha, who hauing rigorously reproached his timidity, said vnto him: that forsomuch as he had giuen his word, that if he would pay the charges of the armie, he would let them go with bagge and baggage, otherwise hee would discharge but two hundred, whereat Vallier being greatly moued, answered, that it was not that which with the Deputie of the Castle he had agreed vnto: But seeing he would doe none otherwise, that it would please him to suffer him to returne to the place for to haue the aduise and deliberation of the assieged, which he could not obtaine, but it was onely permitted vnto him, to send backe the Knight that he had brought with him, to make report of these pittious newes vnto the assieged; and on the other party, Vallier was sent to the Gallie with Irons on his legges. They of the Castle hauing vnderstood the Premises, were greatly afraid of the mischiefe, which they perceiued approaching to-
 50 wards them, and could take none other resolution, then the next day in the morning early to returne the said Knight to the Bascha, to know whether they should looke for no better. But as soone as he was come before him, the Gouvernour was brought in, of whom the Bascha asked, which of both he would choose, either to pay the expences of the armie, or that he and all they of the Castle would remaine prisoners, to whom he answered, that a slaue had none other authoritie then that which by his master was giuen vnto him, and that hauing lost, besides his libertie, the power to command if any thing were yet reserued in him, could not counsell him to command to agree vnto any thing, but that which was concluded with the delegates, which the Bascha hearing, for feare that such an answere should not come to the knowledge of the assieged, and that it should cause them desperately to fight it out, hauing taken counsell of his Captaines, tooke the Gouvernour by the hand, and with a smiling and dissembling countenance said vnto him, that without any doubt he would as he had promised them, set them at free li-60 berty: and that therefore without fearing any thing, hee would cause them all to come out of the Castle: but the Gouvernour, because he had before bene deceiued, would not trust to his words, but said vnto him, that he should command him that was come from the Castle, for that he knew they would doe neuer a whit the more for him. So that the Bascha turning towards the Knight, commanded him that he forthwith should goe vnto him, and cause them to come foorth : swearing vnto them by the head of his great Lord, and his owne, that they should all be deliuered and set at liberty, according to the first conuentions agreed vpon. Which the Knight beleeuing, went to report vnto them these good newes : which they receiued with such ioy, that without any further care or consideration of their misse-hap so neere, and prepared for them, they ran to the prease with their wiues, children, and best moueables, prealing who should first goe forth. But they were not so soone issued, but were cleane spoyled, and of the enemies, part of the Knights were sent to the Gallies, and the rest to the Bascha: who beeing by the Knight Vallier admonished of his faith, which hee had twise giuen, answered, that there was no promise to be kept with dogges, and that they had first violated their Oath with the great Lord, vnto whom at the giuing ouer of the Rhodes, they had sworne that they neuer would take on armes against the Turkes. The Castle being taken and spoyled, and about two hundreth Moores of that Countrey that had serued the Knights, cut in peeces, with great cries and shouts, reioycing of their victory, they discharged a great peale of Ordnance.

Although the houses and buildings within the Towne be ruined, yet it is inuironed with very faire and strong wals, accompanied with a great number of Turrets, double Ditches and false breaches, and the same are on the three parts inuironed with the sea, and within them are very good Wels and Fountaines. We saw in the midst of the Towne an Arch triumphall of white Marble with foure faces vpon foure pillars of Corinth foure square, being grauen in the Front that looketh towards the East (by excellent Sculpture) a Chariot drawen by two great Griffins, and within it was Victory sitting with two wings : Toward the West, was grauen a Chariot, whereupon was sitting Pallas, and about the edge were written diuers Romane letters, but were so ruined, that scarce they were to be knowne. Notwithstanding, by that which can be read, we vnderstand, that they were made in the time of P. Lentulus, which is a good witnesse to beleue that this City, as before I haue said, was builded by the Romanes. The inside of the Arch was full of diuers enrichments, and aboue after the fashion of a foure-square Turret : and two other faces looking towards the North and South, were cut as from the vpper part of the body vnto the girdlestead without any heads, two great figures of the ouercome. All the rest was set foorth with all sorts of weapons in forme of Trophee, not farre from thence was seene a great foure-square place, inuironed with many great and high Pillars in two rankes, after the manner of a Porch, and neere that are the destructions of a high Tower, which in times past was (as a Moore of that Countrey told me) the great Temple or Mosque of the Citie : there are a number more of antiquities ruined. The Chinow being come was sent by the Bascha, we returned towards the Castle, but might not at that time enter in all, because the Bascha had giuen commandement, that there should not enter with the Ambassadour aboue five or sixe at the most, which were Sant Veran de Fleury, de Montenard, Batolomy and the Dragoman, and I : at the entry we met with Morataga and the Capitaine which had the charge of the Castle, which caused vs to be brought vpon the Rampards, to the end we might the better view and consider of all things, and hauing seene both aboue and below, we perceived for certaine, that all things were well repaired and furnished, and well appointed with sixe and thirty peeces of Ordnance, as well small as great, and that there was a great number of Pikes, and pots to cast fire, abundance of all kind of victuals and other Munitions, a good Well and Fontaine : and that at the time when the siege was laid to it, there was as well of Knights as Souldiers of diuers Nations, about sixe hundred, and the best Gunners of the world, it is an euermore shame to them that so faint-heartedly surrendred the same vnto those barbarous people without any warlike reason. All which hauing well considered, with a heauy mind we returned againe to our Gallies, whither incontinent the Bascha sent to desire the Ambassadour that the next day he would come to his solemne dinner, which he pretended to make for ioy of his victory, and taking of the Castle, and that he would bring Vallier with him, which he would not refuse, thinking by such occasion to recouer the rest of the two hundred Knights and Souldiers which were yet to be deliuered : and therefore the day following, being the sixteenth day of August, 1551. accompanied by the Gouverneur Vallier, the Knight de Seur, Cotignac, Capitaine Coste, Montenard and me, went towards Bascha, being within the Ditch against the breach of the Castle, where for a magnificency were set vp two faire Pauillions, the one for him, ioyning vnto a very faire Fontaine : and the other for the Ambassadour and his company : and so soone as he had sent his presents, as well to the Bascha, as to others his familiars (which of old time hath beene the manner and custome that they that haue to do with these Barbarians must obserue) he was brought vnto the Pauillion that was prepared for him, and forthwith serued with all magnificence, honour, and superfluity of meats as well of flesh as fish, diuersly dressed according vnto their fashion : and with wines very excellent that they had found within the Castle, and this seruice was done with noyse of all their instruments, and by Officers in number aboue one hundred, apparelled for the most part in long Gownes of fine cloth of Gold, tuffed or figured, and the other of Veluet and Crimson Damaske, and diuers others colours. The Bascha was no sooner set downe, but all the Ordnance of the Gallies, Foists and Galliot of the army (being in all one hundred and forty, besides the great Gallion and two Mahumez) was discharged, with such a noyse and thundering dring, that it seemed the heauens and skies did shake. The table being taken vp, the Ambassador and Gouvernour Vallier entred into the Pauillion of the Bascha, which in the end agreed to deliuer the two hundred men which he had promised: and moreouer, gaue twenty vnto the Ambassador vpon promise, that he should cause to be released the thirty Turkes taken at Malta, at the landing of the army. But the most part of them that were deliuered, were Spaniards, Sicilians and Calabres, and few French-men: for the most part of them were put to the ranke of criminals forsworne: that day were brought into our Gallies, the Coffers of Vallier, within which were found certaine apparell, a sacke with money, and a cup of siluer, the rest which he said to be more worth then two thousand Crownes, the Turkes had taken away and spoiled: besides, two Pauillions which he esteemed worth three hundred Crownes. The Turkes hauing in their hands an ancient Gunner of the Castle, named Iohn de Chabas, borne within the Towne of Romance in Daulphine (to the end that their feast of victory should not be vnfurnished of some sacrifice of cruelty) for that with a Canon he had shot off the hand of the Clerke generall of the army, brought him into the Towne: and hauing cut off his hands and his nose, they put him quicke into the ground euen to the girdle stead, and there with a cruelty was persecuted and shot at with arrowes, and in the end for to accomplish the execution of his glorious martyrdom, they cut his throat. About eight a clocke in the euening, were lighted vpon all the Gallies, Galliot, Foists, & other vessels, all along vpon the Tackels, Yeards, and other ropes and poupes, in euery of them about three hundred candles, with cries and shouts accustomed, and sound of drums and other instruments. To make an end of all their triumphs, they againe discharged all their Ordnance. The next day being the seuenteenth, the Bascha sent to be presented vnto the Ambassador a gowne of cloth of Gold tiffed, and with the same his leaue to depart, which he so long had desired: and was not receiued without a present giuen him that brought it, and to diuers other Officers of the Bascha, which on all sides came running one after another, as a sort of Hounds, to haue their fee and share in the Game, for they are the most barbarous, couetous, and cruell Nation of the world, and in whom there is neither truth nor fidelity, neuer obseruing the one halfe of that they promise: and yet men must alwayes bee giuing to them.

A cruell sacrifice vpon the person of Iohn Chabas a Gunner of the Castle.

Twelfthly, Captaine Thomas Harbert in the Marmaduke, burden one hundred tunnes, men fiftie, Iron Ordnance twelue.

The Fleet thus furnished set sayle in the sound of Plimmouth, the twelfth of October in the morning, in the yeare 1620.

The one and thirtieth of October, in the morning wee turned into the Road of Gibraltar, where were riding at anchor two of the King of Spaines ships of warre, the Vice-Admirall of a Squadron with the Kings Armes in his fore-top and another, who so soone as they perceiued vs weighed their Anchors, set sayle, and comming Lee-ward of our Admirall, strooke his flag, saluting him with their small shot and great Ordnance, after haled him with voyces; our Admirall striking his flag, answered them with voyces, gaue them his Ordnance and small shot, all the Fleet following in order: this done, we saluted the Towne with our Ordnance, the Towne doing the like by answering vs. Our Admirall being at an Anchor, the Spanish Captaine accompanied with other Gentlemen, came aboard our Admirall, who told vs that there were great store of Pirats abroad, and that two of the Pirats shippes had fought with seuen Spanish Gallies, and had slaine them foure hundred men, and that they had beene at Steria a small Towne with thirty sayle of ships and ten Gallies, and had taken it, and carryed away diuers Prisoners, and that they had threatned to take Gibraltar; there the Admirall sent his sicke men ashore, hauing houses and lodgings prouided for them, amongst whom was Captaine Iohn Fenner who here dyed.

The second of Nouember, about seuen in the morning, hauing a fresh gale at North-west, the Admirall with the rest of the Fleet weighed Anchor and standing off, met North the Rear-Admirall of the Spanish Fleet, who saluting vs North his Ordnance and wee stood on our course North-east and by East, being bound for Malbaga. The third, about two in the morning, wee came to an Anchor in Malbaga Road, and about eight of the clocke wee saluted the Towne with our Ordnance and diuers Volleys of small shot; here diuers Spaniards of account came aboard our ships whom we kindly entertayned, here we likewise expected Letters but heard not of any.

The sixth, our Admirall dispatched a Gentleman, one Master Iohn Dappa, with Letters to the English Embassador at the Court of Spaine, to let him know of our arriual and proceedings. This day about eleuen of the clocke, the Fleet weighed Anchor and set sayle the wind at North-west. But before wee weighed, our Admirall gaue order to the Fleet to diuide themselves into three Squadrons, the Admirall Squadron was kept fixe leagues from the shore, with pendants in the mayne tops for their signes; the Vice-Admirals Squadron three leagues without him, on his Bow with pendants on his fore-tops; the Rear-Admiral three leagues within him on his quarter with pendants on their Misen tops, whodeuiding themselves according to their order steered away East and by South along the shoare, being bound for Allicant.

The seventh, about fixe in the morning, it being calme, and all the Fleet together, the Admirall tooke in all her sayles, and lay a hull, all the Fleet doing the like, the Admirall put out his flag of generall Councell which was Saint George. Whereupon all the Captaines and Masters repayred aboard him, where it was concluded, and thought meet that two ships of least draught of water, and one Pinnasse should hale the shoare close aboard to see if any Pirats were at an Anchor, eyther in Bayes or Coues, and to free the shoare; here likewise was giuen a word whereby to know our owne Fleet from others, if any strangers should chance to fall amongst vs in the night, the word was Greenwich Tower. The Councell ended, and euery man repayred aboard his owne shippe, in the euening the whole Fleet in their order sayled alongst towards Cape Degat.

The eight and ninth dayes hauing but little wind, we gayned not much way. The tenth, in the morning, falling with the point of Muttrill, and hauing the wind Southerly, the whole Fleet put into the Road and there anchored.

The nineteenth, in the morning, we came to Anchor in Allicant Road, where the whole Fleet saluted the Towne with their Ordnance, and the Towne vs: heere our Admirall hauing provided houses for his sicke men, as before hee had done at Gibraltar, sent thirty senen sicke men of his owne ships Company ashore, here likewise he dispatched a Gentleman, one Master 10 Walter Long to Carthage, with Letters of aduice; but all this while could receiue no such Letters as we expected.

The five and twentieth, beeing fitted with Wine, Water, and other such necessaries as wee wanted, the wind being Northerly, the whole Fleet set sayle, leauing behind the Good Will, out of whom our Admirall had taken most of her men to supply his wants for those sicke hee left ashore, and being vnder sayle we shaped our course South-west for Algier.

The seuen and twentieth, about ten in the morning, wee came to Anchor in Algier Road in 20 seuen and twentie fathome water, out of command of the Towne or Castle, the Admirall and Reare-Admirall wearing white Ancients on their Poops, the rest of the Fleet wearing no Ancients at all, going in the whole Fleet, saluted the Towne with their Ordnance, but the Towne gaue vs none againe.

The eight and twentieth, our Admirall sent a Gentleman ashore, one Captaine Squibe, with a white flag of Truce in his Boat, to giue the Vice-Roy to vnderstand the cause of our comming; hereupon the Vice-Roy sent a Boat aboard our Admirall, with a white flag and foure men in her, one principall man in the Towne who deliuered our Admirall, signifying the Vice-Roy, had received command from the Grand Seignior, to vse vs with all respect, and that our men might haue the free libertie of the shoare to buy fresh victuals or whatsoever they wanted; they promised our Admirall if on the morrow hee would send any Gentleman of qualitie ashore with the Kings Maiesties Letters, that vpon the shooting off a Peece of Ordnance, according to our Admirals demand, he should receiue sufficient Hostages aboard for his safetie: this night the Pi-30 rats brought in three Prizes, one Fleming, the other two Englishmen, the one a Plimouth man, and the other of North Yarmouth.

The third of December, came sixe of the King of Spaines ships into the Road, the Admirall striking his flag, saluted our Admirall with small shot and Ordnance, this done, he came aboard our Admirall in his Boat, and told him hee came in pursuite of certaine Pirats, who had taken diuers of their men, who being in a ship of seuen hundred tons neere Carthage, in fight with a Turkish Pirat, had boarded her, entred her men and taken her, had not their owne ship unfortunately false on fire with a mischance hapning, they were forced to forsake the Turkes ship to saue their owne, and so lost both, for being not able to quench the fury of the fire, were forced to yeeld themselues to the slavery of the Turkes to saue their liues, beeing in all three hundred 40 men, whereof thirty perished in the fire. This Spanish Admirall sayling neere the Towne, the Turkes let flye seuentie foure great shot at him, and hee gaue them some sixteene backe in exchange, but the distance betweene them was so farre, that the shot falling short, no harme was done on eyther side.

The fourth, our Admirall receiued from the Towne an answere of the Kings Letters.

The sixth, after long debating, finding the Turkes perfidious and fickle, as well in detayning our Messenger, who deliuered his Maiesties Letters, notwithstanding we had sufficient Hostages for him, as in breaking all other promises: in the end it was agreed thus, vpon leauing a Consull with them, they would let our Messenger come aboard againe; whereupon the Admirall sent a common man, well clothed, by the name of a Consull, whom they receiued with good 50 respect, and sending our Messenger aboard, receiued their owne pledges, and deliuered vs some forty poore Captiues, which they pretended was all they had in the Towne, this was all wee could draw from them. The seuenth, in the morning, our Admirall sent a Letter with instruction to our Councell, with another Letter to the Bashaw, to let him know how ill wee tooke his perfidious dealing.

The eight, in the morning, our Admirall and all the rest of the Fleet weighed Anchor and set sayle.

The tenth day at night, the wind shifted to the South and East, and so to the East.

The fourteenth, came to Anchor in the Road of Alacotha, on the North side of the said Island, we found this to be a very good place, yeelding vs Wood, Water and Ballast, whereof we 60 had great need, the people very kind courteous, bringing vs great store of all manner of provisions which we bought at easie rates, whereby wee supplied our wants, and releued our sicke men, whereof we had great store in our Fleet.

The foure and twentieth, in the morning, the Fleet weighed Anchor and set sayle.

The five and twentieth, about nine at night, came eight or nine sayle of Turkes into our Fleet, whom so soone as we discovered, we chased them and made shot at them, but by reason it was a darke night, and that they sayled better then our ships, they escaped vs.

The fixe and twentieth, about three in the afternoone, wee put into Alicant Road, hoping there to receiue Letters of aduice, else some newes of a supply of victuals out of England, but missed both.

The seuen and twentieth at night the Reare-Admirals Squadron went out to Sea in pursuit of two Turkish Pirats, who had taken about three houres before two Flemmish ships; the Flemmings quiting their ships, saued themselves in their Boats.

The fourth of January at night, the Constant Reformation and the Golden Phenix had order to goe to Sea, to seeke two Pirats ships, which we heard were on the Christian shoare. The fifth at night, they returned into the Road againe, but met not with any.

The sixth, the Vice-Admirall with his Squadron set sayle for Malbaga, to see if they could heare of any newes of a supply of victuals, or whether the two Princes which were long expected were come thither. The twelfth, Master John Duppa came from Carthagen, bringing with him a packet of Letters of aduice sent out of England, bearing date the fourteenth of December, he signified that there was fixe monethes victuals sent out of England, for a supply of his Maiesties ships, and that they were at Malbaga with the two Pinnasses, this night the Reare-Admirall with his Squadron was sent to Sea to see if he could meet with certaine Pirats, which we had intelligence of. The thirteenth, the Reformation, the Samuel, and the Restore, put to Sea, to see if they could meet with any Pirats. The eighteenth, the Reformation with the other ships returned into the Road, where we found the Reare-Admirall with his Squadron likewise returned, but met no Pirats.

The one and twentieth, there came a Flemmish Boat with fifteene Flemmings in her aboard our Admirall, who being chased by the Turkish Pirats off, of Cape Martine, left their shippe and saued themselves by their Boat, this night was the Anthelope with other ships sent out to see if they could meete with them. The foure and twentieth, the Anthelope with the other ships returned into the Road, but met with none.

The five and twentieth, our Admirall beeing invited to the English Consuls house went ashore, where at his arriuall he was entertayned with small shot and Ordnance both from the Towne and Castle, and at night with Fire-workes, running of Horses, shooting of Ordnance, and other sports; this day Captaine John Roper was dispatched with Letters for England. The fixe and twentieth, our Admirall returned aboard the Towne, giuing him a friendly farewell with their Ordnance.

The seuen and twentieth, the Admirall with the rest of the Fleet set sayle, leauing the Marmaduke behind, whose Captaine and Master were both sicke ashore. The eight and twentieth at midnight, we met with seuen sayle of Flemmings ships of Warre, neere Cape Paul, vnder the command of Captaine Haughton Admirall of Zealand, who the next morning, after he had saluted our Admirall with Ordnance, came aboard in his Boat, he told our Admirall hee had two and twentie ships of Warre vnder his charge, whom he had diuided into Squadrons, imploying them some without the Streights, and some within. The one and thirtieth, wee came to an anchor againe in Alicant Road.

The first of February, the Reare-Admirall put to Sea with foure shippes, to see if he could meet with any Pirats, and this day dyed Captaine Eusabey Cane, Captaine of the Hercules, and the Admirall disposed the command of the same ship to Captaine Alexander Bret. The fifth, the Reare-Admirall returned with the other foure ships but had met none.

The sixth, the wind being Easterly, the Fleet weighed Anchor about midnight, shaping our course for Malbaga, during the time of our staying here we refreshed our sicke men ashore, hauing conuenient houses provided for them in the fields Gardens, with carefull people to attend them, providing them such necessaries as they should need. The Constant, for her part, sent ashore ninetie two persons, who as they recouered their strength were sent for aboard, yet notwithstanding all their care, at their departure they were forced to leaue behind them fortie two desperately ill, the Admirall taking order both for them and others, that they should bee carefully provided for vntill the Fleets returne.

The sixteenth, came into the Road the Vice-Admirall and his Squadron with the two Pinnasses which we so long expected out of England, the one the Mercurie, of the burden of two hundred and fortie tunnes, sixtie five men, and twentie peeces of Brasse Ordnance, vnder the command of Captaine Phineas Pet; the other the Spy, of the burden of one hundred and sixtie tunnes, fiftie five men, and eightene Peeces of Brasse Ordnance, vnder the command of Captaine Edward Gyles: there came also two Merchants ships with a supply of victuals for his Maiesties ships.

The eighteenth, the Zouch Phenix, the Hercules, the Neptune, and the Spy put to Sea, with order to ply betweene Gibraltar and Shutte point. The nineteenth, the Anthelope put to Sea, and with those ships which went out the day before, had order to ride in Shutte Road, to see if they could descry any Pirats come into the Streights.

The

The three and twentieth, the Reare-Admirall put to Sea with five other shippes, the Golden Phenix, the Samuel, the Centurion, the Marigold, and the Restore, with order to ride in Tansey Bay, where they were to attend the comming in of diuers Pirats whom we heard to be without the Streights mouth.

The foure and twentieth, the Anihelope with the rest of the shippes returned, bringing with them a prize being a small Frenchman, which had fiftie Buts of Oyle in her, and diuers Moores and Jewes, men, women and children, Passengers bound from Tituon to Algier, all the Turkes sauing themselves in their Boat: this day also came into the Road Captaine Gyles Penne, in a ship of Bristoll, from Tituon Road, bringing a Letter from the Mogoden to our Admirall, and two Moores who treated with him concerning the redemption of their people, whom our ships had taken, offering for so many Moores, so many English, whom they held in the Towne as slaues, hauing bought them of the Turkes Pirats. The seuen and twentieth, the Samuel and the Centurion returned into the Road from Tansey, then also went out the Anihelope, the Zouch Phenix, the Barbarie, the Neptune and the Restore, with order to ride at Shutey, to see if they could discouer any Pirats comming into the Streights, the wind being Westerly. The eight and twentieth, the wind likewise Westerly, the Reformation hauing taken in some of the Captiues, had order to weigh and set sayle for Tituon, to treat with the Moores, and to take in her company the Samuel, the Bonaventure, and the ship of Bristoll, where the same day about noone they came to an Anchor in the Road of Tituon in twelue fathome water, the wind at West.

The fourth of March, Master Alshfield, Minister of the Reformation dyed, much lamented of the whole company, of whom in the extreame of their sicknesses they had receiued much comfort. The fifth, hauing a faire gale at South-east, our Admirall with the rest of the Fleet weighed Anchor, and set sayle for Gibraltar, hauing concluded nothing with the Mogoden. The sixth, wee came to an Anchor in Gibraltar Road, where wee found our Vice-Admirall with his Squadron.

The thirteenth, we came to an Anchor in Malhaga Road.

The eight and twentieth, about eight in the morning, the Admirall and Reare-Admirall set sayle for Alicant.

The second of Aprill dyed Captaine Manwaring. The fourteenth, about three in the after-noone wee came to an Anchor in Alicant Road, where wee found our Admirall with the rest of the Fleet: here our Admirall had hyred a Pollacre about the burden of one hundred and twentie tunne, for that she was reported to bee an excellent Sayler, and likewise bought three Brigandines which rowed with nine Oares on a side: hee also hyred a house wherein hee made diuers workes for the firing of the ships within the Mould of Algier.

The one and twentieth, we receiued Letters out of England, by a Post sent from Malhaga, signifying a remaynder of victuals, which wee expected, was arrived at Malhaga. The five and twentieth, about nine in the morning, the whole Fleet sayle for Alicant Road, beeing bound for Firma terra, to supply our wants for wood. The eight and twentieth in the euening, hauing fitted our selues with wood, we set sayle for Mayorke to take in water. The nine and twentieth, in the after-noone, we came to an Anchor in Mayorke Road. The Towne of Mayorke is large and well fortified, the people industrious, both men, women and children giuen to labour, loving and courteous to strangers: heere wee found all manner of victuals in plentie and at easie rates. Their chiefe Merchandise are Oyle, Wood, and Cheese, whereof the Countrey affoordeth plentie.

The one and twentieth of May, at sixe in the after-noone, we came to an Anchor in Algier Road, order being first giuen by our Admirall how euery ship should berth herselfe.

The ships being come to an Anchor in their orders, our Admirall caused sixe of the Merchants ships presently to weigh, with directions to ply off and on of the Westermost part, keeping as neere the shoare, as conueniently they might, to preuent the comming in of any Pirats betweene the Fleet and the shoare. In the beginning of this night, the Boats and Brigandines appointed for the assistance of two shippes, which our Admirall resolved should that night goe into the Mould, and there to set themselves on fire, being chained and linked to the Pirats ships, repayed aboard our Admirall, there to receiue their directions. The manner and preparations for firing of the ships was thus.

First, there were two small ships which we had taken from the Turkes; the one of the burden of an hundred tunnes, the other of sixtie, with great store of fire-workes in them. There was layd in them plentie of dry Wood, Wood of Ocham, Pitch, Rozen, Tarre, Brimstone and other Materials fit to take fire: they had likewise in them Chaines and Grapnels of Iron to fasten themselves to the ships which they were to fire: they had also Boats to bring off their men when they had fired the ships: then were there three Brigandines fitted with fire-bals, buckets of wild-fire, and fire Pikes to make their fire-workes fast vnto the ships: there was also a Gund-lod fitted with fire-workes, Chaines and Grapnels of Iron; she was to goe into the midst of the ships in the Mould, where fastning her to some ship, was to be set on fire. Shee had likewise with her a Boat to bring off her men. Likewise, there were seuen Boates which wee called called Boats of rescue, well filled with armed men, who were to rescue and releue the Boats of execution, if they should chance to be pursued by other Boats or Gallies at their comming off. These had also fire-workes in them, to fire the ships which rode without the Mould: these Boats being all aboard, the Admirall sent for most of the Captaines and Masters in the Fleet, to aduise whether it were fit to attempt it with Boats and Brigandines, in regard it was little wind, and that Westerly, so that it was impossible for the ships to get in. After some deliberation, it was concluded, that it was not fit, for that the surest and most certaine meanes of firing was by the ships which were to bee made fast to the shippes in the Mould, and to burne with them. Whereupon it was deferred for that time till a fitter opportunitie was offered. The two and twentieth at night, there were like preparations made, but deferred for like reasons. The three and twentieth, in the beginning of the night wee had a fresh gale of wind at South by South-west, continuing the space of two houres or more, with Thunder, Lightning, and some drops of Raine: the two ships weighed, and with the Brigandines and Boats set forwards towards the Mould, but the wind shifting before they came neere, they were forced also to giue ouer for that night.

The foure and twentieth at night, after a great showre of Raine, wee had the wind out of the Bay at South South-west, the weather then cleering vp, both the ships and Boats aduanced themselues towards the Mould, as before they had done: but comming within lesse then Musket shot of the Moulds head it fell calme, so that the ships could by no meanes get in, the Boats and Brigandines finding that they were discouered, by reason of the brightnesse of the Moone, which was then at full, and hearing it reported by a Christian Captiue which did swimme from the Towne the night before to the ships, that the Turkes had left their ships without guard, sailing one or two in a ship, as fearing no such attempt from vs. And moreouer, hearing the Alarm giuen to the Towne by those which kept watch on the walls, with good resolution went on, but wanting wind to nourish and disperse the fire, the fire-workes tooke no effect at all. In this seruice were onely fixe men slaine out-right, foure or fise dangerously hurt (which not long after dyed) and some thirteene sleightly hurt, yet notwithstanding, the attempt was giuen vnder the wals of the Towne, where both small shot and Ordnance played continually vpon them: the hurt done our men was their comming off, for that they were got into the Mould before the Towne was risen, and beeing in, the shippes in the Mould defended them both from small shot and Ordnance of the Towne, our Boates still keeping the shippes betweene them and the Towne.

The rest of this Iournall contayning their returne, &c. is for breuitie omitted. Among many English which since the stirring of this Wasps Nest, haue bin stung, wee haue thought fit to adde to the glory of God, and honour of the English these two strange deliuerances following, the Stories of two ships of Bristow which tooke their takers.

The fise and twentieth, there came in foure sayle of Pirates by the Wester-most point of Land, notwithstanding fixe ships were appointed to lye off at that place, for the wind being Westward and a great Current setting to the Eastward our ships were put so farre to lee-ward that they could not preuent the Pirats comming in betweene the shoare and them, but yet the Bonaenture loosed so neere, that there passed some shot betweene her and the Pirats ships, but no hurt done: this night our Admirall and the whole Fleet weighed Anchor and stood off to the Sea.

The six and twentieth, the fore-part of the day, the wind was shifting to and fro, from the South-east to the South-west; in the after-noon at South, and South South-east hard gale and raynie weather; and at night hauing the wind shifting at South and South-west, we played off and on all night by a wind.

The eight and twentieth, we had faire weather the wind Westerly, this night the Bonaenture, and the Hercules put a Pirat ashoare, he hauing an hundred and thirtie Turkes in her, and twelue poore Christians Captiues, they were all drowned but twelue Turkes, who got the shoare by swimming.

The one and thirtieth in the morning, our Boates tooke vp two Genowayes Captiues, who aduentured to swimme from the Towne to the ships. They told that the same night our shippes stood off to Sea, there came into the Mould seven of the best ships belonging to Algier, and that if we had staid they had fallen into our laps. They likewise told vs, that the Turkes had Boomed vp the Mould, so that it was not possible for eyther shippe or Boate to get into to fire the ships, which were now filled with armed men, besides three Gallies and fiteene Boates which lay continually well fitted without the Mould before the Boome for a Guard, &c.

CHAP. VI.

The Relation of the Iacob, a ship of Bristoll, of one hundred and twentie Tunnes, which was about the end of October, 1621. taken by the Turkish Pirats of Argier: and within five dayes after, foure English youths did valiantly ouercome thirteene of the said Turkes, and brought the ship to Saint Lucas in Spaine, where they sold nine of the Turkes for Gallie-slaues: with mention of some other like English aduentures.

NEere the latter end of October last, 1621. a ship belonging to the Citie of Bristoll, being about the burden of one hundred and twenty Tuns, was met withall and set vpon by Turkes or Pirats of Argier, where after a long and sharpe fight (being in the mouth of the Straits of Gibraltar) the English ship being oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, was taken, their Ordnance, Cables, Anchors, Sailes, Ship and men pillaged, ransacked, and at the mercy of the insulting Barbarians, who to make their worke the surer, tooke all the English-men out of the ship, except foure youths, whose names were, John Cooke, William Ling, David Iones, and Robert Tuckey, into which ship the Turkes did put thirteene of their owne men to command the English, and to bring the ship as a prize to Argier; amongst which one of the Pirats was appointed Captaine, being a strong, able, sterne, and resolute fellow.

These foure poore youths being thus fallen into the hands of mercilesse Infidels, began to studie and complot all the meanes they could for the obtayning of their freedoms: First, they considered the lamentable and miserable estates that they were like to be in, as to be debard for euer from seeing their friends and Countrey, to be chained, beaten, made slaues, and to eate the bread of affliction in the Gallies, all the remainder of their vnfortunate liues, to haue their heads shauen, to feed on course dyet, to haue hard boords for beds, and which was worst of all, neuer to be partakers of the heavenly Word and Sacraments.

Thus being quite hopelesse, haplesse, and for any thing they knew, for euer helplesse, they sayled five dayes and nights vnder the command of the Pirats, when on the fifth night, God in his great mercy shewed them a meanes for their wished for escape, for in the dead of the night, the wind began to arise, and in short space it blew so stiffe that they were enforced to strike both their top Sayles; and at last, it encreased to such a gust or storme, that they must take in their maine Saile, and being vnable to doe it themselves, John Cooke and William Ling did call to the Turkes for helpe: whereupon the Captaine himselfe came to helpe them; who standing by the ships side, betweene the foresaid John and David Iones, lending his hand to hale in the saile, the said John and David suddenly tooke him by the breech and threw him ouer-board, but by fortune hee fell into the bunt of the sayle, where quickly catching hold of a rope, he (being a very strong man) had almost gotten into the ship againe: which John Cooke perceiuing, leaped speedily to the Pumpe, and tooke off the Pumpe brake or handle, and cast it to William Ling, bidding him knocke him downe, which he was not long in doing, but lifting vp the wooden weapon, he gaue him such a palt on the pate, as made his braines forsake the possession of his head, with which his body fell into the Sea.

An Obiection may be made here, why the Turke cried not to his fellowes at first for helpe, or how these things could be done, but the rest of his company must either see or heare it: to which I answer, that at Sea a Gust, Flaw, or Storme, hath many times a louder voice then a man; besides, when Marriners doe hale or pull any thing, they doe make a noyse, as it were crying ha woet hale men hale, which with the noyse of the wind whizzing and hizzing in the shrowds and cordage, would ouercome and drowne the voice or crie of any man whatsoever. Besides, his companions were all busie, some at the mizen, some at the sprit-saile, some to trim the fore-saile, and the night exceeding darke, all these things concurring, and chiefly, God graciously assisting, thus these braue Lads began the businesse luckily.

Nor must I forget Robert Tuckey, who was imployed all this while in a place of maine importance, for he stood at the Helme, and in all the weather guided the Ship; now after the Captaine was thus cashiered, John Cooke ran hastily vp the halfe Decke to the Masters Cabine; neere which, were standing six or seuen Turkes, but hee being nothing daunted or discouraged for them, slipped roughly by them, and gat out two good Cuttleaxes, or short Swords, one of which he deliuered to William Ling, withall saying, courage my fellowes and Countrey-men, God strengthen and assist vs; with that, they laid about them so manfully, that they droue the Turkes from place to place in the Ship, and hauing coursed them from the Poope to the Fore-castle, they there valiantly killed two of them, and gaue another a dangerous wound or two, who to escape the further fury of their Swords, leap'd suddenly ouer-board to goe seeke his Captaine, taine. Thus foure of the thirteene Turkes being made sure for doing any harme, they chased and followed the other nine so close, that they (to saue themselves) being also many of them, sore hurt and wounded, ranne betweene the Ships Decks; whereupon the English men fastned the Decks to keepe them vnder: the Turkes not knowing how to be reuenged, ran afterward toward the Helme, and vnshipt their Whip-staffe, or as some call it, a Whip-stocke (which is the staffe that a Mariner holds in his hand, when he guides or steeres a Ship) by which meanes the English men were in some distresse, by reason the Ship lay tumbling and rowling vnguided in the raging and boystrous billowes of the Sea: at last, John Cooke and William Ling got each of them a Musket, which they quickly charged, and went downe where the nine Turkes were, making offers to shoote at them, at which they were much terrified; whereupon they quickly ship'd their Whip-stocke againe, deliuering the Helme to Robert Tuckey, and then presently they stowed all the Turkes vnder the Hatches, where they kept them close till the next morning, and then as they had occasion to vse them, they would call vp two or three of them at a time, to hale and pull Sheetes, Tackes, Braces and Boleins, to hoyle and strike Sayles, or any such necessary and laborious imployments; in all which, the English made the Turkes attend them, and directing their course for the Port of Saint Lucas in Spaine, they in short time (by Gods ayde) happily and safely arriued at the said Port, where they sold the nine Turkes for Gally-slaues, for a good summe of money, and as I thinke, a great deale more then they were worth.

Nor doe I write this to the intent that any man should presume that their owne strengths, valour or courage, is sufficient to doe these or the like actions, for they are not ordinary, and therefore man is but made the ordinary instrument of an extraordinary power, and he that shall attribute such things as these to the arme of flesh and blood, is forgetfull, ingratefull, and in a manner Atheisticall.

See the History in Hack. Voyages.

One John Fox an expert Mariner, and a good approoued and sufficient Gunner, was (in the raigne of Queene Elizabeth) taken by the Turkes, and kept eightene yeeres in most miserable bondage and slavery, at the end of which time, he espied his opportunity (and God assisting him withall) that hee slew his Keeper, and fled to the Seas side, where he found a Gally with one hundred and fifty Captiue Christians, which hee speedily waying their Anchor, set Saile, and fell to worke like men, and safely arriued in Spaine; by which meanes, he freed himselfe and a number of poore soules from long and intolerable seruitude; after which, the said John Fox came into England, and the Queene (being rightly informed of his braue exploit) did graciously entertaine him for her Seruant, and allowed him a yeerely Pension.

Cap. Nicholes.

Captaine Nichols with a Ship of London, called the Dolphin, fought a long and bloody fight, with many of the Turkish men of warre at one time, at which time hee sunke some of them, slew many of their men, and hauing his owne Ship exceedingly rent and torne with the Enemies great shot, yet at last it pleased God to deliuer him from them, so that hee safely arriued at home.

Master Malam.

Master William Malam of Rotherhithe within these three yeeres was set vpon by these Rovers, and after a long fight, being much hurt by the Ordnance of the Turkes (the night comming on) which made the fight to cease, when the Generall of the Pirates past his word, and bound it with an Oath, that if Master Malam would come aboard his Ship all night, that hee should well and safely bee set aboard againe his owne Ship the next morning, vpon which word and oath Master Malam went aboard the Turke, and a Merchant with him; but first, before he went, commanded his Mate to watch his opportunitie, and steale away with the Ship in the night, if he could, which fell out as he wished, whereby all the Merchants goods were saued, and the Ship safely arriued here at London: but in the morning, when the Turkes did perceiue the English Ship was gone, then would they haue put Master Malam and the Merchant that was with him, to death, whereupon he vrged him with his oath and promise, which was, that he should come and goe safely, and that if a Christian had made him or any man such a promise, and bound it with a vow, hee would haue kept his word. And (that for any thing hee knew) his Ship being so dangerously hurt by them, might be sunke in the night, and not escaped away as he imagined. Now whilst they were in this discourse, presently came a Saile in sight, which afterward they found to be a small Scottish Ship bound for England, whom the Turkes quickly tooke, and pillag'd at their pleasure, taking from them their Sailes, Cables, Anchors and all things necessary for their vse or preservation, and hauing robd, a rifled the poore Scot in that manner, they put Master Malam and the Merchant into her, to trie their fortunes, either to sinke or swim, but it pleased God they safely arriued in the West part of England, where they came home by land sad and disconsolate, because they could not heare any newes of the Ship: but the same night that hee came home, before day, there was happy tidings brought of the Ships safe arriual into the Riuer of Thames.

All these things are true vpon mine owne knowledge, and these worthy Mariners that haue beene so deliuered, doe, and euer did, attribute all the meanes of their deliuerance to the mighty hand of God; and they are so farre from taking any of these things to their owne praise or glory, that some of them haue euer done their best to suppress them from being printed.

CHAP. VII.

The wonderfull recovery of the Exchange of Bristow, from the Turkish Pirates of Argier, published by I O H N R A W L I N S, heere abbreviated.

IN the yeere 1621. the first of Nouember, there was one John Rawlins, borne in Rochester, and dwelling three and twenty yeere in Plimmoth, imployed to the strait of Gibraltar, by Master Richard, and Steuens Treniles, Merchants of Plimmoth, and fraighted in a Barke, called the Nicholas of Plimmoth, of the burden of forty Tun, which had also in her company another ship of Plimmoth, called the George Bonaventure of seventy Tun burthen, or thereabout; which by reason of her greatnesse beyond the other, I will name the Admirall; and John Rawlins Barke shall, if you please, be the Vice-admirall. These two according to the time of the yeere, had a faire passage, and by the eighteenth of the same moneth came to a place at the entring of the straits, named Trassle-gar: but the next morning, being in the sight of Gibraltar, at the very mouth of the straits, the watch descried five saile of ships, who as it seemed, vsed all the means they could to come neere vs, and we as we had cause, vsed the same means to go as farre from them: yet did their Admirall take in both his top sailes, that either we might not suspect them, or that his owne company might come vp the closer together. At last perceiuing vs Christians, they fell from deuices to apparent discouery of hostility, and making out against vs: we againe suspecting them Pirates, tooke our course to escape from them, and made all the sailes we possibly could for Tirriss, or Gibraltar: but all we could doe, could not preuent their approach. For suddenly one of them came right ouer against vs to wind-ward, and so fell vpon our quarter: another came vpon our luffe, and so threatned vs there, and at last all five chased vs, making great speed to surpriue vs.

Their Admirall was called Callfater, hauing vpon her maine top-saile, two top-gallant sailes, one aboue another. But whereas we thought them all five to be Turkish ships of war, we afterwards vnderstood, that two of them were their prizes, the one a smal ship of London, the other of the West-countrey, that came out of the Quaith laden with figges, and other Merchandise, but now subiect to the fortune of the Sea, and the captiuitie of Pirates. But to our businesse. Three of these ships got much vpon vs, and so much that ere halfe the day was spent, the Admirall who was the best sailer, fetcht vp the George Bonaventure, and made booty of it. The Vice-admirall againe being neere vnto the lesser Barke, whereof John Rawlins was Master, shewed him the force of a stronger arme, and by his Turkish name, called Villa-Rise, commanded him in like sort to strike his sailes, and submit to his mercy, which not to be gaine-saied nor preuented, was quickly done: and so Rawlins with his Barke was quickly taken, although the Reare-Admirall being the worst sailer of the three, called Reggiprise, came not in, till all was done.

The same day before night, the Admirall either loth to pester himselfe with too much company, or ignorant of the commodity was to be made by the sale of English prisoners, or daring not to trust them in his company, for feare of mutinies, and exciting others to rebellion; set twelue persons who were in the George Bonaventure on the land, and diuers other English, whom he had taken before, to trie their fortunes in an vnknowne Countrey. But Villa-Rise, the Vice-Admirall that had taken John Rawlins, would not so dispence with his men, but commanded him and five more of his company to be brought aboard his ship, leauing in his Barke three men and his boy, with thirteene Turkes and Moores, who were questionlesse sufficient to ouer-master the other, and direct the Barke to Harbour. Thus they sailed directly for Argier; but the night following, followed them with great tempest and foule weather, which ended not without some effect of a storme: for they lost the sight of Rawlins Barke, called the Nicholas, and in a manner lost themselves, though they seemed safe a shipboord, by fearefull coniecturing what should become of vs: at last, by the two and twentieth of the same moneth, they, or we (chuse you whether) arriued at Argier, and came in safety within the Mould, but found not our other Barke there; nay, though we earnestly inquired after the same, yet heard we nothing to our satisfaction; but much matter was ministred to our discomfort and amazement. For although the Captaine and our ouer-seers, were loth we should haue any conference with our Country-men; yet did we aduenture to informe our selues of the present affaires, both of the Towne, and the shipping: so that finding many English at worke in other ships, they spared not to tell vs the danger we were in, and the mischiefes we must needs incurre, as being sure if we were not vsed like slaues, to be sold as slaues: for there had beene five hundred brought into the market for the same purpose, and aboue a hundred handsome youths compelled to turne Turkes, or made subiect to more vilder prostitution, and all English: yet like good Christians, they bade vs be of good cheere, and comfort our selues in this, that Gods trials were gentle purgations, and these crosses were but to cleanse the drossie from the gold, and bring vs out of the fire againe more cleare and louely. Yet I must needs confesse, that they afforded vs reason for this cruelty, as if they determined to be reuenged of our last attempt to fire their ships in the Mould, and therefore protested to spare none, whom they could surpriue, and take aliue, but either to sell them for money, ney, or torment them to serue their owne turnes. Now their customes and vsages in both these was in this manner.

First, concerning the first. The Bashaw had the ouer-seeing of all prisoners, who were presented vnto him at their first comming into the harbour, and so chose one out of euery eight for a present or fee to himselfe: the rest were rated by the Captaines, and so sent to the Market to be sold; whereat if either there were repining, or any drawing backe, then certaine Moores and Officers attended either to beate you forward, or thrust you into the sides with Goades; and this was the manner of the selling of Slaues.

Execrable tortures by Hellish Pirats inflicted on the English, to make them Renegadoes and Apostataes.

Secondly, concerning their enforcing them, either to turne Turke, or to attend their filthines and impieties, although it would make a Christians heart bleed to heare of the same, yet must the truth not be hid, nor the terror left vtold. They commonly lay them on their naked backs or bellies, beating them so long, till they bleed at the nose and mouth; and if yet they continue constant, then they strike the teeth out of their heads, pinch them by their tongues, and vse many other sorts of tortures to conuert them; nay, many times they lay them their whole length in the ground like a graue, and so couer them with boords, threatening to starue them, if they will not turne; and so many euen for feare of torment and death, make their tongues betray their hearts to a most fearefull wickednesse, and so are circumcised with new names, and brought to confesse a new Religion. Others againe, I must confesse, who neuer knew any God, but their owne sensuall lusts and pleasures, thought that any religion would serue their turnes, and so for preferment or wealth very voluntarily renounced their faith, and became Renegadoes in despite of any counsell which seemed to intercept them: and this was the first newes we encountered with at our comming first to Argier.

Sale of the English.

The 26. of the same moneth, Iohn Rawlins his Barke, with his other three men and a boy, came safe into the Mould, and so were put all together to be carried before the Bashaw, but that they tooke the Owners seruant, and Rawlings Boy, and by force and torment compelled them to turne Turkes: then were they in all seuen English, besides Iohn Rawlins, of whom the Bashaw tooke one, and sent the rest to their Captaines, who set a valuation vpon them, and so the Souldiers hurried vs like dogs into the Market, whereas men sell Hacknies in England, we were tossed vp and downe to see who would giue most for vs; and although we had heauy hearts, and looked with sad countenances, yet many came to behold vs, sometimes taking vs by the hand, sometime turning vs round about, sometimes feeling our brawnes and naked armes, and so beholding our prices written in our breasts, they bargained for vs accordingly, and at last we were all sold, and the Souldiers returned with the money to their Captaines.

Iohn Rawlins was the last, who was sold, by reason of his lame hand, and bought by the Captaine that tooke him, euen that dog Villa Rise, who better informing himselfe of his skill fit to be a Pilot, and his experience to bee an ouer-seer, bought him and his Carpenter at very easie rates. For as we afterwards vnderstood by diuers English Renegadoes, he paid for Rawlins but one hundred and fiftie Dooblets, which make of English money seuen pound ten shillings. Thus was he and his Carpenter with diuers other slaues sent into his ship to worke, and imployed about such affaires, as belonged to the well rigging and preparing the same. But the villanous Turkes perceiuing his lame hand, and that he could not performe so much as other Slaues, quickly complained to their Patron, who as quickly apprehended the inconuenience; whereupon hee sent for him the next day, and told him he was vnseruiceable for his present purpose, and therefore vnlesse he could procure fiftene pound of the English there for his ransome, he would send him vp into the Countrey, where he should neuer see Christendome againe, and endure the extremity of a miserable banishment.

The Exchange of Bristow.

Chandler a Renegado.

But see how God worketh all for the best for his seruants, and confoundeth the presumption of Tyrants, frustrating their purposes, to make his wonders knowne to the sonnes of men, and releues his people, when they least thinke of succour and releasement. Whilest Iohn Rawlins was thus terrified with the dogged answere of Villa Rise, the Exchange of Bristow, a ship formerly surpris'd by the Pirats, lay all vnrigged in the Harbour, till at last one Iohn Goodale, an English Turke, with his confederates, vnderstanding shee was a good sailer, and might be made a proper Man of Warre, bought her from the Turkes that tooke her, and prepared her for their owne purpose: now the Captaine that set them on worke, was also an English Renegado, by the name of Rammetham Rise, but by his Christen name Henrie Chandler, who resolved to make Goodale Master ouer her; and because they were both English Turkes, hauing the command notwithstanding of many Turkes and Moores, they concluded to haue all English slaues to goe in her, and for their Gunners, English and Dutch Renegadoes, and so they agreed with the Patrons of nine English, and one French Slaue for their ransoms, who were presently imployed to rig and furnish the ship for a Man of Warre, and while they were thus busied, two of Iohn Rawlins men, who were taken with him, were also taken vp to serue in this Man of Warre, their names, Iames Roe, and Iohn Davies, the one dwelling in Plimmoth, and the other in Foy, where the Commander of this ship was also borne, by which occasion they came acquainted, so that both the Captaine, and the Master promised them good vsage, vpon the good seruice they should performe in the voyage, voyage, and withall demanded of him, if he knew of any Englishman to be bought, that could serue them as a Pilot, both to direct them out of Harbour, and conduct them in their voyage. For in truth neither was the Captaine a Mariner, nor any Turke in her of sufficiency to dispose of her through the Straites in securitie, nor oppose any enemy, that should hold it out brauely against them. Davies quickly replied, that as farre as he vnderstood, Villa Rise would sell John Rawlins his Master, and Commander of the Barke which was taken, a man euery way sufficient for Sea affaires, being of great resolution and good experience; and for all he had a lame hand, yet had he a sound heart and noble courage for any attempt or aduventure.

When the Captaine vnderstood thus much, he imployed Davies to search for Rawlins, who at last lighting vpon him, asked him if the Turke would sell him: Rawlins suddenly answered, that by reason of his lame hand he was willing to part with him; but because he had disbursed money for him, he would gaine something by him, and so prized me at three hundred Dooblets, which amounteth to fiftene pound English; which I must procure, or incurre sorer indurances. When Davies had certified thus much, the Turks a ship-boord conferred about the matter, and the Master whose Christen name was John Goodale ioyned with two Turkes, who were comforted with him, and disbursed one hundred Dooblets a piece, and so bought him of Villa Rise, sending him into the said ship, called the Exchange of Bristow, as well to superuise what had been done, as to order what was left vndone, but especially to fit the sailes, and to accommodate the ship, all which Rawlins was very carefull and indulgent in, not yet thinking of any peculiar plot of deliuerance, more then a generall desire to be freed from this Turkish slauerie, and inhumane abuses.

By the seuenth of Ianuarie, the ship was prepared with twelue good cast Pieces, and all manner of munition and prouision, which belonged to such a purpose, and the same day haled out of the Mould of Argier, with this company, and in this manner.

There were in her sixtie three Turkes and Moors, nine English Slaues, and one French, foure Hollanders that were free men, to whom the Turkes promised one prise or other, and so to returne to Holland; or if they were disposed to goe backe againe for Argier, they should haue great reward and no enforcement offered, but continue as they would, both their religion and their customes: and for their Gunners they had two of our Souldiers, one English and one Dutch Renegado; and thus much for the companie. For the manner of setting out, it was as vsuall as in other ships, but that the Turkes delighted in the ostentous brauerie of their Streamers, Banners, and Top-sayles; the ship being a handsome ship, and well built for any purpose: the Slaues and English were imployed vnder Hatches about the Ordnance, and other workes of order, and accommodating themselues: all which John Rawlins marked, as supposing it an intolerable slauerie to take such paines, and be subiect to such dangers, and still to enrich other men and maintaine their voluptuous filthinesse and liues, returning themselues as Slaues, and liuing worse then their Dogs amongst them. Whereupon hee burst out into these, or such like abrupt speeches: Oh Hellish slauerie to be thus subiect to Dogs! Oh, God strengthen my heart and hand, and something shall be done to ease vs of these mischiefes, and deliuer vs from these cruell Mahumetan Dogs. The other Slaues pittying his distraction (as they thought) bad him speake softly, lest they should all fare the worse for his distemperature. The worse (quoth Rawlins) what can be worse? I will either attempt my deliuerance at one time, or another, or perish in the enterprise: but if you would be contented to hearken after a release, and ioyne with me in the action, I would not doubt of facilitating the same, and shew you a way to make your credits thriue by some worke of amazement, and augment your glorie in purchasing your libertie, I prethee be quiet (said they againe) and thinke not of impossibilities: yet if you can but open such a doore of reason and probabilitie, that we be not condemned for desperate and distracted persons, in pulling the Sunne as it were out of the Firmament: wee can but sacrifice our liues, and you may be sure of secrecie and taciturnitie.

The fifteenth of Ianuarie, the morning water brought vs neere Cape de Gatt, hard by the shoare, we hauing in our companie a smal Turkish ship of Warre, that followed vs out of Argier the next day, and now ioyning with vs, gaue vs notice of seuen small vessels, sixe of them being Satties, and one Pollack, who very quickly appeared in sight, and so we made toward them: but hauing more aduantage of the Pollack, then the rest, and loth to lose all, we both fetcht her vp, and brought her past hope of recouerie, which when she perceiued, rather then she would voluntarily come into the slauerie of these Mahumetans, she ran her selfe a shoare, and so all the men forooke her; we still followed as neere as we durst, and for feare of splitting, let fall our anchors, making out both our boates, wherein were many Musketeers, and some English and Dutch Renegadoes, who came aboard home at their Conge, and found three pieces of Ordnance, and foure Murtherers: but they straightway threw them all ouer boord to lighten the ship, and so they got her off, being laden with Hides, and Logwood for dying, and presently sent her to Argier, taking nine Turkes, and one English Slaue, out of one ship, and six out of the lesse, which we thought sufficient to man her.

In the rifling of this Catelaynia, our Turks fell at variance one with another, and in such a manner, that we diuided our selues, the lesser ship returned to Argier, and our Exchange tooke the opportunitie of the wind, and plyed out of the Streights, which reioyced John Rawlins very much, as resolving on some Stratageme, when opportunitie should serue: in the meane-while, the Turkes began to murmure, and would not willingly goe into the Marr Granada, as the phrase is amongst them: notwithstanding the *Moore*s being very superstitious, were contented to be directed by their Hofhea, who with vs, signifieth a Witch, and is of great account and reputation amongst them, as not going in any great Vessell to Sea without one, and obseruing whatsoeuer he concludeth out of his Diuination: the Ceremonies he vseth are many, and when they come into the Ocean, euery second or third night he maketh his Coniuration; he beginneth and endeth with Prayer, vsing many Characters, and calling vpon God by diuers names: yet at this time, all that he did consisted in these particulars.

Vpon the sight of two great ships, and as wee were afraid the chasing, beeing supposed to bee Spanish men of Warre, a great silence is commanded in the ship, and when all is done, the company giueth as great a skrich; the Captaine still comming to John Rawlins, and sometimes making him take in all his sayles, and sometimes causing him to hoysse them all out, as the Witch findeth by his Booke, and presages; then haue they two Arrowes, and a Curtleaxe, lying vpon a Pillow naked; the Arrowes are one for the Turkes, and the other for the Christians; then the Witch readeth, and the Captaine of some other taketh the Arrowes in their hand by the heads, and if the Arrow for the Christians commeth ouer the head of the Arrow for the Turkes, then doe they aduance their sayles, and will not endure the fight, whatsoeuer they see: but if the Arrow of the Turkes is found in the opening of the hand vpon the Arrow of the Christians, then will they stay and encounter with any shippe whatsoeuer: the Curtleaxe is taken vp by some Childe, that is innocent, or rather ignorant of the Ceremonie, and so layd downe againe; then doe they obserue, whether the same side is vppermost, which lay before, and so proceed accordingly.

They also obserue Lunatickes and Changelings, and the Coniurer writeth downe their Sayings in a Booke, groueling on the ground, as if he whispered to the Deuill to tell him the truth, and so expoundeth the Letter, as it were by inspiration. Many other foolish Rites they haue, whereon they doe dote as foolishly.

Whilest he was busied, and made demonstration that all was finished, the people in the ship gaue a great shout, and cryed out, a sayle, a sayle, which at last was discovered to bee another man of Warre of Turkes: for he made toward vs, and sent his Boat aboard vs, to whom our Captaine complained, that being becalmed by the Southerne Cape, and hauing made no Voyage, the Turkes denyed to goe any further Northward: but the Captaine resclued not to returne to Argier, except he could obtayne some Prize worthy his endurances, but rather to goe to Salle, and sell his Christians to victuall his ship; which the other Captaine apprehended for his honour, and so perswaded the Turkes to be obedient vnto him; whereupon followed a pacification amongst vs, and so that Turke tooke his course for the Streights, and wee put vp Northward, expecting the good houre of some beneficiall bootie.

All this while our slavery continued, and the Turkes with insulting tyrannie set vs still on worke in all base and seruile actions, adding stripes and inhumane reuilings, euen in our greatest labour, whereupon John Rawlins resolved to obtayne his libertie, and surprize the ship; prouiding Ropes with broad speckes of Iron, and all the Iron Crowes, with which hee knew a way, vpon consent of the rest, to ramme vp or tye fast their Scuttels, Gratings, and Cabbins, yea, to shut vp the Captaine himselfe with all his consorts, and so to handle the matter, that vpon the watch-word giuen, the English being Masters of the Gunner roome, Ordnance, and Powder, they would eyther blow them into the Ayre, or kill them as they aduentured to come downe one by one, if they should by any chance open their Cabbins. But because hee would proceed the better in his enterprize, as he had somewhat abruptly discovered himselfe to the nine English slaues, so he kept the same distance with the foure Hollanders, that were free men, till finding them comming somewhat toward them, he acquainted them with the whole Conspiracie, and they affecting the Plot, offered the aduenture of their liues in the businesse. Then very warily he vndermined the English Renegado, which was the Gunner, and three more his Associates, who at first seemed to retract. Last of all were brought in the Dutch Renegadoes, who were also in the Gunner roome, for alwayes there lay twelue there, fise Christians, and seuen English, and Dutch Turkes: so that when another motion had settled their resolutions, and John Rawlins his constancie had put new life as it were in the matter, the foure Hollanders very honestly, according to their promise, sounded the Dutch Renegadoes, who with easie perswasion gaue their consent to so braue an Enterprize; whereupon John Rawlins, not caring whether the English Gunners would yeeld or no, resolved in the Captaines morning watch, to make the attempt: But you must vnderstand that where the English slaues lay, there hung vp alwayes foure or fise Crowes of Iron, being still vnder the carriages of the Peeeces, and when the time approached being very darke, because John Rawlins would haue his Crow of Iron ready as other things were, and other men prepared in their seuerall places, in taking it out of the carriage, by chance, it hit on the side of the Peece, making such a noyse, that the Souldiers hearing it awaked the Turkes, and bade them come downe: whereupon the Botelane of the Turkes descended with a Candle, and presently searched all the slaues places, making much adoe of the matter, but finding neyther Hatchet nor Hammer, nor any thing elle to moue suspicion of the Enterprize, more then the Crow of Iron, which lay slipped downe vnder the carriages of the Peeces, they went quietly vp againe, and certified the Captaine what had chanced, who satisfied himselfe, that it was a common thing to haue a Crow of Iron slip from his place. But by this occasion wee made stay of our attempt, yet were resolu'd to take another or a better oportunitie.

discouery.

For we layled still more North-ward, and Rawlins had more time to tamper with his Gun-10 ners, and the rest of the English Renegadoes, who very willingly, when they considered the matter, and perpended the reasons, gaue way vnto the Proiect, and with a kind of ioy seemed to entertayne the motiues: only they made a stop at the first on-set, who should begin the enterprize, which was no way fit for them to doe, because they were no slaues, but Renegadoes, and so had alwayes beneficiall entertainment amongst them. But when it is once put in practice, they would be sure not to faile them, but venture their liues for God and their Countrey. But once againe he is disappointed, and a suspicious accident brought him to recollect his spirits anew, and studie on the danger of the enterprize, and thus it was. After the Renegado Gunner, had protested secrecie by all that might induce a man to bestow some beliefe vpon him, he presently went vp the Scuttle, but stayed not aloft a quarter of an houre, nay he came sooner down, 20 & in the Gunner roome sate by Rawlins, who tarried for him where he left him: he was no sooner placed, and entred into some conference, but there entred into the place a furious Turke, with his Knife drawne, and presented it to Rawlins his body, who verily supposed, he intended to kill him, as suspicious that the Gunner had discouered something, whereat Rawlins was much moued, and so hastily asked what the matter meant, or whether he would kill him or no, obseruing his countenance, and according to the nature of ieaousie, conceiting that his colour had a passage of change, whereby his suspicious heart, condemned him for a Traytor: but that at more leisure he sware the contrary, and afterward proued faithfull and induriorous in the enterprize. And for the present, he answered Rawlins in this manner, no Master, be not afraid, I thinke hee doth but iest. With that John Rawlins gaue backe a little and drew out his Knife, stepping also to the 30 Gunners sheath and taking out his, whereby he had two Knives to one, which when the Turke perceiued, he threw downe his Knife, saying, hee did but iest with him. But (as I said) when the Gunner perceiued, Rawlins tooke it so ill, hee whispered something in his eare, that at last satisfied him, calling Heauen to witnesse, that he neuer spake word of the Enterprize, nor euer would, either to the preiudice of the businesse, or danger of his person: Notwithstanding, Rawlins kept the Knives in his sleue all night, and was somewhat troubled, for that hee had made so many acquainted with an action of such importance; but the next day, when hee perceiued the Coast cleere, and that there was no cause of further feare, hee somewhat comforted himselfe.

Another dash-ger.

All this while, Rawlins drew the Captaine to lye for the Northerne Cape, assuring him, that 40 thereby he should not misse purchase, which accordingly fell out, as a wish would haue it: but his drift was in truth to draw him from any supply, or second of Turkes, if God should giue way to their Enterprize, or successe to the victorie: yet for the present the sixth of Februry, being twelue leagues from the Cape, wee descryed a sayle, and presently tooke the aduantage of the wind in chasing her, and at last fetcht her vp, making her strike all her sayles, whereby wee knew her to be a Barke belonging to Tor Bay, neere Dartmouth, that came from Auerare laden
50 with Salt: ere we had fully dispatched, it chanced to be foule weather, so that we could not, or at least would not make out our Boat, but caused the Master of the Barke to let downe his, and come aboard with his Company, being in the Barke but nine men, and one Boy; and so the Master leauing his Mate with two men in the same, came himselfe with five men, and the boy
60 vnto vs, whereupon our Turkish Captaine sent ten Turkes to man her, amongst whom were two Dutch, and one English Renegado, who were of our confederacie, and acquainted with the businesse.

Tor Bay.

But when Rawlins saw this partition of his friends, before they could hoysse out their Boat for the Barke, he made meanes to speake with them, and told them plainly, that he would prosecute the matter eyther that night, or the next and therefore whatsoeuer came of it they should acquaint the English with his resolution, and make toward England, bearing vp the helme, whiles the Turkes slept, and suspected no such matter: for by Gods grace in his first watch about mid-night, he would shew them a light, by which they might vnderstand, that the Enterprize was begunne, or at least in a good forwardnesse for the execution: and so the Boat was let 65 downe, and they came to the Barke of Tor Bay, where the Masters Mate beeing left (as before you haue heard) apprehended quickly the matter, and heard the Discourse with amazement. But time was precious, and not to be spent in disputing, or casting of doubts, whether the Turkes that were with them, were able to master them, or no, beeing seuen to sixe, considering they had the helme of the ship, and the Turkes being Souldiers, and ignorant of Sea Affaires, could not discover, whether they went to Argier or no ; or if they did, they resolved by Rawlins example to cut their throats, or cast them over-board : and so I leave them to make use of the Renegadoes instructions, and returne to Rawlins againe.

The Master of the Barke of Tor Bay, and his Company were quickly searched, and as quickly pillaged, and dismissed to the libertie of the shippe, whereby Rawlins had leisure to entertayne him with the lamentable newes of their extremities, and in a word, of every particular which was befitting to the purpose : yea, he told him, that that night he should lose the sight of them, for they would make the helme for England, and hee would that night and evermore pray for their good successe, and safe deliuerance.

When the Master of the Barke of Tor Bay had heard him out, and that his company were 10 partakers of his Storie, they became all silent, not eyther diffident of his Discourse, or afraid of the attempt, but resolved to assist him. Yet to shew himselfe an vnderstanding man, hee demanded of Rawlins, what weapons he had, and in what manner he would execute the businesse: to which he answered, that he had Ropes, and Iron Hookes to make fast the Scottels, Gratings, and Cabbines, he had also in the Gunner roome two Curtleaxes, and the slaues had five Crowes of Iron before them : Besides, in the scuffling they made no question of some of the Souldiers weapons : then for the manner, hee told them, they were sure of the Ordnance, the Gunner roome, and the Powder, and so blocking them vp, would eyther kill them as they came downe, or turne the Ordnance against their Cabbins, or blow them into the Ayre by one Stratageme or 20 other, and thus were they contented on all sides, and resolved to the Enterprize.

of sight.

The next morning, being the seventh day of February, the Prize of Tor Bay was not to be 30 scene or found, whereat the Captaine began to storme and sweare, commanding Rawlins to search the Seas vp and downe for her, who bestowed all that day in the businesse, but to little purpose: whereupon when the humour was spent, the Captaine pacified himselfe, as conceiting he should sure find her at Argier : but by the permission of the Ruler of all actions, that Argier was England, and all his wickednesse frustrated : for Rawlins beeing now startled, lest hee should returne in this humour for the Streights, the eight of February went downe into the hold, and finding a great deale of water below, told the Captaine of the same, adding, that it did not come to the Pumpe, which he did very politickly, that he might remoue the Ordnance : For when the 40 Captaine askt him the reason, he told him the ship was too farre after the head : then hee commanded to use the best meanes he could to bring her in order : sure then, quoth Rawlins, wee must quit our Cables, and bring foure Peeces of Ordnance after, and that would bring the water to the Pumpe, which was presently put in practice, so the Peeces beeing vsually made fast thwart the ship, we brought two of them with their mouthes right before the Biticle, and because the Renegadoe Flemmings would not begin, it was thus concluded : that the ship hauing three Deckes, wee that did belong to the Gunner roome should be all there, and breake vp the lower Decke. The English slaues, who alwayes lay in the middle Decke, should doe the like, and watch the Scuttels : Rawlins himselfe preuayled with the Gunner, for so much Powder, as should prime the Peeces, and so told them all there was no better watch-word, nor meanes to begin, then vpon the report of the Peece to make a cry and skrich, for God, and King James, and 50 Saint George for England.

When all things were prepared, and every man resolved, as knowing what hee had to doe, and the houre when it should happen, to be two in the afternoone, Rawlins aduised the Master Gunner to speake to the Captaine, that the Souldiers might attend on the Poope, which would bring the ship after : to which the Captaine was very willing, and vpon the Gunners information, the Souldiers gat themselves to the Poope, to the number of twentie, and five or sixe went into the Captaines Cabbin, where alwayes lay diuers Curtleaxes, and some Targets, and so wee fell to worke to pompe the water, and carryed the matter fairely till the next day, which was spent as the former, being the ninth of February, and as God must haue the prayse, the triumph 50 of our victorie.

For by that time all things were prepared, and the Souldiers got vpon the Poope as the day before : to auoid suspition, all that did belong to the Gunner-roome went downe, and the slaues in the middle decke attended their businesse, so that we may cast vp our account in this manner. First, nine English slaues, besides John Rawlins, five of the Tor Bay men, and one boy, foure English Renegadoes, and two French, foure Hollanders : in all foure and twenty and a boy : so that lifting vp our hearts and hands to God for the successe of the businesse, we were wonderfully encouraged ; and settled our selues, till the report of the peece gaue vs warning of the enterprize. Now, you must consider, that in this company were two of Rawlins men, James Roe, and John Davies, whom he brought out of England, and whom the fortune of the Sea brought into the same predicament with their Master. These were imployed about noone (being as I said, the ninth of February) to prepare their matches, while all the Turkes or at least most of them stood on the 60 Poope, to weigh downe the ship as it were, to bring the water forward to the Pumpe : the one brought his match lighted betweene two spoons, the other brought his in a little peece of a Can: and so in the name of God, the Turkes and Moores being placed as you haue heard, and five and forty forty in number, and Rawlins having proined the Tuck-holes, James Roe gaue fire to one of the peeces, about two of the clocke in the after noone, and the confederates vpon the warning, shouted most cheerefully: the report of the peece did teare and breake downe all the Bitickeil; and compasses, and the noise of the slaues made all the Souldiers amased at the matter, till seeing the quarter of the ship rent, and feeling the whole body to shake vnder them: vnderstanding the ship was surpris'd, and the attempt tended to their vtter destruction, neuer Beare robbed of her whelpes was so fell and mad: For they not onely cald vs dogs, and cried out, Vsance de Lamair, which is as much as to say, the Fortune of the wars: but attempted to teare vp the planckes, setting a worke hammers, hatchets, kniues, the oares of the Boate, the Boat-hooke, their curtlexes, and what else came to hand, besides stones and bricke in the Cooke-roome; all which they threw amongst vs, attempting still and still to breake and rip vp the hatches, and boords of the steering, not desisting from their former execrations, and horrible blasphemies and reuilings.

When John Rawlins perceiued them so violent, and vnderstood how the slaues had cleared the deckes of all the Turkes and Moors beneath, he set a guard vpon the Powder, and charged their owne Muskets against them, killing them from diuers scout-holes, both before and behind, and so lessened their number, to the ioy of all our hearts, whereupon they cried out, and called for the Pilot, and so Rawlins, with some to guard him, went to them, and vnderstood them by their kneeling, that they cried for mercy, and to haue their liues saued, and they would come downe, which he bade them doe, and so they were taken one by one, and bound, yea killed with their owne Curtlexes; which when the rest perceiued, they called vs English dogs, and reuiled vs with many opprobrious tearmes, some leaping ouer-boord, crying, it was the chance of war, some were manacled, and so throwne ouer-boord, and some were slaine and mangled with the Curtlexes, till the ship was well cleared, and our selues assured of the victory.

At the first report of our Peece, and hurlyburly in the decks, the Captaine was a writing in his Cabbin, and hearing the noyse, thought it some strange accident, and so came out with his Curtlexe in his hand, presuming by his authority to pacifie the milchiefe: But when hee cast his eyes vpon vs, and saw that we were like to surpriue the ship, he threw downe his Curtlexe, and begged vs to saue his life, intimating vnto Rawlins, how he had redeemed him from Villars-Rise, and euer since admitted him to place of command in the ship, besides honest vsage in the whole course of the Voyage. All which Rawlins confessed, and at last condescended to mercy, and brought the Captaine and five more into England. The Captaine was called Ramtham-Rise, but his Christen name, Henry Chandler, and as they say, a Chandelers sonne in Southwarke. John Good-ale, was also an English Turke. Richard Clarke, in Turkish, Iasar; George Cocke, Ramdarn; John Browne, Mamme; William Winter, Mustapha; besides all the slaues and Hollanders, with other Renegadoes, who were willing to be reconciled to their true Sauour, as being formerly seduced with the hopes of riches, honour, preferment, and such like deuillish baits, to catch the soules of mortall men, and entangle frailty in the tarriers of horrible abuses, and imposturing deceit.

When all was done, and the ship cleared of the dead bodies, John Rawlins assembled his men together, and with one consent gaue the praise vnto God, vsing the accustomed seruice on ship-boord, and for want of bookes lifted vp their voyces to God, as he put into their hearts, or renewed their memories: then did they sing a Psalm, and last of all, embraced one another for playing the men in such a Deliuerance, whereby our feare was turned into ioy, and trembling hearts exhillirated, that we had escaped such ineuitable dangers, and especially the slavery and terror of bondage, worse then death it selfe: The same night we washed our ship, put euery thing in as good order as we could, repaired the broken quarter, set vp the Biticle, and bore vp the Helme for England, whereby Gods grace and good guiding, we arriued at Plimmoth, the thirteenth of February, and were welcommed like the recovery of the lost sheepe, or as you read of a louing mother, that runneth with embraces to entertaine her sonne from a long Voyage and escape of many dangers.

Not long after we vnderstood of our confederats, that returned home in the Barke of Tor-bay, that they arriued in Pensance in Cornwall the eleuenth of February: and if any aske after their deliuerance, considering there were ten Turkes sent to man her, I will tell you that too: the next day after they lost vs, as you haue heard and that the three Renegadoes had acquainted the Masters Mate, and the two English in her with Rawlins determination, and that they themselves would be true to them, and assist them in any enterprise: then if the worst came, there were but seuen to sixe: but as it fell out, they had a more easie passage, then turmoile, or man-slaughter. For they made the Turkes beleete, the wind was come faire, and that they were sayling to Argier, till they came within sight of England, which one of them amongst the rest discovered, saying plainely, that that land was not like Cape Vincent; yes saith he, that was at the Helme, and you will be contented, and goe downe into the hold, and trim the salt ouer to wind-ward, whereby the ship may beare full saile, you shall know and see more to morrow: Whereupon five of them went downe very orderly, the Renegadoes faining themselves asleepe, who presently start vp, and with the helpe of the two English, nailed downe the hatches, whereat the principall amongst them much repined, and began to grow into choller and rage, had it not quickly beene ouerpasse. For one of them stepped to him, and dasht out his braines, and threw him ouer-board: the rest were brought to Excester, and either to be arraigned, according to the punishment of delinquents in such a kind, or disposed of, as the King and Counsell shall thinke meet: and this is the story of this deliuerance, and end of John Rawlins Voyage. The Actors in this Comick Tragedie are most of them aliue; The Turkes are in prison; the ship is to be seene, and Rawlins himselfe dare iustifie the matter.

The names of the English Renegadoes, which consented, and ioyned with the slaues in the reconery of the ship, were these.

Richard Clarke, the Gunner, called in Turkish, Iasar. George Cooke, Gunners-mate, called in Turkish, Ramedam. William Winter, Carpenter, in Turkish, Mustapha. John Browne, in Turkish, Memme. One Dutch Renegado. Foure Dutch slaues. One French slaue. Fiue Englishmen and one boy, taken but three dayes before. Nine English slaues which they tooke with them from Argier. In all foure and twenty men and a boy. Which were all safely landed at Plimmoth, the thirteenth of February, 1621. They saued aliue the siue and forty Turkes and Moores, the Captaine, one Henry Chandlor, borne in South-warke, an English Renogado; and siue Turkes more, who are at this present in Plimmoth Goale, &c.

*Relations of Africa, taken out of Master GEORGE SANDYS his larger discourse obserued in his Iourney, begun
Ann. 1610. LIB. 2.*

§. I.

His Voyage from Rhodes to Alexandria, obseruations there, of Egypt, in generall, and of Nilus.

I haue contracted this History (as others) for breuity: omitting nothing willingly which the Author saw: in other things commonly referring the Reader to M. Sandys his owne booke or other Authors which were his guides. For we write of mens trauailes, rather then a history of places & Regions in this worke: which herein differeth from that which I haue called my Pilgrimage. Many also of the things left out are in Leo or others here inserted.

R

Hodes is now inhabited by the Turkes and Jewes: those Christians that be, being Greekes, and not suffered after Sun-set to abide in the Citie: the Suburbs whereof are vtterly razed. I haue heard that all the Monuments, Statues, an inscriptions belonging to the Knights of the Order, are by the Turkes preserued entire, excepting such as the warres had demolished. Heere the Grand Signior maintaineth siue Gallies. About this Iland, we expected to haue met with Pirats, but were happily deceiued.

Now hauing lost the sight of Rhodes, we saw no land vntill the third night after: in the Euening, doubtfully discovering the Coast of Egypt. Fearing the Lee-shoare, all night we bore out to Sea: the lightning ministring vncomfortable light, intermixed with thunder and tempests. The next day we entred the Hauen of Alexandria, newly defamed with a number of wracks, which scattered here and there, did miserably testifie the vn safe protection of that Harbour. For not past two nights before the Northerne winds beating full vpon the mouth of the Hauen, with violent Seas droue the fore-most ships from their Anchors, who falling foule on the rest, sunke all for company, euen two and twenty in number: amongst the rest, that great and warlike ship, called the Red-Lion, but taken the yeere before from the Knights of Malta.

But before we proceed any further in particulars, meet it is that something be said of Egypt in generall. The wonderfull fertility of the soile, is rather to bee admired then expressed: in times past reputed the granary of the world; insomuch as it was not thought possible for the Roman Empire to subsist, if not assisted by the affluence of Egypt. The occasion of thrt saying of Selymus when he had conquered the Country, that, Now he had taken a Farme that would feed his Iemoglans. Amongst other commodities which this earth doth yeeld, and are fetcht from hence by forrainers, Sugar, Flaxe, Rice, all manner of Graine, Linnen-cloth, Hides, Salt, But-targo, and Cassia, being now the principall.

Whatsoeuer here is estimable, proceedeth from the munificency of this Riuer; for progresse, and property of all other the most excellent: vnto former ages, though often attempted, (and that by great Potentates) of an vndiscovered originall,

Four miles below Cairo, it divideth into two maine and nauigable branches; that next the East running into the Mid-land Sea by Damiata (heretofore Pelusium;) the other inclining vnto the West, and formerly called Canopus, falleth into the selfe-same Sea a little below Rosetta, making of the richest portion of the Land a triangular Iland, named Delta, in that it beareth the forme of that letter; the fresh water keeping together, and changing the colour of the Salt, farre further into the Sea, then the shoare from thence can be discerned. Two other branches there be that runne betweene these, but poore in waters; besides diuers channels cut by the labour of man, for conueiances in the time of the inundation; which also are no small strengthning to the Countrey. Of those seuen mentioned by Herodotus, and those nine by Ptolomy, these are all that I either saw or could heare of. Nor is it a thing extraordinarie for Riuer to lose their channels, either choaked by themselves, or by the aduerse Seas, with beds of Sand, and turned vp grauell resisting their passages. But amongst the hidden mysteries of Nature, there is none more wonderfull, then is the ouerflowing of this Riuer; making of a meere Desart (for such is Egypt vnwatered by Nilus) the most fruitfull part of the habitable world, little when others are great, and their decreate increaseth.

Not tide to lawes of other streames; the Sunne.

Sub torrente plaga, ne terras dissipet ignis

Nilus ad est mundo, contraque accensa leonis

Ora tunc——Lucan. l. 10.

The earth then burnt with the violent feruour, neuer refreshed with raine (which here falls rarely and then onely in the Winter) hath helpe from Nilus, most constantly obseruing his accustomed seasons, beginning to arise with the arising Sunne on the seuenteenth of Iune; swelling by degrees vntill it mount sometimes foure and twentie cubits, but that the vttermoist.

This year * at Cairo it rise three and twentie. About two miles about the Citie, at the end of old Cairo, in the beginning of August they cut the bankes; then when ascended vnto his principall height; before kept in, lest that the too timely deluge should destroy the fruites of the earth ere fit to be reaped. At which the Bassa is himselfe in person (who giueth the first stroke) accompanied with a world of people, rowed in Gallies and Barges of triumph, and for diuers dayes feasting: the Bassa in the Castle of Michia, an Iland surrounded with Nile (so called, in that there the Pillar doth stand, by which they obserue the increase of the Riuer) others vnder Pavilions pitched by the shoare, with barbarous solemnities, and generall reioycings. At their returne they are met by those of the Citie, who bestrew their heads with flowers, as the welcome forerunners of that they long wished. They turned in water following them at the heeles; boats now rowed, where but now they trampled, filling the dustie trenches and long emptied Cisternes: and a while after couering in many places the superficies of the land, which there then appeareth as a troubled Lake. Antwerable to the increase of the Riuer, is the plentie or scarcitie of the yeare succeeding, bringing with it both earth and water into a sandie and thirstie soile, of it selfe vnprofitable: so that it as well manures as moistens, with the fat and pregnant slime which it leaueth behind it. Vnto which they owe not their riches onely, but themselves. For the plague which here oft miserably rageth, vpon the first of the flood doth instantly cease: insomuch as when five hundred die at Cairo the day before, which is nothing rare (for the sound keepe companie with the sicke, holding death fatall, and to auoid them irreligion) not one doth die the day following. Wherefore no maruell though ignorant and superstitious antiquitie, vnder the name of Osiris adored this Riuer, which afforded them so many benefits, and such as not apprehended were thought supernaturall. Thus where couered with water, it is no vnpleasant sight to behold the Townes appearing like little Ilands; the people passing and repassing by boate, and not seldome swimming: who the lesse they see of their Countrey, the more is their comfort. About the midst of September it ceaseth to augment: and retiring a moneth after within his proper bounds, giueth way vnto Husbandrie (the earth vntilled, by throwing the Graine on the mud, and Rice into the water, affording her first increase) vntill May decreasing, and then in a marueilous penurie of water. To proue that it proceedeth from a naturall cause, this one, though strange, yet true experiment will suffice. Take of the earth of Egypt adioyning to the Riuer, and preferue it carefully, that it neither come to be wet nor wasted; weigh it daily, and you shall find it neither more nor lesse heauie vntill the seuenteenth of Iune, at which day it beginneth to grow more ponderous, and augmenteth with the augmentation of the riuer, whereby they haue an vnfallible knowledge of the state of the Deluge: proceeding without doubt from the humiditie of the Aire, which hauing a recourse through all passible places, and mixing therewith, increaseth the same as it increaseth in moysture. In the tenth and eleuenth yeare of Cleopatra, it is by Wri-Pethaps rather ceasing vpon Sunnes entering into Leo, as it doth at Aleppo, and elsewhere in those parts. A vulgar experiment generally affirmed: as by *Alinus in Med. Many ages before, Callimachus reports, that it did the like for nine yeares together. From the same cause, no question, but that seven yeares dearth proceeded in the time of Pharao.

The Bassas severe iustice.

Theeues, how punished.

Throughout this Countrey there are no Wines, yet want they none, in that they desire them not. Neither are here any trees to speake of, but such as are planted, and those in Orchards only: excepting Palmes, which delight in Desarts; and being naturally theirs, doe grow without limits. Of these they haue plenty, pleasing the eye with their goodly formes, and with diuersitie of benefits enriching their owners. Of body straight, high, round, and slender (yet vnfit for buildings) crested about, and by meanes thereof with facilitie ascended. The branches like Sedges, slit on the neather side, and euer greene; growing onely on the vppermost height, resemble faire plumes of feathers, which they yearely prune, by lopping off the lowest, and at the top of all by bearing a little of the bole. Of these there be male and female, both thrust forth cods (which are full of seeds like knotted strings) at the roote of their branches, but the female is onely fruitfull; and not so, vnlesse growing by the male (towards whose vpright growth she inclines her crowne) and haue of his seedes commixed with hers; which in the beginning of March they no more faile to doe, then to sow the earth at accustomed seasons. Their Dates doe grow like fingers, and are thereof named; not ripe vntill the fine of December, which begin to cod about the beginning of February. They open the tops of such as are fruitlesse, or otherwise perisht; and take from thence the white pith, of old called the braine, which they sell vp and downe: an excellent sallad, not much vnlike in taste, but farre better then an Artichoke. Of the branches they make Bed-steads, Lattices, &c. of the web of the Leaues, Baskets, Mats, Fans, &c. of the outward huske of the Cod, good Cordage; of the inward, Brushes, &c. such and such like affoord they yearely without empaire to themselves. This tree they held to be the perfect image of a man, and by the same represented him: First, for that it doth not fructifie, but by coiture: next, as hauing a Braine, as it were, in the vppermost part; which once corrupted, as man, euen so it perisheth: and lastly, in regard that on the top thereof grow certaine strings, which resemble the haire; the great ends of the branches appearing like hands stretcht forth, and the Dates as fingers. And because the Palme is neuer to be suppressed, but shooteth vp against all opposition, the boughs thereof haue been proposed as rewards for such as were either victorious in armes or exercises. Wood then is here but scarce in regard of the quantitie; and yet enough, if their vses for the same be considered. For they eate but little flesh (fresh Cheese, fowre Milke made solid, Roots, Fruits and Herbs, especially Colocasia, anciently called the Egyptian Beane, though bearing no Beane, but like the leafe of a Colewort, being their principal sustenance; baking their bread in Cakes on the harth, and mingling therewith the seeds of Coriander.) As for cold, they know it not; hauing sufficient of the refuse of Palmes, Sugar-canes, and the like, to furnish them with fuell, answerable to their necessities. But forrainers that feed as in colder Countries, doe buy their Wood by weight, which is brought in hither by shipping. The Gallions also of Constantinople, alwaies goe into the Blacke Sea for timber, before they take their voyage for Cairo. Omit I must not the sedge reeds which grow in the Marishes of Egypt, called formerly Papyri, of which they made paper; and whereof ours made of rags, assumeth that name. They diuided it into thin flakes, whereinto it naturally parteth: then laying them on a table, and moistning them with the glutinous water of the Riuer, they prest them together, and so dried them in the Sunne. It is now gouerned by a Bassa who hath his residence in Cairo, and commandeth as an absolute Soueraigne; vnder whom are sixteene Sanjacks, and a hundred thousand Spacheis. The reuenues of this little Countrey amounting to three Millions of * Shariffes. The Great Turke hauing one (viz. foure hundred thousand disbursed yearely in Sugar and Rice, and sent to Constantinople; the residue sent ouer-land with a guard of sixe hundred Souldiers, for feare of the Florentine;) another Million is spent in payes, and in setting forth the Caruan vnto Mecha; the third hee hath for the supportance of his owne estate, and entertainment of his dependents. But this is little in regard of that which was raised thereof in the reigne of Auletes, who receiued seven Millions and a halfe of Crownes; much more supposed to haue yeilded to the more prouident Romanes.

The Bassa now being, and called Mahomet, is a man well stricken in yeares, of a fowre and inflexible nature. At his first entrance hee cut off the heads of foure thousand Spacheis, that had borne themselves too insolently, and committed many outrages and extortions. Hee sent the great men that bore ouermuch sway vnto Constantinople; those that refused to goe, he caused to be strangled, vsing the aide of the Arabians (who iustly hated the other) in all his executions. If a robbrie be committed, and the theeues escape, such as are appointed to guard those quarters, do suffer in their stead; insomuch as often they attach poore innocents when they cannot apprehend the guiltie, to deliuer themselves from punishment: boring holes through the condemneds armes, stretcht wide on staues, in which are Candles stucke, that burne downe into the flesh, and are led in that manner through the Citie vnto the place of execution. Others are stript of their skinnies, yet liue in horrible torment so long as the Executioners Steele offends not the Nauell. Drunkenesse is punished with death; and all disorders so seuerely lookt into, that I thinke in no other place you shall see so few amongst such a multitude of people. The malice his rigour procured, had caused himsele to confine himsele to the Castle for a twelue-moneth, before our comming to Cairo: but his gouernment is so well approued by the Grand Signior, that to doe him the more honour, he hath giuen him his daughter in marriage, a childe of foure yeares old, which hath beene solemnized with all possible Ceremonies. One thing more is in him prayse-worthy; that hee will hardly suffer a Christian to turne Mahometan, either out of the dislike 10 of his owne Religion, or knowing well that they doe it onely for commoditie and preferment.

Those that now inhabit the Countrey, are for the most part Moores. Turkes there are many, and Jewes, which reside onely in Cities. Store of Arabians, and not a few Negroes. Of Christians, the natiue Copties are the most in number: some Greekes there bee, and a few Armenians.

The Egyptian Moores (descended of the Arabians, and vnderstanding each other) are men of a meane stature, tawnie of complexion, and spare of bodie, shrill tongued, and nimble footed; naturally indutrious, affecting more their profit then their ease; yet know they not how to liue of a little, as in nothing riotous. Rather craftie they are then wise; more obseruant then 20 faithfull, by much more deuout then the Turkes in the Mahometan Religion. In Learning they are vtterly ignorant. Amongst them none are Noble: few admitted to the Souldiery, (nor suffered in Townes to weare Weapons) not any to Magistracie. In Cities the best of them exercise Merchandize: rich by meanes of their Trafficke with the Indians; yet that decayed since our East Indian Voyages: insomuch, as Spices brought out of the Leuant heretofore, are now with profit brought thither by our Merchants. In habit they differ little from the Turkes, excepting 30 some of the yonger sort, who weare side Coates of Linnen (the ancient habit of that Countrey) girt to their waistes, and Towels throwne about their neckes of the same. Diuers of the Negroes weare Vests like Surplices. Those of the poorest, long Garments of Hayre, streakt blacke and white; in the winter, side Coates of Cotten. The Beggars by singing, both get reliefe, and comfort their pouertie, playing withall vpon Drummes which are fashioned like Siues.

A number here be afflicted with sore eyes, eyther by the reflecting heate, the salt dust of the soyle, or excessiue Venerie: for the Pockes is vncredibly frequent amongst them. The women when out of their houses, are wrapt from the crowne of the head to the foot in ample Robes of Linnen, spreading their armes vnderneath to appeare more corpulent: for they thinke it a speciall excellencie to be fat; and most of them are so; so in frequenting the Bannias for certayne dayes together, wherein they vse such dyet and frictions, as daily vse confirmeth for effectually. They couer their faces with black Cypresse bespotted with red. Their vnder garments of lighter 40 stoffes then the Turkish, not differing in fashion. The better sort weare hoopcs of Gold and Silver about their armes, and aboue their ancles: others of Copper, with Peecces of Coyne halfe couering their fore-heads, and plates hung about their neckes, &c. Both men and women doe brand their armes for the loue of each other. Diuers of the women haue I seene with their chinnes distayned into knots and flowres of blue, made by pricking of the skinne with Needles, and rubbing it ouer with Inke and the Iuyce of an herbe, which will neuer weare out againe. They haue quicke and easie labour, bearing heretofore often two, and sometimes three at a burthen: those also borne in the eighth moneth liuing, rarely if else-where heard of. In the adioyning Deserts of Saint Macario, a Plant there is, low, leauelisse, browne of colour, branched like Corall, and closed at the top, this in the time of the labour of women, they set in water in some corner of the roome, which strangely displayeth, procuring (as they generally coniecture) easie deliueries. The Countrey people doe follow Husbandry. They are not long in 50 dressing themselues, being onely wrapt in a russet Mantle: nor haue the women any better couerture, hiding their faces with beastly clouts, hauing holes for their eyes; which little is too much to see, and abstayne from lothing. Ouer their shashes the men weare rounds of stifened russet, to defend their braines from their piercing feruour. A people breathes not more sauage and nastie, crufted with dirt, and stinking of smoke, by reason of the * fuell, and their houses * Stercus bouum which haue no Chimnies. Some of them dwell vnder beggerly Tents, and those esteemed of the old Inhabitants.

But the Copties are the true Egyptians, retayning the name of Coptus that ancient Citie and Territorie, a litle below, and on that side the Riuer where once stood Thebes, against the lland 60 of the Tenterites. The name signifieth Priuation, so called, for that there Isis cut off a locke of her Hayre, and put on funerall Garments for the death of Osiris. Others will haue them so called in regard of their Circumcision. These, as I said, are Christians, notwithstanding they are circumcised, whereof they now begin to bee ashamed; saying, that in the Countrey they are thereunto compelled by the Moores; and in Cities where secure from violence, they vse it not; how-howbeit, doing it rather in that an ancient custome of their Nation (mentioned by Herodotus) then out of Religion. They were infected with that heresie of one nature in Christ, long before Iacobus (of whom now named, and of whom wee shall speake hereafter) divulged it in Syria.

Their Christianity & rites.

At this day they professe him to be perfect God and perfect man; yet dare not distinguish his natures, for feare of diuiding his person. They baptize not their Children vntill fortie dayes old. Presently after mid-night they repayre to their Churches, where they remaine wel-nigh vntill Sunday at noone; during which time, they neither sit nor kneele, but support themselves vpon crutches. The Priest is veiled and vested in Linnen, hauing two or three Boyes appparelled alike, and sequestred from the rest of the people, to assist him; for they conferre inferiour Orders vpon 10 children. They sing ouer most part of the Psalms of Dauid at euery meeting, with diuers parcels of the Old and New Testaments; the latter, as written by Nicomedes: some in the Copticke Language, vnderstood but by few, most in the Moresco. Often both Priest and people conioyned in Sauage noyses, to our iudgements not articulate. The Priest not seldome eleuating a red cloth (vnder which, I suppose, was the Sacrament) which they administer in both kinds, and giue it to Infants presently after Baptisme. In their Churches they haue the Picture of our Sauiour, and the blessed Virgin; but not ouer their Altars; nor for any thing I could perceiue, doe they reuerence them.

In certaine Chests they preserue the bones and ashes of such as haue turned Mahometan, and afterward recanted; for which they haue suffered Martyrdome. At their entrance they kisse 20 their hands, and lay them vpon one another: the women in grated Galleries separated from the men. Extreame Vnction, Prayer for the Dead, and Purgatory, they admit not of. The Romane Church they hold for Hereticall, and reiect all generall Councils, after that of Ephesus. Yet a multitude of late haue beene drawne to receiue the Popish Religion (especially in Cairo) by the industry of Friars, hauing had the Romane Liturgie sent them from Rome, together with the Bible, in the Arabecke Language. Of Alexandria hath their Patriarke his name, but his abode is in Cairo. Sixe dayes iourney about Cairo vp the Riuer, they haue a great Citie, called Saiet; where Christ, with his mother, is said to haue made their abode vntill the death of Herod: vnto which, growing old and sickly, they repaire, as desirous to die 30 there: where there is a goodly Church, though something ruinous, built by Hellen the mother of Constantine, and consecrated to the blessed Virgin. They neuer eate in the day time during the Lent, but on Saturdayes and Sundayes. They weare round Caps, Towels about their neckes, and gownes with wide sleeues of Cloth, and Stuffs lesse ponderous. These liue in more subiection then the Moores, by reason of their Religion, and pay yerely a certaine summe for their heads to the Bassa. Ignorant in the excellencies of their ancestors, but retaining their vices. Some of them professe some knowledge in Magicke, being but Iuglers, compared with the former, by whom such miracles were effected.

* Alexandria.

The Lake Mardotis afforded another Hauen vnto the Citie, * then that of the Sea more profitable: by reason of the commodities of India, the Arabian Gulph, and vp-land parts of Egypt, brought downe by the conueniency of that passage by Channels now vtterly ruined. And 40 the same by a narrow cut was ioyned vnto another Lake, farre lesse, and neerer the Sea, which at this day too plentifully furnisheth all Turkie with Salt-peter. Betweene the lesse Lake and the Citie, there passeth an artificiall channell which serueth them with water (for they haue no wells) in the time of the deluge, conueyed by Conduits into ample Cisterns (now most of them Fennie for want of vse, an occasion of much sickenesse in the summer) and so preserued vntill the succeeding overflow. For Alexandria is all built vpon vaults, supported with carued pillars one aboue another, and lined with stone; insomuch, as no small proportion thereof lay concealed in earth, consider we either of the Coast or quantity.

Such was this Queene of Cities and Metropolis of Africa: who now hath nothing left 50 her but ruines; and those ill witnesses of his perished beauties: declaring rather, that Townes as well as men, haue their ages and destinies. Onely those wals remaine which were founded (as some say) by Ptolomie: one within another, imbatled, & garnished with threescore & eight Turrets; rather stately then strong, if compared with the moderne. Yet these, by the former descriptions, and ruines without appeare to haue immured but a part of the Citie. After that destroyed by the Saracens, it lay for a long time waste, vntill a Mahometan Priest, pronouncing (as he said, out of Mahomet's prophesies) indulgences to such as should re-edifie, inhabite, or contribute money thereunto, within certaine dayes, did in a short season repeople it. But a latter destruction it receiued by the Cypriots, French, and Venetians, about the time that Lewis the fourth 60 was enlarged by the Sultans, who surprised the Citie with a marueilous slaughter. But hearing of the approach of the Sultan, (who had raised a great army for their reliefe) despairing to maintaine it, they set it on fire, and departed. The Sultan repairing the wals as well as he could, built this Castle that now stands on the Pharus for the defence of the Hauen; and brought it to the state wherein it remaineth. Sundry Mountaines are raised of the ruines, by Christians not to be mounted; lest they should take too exact a suruey of the Citie: in which are often found (especially after a shower) rich stones, and medals engrauen with the figures of their Gods, and men, with such perfection of Art; as these now cut, seeme lame to those, and vniuely counterfeits. On the top of one of them stands a watch-tower, where continuall centinell is kept, to giue notice of approaching sailes. Of Antiquities there are few remainders: onely Hieroglyphicall Obeliske of Theban Marble, as hard wel-nigh as Porphir, but of a deeper red, and speckled alike, called Pharoes Needle, standing where once stood the Palace of Alexander: and another lying by, and like it, halfe buried in rubbidge. Without the walls on the South-west side of the Citie, on a little hill stands a Columne of the same, all of one stone, eightie fixe Palmes high, and 10 thirty fixe in compasse, the Palme consisting of nine inches and a quarter, according to the measure of Genoa, as measured for Zigal Bassa by a Genones, set vpon a square cube (and which is to be wondered at) not halfe so large as the foot of the Pillar, called by the Arabians, Hemadeslaeor, which is, the Columne of the Arabians. They tell a Fable, how that one of the Ptolomies erected the same in the furthest extent of the Hauen, to defend the Citie from Nauall incursions: ha-

 20 uing placed a Magicall glasse of Steele on the top, of vertue (if vncovered) to set on fire such ships as sailed by. But subuerted by them, the glasse lost that power, who in this place re-erected the Columne. But by the Westerne Christians it is called the pillar of Pompey: and is said to haue bene reared by Cesar, as a memoriall of his Pompeian Victory. The Patriarke of Alexandria hath here a house adioyning to a Church, which stands (as they say) in the place
 30 where Saint Marke was buried, their first Bishop and Martyr: who in the dayes of Traian, haled with a rope tied about his neck, vnto the place, called Angeles, was there burned for the testimonie of Christ, by the idolatrous Pagans. Afterward his bones were remoued to Venice by the Venetians, he being the Saint and Patron of that Citie. There be at this day two Patriarkes, one of the Greeks; another of the Circumcised, the vniuersall Patriarke of the Copties and *Abas-
 40 fines*. The name of the Greeke Patriarke now being, is Cyril, a man of approued vertue and learning, a friend to the reformed Religion, and opposing the contrary; saying, that the differences betweene vs and the Greekes, be but shels; but that those are Kernels betweene them and the other. Of whom something more shall be spoken hereafter. The buildings now being, are meane and few, erected on the ruines of the former: that part that lieth along the shoare inhabited onely, the rest desolate: the walls almost quadrangular; on each side a gate, one opening 50 towards Nilus; another regards Mariotis; the third, the Desarts of Barcha; and the fourth, the Hauen. Inhabited by Moores, Turkes, Iewes, Copties, and Grecians; more in regard of Merchandize, (for Alexandria is a Free Port, both for friend and enemy) then for the conueniency of the place: seated in a Desart, where they haue neither Tillage nor Pasturage, except what borders on the Lake; that little, and vnhusbanded: yet keepe they good store of Goats, that haue eares hanging downe to the ground, which feed amongst ruines. On the Ile of Pharus, now a part of the Continent, there stands a Castle, defending the entrance of the Hauen; which hath no water but what is brought vpon Camels from the Cisterns of the Citie: this, at 60 our comming in, as is the vse, we saluted with our Ordnance. As many of vs as came ashore, were brought to the Custome-house, to haue our selues and our valeifas searched: where ten in the hundred is to be paid for whatsoeuer we haue, and that in kind, onely money payes, but one and a halfe; whereof they take an exact account, that thereby they may aime at the value of returned commodities; then paying eleuen in the hundred more, euen for such goods as are in property vnaltered. At so high a rate is this free traffique purchased, the Mahumetan here paying as much as the Christian. The Customes are framed by the Iewes, paying for the same vnto the Bassa twenty thousand * Madeins a day, thirty of them amounting to a Ryall of eight. Wee lodged in the house of the French Consul, vnto whose protection all strangers commit themselves. The Cane lockt vp by the Turkes at noones and at nights, for feare that the Franks should suffer or offer any outrage. The Vice-consul keeps a table for Merchants, he himselfe a 70 Magnifico, lesse liberall of his presence, then industrious to pleasure; yea, rather stately then proud; expecting respect, and meriting good will: that was a Priest, and would be a Cardinall; with the hopes whereof, they say, that he feasteth his ambition. By him we were prouided of a Ianifary for our guard vnto Cairo: his hire, fise peeces of gold, besides his owne diet and his mans, with prouision of Powder. For our Asses (not inferiour in this Countrey vnto horses for trauell) halfe a Shariffe a peece, for our Camels a whole one. At the gate they tooke a Madein a head, for our selues and our Asses, so indifferently doe they prise vs: through which wee could not passe without a Tescaria from the Cadee, the principall officer of this Citie.

ON the second of February in the afternoone, we vndertooke our Iourney: passing through a Desart, producing here and there a few ynhusbanded Palmes, Capers, and a weed called Kall by the Arabs. This they vse for fuel, and then collecting the ashes, which crusht together like a stone, they sell them in great quantity to the Venetians, who equally mixing the same with the stones that are brought them from Pania by the Riuer of Ticinum, made thereof their Christaline Glasses. On the left hand we left diuers ruinous buildings: one said to haue been the Royall mansion of Cleopatra. Beyond which, Bucharis, once a little, but ancient Citie, now onely shewing her foundations, where grow many Palmes which sustaine the wretched people that lue thereabout in beggerly Cottages; where on a Rock stands a Tower, affording light by night to the sailer, the place being full of danger. Anon we passed by a guard of Souldiers, there placed for the securing of that passage, paying a Madein for euerie head. Seuen or eight miles beyond, we ferried ouer a Creeke of the sea. On the other side stands a handsome Cane, not long since built by a Moore of Cairo for the reliefe of Trauellers, containing a quadrangle within, and arched vnderneath. Vnder one of these wee reposed; the stones our beds, our fardels the bolsters. In such like places they vnloade their merchandize, refreshing themselves and their Camels with prouision brought with them, secured from theeues and violence. Giuing a trifle for Oyle, about midnight we departed, hauing here met with good store of company, such as allowed traouelling with their matches light, and prepared to receiue all onsets. The Moores to keepe themselves awake, would tell one tale a hundred times ouer. By the way againe we should haue paid Caphar, but the benefit of the night excused vs. Trauelling along the Sea shoare, and at length a little inclining on the right hand, before day we entred Rosetta, repairing to a Cane belonging to the Frankes. Our best entertainment an vnder-roome, musty, without light, and the vnwholsome floore to lie vpon.

This Citie stands vpon the principall brance of the Nile, (called heretofore Canophus) which about some three miles beneath dischargeth it selfe into the Sea. Hauing here (as at Damiata) his entrance crossed with a barre of Sand, changing according to the changes of winds, and beating of the Surges, insomuch, that the Ierbies that passe ouer, are made without keeles, hauing flat and round bottoms. A Pilot of the Towne there sounding all the day long, by whose directions they enter, and that so close vnto him, that one leapes out of that boate into the other to receiue pilotage, and returneth swimming. The Ierbies that can passe ouer this barre, may, if well directed, proceed vnto Cairo. Rosetta (called Rasid by the Egyptians) perhaps deriued of Ros, which signifieth Rice in the Turkish Tongue, and so named for the abundance that it vttereth (they here shealing monethly three hundred quarters) was built by the slaue of an Egyptian Caliph. The houses are all of Brick, not old, yet seeming ancient: flat-rooft, as generally all bee in these hotter Countries (for the Moores vse much to lie on the tops of their houses) ietting ouer aloft like the poores of ships, to shadow the streets that are but narrow, from the Sunnes reflections. Not small, yet of small defence; being destitute of walls, and other fortifications. I thinke no place vnder heauen is better furnished with Graine, Flesh, Fish, Sugar, fruites, Rootes, &c. Raw hides are here a principall commoditie, from hence transported into Italy.

The next day but one that followed, we embarked for Cairo in a Ierbie, vnto which seuen water men belonged, which we hired for twelue Dollars. This Arme of the Nile is as broad at Rosetta, as Thames about Tilbury, streightning by little and little: and then in many places so shallow, that oft we had much adoe to free our selues from the flats that had ingaged vs: the water being euer thicke, as if lately troubled; and passing along with a mute and vnspeedy current. Ten miles about Rosetta, is that cut of the Riuer which runnes to Alexandria. By the way wee often bought as much Fish for sixe pence, as would haue satisfied twentie. On each side of the Riuer stands many Townes, but of no great esteeme, for the most part opposite, built partly of Brick, and partly of Mud; many of the poorer houses appearing like Bee-hiues, seated on little Hills throwne vp by the labour of man, to preserue them and their Cattell in the time of the ouerflow. Vpon the bankes all along are infinite numbers of deepe and spacious Vaults, into which they doe let the Riuer, drawing vp the water into higher Cisterns, with wheelles set round with Pitchers, and turned about by Buffoloes: from whence it runnes along little trenches, made vpon the ridges of banks, and so is conueied into their seuerall grounds, the Countrie lying all in a leuell. The winds blew seldome fauourable, insomuch as the poore Moores for most part of the way were enforced to hale vp the boate, often wading about their middles to deliuer it from the shallowes. At euery enforcing of themselves (as in all their labours) crying Elough, perswaded that God is neare them when they name him, the diuell farre off, and all impediments lessened. Of these it is strange to see such a number of broken persons, so being by reason of their strong labour and weake food. The pleasant walkes which we had on the shoare, made our lingring passage lesse tedious. The fruitfull soyle possessing vs with wonder; and early maturitie of things, there then as forward as with vs in Iune, who beginne to reape in the ending of March.

The Sugar Canes serued our hands for staues; and feasted our tastes with their Liquor. By the way we met with Troupes of Horsemen, appointed to cleere those passages from Theeues, whereof there are many, who also rob by water in little Frigats. Which made our carefull lan- zary (for so are most in their vndertaken charges) assisted by two other (to whom wee gaue their passage, who otherwise would haue taken it) nightly to keepe watch by turnes, discharging their Harquebuses in the euening, and hanging out kindled matches, to terrifie the Theeues, and testifie their vigilancie. Five dayes now almost spent since we first embarked, an houre before Sun-set we sayled by the Southerne angle of Delta: where the River deuideth into another branch, not much inferiour vnto this, the East bounds of that Iland (which whether of Asia or Africa is yet to be decided) entring the Sea (as hath beene said before) below Damietta. Proceeding vp the river, about twilight we arrived at Bolac the Port Town to Cairo, and nor two miles distant: where euery Frank at his landing is to pay a Dollar. Leauing our carriages in the Boat, within night we hired sixe Asses with their driuers for the value of sixe pence, to conduct vs vnto Cairo, where by an English Merchant we were kindly entertayned, who fed and housed vs gratis.

This Citie is seated on the East side of the Riuer, at the foote of the rockie mountaine Muc- sac: winding therewith, and representing the forme of a crescent, stretching South and North with the adioyning Suburbs, siue Italian miles; in breadth scarce one and a halfe where it is at the broadest: the walles (if it be walled) rather seeming to belong vnto priuate houses then otherwise. Yet is the Citie of a marueilous strength, as appeared by that three dayes battell carried through it by Selimus, and maintained by a poore remainder of the Mamlucks. For the streets are narrow, and the houses high-built, all of stone well nigh to the top, at the end almost of each a Gate, which shut (as nightly they are) make euery street as defensue as a Castle. The houses more beautifull without, then commodious within, being ill contriued with comber- some passages. Yet are the roofes high pitch, and the vppermost lightly open in the middest to let in the comfortable aire. Flat, and plaistred aboue: the walls surmounting their roofes, com- monly of single bricks (as are many of the walls of the vppermost stories) which ruined aboue, to such as stand aloft afford a confused spectacle, and may be compared to a Grove of flourishing Trees that haue onely seere and perished Crownes. Their Lockes and Keyes bee of wood; euen vnto doores that are plated with Iron. But the priuate buildings are not worth the mention, if compared to the publike, of which the Mosques exceed in magnificencie: the stones of many being curiously carued without, supported with Pillars of Marble, adorned with what Art can deuile, and their Religion tollerate. Yet differ they in forme from those of Constantino- ple: some being square with open roofes in the middle of a huge proportion, the couered Circle Tarrast aboue: others stretching out in length, and many fitted vnto the place where they stand. One built (and that the greatest) by Gehor, called Gemith Hashare: hee being named Hashare by the Caliph, which signifieth Noble. Of these in this Citie there is reported to bee such a number, as passes beliefe, so that I list not name it.

Adioyning vnto them are lodgings for Santons, (which are fooles, and mad men) of whom we haue spoken already. When one of them dye, they carry his body about in procession with great reioycings, whose soule they suppose to bee rapt into Paradise. Heere bee also diuers goodly Hospitals, both for building, reuenue, and attendance.

Next to these in beautie are the Great mens Serraglios. By which if a Christian ride they will pull him from his Ass (for they prohibit vs Horses as not worthy to bestride them) with indignation and contumely. The streets are vn timer, and exceeding dirtie after a shower (for here it rayneth sometimes in the winter contrary to the receiued opinion, and then most subiect to plagues) ouer which many beames are laid athwart on the tops of houses, and couered with Mats to shelter them from the Sunne. The like couerture there is betweene two high Mos- ques in the principall street of the Citie, vnder which when the Basha passeth, or others of qualitie, they shoot vp arrowes, which sticke aboue in abundance. The occasion of that custome I know not. During our abode in the Citie fell out the Feast of their little Byram, when in their priuate houses they slaughter a number of sheepe; which cut in gobbets, they distribute vnto their slaues and poorer sort of people, besmearing the doores with their blood: perhaps in imitation of the Passeouer.

The Nile (a mile distant) in the time of the inundation, by sundry channels flowes into the Citie. When these channels grow emptie, or the water corrupted, they haue it brought thence forth from the Riuer by Camels. For although they haue many Wels, yet is the water bad, and good for no other vse then to coole the streets, or to cleanse their houses. In the heart of the Towne stands a spacious Caue, which they call the Beseftan; in which (as in those at Constantinople) are sold all kind of Wares of the finer sort, selling old things by the call, of, who

- gives more?* imitating therein the Venetians, or imitated by them. Three principall gates there be to this Citie, Bebe Nanfre, or the Gate of Victorie, opening towards the Redde Sea; Bab Zueila leading to Nilus, and the old Towne (betweene these the chiefe street of the Citie doth extend) and Bebel Futuli, or the Port of Triumph, on the North of the Citie, and opening to the Lake called Eshykje. Three sides thereof are inclosed with goodly buildings, hauing galleries of pleasure which iettie ouer, sustayned vpon Pillars. On the other side (now a heape of ruines) stood the stately Pallace of Dultibe, Wife to the Sultan Gaibemus: in which were doores and Iauces of Iuorie; the walles and pauements checkered with discoloured Marble, Columnes of Porphir, Alabaster, and Serpentine: the feelings flourished with Gold and Azure, and inlayd with Indian Ebony, a Tree, which being cut downe, almost equals a stone in hardnesse. In a word, the magnificencie was such as could be deuised or effected by a womans curiositie, and the Purse of a Monarch, leuelled with the ground by Selymus; the stones and ornaments thereof were coueyed vnto Constantinople. 10
- The Lake. The Lake both square and large, is but onely a Lake when the Riuer ouer-floweth; ioyned thereunto by a channell, where the Moores (rowed vp and downe in Barges, shaded with Damaskes, and Stuffed of India) accustome to solace themselues in the euening. The water fallen, yet the place rather changeth then loseth his delightfulnesse: affoording the profit of five Harvests in a yeare, together with the pleasure, frequented much in the coole of the day. I cannot forget the iniurie receiued in this place, and withall the iustice. Abused by a beggerly Moore, (for such onely will) who then but seemed to begin his knauery, wee were glad to flye vnto another for succour, seeming a man of good sort; and by kissing of his garment, insinuated into his fauour; who rebuked him for the wrong hee did vs. When crossing vs againe, ere wee had gone farre, he vsed vs farre worse then before: we offering to returne to the other, which he fearing, interposed; doing vs much villany to the merriment of the beholders, esteeming of Christians as of Dogges and Infidels. At length we got by, and againe complained. Hee in a maruellous rage made his slaues to pursue him; who caught him, stript him, and beat him with Rods all along the Leuell, calling vs to bee lookers on, and so conueyed him to the place of correction; where by all likelihood he had a hundred blowes on the feet to season his pastimes. Beyond this are a number of stragling houses, extending well-nigh to Bolac, which is the Key vnto Cairo, a large Towne, and stretching alongst the Riuer; in fashion of building, in some part not much inferiour to the other. Within and without the Citie are a number of delicate Orchards, watered as they doe their fields, in which grow variety of excellent fruits; as Oranges, Lemons, Pomegranates, Apples of Paradise, Sicamor figs, and others, (whose barks they bore full of holes, the trees being as great as the greatest Oakes, the fruit no growing amongst the leanes, but out of the bole and branches) Dates, Almonds, Cassia fistula, (leaued like an Ash, the fruit hanging downe like Saufages) Locust, (flat, and of the forme of a Cycle) Galls growing vpon Tamarix, Apples no bigger then Berries, Plantains that haue a broad flaggie leafe, growing in clusters, and shaped like Cucumers, the rind like a Pescod, solid within, without stones or kernels, to the taste exceeding delicious, (this the Mahometans say was the forbidden fruit; which beeing eaten by our first Parents, and their nakednesse discovered vnto them, they made them Aprons of the leaues thereof) and many more, not knowne by name, nor seene by mee else-where: some bearing fruit all the yeare, and almost all of them their leaues. To these adde those whole fields of Palmes (and yet no preiudice to the vnder-growing Corne) of all others most delightfull. 20
- Base knauerie, & good iustice. In the aforesaid Orchards there are great numbers of Cameleons; yet not easily found, in that neere to the colour of that whereon they sit. A creature about the bignesse of an ordinary Lizard. His head vnproportionably bigge, his eyes great, and moouing without the writhing of his necke which is inflexible, his backe crooked, his skinne spotted with little tumors, lesse eminent as neerer the belly; his tayle slender and long: on each foot he hath five fingers, three on the out-side, and two on the inside slow of pace, but swiftly extending his tongue, of a marvellous length for the proportion of his body, wherewith he preyes vpon Flyes, the top thereof being hollowed by Nature for that purpose. So that deceiued they be who thinke that they eat nothing, but onely liue vpon Ayre; though surely Aire is their principall sustenance. For those that haue kept them for a whole yeare together, could neuer perceiue that they fed vpon any thing else, and might obserue their bellies to swell, after they had exhausted the Ayre, and closed their iawes; which they expanse against the rayes of the Sunne. Of colour Greene, and of a duskey yellow: brighter and whiter towards the belly, yet spotted with blue, white, and red. They change not into all colours, as reported: laid vpon Greene: the Greene predominates; vpon yellow the yellow: but laid vpon blue, or red, or white, the Greene retayneth his hue notwithstanding; onely the other spots receiue a more orient lustre: laid vpon black, they looke black, yet not without a mixture of Greene. All of them in all places are not coloured alike. They are said to beare a deadly hatred to the Serpent, insomuch as when they espie them basking in the Sunne, or in the shade, they will climbe to the ouer-hanging branches, and let downe from their mouthes a thred, like to that of a Spinners, hauing at the end a little round drop, which shineth like Quicksilver, that falling on their heads doth destroy them: and what is more to be 30

Aloft, and neere the top of the Mountaine, against the South end of the Citie, stands the Castle (once the stately Mansion of the Mameluck Sultans, and destroyed by Selymus) ascended vnto by one way onely, and that hewen out of the Rocke; which rising leisurely with easie steepes and spacious distances, (though of a great height) may bee on horse-backe without difficultie mounted. From the top, the Citie by reason of the Palmes dispersed throughout, appeareth most beautifull; the whole Countrey below lying open to the view. The Castle so great, that it seemeth a Citie of it selfe, immured with high wals, diuided into partitions, and entred by

10 doores of Iron; wherein are many spacious Courts, in times past the places of exercise. The ancient buildings all ruinated, doe onely shew that they haue beene sumptuous; there beeing many Pillars of solid Marble yet standing, of so huge a proportion, that how they came thither is not least to be wondred at. Here hath the Bassa his Residence, wherein the Diuān is kept, on Sundayes, Mondayes, and Tuesdayes the Chaufes as Aduocates, preferring the Suites of their Clients. Fortie Ianizaries he hath of his Guard, attyred like those at Constantinople, the rest employed about the Countrey, for the most part are not the sonnes of Christians, yet faithfull vnto such as are vnder their charges, whom should they betray, they not onely lose their liues, but also the pay which is due to their Posteritie. Such is this Citie, the fairest in Turkie, yet differing from what it was, as from a body beeing young and healthfull, doth the same growne

20 old and wasted with Diseases.

Now Cairo, this great Citie is inhabited by Moores, Turkes, Negroes, Iewes, Coptes, Greekes, and Armenians: who are here the poorest, and euery-where the honestest; labouring painfully, and liuing soberly. Those that are not subiect to the Turke, if taken in warres, are freed from bondage: who are, liue freely, and pay no Tribute of Children as doe other Christians. This priuiledge enioy they, for that a certaine Armenian foretold of the greatnesse and glory of Mahomet. They once were vnder the Patriarke of Constantinople: but about the Heresie of Eutyches they fell from his gouernment, and communion with the Grectans, whom they detest aboue all other: rebaptizing such as conuert to their Sect. They beleue that there is but one nature in Christ, not by a commixtion of the diuine with the humane, as Eutyches taught, but by a 30 coniunction, euen as the soule is ioyned to the body. They deny the Reall Presence in the Sacrament, and administer it as the Coptes doe: with whom they agree also, concerning Purgatorie, and not praying for the dead: as with the Greekes, that the Holy Ghost proceedeth onely from the Father, and that the dead neither doe nor shall feelee ioy or torment vntill the day of Doome.

Their Patriarke hath his being at Tyberis in Persia: in which Countrey they liue wealchily, and in good estimation. There are three hundred Bishops of that Nation; the Priests marry not twice: eat flesh but five times a yeare, and then lest the people should thinke it a sinne to eate, in regard of their abstinence. They erre that write, that the people abstaine from all meates prohibited by the Mosaicall Law; for Hogges flesh they eate where they can, without 40 offence, to the Mahometans. They obserue the Lent most strictly, yet eate flesh vpon Fridayes betweene Easter and Whitsontide. As for Images they adore them not. Here they haue their Assemblies in obscure Chambers. Comming in (which was on a Sunday in the after-noone) we found one sitting in the midst of the Congregation, in habit not differing from the rest, reading on a Bible in the Chaldean Tongue. Anon the Bishop entred in a Hood and Vest of blacke, with a stasse in his hand, to which they attributed much holinesse. First, hee prayed, and then sung certaine Psalmes, assisted by two or three; after all sung ioyntly, at interims praying to themselves: resembling the Turkes in the posture of their bodies, and often prostrations: the Bishop excepted; who erecting his hands stood all the while with his face to the Altar. The Seruice ended, one after another doe

50 kisse his hand, and bestow their Almes, he laying the other on their heads, and blessing them. Lastly, prescribeth succeeding Fasts and Festiualls. Where is to be noted, that they fast vpon the Day of the Natiuitie of our Sauour.

Here also is a Monasterie of Greece Coloieros, belonging vnto the capitall Monastery of Saint Katherine of Mount Sina, from Cairo some eight dayes iourney ouer the Deserts; said to bee the daughter of King Costa, a King of Cyprus, who in the time of Maxentius conuerted many vnto Christ. Tortured on a Wheele, and finally beheaded at Alexandria (where two goodly Pillars of Theban Marble (though halfe swallowed with ruines) preserue the memory of the place,) she was conueyed (as they affirme) by an Angell, and buried in this Mountaine. It hath three tops of a maruellous height: that on the West-side of old called Mount Horeb, where God appeared to Moses in a bush, fruitfull in pastorage, farre lower, and shadowed when the Sunne ariseth by the middlemost, that whereon God gaue the Law vnto Moses. The Monastery stands at the foot of the mountaine, resembling a Castle, with an Iron doore; wherein they shew the Tombe of the Saint much visited by Pilgrims, from whence the top by foureene thousand steps of stone is ascended, where stands a ruined Chappell. A plentifull Spring descendeth from thence and watering the Valley below, is againe drunke vp by the thirstie sand. This strong Monasterie is to entertayne all Pilgrims, (for there is no other place of entertainment) hauing an annuall Reuenue of sixtie thousand Dollars from Christian Princes. Of which foundation fixe and twentie other depend, dispersed through diuers Countries. They giue also daily Almes to the Arabs, to be the better secured from out-rage. Yet will they not suffer them to enter, but let it downe from the Battlements. Their Orchard aboundeth with excellent Fruites: amongst which Apples, rare in these Countries, transferred from Damasco. They are neither subiect to Pope, nor Patriarke, but haue a Superintendent of their owne, at this present in Cairo. These here made vs a collation, where I could not but obserue their gulling in of Wine with a deare felicitie, whereof they haue their prouision from Candy.

During our abode here, a Caruan went forth with much solemnity, to meet and relieue the great Caruan in their returne from Meeha, which consisteth of many thousands of Pilgrims that trauell yeerely thither in deuotion and for Merchandize; euery one with his bandroll in his hand, and their Camels gallantly trickt (the Alcoran carried vpon one, in a precious case couered ouer with needle-worke, and laid on a rich pillow, inuironed with a number of their chanting Priests) guarded by diuers companies of Souldiers, and certaine field peeces. Forty easie dayes Iourney it is distant from hence: diuided by a wildernesse of sand, that lyeth in drifts, and dangerously mooueth with the wind, through which they are guided in many places by starres, as ships in the Ocean.

Egges hatched
by art.

Then Cairo, no Citie can be more populous, nor better serued with all sorts of prouision. Here hatch they egges by artificiall heat in infinite numbers, the manner as seene thus briefly. In a narrow entry on each side stood two rowes of Ouens, one ouer another. On the floores of the lower they lay the offals of flaxe; ouer those mats, and vpon them their egges, at least sixe thousand in an Ouen. The floores of the vpper Ouens were as rooffes to the vnder, grated ouer like Kilnes, onely hauing tunnels in the middle, with couers vnto them. These gratings are couered with Mats, on them three inches thicke lyeth the dry and puluerated dung of Camels, Buffoloes, &c. At the hither and farther sides of those vpper Ouens are Trenches of Lome; a handfull deepe, and two handfuls broad. In these they burne of the foresaid dung, which giueth a smothering heat without visible fire. Vnder the mouthes of the vpper Ouens are conueyances for smoke, hauing round roofes, and vents at the top to shut and to open. Thus lye the Egges in the lower Ouens for the space of eight dayes, turned daily, and carefully lookt to that the heate be but moderate. Then cull they the bad from the good, by that time distinguishable (holding them betweene a Lampe and the Eye) which are two parts of three for the most part. Two dayes after they put out the fire, and conuey by the passage in the middle, the one halfe into the vpper Ouens: then shutting all close, they let them alone for ten dayes longer, at which time they become disclosed in an instant. This they practise from the beginning of Ianuary vntill the midst of Iune, the Egges being then most fit for that purpose; neither are they (as reported) preiudiced by Thunder: yet these declare that imitated Nature will neuer be equalled, all of them being in some part defectiue or monstrous.

Most of the Inhabitants of Cairo consist of Merchants and Artificers: yet the Merchants frequent no forrein Marts. All of a Trade keepe their shops in one place, which they shut about the houre of foue, and solace themselves for the rest of the day, Cookes excepted, who keepe theirs open till late in the euening. For few, but such as haue great Families dresse meate in their houses, which the men doe buy ready drest; the women too fine fingerd to meddle with housewifry, who ride abroad vpon pleasure on easie-going Asies, and tye their Husbands to the beneuolence that is due; which if neglected, they will complaine to the Magistrate, and procure a Diuorcement. Many practitioners here are in Physick, inuited thereunto by the store of Simples brought hither, and here growing, an Art wherein the Egyptians haue excelled from the beginning.

Rue whole-

Fears by birds and beasts.

See Leo.

A kind of Rue is here much in request, wherewith they perfume themselves in the mornings, not onely as a preseruatiue against infection, but esteeming it preualent against hurtfull spirits. So the Barbarians of old accustomed to doe with the Roots of wild Galingal. There are in this Citie, and haue beene of long, a sort of people that doe get their liuings by the shewing of feats with Birds and Beasts, exceeding therein all such as haue beene famous amongst vs. I haue heard a Rauens to speake so perfectly, as it hath amazed me. They vse both their throats and tongues in vttering of sounds, which other Birds doe not, and therefore more fit for that purpose. Scaliger the Father, reports of one that was kept in a Monasterie heard by him; which, when hungry, would call vpon Conrade, the Cooke, so plainly, as often mistaken for a man. I haue seene them make both Dogges and Goats to set their foure feet on a little turned Pillar of wood, about a foot high, and no broader at the end then the palme of a hand, climbing from one to two, set on the top of one another, and so to the third and fourth; and there turne about as often as their Masters would bid them. They carry also dancing Camels about, taught when young, by setting them on a hot hearth, and playing all the while on an Instrument: the poore beast through the the extremity of heat lifting vp his feet one after another. This practise they for certaine moneths together, so that at length whensoever he heareth the fiddle, he will fall a dancing. Asles they will teach to doe such tricks, as if possessed with reason : to whom Banks his horse would haue proued but a Zany.

The time of our departure proroged, we rode to Matarea, five miles North-east of the Citie. Matarea. By the way we saw land cast vpon the earth, to moderate the fertility. Here they say, that our Sauour, and the blessed Virgin, with Ioseph, reposed themselves, as they fled from the fury of Herod, when oppressed with thirst, a Fountaine forthwith burst forth at their feet to refresh them. We saw a Well enuironed with a poore mud wall, the water drawne vp by * Buffolos in- Salanicus tom; 10. cap. 6. dares to a little Cisterne; from whence it ran into a lauer of Marble within a small Chappell, by the Moors (in contempt of Christians) spitefully defiled. In the wall there is a little concaue lined with sweet wood (diminished by affectors of relicks) and smoked with incense: in the sole, a stone of Porphyry, whereon (they say) she did set our Sauour. Of so many thousand Wells (a thing most miraculous) this onely affordeth gustable waters, and that so excellent, that the Bassa refuseth the riuer to drinke thereof, and drinks of no other; and when they cease for any time to exhaust it, it sendeth forth of it selfe so plentifull a streame, as able to turne an ouer-fall Mill. Passing through the Chappell, it watereth a pleasant Orchard; in a corner whereof there standeth an ouer-growne fig-tree, which opened (as they report) to receiue our Sauour and his mother, then hardly escaping the pursuers; closing againe till the pursute was past; then againe diuiding, as now it remaineth. A large hole there is through one of the sides of the leaning bulke: this (they say) no bastard can thred, but shall sticke fast by the middle. The tree is all to be-hackt for the wood thereof, reputed of soueraigne vertue. But I abuse my time, and prouoke my Reader. In an inclosure adioyning, they shewed vs a plant of Balme, the whole remainder of that store which this Orchard produced, destroyed by the Turkes, or enuy of the Jewes, as by them reported, being transported out of Iury, in the dayes of Herod the Great, by the commandement of Antonius, at the suite of Cleopatra: but others say, brought hither out of Arabia Felix, at the cost of a Saracen Sultan. Balme.

The Pyramides viewed, SPHYNX and other antiquities: Journey from Cairo to Gaza.

A Day or two after, wee crossed the Nilus. Three miles beyoud on the left hand left we the place whereupon Good-friday the armes and legs of a number of men appeare stretched forth of the earth, to the astonishment of the multitude. This I haue heard confirmed by Christians, Mahometans, and Jewes, as scene vpon their feuerall faiths. An imposture perhaps contriued by the water-men, who fetching them from the Mummes, (whereof there are an vnconsumeable number) and keeping the mystery in their families, doe sticke them ouer night in the sand, obtaining thereby the yeerely Ferrying ouer of many thousand of passengers. Three or foure miles further, on the right hand, and in sight, athwart the Plaine, there extendeth a caulley supported with Arches five Furlongs long, ten paces high, and five in breadth, of smooth and figured stone; built by the builder of the Pyramides, for a passage ouer the soft and vnsupporting earth with weighty carriages. Now hauing ridden through a goodly Plaine, some twelue miles ouer (in that place the whole breadth of Egypt) we came to the foot of the Libyan Desarts. Mumme.

Full West of the Citie, close vpon these Desarts, aloft on a Rockie Leuell adioyning to the Valley, stands those three Pyramides (the barbarous Monuments of prodigality and vaine-glory) so vniuersally celebrated. The name is deriued from a flame of fire, in regard of their shape; broad below, and sharpe above, like a pointed Diamond. By such the ancient did expresse the originall of things, and that formelesse forme-taking substance. For as a Pyramis beginning at a point, and the principall height, by little and little dilateth into all parts: so Nature proceeding from one vndeuidable Fountaine (euen God the Soueraigne Essence) receiueh diuersitie of formes, effused into feuerall kinds and multitudes of figures; vniting all in the supream head, from whence all excellencies issue. Pyramides.

Most manifest it is, that these, as the rest, were the Regall Sepulchers of the Egyptians. The greatest of the three, and chiefe of the Worlds seven wonders, being square at the bottome, is supposed to take vp eight Acres of ground. Every square being three hundred single paces in length, the square at the top consisting of three stones onely, yet large enough for threescore to stand vpon: ascended by two hundred and fiftie five steps, each step about three feet high, of a breadth proportionable. No stone so little throughout the whole, as to be drawne by our Carriages, yet were these hewen out of the Troian mountaynes, farre off in Arabia, so called of the Captiue Troians, brought by Menelaus into Egypt, and there afterward planted. A wonder how conveyed hither: how so mounted, a greater. Twentie yeares it was a building, by three hundred threecore and sixe thousand men continually wrought vpon: who onely in Radishes, Garlicke, and Onions, are said to haue consumed one thousand and eight hundred Talents. By these and the like Inuentions exhausted they their Treasure, and employed the people, for feare lest such infinite wealth should corrupt their Successors, and dangerous idlenesse beget in the Subiect a desire of innouation. 30

Yet this hath beene too great a morsell for Time to deuoure; hauing stood, as may be probably coniectured, about three thousand and two hundred yeares; and now rather old then ruinous: yet the North-side most worne, by reason of the humiditie of the Northerne wind, which here is the moistest. The top at length we ascended with many pauses and much difficultie, from whence with delighted eyes we beheld that soueraigne of streames, and most excellent of Countries. Southward and neare hand the Mummies: a-farre off diuers huge Pyramides; each of which, were this way, might supply the repute of a wonder. During a great part of the day it casteth no shadow on the Earth, but is at once illuminated on all sides. Descending againe, on the East-side, below, from each corner equally distant, we approched the entrance, seeming heretofore to haue beene closed vp, or so intended, both by the place it selfe, as appeareth by the following Picture, and conueyances within. 40

North moist.

Other Pyramides.

Into this our Ianizaries discharged their Harquebuses, lest some should haue skulkt within to haue done vs a mischiefe, and guarded the mouth whilst wee entred, for feare of the wilde Arabs. To take the better footing we put off our shooes, and most of our apparell: foretold of the heate within, not inferiour to a Stoue. Our guide (a Moore) went foremost: euery one of vs with our lights in our hands. A most dreadfull passage, and no lesse cumbersome; not aboue a yard in breadth, and foure feet in height: each stone contayning that measure. So that alwayes stooping, and sometimes creeping, by reason of the rubbidge, we descended (not by staires, but as downe the steepe of a hill) a hundred feet: where the place for a little circuit enlarged; and the fearefull descent continued, which, they say, none euer durst attempt any farther. Saue that a Bassa of Cairo, curious to search into the secrets thereof, caused diuers condemned persons to vndertake the performance; well stored with lights and other prouision: and that some of them ascended againe wel-nigh thirtie miles off in the Deserts. A Fable deuised onely to beget wonder. But others haue written, that at the bottome there is a spacious Pit eightie and sixe Cubits deepe, filled at the ouer-flow by concealed Conduits: in the midst a little Iland, and on that a Tombe contayning the bodie of Cheops, a King of Egypt, and the builder of this Pyramis: which with the truth hath a greater affinitie. For since I haue beene told by one out of his owne experience, that in the vttermost depth there is a large square place (though without water) into which he was led by another entry opening to the South, knowne but vnto few (that now open 60

open being shut by some order and came vp at this place. A turning on the right hand leadeth into a little roome, which by reason of the noysome sauiour, and vncasie passage wee refused to enter. Clambering ouer the mouth of the aforesaid Dungeon, we ascended as vpon the bow of an Arch, the way no larger then the former, about a hundred and twentie feet. Here we passed 40 through a long entry which led directly forward; so low, that it tooke euen from vs that vncasie benefit of stooping. Which brought vs into a little roome with a compast rooffe, more long then broad, of polished Marble, whose grauel-like smell, halfe full of rubbidge forced our quicke returne. Climing also ouer this entrance, we ascended as before, about an hundred and twentie feet higher. This entrie being of an exceeding height, yet no broader from side to side then a man may fathome, benched on each side, and closed about with admirable Architecture, the Marble so great, and so cunningly ioyned, as had it beene hewen through the liuing Rocke. At the top we entred into a goodly Chamber, twentie foot wide, and fortie in length, the rooffe of a maruelou height; and the stones so great, that eight floores it, eight roofes it, eight
50 flage the ends, and sixtene the sides, all of well wrought Theban Marble. Athwart the roome at the vpper end there standeth a Tombe, vncouered, empty, and all of one stone; brest high, seuen feet in length, not foure in breadth, and sounding like a Bell. In this, no doubt, lay the bodie of the Builder. They erecting such costly Monuments, not onely out of a vaine ostentation: but beeing of opinion, that after the dissolution of the flesh the soule should suruiue; and when thirtie sixe thousand yeares were expired, againe bee ioyned vnto the selfe-same bodie, restored vnto his former condition: gathered in their conceits from Astronomicall demonstrations. Against one end of the Tombe, and close to the wall, there openeth a Pit with a long and narrow mouth, which leadeth into an vnder Chamber. In the walles on each side of the vpper roome, there are two holes, one opposite to another; their ends not discernable, nor 60 bigge enough to be crept into: footie within; and made, as they say, by a flame of fire which darted through it. This is all that this huge masse contayneth within his darke some entrailes: at least to be discovered.

Herodotus reports that King Cheops became so poore by the building thereof, that hee was The Cheops compelled to prostitute his Daughter, charging her to take whatsoever shee could get: who affecting fecting her particular glorie, of her seuerall Customers demanded seuerall stones, with which she erected the second Pyramis; farre lesse then the former, smoothe without, and not to be entered. The third which standeth on the higher ground, is very small if compared with the other; yet saith both Herodotus and Strabo, greater in beautie, and of no lesse cost: beeing all built of Touch-stone; difficult to be wrought, and brought from the farthest Ethiopian mountaines: but surely not so; yet intended they to haue couered it with Theban Marble; whereof a great quantitie lyeth by it. Made by Mycerinus the Sonne of Cheops; some say, by a Curtizan of Naucrētis, called Dorica by Sappho the Poetresse, beloued of her Brother Caraxus, who fraught with Wines, oft sayled hither from Lesbos. Others name Rhodope, another of that Trade; at the first fellow slaue with Esop the writer of Fables: who obtayning her libertie dwelt in this Citie: where such in some sort were reputed noble. But that she should get by whoring such a masse of Treasure, is vncredibile.

Some tell a Storie, how that one day washing her selfe, an Eagle snatcht away her shooe, and bearing it to Memphis, let it fall from on high into the lap of the King. Who astonished with the accident, & admiring the forme, forth-with made a search for the owner throughout all his Kingdome. Found in Naucrētis, and brought vnto him, he made her his Queene, and after her death enclosed her in this Monument. She liued in the dayes of Amasis.

The Colossus.

Plinie taxed.

Not farre off from these the Colossus doth stand, vnto the mouth consisting of the naturall rocke, as if for such a purpose aduanced by Nature, the rest of huge flat stones laid thereon, wrought altogether into the forme of an Ethiopian woman, and adored heretofore by the Countrey people as a rurall Diety. Vnder this, they say, lieth buried the body of Amasis. Of shape lesse monstrous then is Plinies report: who affirmeth, the head to be an hundred and two feet in compasse, when the whole is but sixtie foot high. the face is something disfigured by Time, or indignation of the Moors, detesting Images. The fore-said Author (together with others) doe call it a Sphinx. The vpper part of a Sphinx resembled a Maide, and the lower a Lion; whereby the Egyptians defigured the increase of the Riuer, (and consequently of their riches) then rising when the Sunne is in Leo and Virgo. This but from the shoulders vpward surmounteth the ground, though Pliny giue it a belly, which I know not how to reconcile vnto the truth, vnlesse the sand doe couer the remainder. By a Sphinx the Egyptians in their Hieroglyphickes presented an Harlot, hauing an amiable and alluring face; but withall the tyrannie, and rapacitie of a Lion: exercised ouer the poore heart-broken, and voluntarily perishing Louer.

The Images of these they also erected before the entrances of their Temples; declaring that secrets of Philosophy, and sacred Mysterie, should be folded in Ænigmaticall expressions, separated from the vnderstanding of the prophane multitude.

Five miles South-east of these, and two West of the Riuer, towards which inclineth this brow of the mountaine, stood the Regall Citie of Memphis: the strength and glory of old Egypt, built by Ogdoo, and called Memphis, by the name of his Daughter, compressed (as they saie) by Nilus, in the likenesse of a Bull. In this was the Temple of Apis (which is the same with Osiris) as Osiris with Nilus, Bacchus, Apollo, &c.

But why spend I time about that that is not? The very ruines now almost ruinated, yet some few impressions are left, and diuers throwne downe, Statues of monstrous resemblances, a scarce sufficient testimonie to shew to the curious seeker, that there it had beene.

This hath made some erroneously affirme old Memphis to haue beene the same with new Cairo: new in respect of the other. But those that haue both seene and writ of the former, report it to haue stood three Schoenes aboue the South Angle of Delta, (each Schoene contayning five miles at the least, and sometimes seuen and a halfe, differing according to their seuerall customes) which South-angle is distant but barely foure miles from Cairo. Besides, these Pyramides appertaining vnto Memphis, affirmed to haue stood five miles North-west of that Citie, standing directly West, and full twelue from this. But the most pregnant prooffe hereof are the Mummies, (lying in a place where many generations haue had their Sepulchres) not farre aboue Memphis, neere the brow of the Libyan Desart, and streightning of the Mountaines, from Cairo wel-nigh twenty miles. Nor likely it is that they would so farre carry their dead, hauing as conuenient a place adioyning to the Citie.

These we had purposed to haue seene, but the chargeable guard, and feare of the Arabs, there then solemnizing their festiual, being besides to haue laine out al night, made vs content our selus with what we had heard; hauing before seene diuers of the embalmed bodies, and some broken vp, to be bought for Dollars a peece at the Citie. In that place are some indifferent great, and a number of little Pyramides, with Tombes of seuerall fashions: many ruinated, as many violated by the Moors and Arabians, who make a profit of the dead, and infringe the priuiledge of Sepulchres. These were the graues of the ancient Egyptians, from the first inhabiting of that Countrey; coueting to be there interred, as the place supposed to containe the body of Osiris. Vnder euery one, or wheresoeuer lies stones not naturall to the place, by remoouing the same, descents are discovered like the narrow mouths of Wells (hauing holes in each side of the walls to deſcend by, yet ſo troubleſome, that many reſuſe to goe downe, that come thither of purpoſe) ſome wel-nigh ten fathoms deepe, leading into long vaults (belonging, as ſhould ſeeme, to particular families) hewne out of the Rocke, with Pillars of the ſame. Betweene euery Arch the corſes lie ranckt one by another, ſhrowded in a number of folds of linnen, ſwathled with bands of the ſame: the breſts of diuers being ſtained with Hieroglyphicall Characters. Within their bellies are painted papers, and their Gods incloſed in little Models of ſtone or mettall, ſome of the ſhape of men, in coat-armours, with the heads of Sheepe, Hawkes, Dogs, &c. others of Cats, Beetles, Monkees, and ſuch like. Of theſe I brought away diuers with mee, ſuch in ſimilitude.

30 The Linnen pulled off (in colour, and like in ſubſtance to the inward filme betweene the Barke and the bole, long dried, and brittle) the body appeareth ſolid, vncorrupt, and perfect in all his dimensions: whereof the muſculous parts are browne of colour, ſome blacke, hard as ſtone-pitch, and hath in Phyſicke an operation not vnlike, though more Soueraigne. In the preparing of theſe, to keepe them from putrifaction, they drew out the braines at the noſtrils with an inſtrument of iron, replenishing the ſame with preſeruatiue ſpices. Then cutting vp the belly with an Ethiopian ſtone, and extracting the bowels, they clenſed the inside with wine, and ſtuffing the ſame with a compoſition of Caſſia, Myrrhe, and other odours, cloſed it againe. The like the extreame bitterneſſe, and ſiccative faculty, not onely forthwith ſubdued the cauſe of interior corruption, but hath to this day (a continuance of about three thouſand yeeres) preſerued them vncorrupted. Such is the differing nature of that tree, procuring life as it were to the dead, and death to the liuing. This done, they wrapt the body with linnen in multitudes of folds, be-ſmeared with Gum, in manner of ſcare-cloth. Their ceremonies (which were many) performed

med, they layd the corps in a boate, to be wafted ouer Acherusia, a lake on the South of the Citie, by one onely whom they called Charon, which gaue to Orpheus the inuention of his infernall Ferri-man: About this lake stood the shady Temple of Hecate, with the Ports of Cocytus and Oblivion, separated by barres of brasle, the originall of like fables. When landed on the other side, the body was brought before certaine Iudges, to whom if conuincd of an euill life, they deprived it of buriall; if otherwise, they suffered it to be interred as aforesaid. So sumptuous were they in these houses of death, so carefull to preserve their carkasses, Forso much as the soule, knowing it selfe by diuine instinct immortall, doth desire that the body (her beloued companion) might inioy (as farre foorth as may be) the like felicitie: giuing, by erecting such loftie Pyramides, and those dues of funerall, all possible eternity. Neither was the losse of this lesse 10 feared, then the obtaining coueted.

Returning by the way that we came, and hauing repast the Nilus, we inclined on the right hand to see the ruines of the old Citie adioyning to the South of Cairo, called formerly Babylon, of certaine Babylonians then suffered to inhabite by the ancient Egyptian Kings; who built a Castle in the selfe same place where this now standeth, described before, which was long after the Garrison Towne of one of the three Legions, set to defend this Countrey in the time of the Romanes, and anciently gaue the name of Babylon vnto this Citie below, now called Misrabelech by the Arabians, said to haue beene built by Omar the successor vnto Mahomet; but surely, rather reedified by him then founded, hauing had in it such store of Christian Churches as testified by their ruines. We past by a mighty Cisterne closed within a Tower, and standing vpon 20 an in-let of the Riuer, built as they heare say, at the charge of the Iemes, to appease the anger of the King, incensed by them against the innocent Christians; who by the remouing of a Montaine (the taske imposed vpon their faith) conuerted him vnto their Religion, and his displeasure vpon their accusers. This serueth the Castle with water running along an aquaduct borne vpon three hundred Arches. The ruines of the Citie are great, so were the buildings; amongst which, many of Christian Monasteries and Temples, one lately (the last that stood) throwne by this Bassa (as they say) for that it hindred his prospect: If so, he surely would not haue giuen leaue vnto the Patriarke, to rebuild it; for which he was spitefully spoken of by the Moors, as a suspected fauourer of the Christian Religion, who subuerted forthwith what he had begun. Whereupon the worthy Cerill made a Voyage vnto Constantinople, to procure the Grand Signi- 30 ors Commandement for the support of his purpose, when by the Greeks there, not altogether with his will, he was chosen their Patriarch, but within a short space displanted (as the manner is) by the bribery of another, he returned vnto Cairo. Besides, here is a little Chappell dedicated to our Lady, vnderneath it a grott, in which it is said that she hid her selfe, when pursued by Herod. Much frequented it is by the Christians, as is the Tombe of Nafissa (here being) by the Mahometans.

The few inhabitants that here be, are Greekes and Armenians: Here we saw certaine great Serraglios, exceeding high, and propt vp by buttresses. These they call the Granaries of Ioseph, wherein he hoarded corne in the yeer of plenty against the succeeding famine. In all there be seuen, three standing, and imployed to the selte same vse, the other ruined. From thence vp the Riuer 40 for twenty miles space, there is nothing but ruines: thus with the day we ended our Progresse.

Vpon the fourth of March we departed from Cairo, in the habites of Pilgrims, foure of vs English, consoorted with three Italians, of whom one was a Priest, and another a Physician. For our selues we hired three Camels with their keepers; two to carry vs, and the third for our provision. The price we shall know at Gaza, vpon the diuiding of the great Caruan, answerable to the successe of the iourney. We also hired a Coptie for halfe a Dollor a day, to be our interpreter, and to attend on vs. Our provision for so long a Voyage we bore along with vs, viz. Biscot, Rice, Raisins, Figs, Dates, Almonds, Oliues, Oyle, Sherbets, &c. buying Pewter, Brasle, and such like implements, as if to set vp house-keeping. Our water we carried in Goat skins. Wee rid in shallow Cradles (which we bought also) two on a Camell, harboured aboue, and couered 50 with linnen, to vs exceeding vnease; not so to the people of these Countreys, who sit crosse-legged with a naturall falicity. That night we pitched by Hangia, some foureteene miles from the Citie. In the euening came the Captaine, a Turke, well mounted, and attended on. Here we stayest the next day following, for the gathering together of the Caruan; paying foure Madeins a Camell vnto them of the Village. These as (those elsewhere) doe nightly guard vs, making good whatsoeuer is stolne. Euer and anon one crying Washed, is answered, Elongh, by another (ioyntly signifying one onely God) which passing about the Caruan, doth assure them that all is in safety. Amongst vs were diuers Jewish women: in the extremity of their age vnder-taking so wearisome a iourney, onely to die at Ierusalem, bearing along with them the bones of their Parents, Husbands, Children, and Kinsfolke; as they doe from all other parts 60 where they can conueniently. The Merchants brought with them many Negros; not the worst of their Merchandizes. These they buy of their Parents, some thirty dayes iourney aboue, and on the West side of the Riuer. As the wealch of others consists in multitudes of cattell; so theirs in the multitude of their children, whom they part from with as little passion; neuer after to be be seene or heard of: regarding more the price then condition of their slavery. These are descended of Chus, the Sonne of cursed Cham; as are all of that complexion. Not so by reason of Chams Curse their Seed, nor heat of the Climate: Nor of the Soyle, as some haue supposed; for neither haply, continuing still will other Races in that Soyle prooue black, nor that Race in other Soyles grow to better complexion: but rather from the Curse of Noe vpon Cham in the Posteritie of Chus.

About ten of clocke in the night the Caruan dislodged, and at seuen the next morning pitched at Bilbesb, which is in the Land of Goshen. Paying two Madeines for a Camell, at midnight we departed from thence. Our Companions had their Cradles stricke downe through the negligence of the Camellers, which accident cast vs behind the Caruan. In danger to haue 10 beene surprized by the Peasants, we were by a Spahie that followed, deliuered from that mischiefe. About nine in the forenoone, we pitched by Catara, where we payed foure Madeines for a Camell.

Here about, but neerer the Nile, there is a certaine Tree, called Alchan, by the Arabs, the The tree Al leaves thereof being dryed and reduced into powder, doe dye a reddish yellow. There is yeare-ly spent of this through the Turkish Empire, to the value of fourescore thousand Saltanies. The women with it doe dye their haire and nayles, some of them their hands and feet; and not a few, the most of their bodies tempered onely with Gumme, and laid on in the Bannia, that it may penetrate the deeper. The Christians of Bosna, Valachia, and Russia, doe vse it as well as the Mahometans. Trees also here be that doe bring forth Cottens. The next morning before 20 day, we remoued and came by nine of the clocke to Salbia, where we ouer-tooke the rest of the Caruan: all Christians of those Countries riding vpon Mules, and Asses. Who had procured leaue to set forward a day before; desirous to arriue by Palme Sunday at Ierusalem, (this Caruan staying ten dayes longer then accustomed, because of certaine principall Merchants) but they durst not by themselves venture ouer the mayne Deserts: which all this while wee had trented along, and now were to passe through.

A little beneath is the Lake Sirbonis, called by the old Egyptians the place of Typhons expiation, now Bayrena, diuiding Egypt from Syria. A place to such as knew it not, in those times full of vn suspected danger. Then two hundred furlongs long, being but narrow, and bordered on each side with hils of sand, which borne into the water by the winds so thickned the same, as not by the eye to bee distinguished from the part of the Continent: by meanes whereof 30 whole Armies haue beene deuoured. For the lands neere hand seeming firme, a good way entered slid farther off, and left no way of returning, but with a lingring crueltie swallowed the ingaged: whereupon it was called Barathrum. Now but a little Lake and waxing lesse daily: the passage long since choaked vp which it had into the Sea. Close to this standeth the Mountaine Cassius (no other then a huge mole of sand) famous for the Temple of Iupiter, and Sepulchre of Pompey, there obscurely buried by the pietie of a priuate Souldier, vpon whom hee is made by Lucan, to bestow this Epitaph:

Here the Great Pompey lyes, so Fortune pleas'd
40 To instile this stone; whom *Cæsar*s selfe would haue Interr'd, before he should haue mist a Graue.

Hic situs est magnus, placet hoc Fortuna sepulchrum
Dicere Pompei: quo condi maluit illum Quam terra caruisse Socr.

Who lost his head not farre from thence by the treacherie and commandement of the vngratefull Protomie. His Tombe was sumptuously re-edified by the Emperour Adrian. North hereof lyes Idumea, betweene Arabia, and the Sea extending to Iudea.

The Subassee of Sabia invited himselfe to our Tent, who feeding on such prouision as we had, would in conclusion haue fed vpon vs; had not our commandement (which stood vs in foure Sbariffes) from the Bassa of Cairo, and the fauour of the Captaine, by meanes of our Physician, protected vs: otherwise, right or wrong had bin but a silly plea to barbarous couetousnesse armed with power. We seuen were all the Frankes that were in the company, we heard how hee had 50 serued others, and reioyced not a little in being thus fortified against him. The whole Caruan being now assembled, consists of a thousand Hories, Mules and Asses; and of five hundred Camels. These are the ships of Arabia, their Seas are the Deserts. A Creature created for burthen. Sixe hundred weight is his ordinary load; yet will he carrie a thousand. When in lading or unlading he lyes on his belly, and will rise (as it is said) when laden proportionably to his strength, nor suffer more to be laid on him. Foure dayes together hee will well trauell without water, for a necessitie foureene: in his often belchings thrusting vp a Bladder, wherewith hee moysteneth his mouth and throat, when in a Iourney they cramme them with Barley dough. They are, as some say, the onely that ingender backward. Their paces slow, and intollerable hard, beeing 60 withall vn sure of foot, where neuer so little slippery or vneuen. They are not made to amend their paces when wearie, with blowes; but are encouraged by Songs, and the going before of their Keepers. A beast gentle and tractable, but in the time of his Venery: then, as is remembering his former hard vsage, he will bite his Keeper, throw him downe and kicke him: fortie dayes continuing in that forie, and then returning to his former meeknesse. About their neckes they they hang certaine Charmes included in Leather, and writ by their Dernises, to defend them from mischances, and the poyson of ill eyes. Here we paid five Madeines for a Camell. Having with two dayes rest refreshed them, now to begin the worst of their Journey, on the tenth of March we entred the mayne Deserts, a part of Arabia petrea: so called of Petrea, the principall Citie, now Rathalalah. On the North and West it borders on Syria and Egypt, Southward on Arabia Felix and the Red Sea; and on the East it hath Arabia the Desert: a barren and desolate Countrey, bearing neither Grasse nor Trees, save onely here and there a few Palmes which will not forsake those forsaken places. That little that growes on the Earth, is wild Hysope, whereupon they doe pasture their Camels, a Creature content with little, whose Milke and flesh is their principall sustenance. They have no water that is sweet, all being a meere Wildernesse of sand. The winds hauing raysed high Mountaynes, which lye in Drifts, according to the quarters from whence they blow.

About mid-night (the Souldiers being in the head of the Caruan) these Arabs assailed our Rere. The clamour was great, and the Passengers, together with their Leaders, fled from their Camels. I and my companion imagining the noise to bee onely an encouragement vnto one another, were left alone; yet preserved from violence. They carried away with them diuers Mules and Asses laden with Drugges, and abandoned by their Owners, not daring to stay too long, nor cumber themselves with too much luggage, for feare of the Souldiers. These are descended of Ismael, called also Sarracens of Sarra, which signifieth a Desert, and saken, to inhabit. And not onely of the place, but of the manner of their liues, for Sarrack imports as much as a Thiefe, as now, being giuen from the beginning vnto Theft and Rapine. They dwell in Tents, which they remoue like walking Cities, for opportunitie of prey, and benefit of pasturage. They acknowledge no Soueraigne, not worth the conquering, nor can they bee conquered, retyring to places impassable for Armies, by reason of the rolling sands and penurie of all things. A Nation from the beginning vnmixed with others, boasting of their Nobilitie, & at this day hating all Mechanicall Sciences. They hang about the skirts of the habitable Countries; and hauing robbed, retyre with a maruellous celeritie. Those that are not detected persons, frequent the neighbouring Villages for prouision, and trafficke without molestation, they not daring to intreat them euilly. They are of meane statures, raw-boned, tawnie, hauing feminine voyces, of a swift and noyless pace, behind you ere aware of them. Their Religion Mahometanisme, glorying in that that the Impostor was thir Countyman: thir Language extending as farre as that Religion extendeth. They ride on swift Horses (not misse-shapen, though leane) and patient of labour. They feed them twice a day with the milke of Camels, nor are they esteemed of, if not of sufficient speed to ouer-take an Ostridge. Of those there are store in the Deserts. They keepe in flockes, and oft affrighted the stranger Passenger with their fearefull shreeches, appearing as farre off like a troupe of Horsemen. Their bodies are too heauie to bee supported with their wings, which vselesse for flight, doe serue them onely to runne the more speedily. They are the simplest of Fowles, and Symbols of folly. What they find, they swallow, without delight, euen stones and Iron. When they haue laid their Egges, not lesse great then the bullet of a Culuerin (whereof there are great numbers to be sold in Cairo) they leaue them, and vnmindfull where, sit on those they next meet with. The Arabs catch the young ones, running apace as soone as disclosed; and when fatted, doe eat them, so doe they some part of the old, and sell their skinnies with the feathers vpon them. They ride also on Dromedaries, like in shape, but lesse then a Camell, of a jumping gate, and incredible speed. They will carrie a man (yet vnfit for burthen) a hundred miles a day; liuing without water, and with little food satisfied. If one of these Arabians vndertake your conduct, he will performe it faithfully, neyther will any of the Nation molest you. They will leade you by vnknowne nearer wayes, and farther in foure dayes, then you can trauell by Caruan in fourteene. Their Weapons are Bowes, Darts, Slings, and long Iauelings headed like Partisans. As the Turkes sit crosse-legged, so doe they on their heeles, differing little in habit from the Rustick Egyptians.

About breake of day we pitched by two Wels of brackish water, called the Wels of Duedar. Hither followed the Subassee of Salbeia, with the Jewes which we left behind, who would not trauell the day before, in that it was their Sabbath. Their Superstition had put them to much trouble and charge; as of late at Tunis it did to some paine. For a sort of them being to imbarke for Salonica, the wind comming faire on the Saturday, and the Master then hoysing sayles, loth to infringe their Law, and as loth to lose the benefit of that passage, to coozen their consciences, they hyred certayne Ianizaries to force them aboard, who tooke their money, made a iest of beating them in earnest. At three of the clocke wee departed from thence, and an houre before mid-night pitched by the Castle of Catie, about which there is nothing vegetiue, but a few solitary Palmes. The water bad, inso much that that which the Capitaine drinckes is brought from Tina, a Sea-bordering Towne, and twelue miles distant. Threescore Souldiers lye here in Garrison. We paid a piece of Gold for euery Camell, and halfe a Dollar a piece for Horses, Mules and Asses, to the Capitaine, besides, five Madeines a Camell to the Arabs. It seemeth strange to me, how these Merchants can get by their Wares so far fetcht, and traelling through such a number of expences.

Jewish Superstition.

Fraudes pietatis, rewarded with pie fraudes. Catie.

The thirteenth spent in paying of Capbar, on the fourteenth of March by five of the clocke we departed, and rested about noone by the Wells of Slaues. Hither followed the Gouvernour of Catie, accompanied with twenty horse, and pitched his tent besides vs. The reason why hee came with so slight a Conduct, through a passage so dangerous (for there, not long before, a Caruan of three hundred Camels had bene borne away by the Arabs) was for that he was in fee with the chiefe of them, who vpon the payment of a certaine taxe, secured both goods and passengers. Of these there were diuers in the company. Before midnight we dislodged, and by fixe the next morning, we pitched by another Well of brackish water, called the Wel of the mother of Assan. In the afternoone we departed. As we went, one would haue thought the Sea
 10 to haue bene hard by, and to haue remooued vpon his approaches, by reason of the glistering Nitre. And no doubt, but much of these Desarts haue in times past bene Sea, manifested by the saltnesse of the soile, and shels that lie on the sand in infinite numbers. The next morning by five of the clocke, we came to Arissa, a small Castle, enuironed with a few houses: the Garrison
 15 consisting of a hundred Souldiers. This place is something better then Desart, two miles remo- ued from the Sea, and blest with good water. Here we paid two Madeins for a Camell, and halfe as much for our Asses; two of them for the most part rated vnto one of the other. On the seuenteenth of March, we dislodged betimes in the morning, resting about noone by the Wells of Feare; the earth here looking greene, yet waste, and vnhusbanded. In the euening we depar-
 20 ted. Hauing passed in the night by the Castle Haniones, by the breake of day they followed vs to gather their Capbar; being three Madeins vpon euery Camell. The Countrey from that place pleasant, and indifferent fruitfull. By seuen of the clocke, we pitched close vnder the Ci- tie of Gaza.

And here we will leaue him till our Asian opportunity doth reuiuie vs: returning now to the more Southerly and Westerly parts of Africa, passing from Nilus to Niger. Onely in the way, we will with our Author touch at Malta an African Iland, and with his eyes obserue the rarities there.

§. IIII.

Arriuall at Malta, and observations there.

Now out of sight of Candie, the Winds both slacke and contrary, we were forced to beare Northward of our course, vntill we came within view of Zant, where our Master purposed to put in (since we could not shorten our way) but anon we dis- couered five sailes making towards vs; and imagining them to be men of warre, made all things readie for defence. But to our better comfort, they prooued all English, and bound for 30 England; with whom we consoorted to furnish the ship with fresh water, and other prouisions: they hauing supplied our necessities.

So on the second of Iune being Sunday, we entred the Hauen that lies on the East side of the 40 Citie of Valetta, which we saluted with eightene peeces of Ordnance, but we were not suffe- red to come into the Citie (though euery ship had a neat Patent to shew, that those places from whence they came were free from the infection) nor suffered to depart, when the wind blew faire; which was within a day or two after. For the Gallies of the Religion were then setting forth, to make some attempt vpon Barbarie. The reason thereof, lest being taken by the Pyrats, or touching vpon occasion at Tripoli, Tunis, or Argire, their designs might be by compulsion, or voluntarily reuealed: nor would they suffer any Frigat of their owne, for feare of surprisall, to 50 goe out of the Hauen, vntill many dayes after that the Gallies were departed. But because the English were so strong (a great ship of Holland putting also in to seeke company) and that they intended to make no more Ports: On the sixt of Iune, they were licenced to set saile, the Ma-
 55 sters hauing the night before, in their seuerall long-boats, attended their returne of the great Ma- ster (who had bene abroad in his Gallie to view a Fort that then was in building) and wel- comed him home with one and twenty peeces of Ordnance.

But no intreaty could get me abroad, choosing rather to vndergoe all hazards and hardnesse whatsoeuer, then so long a Voyage by sea, to my nature so irkesome. And so was I left alone on a naked promontory right against the Citie, remote from the concourse of people, without pro- uision, and not knowing how to dispose of my selfe. At length a little boat made towards me, rowed by an officer appointed to attend on strangers that had not pratticke, lest others by com-60 ming into their company, should receiue the infection; who carried me to the hollow hanging of a rocke, where I was for that night to take vp my lodging; and the day following to be con- ueied by him vnto the Lazaretta, there to remaine for thirty or forty dayes before I could be admitted into the Citie. But behold, an accident, which I rather thought at the first to haue been a vision, then (as I found it) reall. My guardian being departed to fetch me some victuals, laid along, and musing on my present condition, a Phalucco arriueth at the place. Out of which there

there slept two olde women; the one made mee doubt whether shee were so or no, shee drew her face into so many formes, and with such anticke gestures stared vpon me. These two did spread a Turkie Carpet on the rocke, and on that a table-cloth, which they furnished with variety of the choycest viands. Anon, another arriued, which set a Gallant ashore with his two Amarosaes, attired like Nymphs, with Lutes in their hands, full of disport and forcery. For little would they suffer him to eate, but what he receiued with his mouth from their fingers. Sometimes the one would play on the Lute, whilst the other sang, and laid his head in her lap; their false eyes looking vpon him, as their hearts were troubled with passions. The attending Hags had no small part in the Comedie, administering matter of myrth with their ridiculous moppings. Who indeed (as I after heard) were their mothers borne in Greece, and by them brought hither to trade amongst the vnmarrried fraternitie. At length, the French Captaine (for such he was, and of much regard) came and intreated me to take a part of their banquet; which my stomacke perswaded me to accept of. He willed them to make much of the Forestier: but they were not to be taught entertainment, and grew so familiar, as was to neither of our likings. But both he and they, in pittie of my hard lodging, did offer to bring me into the Citie by night (an offence, that if knowne, is punished by death) and backe againe in the morning. Whilst they were vrging me thereunto, my guardian returned; with him a Maltese, whose father was an English man, he made acquainted therewith, did by all meanes dehort them. At length (the Captaine hauing promised to labour by admittance into the Citie) they departed. When a good way from shoare, the Curtizans stript themselues, and leapt into the Sea, where they violated all the prescriptions of modestie. But the Captain the next morning was not vnmindfull of his promise, soliciting the Great Master in my behalfe, as he sate in Counsell; who with the assent of the great Crosses, granted me Pratticke. So I came into the Citie, and was kindly entertained in the house of the foresaid Maltese, where for three weekes space, with much contentment I remained.

Description of Malta.

Malta doth lie in the Lybian Sea, right betweene Tripolis of Barbarie and the South-east angle of Sicilia: distant an hundred fourescore and ten miles from the one, and threescore from the other; containing also threescore miles in circuit, called formerly Melita, of the abundance of honey. A Countrey altogether Champion, being no other then a rock couered ouer with earth, but two feet deepe where the deepest; hauing few trees, but such as beare fruit; whereof of all sorts plentifully furnished, so that their wood they haue from Sicilia, yet there is a kind of great Thistle, which together with Cow-dung serues the Countrey people for fuell, who need not much in a Clime so exceeding hot; hotter by much then any other which is seated in the same parallell, yet sometimes tempered by the comfortable winds, to which it lies open. Rivers here are none, but sundry fountaines. The soile produceth no graine but Barley, bread made of it, and Oliues, is the Villagers ordinary diet: and with the straw they sustaine their Cattell. Commis-seed, Annis-seed, and honey, they haue here in abundance, whereof they make Merchandize, and an indifferent quantity of Cotten-wooll; but that the best of all other. The inhabitants die more with age then diseases, and heretofore were reputed fortunate for their excellencie in Arts and curious Weauings. They were at first a Colonie of the Phoenicians, who exercising Merchandize as farre as the great Ocean, betooke themselues to this Iland; and by the commoditie of the Hauen, attained too much riches and honour (who yet retaine some print of the Punicke Language, yet so that they now differ not much from the Moresco) and built in the midst thereof the Citie of Melita (now called old Malta) giuing or taking a name from the Iland. Now whether it came into the hands of Spaine with the Kingdome of Sicilia, or won from the Moores by their swords, (probable both by their Language, and that it belongeth to Africa) I am ignorant: but by Charles the fifth it was giuen to the Knights of the Rhodes.

The order of Knights Hospitallars.

This order of Knight-hood receiued their denomination from Iohn the charitable Patriarch of Alexandria, though vowed to Saint Iohn Baptist as their Patron. Their first seat was the Hospitall of Saint Iohn in Ierusalem (whereupon they were called Knight-hospitallers) built by one Gerrard, at such time as the Holy land became famous by the successfull expeditions of the Christians; who drew diuers worthy persons into that societie, approued by Pope Galasius the second. They by the allowance of Honorius the second, wore garments of blacke, signed with a white crosse. Raymond, the first Master of the Order, did amplifie their Canons; instilling himselfe, The poore seruant of Christ, and Guardian of the Hospitall in Ierusalem. In euery Countrey throughout Christendome they had Hospitals, and Reuenues assigned them, with contributions procured by Pope Innocent the second. They were tied by their voves to entertaine all Pilgrims with singular humanitie; to safeguard their passages from theues and incursions, and valiantly to sacrifice their liues in defence of that Countrey. But the Christians being driuen out of Syria, the Knights had the Rhodes assigned them by the Greeke Emperour, (others say, by Clement the fifth) which they won from the Turke, and lost againe as aforesaid; retiring from thence vnto Malta. There are of them here seuen Alberges or Seminaries, one of France in generall, one of Auerne, one of Prouince, one of Castile, one of Aragon, one of Italie, one of Almany

Almany: and an eight there was of England, vntill by Henry the Eighth dissolved, with what Iustice, I know not. Yet is there one that supplyeth the place in the Election of the Great Master. Of euery one there is a Grand Prior, who liues in great reputation in his Countrey, and orders the affaires of their Order.

Saint Johns without Smith-field; being in times past the Mansion of the Grand Prior of England, an Irish-man liuing in Naples, and reciuing a large Pension from the King of Spaine, now beareth that Title. Those that come for the Order are to bring a testimonie of their Gentry for sixe Descents, which is to be examined, and approued by the Knights of their Nation, he being first to remaine here a yeare for a probation. Nor are women exempted from that dignitie, admitted by a Statute made in the Mastership of Hugo Reuelm, perhaps, for that one Agnis, a noble Ladie was the Author, as they affirme, of their Order; but that there be any now of it, is more then I could be informed. The Ceremonies vsed in Knighting, are these. First, carrying in his hand a Taper of white Waxe, hee kneeleth before the Altar, clothed in a long loose Garment, and desireth the Order of the Ordinarie. Then, in the Name of the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost, he receiueth a Sword, therewith to defend the Catholike Church, to repulse and vanquish the Enemy, to relieue the oppressed, if need should be, to expose himselfe vnto death for the Faith, and all by the power of the Crosse, which by the Crosse-hilt is designed. Then is he girt with a Belt, and thrice strooke on the shoulders with his Sword, to put him in mind that for the honour of Christ he is chearefully to suffer whatsoever is grievous, who taking it of him, thrice flourisheth it aloft as a prouokement to the Aduersary, and so sheathes it againe, hauing wiped it first on his arme, to testifie that thence-forth hee will liue vndefiledly. Then hee that giues him Knight-hood laying his hand on his shoulder, doth exhort him to be vigilant in the Faith, and to aspire vnto true honour by couragious and laudable actions, &c. Which done, two Knights doe put on his Spurres, gilt; to signifie that he should spurne Gold as durt, not to doe what were ignoble for reward. And so goes hee to Masse with the Taper in his hand, the workes of Pietie, Hospitalitie, and redemption of Captiues, being commended vnto him, told also of what he was to performe in regard of his Order. Being asked if he bee a free man, if not ioyned in Matrimonie, if vnuowed to another Order, or not of any profession, and if he were resolued to liue amongst them, to reuenge their iniuries, and quit the authoritie of Secular Magistracie. Hauing answered thereunto, vpon the receipt of the Sacrament, he vowes in this Order, I vow to the Almighty God, to the Virgin Mary his immaculate Mother, and to Saint Iohn Baptist, perpetually, by the helpe of God, to bee truly obedient to all my Superiours, appointed by God and this Order, to liue without any thing of my owne, and withall to liue chastly. Whereupon he is made a partaker of their Priuiledges and Indulgences, granted vnto them by the Sea of Rome. Besides other Prayers, they are commanded to say a hundred and fiftie Pater noster daily, for such as haue beene slaine in their Warres. They weare Ribands about their neckes with Brouches of the Crosse, and Clokes of blacke with large white Crosses set thereinto on the shoulder, of fine Linnen, but in time of Warre, they weare Crimson Mandilions, behind and before so crossed, ouer their Armour.

Their Vow.

They come hither exceeding young, that they may the sooner attayne to a commendam at home, (whereof many be of great value) not got by fauour but signioritie, and are to liue here for the space of five yeares (but not necessarily together) and to goe on foure Expeditions. If one of them be conuicted of a capitall crime, hee is first publicly disgraced in the Church of Saint Iohn where he receiued his Knight-hood, then strangled, and throwne after into the Sea in the night time. Euery Nation doe feed by themselves in their seuerall Alberges, and sit at the Table like Fryers, but such as vpon suite doe get leaue to eat apart, haue sixtie Crownes allowed them by the Religion yearly, as all haue five and twentie a piece for apparell.

Degradation and death.

There are here resident about five hundred, not to depart without leaue, and as many more dispersed through Christendome, who hither repaire vpon euery summons, or notice of inuasion. The Religion is their generall Heire wheresoeuer they dye, onely each Knight may dispose of a fifth part of his substance. There be sixteene of them Counsellors of State, and of principall authoritie, called Great Crosses, who weare Tippets, and Coates also vnder their Cloakes, that be signed therewith. Of these are the Martiall, the Master of the Hospitall, the Admirall, the Chancellor, &c. When one doth dye another is elected by the Great Master and his Knights, who giue their voyces (if I forget not) by Bullets, as doe the Venetians, whereby both enuie and faction is auoyded. Now, if the Great Master fall sicke, they will suffer no Vessell to goe out of the Hauen, vntill hee bee either recovered, or dead, and another elected, lest the Pope should intrude into the Election, which they challenge to be theirs, and is in this manner performed.

Election.

The seuerall Nations elect two Knights a piece of their owne, and two are elected for the English, from amongst themselves these sixteene choose eight, and those eight doe nominate a Knight, a Priest, and a Fryer-servant (who also weares Armes) and they three choose the Great Master, out of the sixteen Great Crosses. This man is a Pickard borne, about the age of sixtie, and hath gouerned eight yeare. His Name and Title, The Illustrious and most Reuerent Prince my Lord

Fryer Alofius, of Wignian-court, Great Master of the Hospitall of Saint Johns of Ierusalem, Prince of Malta, and Goza. For albeit a Fryer, (as the rest of the Knights) yet is he an absolute Soueraigne, and is brauely attended on by a number of gallant yong Gentlemen. The Clergie doe weare the Cognizance of the Order, who are subiect to like Lawes except in military matters.

Valetta,

Saint Hermes.

There are sixtie Villages in the Iland, vnder the command of ten Captaines, and foure Cities. Old Malta is seated (as hath beene said before) in the midst of the Iland, vpon a hill, and formed like a Scutchion: held of no great importance, yet kept by a Garrison. In it there is a Grot, where they say Saint Paul lay when he suffered shipwracke; of great deuotion amongst them. The refined stone thereof they cast into little Medals, with the Effigies of Saint Paul on the one side, and a Viper on the other, Agnus Dei, and the like: of which they vent store to the Foreigner. They say, that being drunke in wine it doth cure the venome of Serpents, and withall, though there be many Serpents in the Iland, that they haue not the power of hurting although handled, and angred; berese of their venome euer since the being here of the Apostle. The other three Cities (if they may all be so termed) are about eight miles distant, and not much without a Musket shot each of other, neere the East-end, and on the North-side of the Iland, where there is a double Hauen diuided by a tongue of rocke, which extendeth no further then the conveniently large entrance. The East Hauen resembleth the horne of a Stag, the first branch (as the Palme) affording an excellent harbour for the greatest shippes, and the second for Gallies; the rest are shallow. Close to the vppermost toppe there is a Fountayne of fresh water, which plentifully furnisheth all Vessels that doe enter. On the tip of the foresaid tongue stood the strong Castle of Saint Hermes, the first that the Turke besieged, which after many furious assaults, twentie thousand Canon shot (whose horrible roarings were heard to Messina) and the losse of ten thousand liues, they tooke in the yeare 1565. in the moneth of Iune, but to the greater glory of the vanquished, that losse rather inraging then dis-heartning the remaynder.

Now vpon the point of the Promontory which lyes betweene these two branches of that Hauen, where the Ships and Gallies haue their stations, on a steepe rocke stands the Castle of Saint Angelo, whose strength appeared in frustrating those violent batteries (being next besieged by the Turke) whereof it yet beareth the skarres. At the foot of the Rocke are certaine Canons planted, that front the mouth of the Hauen. This Castle is onely diuided by a Trench cut through the Rocke, from the Burgo, a little Citie which possesseth the rest of that Promontory, being all a Rock, hewen hollow within, for their better defence; disioyned by a great deep Ditch from the Land. South of this, and on the next Promontory, stands another Towne, which is called, La Isula, on the point thereof a platforme, and at the other end the strong Fort of Saint Michael, yet inferiour in strength to that of Saint Angelo. Here remember we the pietie of a Mahometan, descended, no doubt of Christian Parentage, and fauouring our Religion, who in the time of the strictest siege, and smallest comfort to the besieged, leapt into the Sea, and maugre all the shot that was made at him, swamme to this Castle: where first requiring and receiuing Baptisme, hee made knowne vnto them the secrets of the Enemie, aduised how to frustrate their purposes, and brauely thrust himselfe forward in enery extremitie. But the Knights of the Order assisting one another by their proper valour, so nobly behaued themselves, that the Turke began to despaire of successe, and vpon the rumoured approach of the Christian succours (which in the best construction by the ouer-circumspect Vice-Roy of Sicilia had beene dangerously protracted) imbarqued themselves, and departed. But all, sauing Burgo and Saint Angelo, reduced into powder, and the returne of the Turke distrusted, it was propounded amongst the Knights, to abandon the Iland, rather then vainly to repaire, and endeouour to defend those lamentable ruines, the Aduersaries vnequall power, and backward ayde of the Christian Princes considered. But it too much concerned the state of Christendome, (especially of the Countries confining) it being as it were both the Key and Bulwarke thereof, insomuch that the Pope, the Florentine, and the rest of the Princes of Italy, encouraged them to stay, assisting them with money, and all necessary prouision; but especially the King of Spaine, who ouer and aboue did send them three thousand Pioners, leuyed in the Kingdome of Naples and Sicilia, to repaire their old Fortresses, and begin a new Citie vpon that tongue of Land which diuideth the two Hauens, now almost absolutely finished.

This is called the Citie of Valetta, in the honour of Iohn de Valetta, who then was Great Master. Not great, but faire, exactly contriued, and strong aboue all others, mounted aloft, and no where assailable by Land, but at the South end. The walls of the rest doe ioyn to the vpright Rocke, as if of one piece, and beaten vpon by the Sea. That towards the Land, is but a narrow Isthmos, where the Rocke doth naturally rise, the Ditch without, hewen downe exceeding broad, and of an incredible profunditie, strongly flankt, and not wanting what fortification can doe. This way openeth the onely gate of the Citie, (the other two, whereof one leadeth to Saint Hermes, and the other to the Hauen, being but small Posternes) and hard within are two great Bulwarks, planted on the top with Ordnance. At the other end (but without the wall) stands the Castle of Saint Hermes, now stronger then euer, whereof (as of that Saint Angelo) no French man can be Gouvernour. Almost euery where there are platformes on the

the walls, well stored with Ordnance. The walls on the inside not above sixe foot high, vnim- battald, and sheluing on the outside, the buildings throughout a good distance off both to leaue roome for the Souldiers, and to secure them from batterie. Neere the South end, and on the West side, there is a great pit hewne into the rocke, out of which a Port cut vnder the wall into the West Haven, intended (for yet vnfinished) to haue beene made an Arsenall for their Gallies, (that harbour being too shallow for ships) a worke of great difficulty. The market place is spacious, out of which the streets doe point on the round. The buildings for the most part vniforme, all of free stone, two stories high, and flat at the top; the vpper roomes of most hauing out tarrasses. The Great Masters Palace is a Princely structure, hauing a Tower which ouer-10 looketh the whole Iland. The chamber where they sit in Counsell, is curiously painted with their fights by Sea and by Land, both forraine and defensue. The seuen Alberges of the Knights, be of no meane building; amongst whom the Citie is quartered. Magnificent is the Church of S. Paul, and that of Saint Johns: the one the seat of a Bishop, and the other of a Prior. And Saint Johns Hospitall doth merite regard, not onely for the building, but for the entertain-20 ment there giuen. For all that fall sicke are admitted thereunto, the Knights themselues there lodge when hurt or diseased, where they haue Physicke for the bodie, and for the soule also (such as they giue.) The attendants many, the beds ouer-spread with faire Canopies; every fortnight hauing change of Linnen. Serued by the Iunior Knights in siluer, and euery Friday by the Great Master, accompanied with the great Crosses. A seruice obliged vnto from their first insti-
 20 tution; and thereupon called Knight-hospitallers. The Iesuits haue of late crept into the Citie, who now haue a Colledge a building. Heere bee also three Nunneries; the one for Virgins, another for penitent Whores, (of impenitent here are store) and the third for their battards.

The barrenesse of this Ile is supplied with the fertilitie of Sicilia, from whence they haue their prouision. The Citie is victualed for three yeeres, kept vnder the ground, and supplied with new as they spend of the old. They haue some fresh water Fountaines, and the raine that falleth, they reserue in Cisternes. Besides the Knights and their dependants, the Citizens and I-landers be within the muster of their forces; in which there are not of liuing soules aboue twen-30 tie thousand. They keepe a Court of guard nightly, and almost euery minute of the night, the watch of one Fort giues two or three tolls with a bell, which is answered by the other in or-30 der. The Religion hath onely five Gallies, and stinted they are, as I haue heard, to that number, (if more, they belong vnto priuate men) and but one ship. The custome is, or hath beene, ha-30 uing hung out a flagge, to lend money to all commers that would dice it, if they win, to repay it with aduantage; if lose, to serue vntill their entertainment amounted to that summe. Now the 30 expeditions that they make, are little better then for bootie; sometimes landing in the night
 30 time on the maine of Africa, and surprising some village, or scouring along the coasts, take cer-30 taine small Barks, which disburdened of their lading and people, they suffer to hull with the 30 weather. For they made good profit of their slaues, either imploying them in their drudgeries, 30 (they hauing at this instant aboue fifteene hundred of them) or by putting them to ransome. For 40 euer and anon you shall haue a little boat with a flag of treaty, come hither from Tripoli, Tunis, 40 or Algeirs, to agree for the redemption of captiues, as doe the Malteses to those places who are 40 serued with the same measure. During my abode here, there arriued a Barke, brought in by 40 eight English men, who had for a long time serued the Turkish Pirats of Tunis, they bound for 40 Algeirs, tooke weapons in hand, and droue the distrustlesse Turkes (being twice as many) into 40 the sterne, kept there by two, whilst the other dressed the sailes for Malta. Amongst them there 40 was one, who saying he would neuer be slaue to a Christian, stript himselfe secretly, propping 40 vp his gowne, and laying his Turbant vpon it, as if still there, and dropt it into the Sea. But the 40 deceiuer was deceiued by the high land which seemed neerer then it was, and so wearied with 40 swimming, sunke in their sights. The Inquisition would haue seized both on their persons and 50 purchase, because they had serued the Infidell: but they were protected by the Great Master (be-50 ing desirous to serue him) who will not suffer their cruell authoritie to enter into the new City, 50 so that they are faine to reside in Burgo.

Their Gallies

Their expeditions.

The Malteses are little lesse Tawnie then the Moores, especially those of the Countrey, who 60 goe halfe clad, are indeed a miserable people; but the Citizens are altogether Frenchified; the 60 Great Master, and maior part of the Knights being French men. The women weare long blacke 60 stoles, wherewith they couer their faces (for it is a great reproach to be seene otherwile) who 60 conuerse not with men, and are guarded according to the manner of Italy. But the iealous are bet-60 ter secured, by the number of allowed Curtizans (for the most part Grecians) who sit playing in 60 their doores on instruments; and with the arte of their eyes inueagled these continent by vow, 60 but contrary in practise, as if chastitie were onely violated by marriage. They here stirre early 60 and late, in regard of the immoderate heat, and sleepe at noone day. Their markets they 60 keepe on Sundayes.

The people

Now were the Gallies returned with indifferent successe, and yet my stay was proroged by the approaching festiuall of their Patron; for vntill that was past, no boat would stirre out of the Harbour. The Palace, Temples, Alberges, and other principall houses, were sticke round on the outside with lampes, the evening before: and amongst other solemnities, they honoured the day with the discharge of all their Artillery. The Forts put forth their Banners, and every Alberge the Ensigne of his Nation, at night hauing Bone-fires before them; five great ones being made in the Court of the Palace; whereof, the first was kindled by the Great Master, the second by the Bishop, the third by the Prior, the fourth and fifth by the Marshall and Admirall. On the foure and twentieth of Iune, I departed from Malta in a Phalucco of Naples, rowed by five, and not twice so big as a Wherry, yet will for a space keepe way with a Gally. They vse to set forth in such boats as these, two houres before Sun-set, and if they discover a suspected saile betweene that and night (for the Turkes continually lie there in waite) doe returne againe: if not, they proceed; and by the next morning (as now did we) reach the Coast of Sicilia.

CHAP. I.

A true Relation of Master RICHARD IOBSON'S Voyage, employed by Sir WILLIAM SAINT JOHN, Knight, and others; for the Discouerie of Gambia, in the Sion, a ship of two hundred tons, Admirall; and the Saint Iohn five, Vice-Admirall. In which they passed nine hundred and sixtie miles vp the Riuer into the Continent. Extracted out of his large Iournall.

We set sayle from Grauesend, on Saturday the fift of October, 1620. From Grauesend. On the five and twentieth, we departed from Dartmouth, we sayled from Dartmouth to the Canaries.

The fourteenth of February, we came to an anchor in Tra-uisco Road, where we found three Frenchmen, and one Fleming. Francisco a Portugall here dwelling was busie to enquire if we went to Gambia, hauing a letter as he said from M. Cramp, who had lately departed thence for Sierra Lione, set forth by the Company. This Portugall fearing iust reuenge for the ship taken and men betrayed and murdered by them in Gambia, had procured a Letter in behalfe of some of his friends. In the Riuer of Borsall we entred, where we tooke a small Boat belonging in part to Hector Numez, the principall in that Treachery and Murther aforesaid and detaind some of his goods therein for satisfaction, taking thereof a publike Inuentorie, that if any other could lay iust clayme they might be restored. This was done by punishing Numex, and to terrifie others from like trecherous attempts, not without effect. The Portugals were glad they so escaped, knowing and cursing Numex his villanie. The Portugalls which trade here, and inhabit the Ri-uer are banished men, Renegadoes and baser people, and behaue themselves accordingly.

The general winds.

We built a Shallop, and lanced it the two and twentieth. The next day we set sayle vp the Riuer, and the tyde spent, anchored against a litle Iland on the South-side some foure leagues vp.
From October till May, the winds are generally Easterly, and downe the Riuer which much hindred our course vp the same. We past vp by tydes, intending to stay at a Towne called Tankoronalle, but ouer-shot it in the night, and the next morning were against another Towne foure leagues

Tankoronalle.

- Tindobauge.* leagues higher, called Tindobauge. Our ship with her Ordnance might here come both sides the Riuer.
- Here dwelt Emanuel Corseen a Portugall, which told vs that Master Tomson was killed by one of his Company, and that the rest were in health. It was intended the Sion should stay here, and therefore the Kings Customers were paid, who dwelt some fixe miles from the Riuer, but had his drunken Officers to receiue them.
- The Voyage vp the Riuer.* Leaving her with five and twentie men and boyes. On Wednesday, the nine and twentieth, the Saint Iohn and two shallops, we set sayle vp the Riuer twelue men in the bigger, with Henry Lowe, and thirteene in the lesser with my selfe, which with the Boat towed her vp in calmes.
- Pudding Iland. Maugegar.* On the first of December, we came to Pudding Iland, sixteene leagues from the ship. The second, we anchored against a little Creeke which leads into a Towne Maugegar. We went to this Towne, meeting by the way a Portugall, called Bastian Roderigo, who gaue mee an Ounces skinne. On Munday the fourth, the King with his Alcade came aboard, and drunke himselfe with his Consorts so drunke, that the Customs were deferred till next day. Henry Lowe agreed for a house, and left there Humfrey Davis, Iohn Blithe, and one Nicholas a prettie youth, which two last dyed there. On the seuenth, we passed thence by a Towne on the North-side, called Wolley, Wolley, bigger then any wee had yet seene, and in the after-noone came to an anchor at Cassan (where the Katharine was betrayed) where no Portugall would now be seene. This King is vnder the great King of Bursall. The Alcade shewed vs friendship, and told vs that the Portugals had hired men of that Towne to kill vs as we went vp, in some narrower Strights of the Riuer, for feare whereof we could not get any Blackman to goe with vs to be our Pilot and Linguist. This Towne is populous and after their manner warlike. We here had intelligence, that Salt is a good Commoditie about in the Riuer, and that within eight dayes there would come a Carauan from Tynda for Salt before this place.
- Pomeron. Ieraconde.* On the fourttenth, we came to a Towne on the South-side, called Pompeton, about which dwells no Portugall in this Riuer. Next morning we came to the Port of Ieraconde, two miles from which dwelt Farran a perpetuall Drunkard, but which held his Countrey in greatest awe. Hence Henry Lowe sent a slaue with a Letter to Oranto sixteene miles off, where the English dwelt. On the seuenteenth, Matthew Broad and Henry Bridges came to vs by Land, which were exceeding glad after so long space to see their Countrymen, as we also to heare them report their securitie amongst those wild people. Broad said, much good might bee done vp the Riuer, but that it must be done without delay, the Riuer falling daily. Conming within fixe miles of Oranto we landed and went thither, where Brewer which had beene at Tinda with Tomson, filled vs with golden hopes. But the neglect of bringing Salt thorough ignorance or emulation was a hinderance. The King of Oranto abode on the other side of the Riuer; his name Summa Tumba, a blind man and subiect to the great King of Cantore. We went to him and had a speech made to him of thankfulness, for our Countreymens kind vsage; His answer was repeated by the mouth of another, after the fashion of the Countrey: which Ceremonie done, he made hast to drowne his wits in the Aquanita and good liquor we brought him. His Custome paid, we departed.
- English at Oranto.* The one and twentieth, I sent away my Boat, & the next day came abundance of people; some to sell; all to begge; the King sometimes by his Wife, sometimes by his Daughter, but euery day his Sonnes were there, and likewise diuers others of the better sort, but Count, from many great persons: which word they vse for commendations. You must returne something againe, or it will be ill taken.
- Oranto.* On Christmas day, Ferambra sent vs as much Elephants flesh as one could well carrie, new killed. This Ferambra went foure miles off, and was a friend of our people, and when the Portugals had dealt with the King of Naoy, to kill them all, who sent his forces to performe it, he put himselfe and his people in Armes for their defence, and conueyed them ouer the Riuer to his Brother, called Bo Iohn, and saued their goods. On the one and thirtieth, came the Shallop backe.
- Ferumbra said.* We being ten white men, went the second of Ianuary from Oranto for Tinda: the first tyde we went to Batto, Bo Iohns Towne, and there agreed with a young Marybucke to goe with vs. *Lowe*s emulation hindred vs with delayes, both now and before. On the sixth, Sumaway, King of Bereck vnder the great King of Cantore, came aboard with his Wife, and begged our courtesie. We tooke in Sanguilly, a blacke Boy, who had liued with Master Tomson, and spake prettie English. On the ninth, we anchored in a vast place both at noone and night, where was a world of Sea-horses, whose pathes where they went on shore to feed, were beaten with tracts as great as London high-way. Next morning we anchored at Massamacoadum, fifteene leagues from Pereck. On the eleuenth, at Benauko. The twelfth, after rockie passages to Baraconda. The tyde went no further. Beyond were no Townes, neere the Riuer, nor Boates nor people to be seene.
- Batto.* On the fourteenth, Bacay Tombo, the chiefe man of the Towne, came a board with his wife, and brought vs a Beeffe. We hired another Marybuck, because they are people which may trauell free-
- Sea-horses, high-ways.*

freely: & now were ten white and foure blacke. Hauing now the streame against vs, we durst not for feare of Rockes in the night, nor could for immoderate heat in the Suns height proceed, but were forced to chuse our houres in the morning till nine, and after three in the afternoone. We past by Wolley a small Riuer, and found about shallow waters, wherein were many Sea Horses curuetting and snorting hard by vs, one came swimming by vs dead and stinking, yet the Negros were displeased they might not eate him.

On the seuenteenth, on both sides the Riuer we saw thousands of Baboones and Monkies. A Sea Horse gaue the Boat a shrewd blow, but did no harme. We had still our Canoe before vs to sound the depth.

10 On the eighteenth, we were forced to enter the Riuer naked, very fearefull of the Bumbos, (so they call the Crocodiles) and carry the Boat against the current, and ouer or thorow the sand, heauing and shouing till we come in deepe water.

The nineteenth, we met with a violent current, that all the strength of sixe Oares could preuaile, but a mile in an houre. The twentieth, on the Star-board side, we had Cantore Riuer, which hath a faire entrance, where Ferran Cabo is the great King. On the one and twentieth, we sent a shoare to the Mountaine tops, whence might be perceiued onely Desarts, replenished with terrible wild Beasts, whose roaring we heard euery night. The Blackes are so afraid of the Bumbos, that they dare not put their hands into the water, diuers of them being by them deuoured. Yet did they auoid from vs, whether it were our noise or multitude which caused it.

Some we saw thirty foot long, yet would not come neere vs. On the two and twentieth, wal-

20 king on the banke, I espied sixteene great Elephants together hard by me. A Blacke with me fell a trembling. The sedge in the place was almost as high againe as our heads; so that we could not be seene till we were within Pistoll shot of them. We saw diuers little ones by their sides. We made an offer to shoot, but the Peece would not off, which they perceiuing began to run, in a miles space not so much as turning nor looking behind them; making speed to the Mountaines, like a Deare in the Forrest. The Moors wondred at our aduenture. On the three & twentieth, we were faine to enter the water, & by strength of hand, to carry the boat a mile & a halfe into deeper water. On the foure and twentieth, we towed her, sometimes adding haling by the Boats side, as sholds and trees permitted: and met with one vehement current, ouerthwart broken rockes, so that we were forced to hold her by force, till one taking the Anchor on his neck, waded about that quicke fall, and letting it fall, we haled by our havor, and escaped that gut.

30 The five and twenty, troubled with sholds, we heard as we passed, a gush of water, hidden by the greene trees, with which water we stored our selues; that of the Riuer being so ranke with a muskie sent of the Crocodiles, as we supposed that it was distastefull; whereas this was pleasant. One of our Moors was taken, and like to be lost in a Whirlepoole; notwithstanding, he could swimme well, had not one of our men laid hold on him as he rose the third time, almost spent, from vnder water. On the sixe and twentie, we were comforted with the sight of the hill of Tinda, being high rockie land. We lent three Moors thither with a present to the King, and to Buckor Sano, a Merchant of Tinda, intreating him to come downe to vs with prouision, for we had no flesh. Deare and Fowle were plentifull on both sides the Riuer, had we bene prouided of a good Peece. And the Riuer fish did so taste of Muske, that (like the water) we could 40 not endure the shoare. I went ashaore to view the Riuer, & might see sometimes twentie Crocodiles one by another: and in the night, specially towards breake of day, they would call one to another, much resembling the sound of a deepe Well, and might be easily heard a League. We past the sholds, and against Tinda Riuer, recouered steepe water, and saw many Sea Horses, which loue deepe waters. On the thirtieth, we killed an Anthelope bigger then any Windsore Stagge, the blood of him drew a world of Eagles, and other Fowle; amongst which came one Stalker, a Fowle higher then a man, which we likewise killed. Presently after, came our men backe with Buckor Sano's brother, and a seruant of the Kings, with Hens. Our Deare was killed in good season for their entertainment: the report passing among them current, that with

50 our thunder (so they called our Guns) we could kill whatsoever we would. They much fearing the same, as hauing neuer seene or heard it, whereof we made good vse. On Thursday, the first of February, came Buckor Sano with a troupe of forty people, amongst which his wife and daughter. Hauing tasted of our strong Waters, hee lay drunke aboard that night (he was neuer so after) and was sicke the next day. He gaue vs a Beafe, and many of the people brought Goats, Cocks, and Hens, which we bought easily. On Saturday, we began to trade our Salt, which is the chiefe thing they desired; other things they asked for, which we had not prouided: slaues (he told vs) were the things they held dearest; for any thing else we should haue, if we would maintaine our comming thither, he would prouide it. We had some Elephants teeth, Negros Clothes, Cotten Yearne, and some gold of them. We refused to buy Hides, because we would not lade our Boat downe the Riuer, the water falling euery day, which wee kept note of by the shoare. The people came daily more and more to vs, and vpon the shoare they built houses, we also had a house open to trade vnder, so as it seemed like a pretty Towne. Our Blackes went ouer the Riuer, and three dayes after brought other people, which built a Siege

Towne

Sea-horses bounding in the fresh water, both in the water and on shoare. They are like a horse, but with claws on their feet, and short legs, tuskes, manes, &c. Monkies and Baboones, Crocodiles thirty foot long. Elephants.

Salt, chiefe trade.

Towne on the other side the Riuer. And within three dayes there were five hundred, which were a more Sauage people; hauing breeches of beasts skins, neither had they euer seene any white people before. The women would run and hide themselves when we came neere them at their first comming; but after grew bold to buy and sell with vs. These people likewise were all for Salt, and had Teeth and Hides store. Our Salt was almost gone before they came; for we had but forty bushels at first.

Baiay Dinko was the chiefe man, & called by the name of his Countrey, vnder the great King of Cantor. Iuddies or Fiddlers. He bought and sold &c. for vs.

Baiay Dinko the chiefe was aboard, very desirous we should come againe. On that side wee saw likewise there was Gold, and those people had familiarity with each other, whereby it seemed they had trade and commerce, by some higher part of the Riuer.

On the seuenth, the King of Ielicot on Tinda side, vnder the great King of Wolley, came downe with his Iuddies or Fiddlers, which plaid before him and his wiues, such being the fashion of the great ones. These Iuddies are as the Irish Rimers: all the time he eats, they play and sing songs in his prayse, and his ancestors: When they die, they are put in an hollow tree vpright, and not buried, we gaue him a Present, and he a Beefe to vs.

Nuts of precious esteeme. He seemeth to be the Cola.

On the eighth, Buckor Sano would needs be stiled the white mans Alcaid; I tooke it kindly, and put about his necke a string of Christall, and a double string of Currall. Broad gaue him a siluer chaine, and with drinking a cup of Rosa-solis, and shooting off five Muskets, a solempne cry, Alcaide, Alcaide, was proclaimed: he adding his fiddlers musicke, the people also ready with their bowes and arrowes, his wife with matts on shoare to attend the solemnity. So soone as he came on shoare, he frankely gaue his nuts to the people, reioycing in this new honor. These nuts are of great account through all the Riuer, and are a great fauour from the King: five hundred of them will buy a wife of a great house. Their taste is very bitter, but causeth the water presently after, to taste very pleasant. This done, he went to the Kings house, who sate without doores, their fashion being as soone as it is darke, to make a fire of Reed without doores, and the best sort to haue matts, on which to sit downe, and vse their Ceremonies. He placed me by the King, and went himselfe sixe paces off, right before him, and made a speech, which one repeats after him as he speakes, to intreat his kind vsage to the white men. The King answered with a like speech, giuing vs liberty to shoot any thing on the land, and none should offend vs. Buckor Sano kneeled downe, and gaue him thanks, and sent vnto him in our behalfe the Currall and Christall. Whereupon the King made a long speech, concluding, that he would giue him that land whereon we were, for vs, for euer. Vpon which words, Buckor Sano pulled off his shirt in token of thankfulness, and kneeled downe naked, vntill diuers Marybuckes with their hands raked vp a heape off the ground, vpon which he lay flat with his belly, and couered him with the earth lightly from head to heele. Then with his hands he threw the earth round about amongst vs all: after which, the Marybuckes gathered a round heape againe together, and compassing it with a round ring of the same earth, wrote with his finger as much as the round would containe: which done, Buckor Sano tooke of that earth into his mouth, and put it forth againe, and then taking both his hands full of the earth, and our two Marybuckes following him vpon their hands and knees, they came to me where I sate, and threw it into my lap. This done, he rose vp, and two women were ready with clothes to wipe him, and a third woman with a cloth to fan him, and stepping a little off, he had his best clothes brought him, which he put on, and his sheafe of arrowes about his necke, a bow and an arrow in his hand. He came in againe, and twenty more, with bow and arrowes, after he had gone twice or thrice about, presenting himselfe by drawing his arrow vp to the head, as if he were to shoot, he deliuered them, and sate downe by me. The rest with their bowes and arrowes came one after another, and kneeling at his foot with their faces, from him presented their bowes, as hee did. Then began others to dance after their fashion, at the end whereof they began to make seuerall speeches, (for euery one of the better sort will haue his speech) wherewith we were weary, and left them for that night. Our manner was to set our watch with a Psalme, which they hearing, would be still, and after a shot would leaue vs quiet till morning.

The Countrey giuen to the English.

In this manner the Kings take possession of the lands they came to.

Iron preferred before Gold.

Much Gold.

Combaconda. Tombuto.

I shewed this Buckor Sano a small Globe, and our Compasse, whereupon he told vs that he had seene with his eyes a Countrey Southward, whose houses were all couered with gold, the people wearing iron in rings through their lips and eares, and other places, to which place hee told vs it was foure moones trauell. Hee told vs likewise of a people which hee called Ara-becke, who came vnto this Countrey, and would be at a Towne, called Mombarr, but sixe dayes iourney from Tinda, the second moone after, which was in March. And there was a Town called Iaye, from whence much gold came, but three dayes iourney from Mombarr, whither these Ara-beckes went not. More I might haue knowne, had not the emulations of my companie hindered, who would not suffer the blacke boy to let me know what he speake.

Some people which came to vs, were of Combaconda, a Towne foure dayes iourney thence, which we thinke is Tombuto. A Marybucke was here of Master Tomsons acquaintance, borne in Iaye, which would not company with the people of Tinda, but came to vs, and told vs that many people were comming, but were sent backe by some that returned, and reported our Salt was gone. He offered, if we were past these people, he would vndertake to bring vs to Mombarr and and Gago, We made haste to be gone: for by our marke the water was sunke aboute fixe inches, promising to returne in May, when the water increased. We called this place Saints Johns Mart.

On Saturday the tenth of February, we came away, the wind and streame serued, but wee durst not sayle for the sholds, nor row by night. On Wednesday at night, hauing but three miles to Baraconde, by the Moores intreatie wee went thither ouer Land, and passed easily in fixe dayes downe, what had cost vs twelue dayes labour and trouble. We had a great chase at an Elephant, wounded and made him flie, but lost him in the high sedge, and after found him in the Riuer, where being shot in the eare he turned head on vs, and made vs row off, and leaue him thrice wounded, our Peece failing in the discharge.

Munday the nineteenth, we came to Butto, Bo Johns Towne, wee had out first Marybucke and the blacke Boy which spake English, whose age of fixteene yeares was now ripe for their Circumcision. Hither we came in season for that Solemnitie, hearing before we came, shoutes, Drummes and Countrey Musicke. The Boy knew the meaning, and told vs it was for cutting off prickles, a world of people being gathered for that purpose, like an English Faire. Vnder euerie great tree, and among all their houses at night were fires without doores, and in especiall places dancing, the Muscull Instruments made with Keyes like vnto Virginals, whereupon one playes with two stickes which haue round Balls of leather at the end, about their wrists Iron Bracelets, They are called Ballardes, and contayne some seuentene Keyes. The women for the most part dance with strange bending of their bodies, and cringing of their knees, their legges crooked, the standers by keeping a time in clapping their hands together to grace the dance. If the men dance, it is one alone with such Swords as they weare, naked in his hand, with which he acteth.

About two furlongs from their houses vnder a great tree were many fires, and much drumming with great noyse: here they said were those which were cut, but would not suffer mee to goe see. Some distance beyond we might heare a great roaring noyse, which they fearefully said was the voyce of Hore, that is, after their imposture a Spirit, which approacheth at great Feasts, for whom they prouide store of Rice, Corne, Beeffe, and other flesh readie drest, which is instantly deuoured. And if he be not satisfied, he carries some of their Sonnes (the vncircumcised Females he regards not) and keepes nine dayes or more in his belly, then to bee redeemed with a Beeffe, or other belly-timber: and so many dayes after must they be mute, and cannot be enforced to speake. This seemes an illusion of their Priests to exact Circumcision, and the hoarseness of some shewed, they had lost their throats in that roaring. This roaring, shouting and dancing continued all night. We saw our blacke Boy circumcised, not by a Marybucke, but an ordinary fellow hackling off with a Knife at three cuts his prapuce, holding his member in his hand, the Boy neyther holden nor bound the while. He was carryed to the rest, nor would they suffer our Surgeon to heale him. The people in twentie miles space came in to this Feast with their prouision.

I made haste backe to Setico, to meete the Tinda Merchants, and on the fixe and twentieth, being within two miles of the place, I receiued a great and dangerous blow by a Sea-horse which endangered our sinking, but we made shift to stop it with some losse. We came to Setico foure miles from the water side, the greatest Towne we saw in the Countrey, higher then which the Portugall Trade not, and from hence carry much Gold; the most of the Inhabitants Marybuckes, and the Towne gouerned by one of them, called Fodea Brani. They are stored with Asses and Slaues, their Merchandize Salt. The chiefe Marybucke dying, there came multitudes of people to his Funerall. Of the Graue-Earth digged for him euery principall Marybucke, made a Ball mingled with water out of one pot, which they esteemed as a Relike. They lay all sweet smels they can get into the ground with him, and tooke it kindly that I bestowed some. Much Gold is buried with them, or before by themselves in a priuate place, for their vse in another World. Much singing, or howling, and crying is vsed many dayes about the Graue. This recourse was also to establish his eldest Sonne in his dignitie, to which many Presents are sent. I saw among other beasts one Ramme of a hayrie Wooll like Goats. Sonnes succeed their Fathers, but the Kings Brethren take place before the Sonnes. The sicknesse of our men in the Saint Johns, hastened my departure.

Sunday the eleuenth of March, I returned, and on Wednesday came to the Saint John. The next day, I set forward to the Sion, and on Saturday came to Pompetan, where the Portugall made vs good cheere. Hee told vs of the Devils giuing notice of our beeing in the Riuer, and comming vp, which the circumstances made probable. On Munday, we came to Cassan, a hill where the Sion did ride: the Master and many others dead, and not about foure able men in the Company.

Here we lay from the nineteenth of March, to the eighteenth of Aprill, wee weighed and came the next morning to anchor against Wolley, Wolley, vnder the King of Cassan. Whiles wee were there, came a new King from the King of Bursall to take possession of the Countrey, the old King being elected as the Sonne of a Captiue woman, whereas this was right Heire by both Parents, and now come of age, who now transported himselfe and his over the Riuer, to giue place to this new King, which promised vs all kindnesse.

The twentieth, we came to Mangegar, within a mile of which, euery Munday is a great concourse and market, but miserable Merchandize. The last of Aprill, the Saint Iohn came to vs, and the fourth of May we sayled downe the Riuer together. From May to October, it blowes vp the Riuer except in the Ternado, which comes for the most part South-east. On the eighteenth, we prepared our Shallop. On the nineteenth, we set vp Tents on the shoare. The King of the Countrey called Cumbo, came to vs, and was very kind and familiar, promising all fauour, labours of calking and other businesse, watching and Musketos, which here exceedingly abounded, did much molest vs. On the ninth, wee turned out of the Riuer. Next morning before day, we had a violent storme, or Ternado, with Thunder, Lightning, and exceeding store of raine. This weather is frequent from May to September. Wee put in at Tranisco for Workmen, our Carpenters being dead. Thence we hasted home.

* Translated out of Dutch by G. Artus Dantisc. and the sixth part of De Bry, his Ind. Orient. The Voyage from the Tessel, Nouember the first, 1600. til Ianuary the third, when they arriued at Mourre, I omit.

*A description and historicall declaration of the golden Kingdome of Guinea, otherwise called the golden Coast of Myna, lying in a part of Africa, shewing their beliefe, opinions, traffiquing, bartering, and manner of speech; together with the situation of the Countrey, Townes, Cottages, and Houses of the same; with their Persons and Proportions, Hauens and Riuers, as they are now found out and discovered: all perfectly viewed and curiously discovered, and written by one that hath oftentimes bene there. Translated out of Dutch, conferred also with the Latine Edition, * and contracted.*

§. I.

What course the ships hold which seeke to goe to the Gold Coast of Guinea. Of Cape Verde, and the course from thence.

Each ships as passe by the Ilands of Canadai, must thence (if they will haue traffique at Cape Verde) hold their course South and by East, and South South-east, till they be vnder fifteene degrees, and then seeing no Land, they must hold their course East, till they find Land, and not South because of stormes, which alwayes come from the East, and hauing done at Cape Verde, they must hold their course somewhat South and by West, vntill they be a good way from the Land, or at least without it, for that commonly they can hardly get from the Land, by reason of the stormes, and the wind that comes out of the Sea, which alwayes driueth them to the Land, whereby commonly men are neerer to the Land, then oftentimes they thinke they are. And those that meane also to traffique on the Coast of Manigette, when they are about the Bassis of Rio grande, then they must seeke to get to the Land, that they may enter into Sierra Leona, and other Riuers, there to make their profit, and all along the Coast in other Riuers and Townes, vntill they come to Cape de las Palmas, and then they must take their course along by the Cape de tres puntas. But they that desire not to goe neerer to Cape Verde, or the Graine * Coast, but only seeke to goe right forth, to the Gold Coast of Myna, hold their course by the Ilands of Canaria, and sayle Southward, vntill they haue past by the Ilands of Cape Verde, leauing them commonly on Bagh-boord, or as the wind serueth them, being vnder ten, nine, or eight degrees, then they begin to make towards the Land, and to hold their course South and by East, and by the same course to seeke to get about all Bassis and shallowes, without altering their course, for they that fall vpon Saint Annes shallowes, lying vnder sixe degrees, haue much labour and pain before they can get off from them again; and on the other side they lose a great deale of time, oftentimes thinking that they are off from the shallowes, when their ship is still vpon them, which is because it is no continuall shallow, but full of deepe pits: for in one place you shall haue three fathome deepe, and then againe ten fathome, and then againe, the streame driues you still to Land, so that many men by meanes of their negligence know not what to do, and are put to much trouble before they can bring their Voyage to an end. Now, sayling further, and comming vnder seuen and sixe degrees, there commonly you find calmes, specially, when it Sierra Leona. & las Palmas.

* The Graine Coast, is Manigette, so called of a kind of Grape. Baixas de S. Anna.

it is not a time of Trauadoes, which is in Aprill, May, and Iune, whereof men are in great feare. It fell out so with vs, that beeing vnder those highthes, we were twentie dayes driuing in a calme, without winning any great highth, and that which we wonne with the Current, the next day we lost it againe with a contrary wind; so that you must beware of the Land in any hand, specially, those that goe to Brasilia, for they must take heed, not to goe too neere the Land, lest the calme taketh them: I once found a ship thereabouts, which thought to sayle to the Bay, de Todos los Santos, and thinking that the streame draue him vpon the Coast of West India, fell there vpon the Graine Coast, so that hee was forced to goe backe againe, and beeing not able to fall into his right course, hee was constrained to leaue it, and in stead of sayling to Brasilia, he was forced to goe to Saint Thomas, so that vnder those highthes, you can doe nothing with the wind, but onely by the current, which alwaies runnes East with the bough.

They that sayle to East India, also shunne this calme as much as possible they may, to get a-boue the sand, or rife of Brasilia, for otherwise they must whether they will or not, goe to Cape Toxes Gonsalues, and then sayle along vnder the Equinoctiall Line, at least three or foure hundred miles, before they can get againe into their right course, as it happened not long since to some of our ships, which was a great hinderance vnto their Voyage, further hauing past this calme, and towards the Land about Cape de las Palmas, or to some other places, which you know, then you must hold your course along by the Land, but no neerer to the Land then eight and twentie fathomes deepe, till you come to Cape de tres punctus, where the Golden Coast begins, and where the Hollanders traffique with the Negroes.

20 First, passing the River of Senega, you begin to draw neere to Cape Verde, which is a piece of Land easily to be knowne, for the first point sheweth it selfe with two hillockes or houels, and lyeth farre into the Sea, and on both the North and South-side thereof loseth the Land, but Southward from the point, about halfe a mile from the Land, there is an Iland seene, whereon many Fowles breed, and great numbers of Egges are found therein, behind this Iland there lyeth a great Rocke, a little separated from the Land. This Iland is very vnfit to rayse shallops on, you may sayle betweene the Land and this Iland, with a ship of three hundred and twentie tuns, but not without great feare, for that there are many Rockes lying vnder the water, but for the best securitie of ship and goods, it is better to sayle on the West side of the Iland to the other Iland, where shallops may be set together, which you may see being right against the first Iland, lying about three miles Southeast from the other: these Ilands are not inhabited, and there is nothing to be had in them but great store of ballast and wood to burne, but for that there is a conuenient Valley to make shallops in, therefore those places are much vsed, and are the cause that many ships sayle to them, but on the firme Land there are great store of Negroes inhabiting, which traffique with all Nations.

The Countrey people goe naked, only that they hang a piece of Linnen cloth before their priuie members, but their Gouernours (as Captaines and Gentlemen) are better apparelled then the common sort of people, and are well knowne by their Garments to be such. They go in a long Cotton Garment close about them like a womans smocke, full of blue stripes, like feather bed tikes, on their armes they weare many foure-cornerd leather bagges, all close ioyned together, and the like vpon their legges, but what is within them, I know not, because they will not let vs see. About their neckes they weare Beads made of Sea-horse Teeth, and some Corals, or Beades which wee bring them, on their heads they weare Caps of the same stuffe that their clothes are, they are people that are very industrious and carefull to get their liuings, their chiefest Trade is Husbandry, to sowe Rice and Corne: their great riches is in Cowes, which there are very scant and deare, but further into the Countrey there are great store, for that men lade whole ships full of Salt hides at Porta dallia, which they take in exchange or barter for Iron, which place lyeth but seuen or eight miles from Cape Verde. They make very faire Iron worke, and in that Countrey, there is great store of Iron spent, specially faire long barres, whereof they are as curious as any man in the World can be, those they vse to make Instruments of, wherewith to fish, and to labour vpon the Land, as also to make weapons, as Bowes, Arrowes, Aponers; and * Assagayen they haue no knowledge of God, those that traffique and are conuersant among strange Countrey people, are ciuiller then the common sort of people, they are very greedie eaters, and no lesse drinkers, and very lecherous, and theeuish, and much addicted to vncleanenesse: one man hath as many wiues as hee is able to keepe and maintaine.

The women also are much addicted to lecherie, specially, with strange Countrey people, of whom they are not ialous, as of their owne Countrey people and Neighbours; their Religion is after the manner of Mahomets law, for circumcision and such like toyes. They are also great Lyers, and not to be credited, the principall Commodities that men traffique for there, are Hides, Amber-greece, Gumme of Arabia, Salt, and other wares of small importance, as Rice, Graine, Teeth, and some Ciuet. The Portugals also dwell there, with other Nations, wherewith they may freely traffique, because they are not subiects to the King of Spaine; and besides, that they are not Masters of the Countrey, and haue no command but ouer their slaues. The Negroes are vnder the command of their owne Gouernours, which are called Algaier in their Language, which is a Captain of a Village, for euery Village hath his feuerall Algaier, and when Note.

Melli.

Leauing Cape Verde, to saile to the Golden Coast of Myna, the course is best (if the wind will serue) along by the land, to the place where you will Trafique, and deale with the Negros: from Cape Verde to Rio de Gambia, it is fife and twenty miles, from Rio Gambia to the Baixas of Rio Grande thirty miles, from thence to Sierra Liona, threescore miles; there is a good place to lie in the Winter time, for in the entrie of the Riuer you haue fife fathome deepe at the least, 10 and so for the space of fourteene miles going South-east, towards the Roade, you haue sixteene, fourteene, twelue, ten, and eight fathome water: from the Riuer of Sierra Liona, to Rio de Galinas, (that is, the Riuer of Hens, because there arne many Hens, and very good cheape, at a Mefken a peece) forty miles, from Rio de Galinas to Cape de Monte eighteene miles, the land of Cape de Monte reacheth South-east, and by South, it is a low land, but the Cape is high land, like a hill, or like a horse necke, with a falling in: from Cape de Monte, to Cape dos Baixas, fiftie miles; from Cape de Bassis to Cape de das Palmas, fiftie miles. These are the three principallest Capes of all the gold Coast; this Cape lieth vnder foure Degrees, and is the furthest land of all the Coast, which reacheth towards the Equinoctiall line, all the land for the most part lieth South-east, and North-west, low ground, sometimes rising, but no high hills to be seene inward 20 to the land; from Cape das Palmas, to Cape de Apollonia, and so to Cape de tres Punctus sixtie miles, from Cape de Monte, to Cape de Miserade, *sixteene miles (this Cape is a high land) from Cape de Miserade to Rio de Ceste, foure and twentie miles, all along hither to you, haue good Anchor ground at twelue fathome, the West point is rising land, like to a hill that riseth and sheweth it selfe within the Countrey, when you are North) from it you are then right against Rio de Cestes, before in the mouth of the Riuer, there lieth a small Island, and the Village where you Traffique, lieth a mile vpwards within the Riuer. From Rio de Cestes to Cape das Baixos fife miles, this Cape sheweth like a saile, and it is a white Rocke which lieth out into the Sea, being two miles from the Cape you saw, foure and thirty, and fife and thirty fathome water, good Anchor ground, you may hold your course along by the land at two and thirty, 30 three & thirty, and foure & thirty fathome deepe; but go no neere if you desire not to go to the gold Coast, because of stormes, with a wind out of the Sea, as also because of Rockes, and foule ground, that are, and is found to be there, which will rather hurt, then doe you good. From Cape de Bassis to Sanguin three miles, there is much Graine to be bought, and good Traffique to be made. From Sanguin to Bosoe a mile and a halfe, there also is Traffique; from Bosoe to Sertres two miles, there also you may Traffique, and it is a good place: from Sertres to Botowa two miles, it is also a good place to Traffique in: from Botowa to Synno, fife miles. There also is Traffique; from Synno to Sonweroboe three miles, from Sonweroboe to Baddoe two miles, from Baddoe to Cron two miles; from Cron to Wappa foure miles; from Wappa to Granchetre two miles: This the French men call Paris (from Granchetre to Goyana, foure miles, thither there commeth great store of Graine to sell, and it is a good place to Traffique in with the Negros, 40 from Goyana to Cape de das Palmas three miles, all this from Cape Verde to Cape de das Palmas is called the Graine or golden Coast (otherwise Mellegette) wherein the Kingdome of Mellie is contained, which by vs that are the Netherlanders is called the Graine Coast: but by others it is called the Coast of Mellegette: This Kingdome of Mellie hath an other Kingdome vnder it, called Bitonni, which lieth not farre from Rio Cestes.

The Kingdome of Mellie is rich of Corne, Graine, Rice, Cotten, and Flesh, and some Elephants, where by they sell many of their teeth vnto strangers. The inhabitants are mischieuous and cruell, (yet better in one place then in another) alwayes seeking to spoile and intrap strangers, that come thither, and cruelly to murder them; but some Countrey-men are better welcome vnto them then others, and those are Frenchmen, because of their long Traffique 50 into those Countreys. The Portugalls come very little thither, one Countrey men are better entertained in one place then in another, & that by reason they haue sometimes swaggred there abouts, and for that cause the Negros seeke to be reuenged. The greatest Traffique here is Graine, Teeth, and some Rice; other Wares that are there to be had cannot be bartered for in any great quantity, as gold and Teeth, for there is little to be had, but other necessities for sustenance of man, are there reasonably to be had, and wine of Palme, which they draw out of the trees, is there very delicate, exceeding sweet, and as excellent as any can be found in those Coasts. The Inhabitants are subiects to their Captain, whom they call Taba, and are very submis- 60 sive and ready to obey his commandement. The Kings or Captaines of their Villages, are very graue, and rule with great seueritie, holding their subiects in great subiection. Their Language differereth in the one place from the other: but most of them speake a little French, by reason, that they are vsed to deale much with the French men, and so get some part of their speech, as they on the gold Coast also doe, who likewise speake a little Portugall, by reason also that the Portugalls in times past vsed to Traffique much there. They are very expert in husbandry, as to some some Graine, wherewith they haue a great Traffique, they are also very cunning, and fine workmen to make many fine things; specially, very faire Canoes or small Scutes, wherewith they also rowe into Sea, which they cut out of a whole tree (like to a Venetian Goudel) which are very swift to goe; the men haue as many wiues as they can maintaine, but they keepe them very short, and lobke neere vnto them. They are likewise very lealous of their wiues: for if they perceiue that any of their wiues haue plaid false with them, they will seeke great reuenge against the partie that hath done them the wrong, and will make warre vpon him, and for that cause, raise all their Countrey, so that the women are not here so common, as on the golden Coast of Mina, and else where. Passing further from Cape dás Palmas, you find many Riuer, 10 where you may barter for great store of Teeth, to Cape de Tres Punetas, and for that cause it is called the tooth Coast.

Passing Cape de Apolonia, (which lieth betweene Cape las Palmas, and Cape de Tres Punetas) five miles further: there lieth a small Castle, but not strong, which is held by the Portugalls, the Village is called Achombene, and the Castle Ariem, there many Negros dwell, but come seldom aboard our ships that lie there at Anchor, which the Portugalls forbid them to doe. Thus you haue read the Description of the Graine or gold Coast, as also the Tooth Coast, and now you shall read of the Coast of Mina. * And first of the Iron people in this golden Coast.

§. II.

How they marrie each with other, and what goods their Fathers giue with their Children; their House-keeping together; the womans lying in; education of their Children: Their proportions, industrie and conditions.

When their children begin to attaine to yeeres of discretion, and are able to be married to a wife, Then the father seeketh out a wife for his Son, which he thinks wil like his Son well, and yet he neuer saw, nor knew her before, & without wooing each other. Who being thus brought together, the Father giueth nothing at all with his son towards household; but if he hath gotten any thing himselfe, by fishing or carrying Merchants aboard the ship, that is his owne to begin household withall. But the Brides friends, giue the value of fourteene Gulderns in gold with their daughter, for their marriage good; which is to be vnderstood, that if they be any thing worth, then the Father giueth his daughter a Peso and a halfe of gold, and the mother halfe a Peso of gold: which after our reckoning altogether, is halfe an ounce of gold Troy weight, which they giue them to buy wine de Palma, to keepe their Bridall withall: for she hath nothing else, but that which her Father and Mother giueth her, for she getteth nothing in her youth, as her husband did. And if it be a Kings sonne or daughter, they also giue no more with them to their marriage; for it is a common custome with them to giue no more with their daughters in marriage, then they giue them as a liberalitie, but when they goe to keepe house, they giue them a slaue to serue them. Besides this, the Bride in the presence of her friends which come to the Banquet, maketh a promise, and sweareth, to be true to her husband, and not to vse the bodily company of any other man; but the man taketh no such oath, but is free thereof.

Provision of a wife.

Portion.

Rites of marriage.

Now, if she chanceth to commit whoredome with an other man, either willingly or against her will, and that her husband heareth thereof, then he must put her away for it; and the man that hath committed the act, shall forfeit to the King foure and twenty Pesos (which after our account is nine ounces) of gold. But if it be a Dutch man, he payeth no fine, because he is a stranger, and knew not whether the woman was married or not, which excuseth him: yet the fault is laid vpon the woman that hath done such an offence, and she must pay to her husband foure Pesos, or halfe an ounce of gold, because she committed adultery with another man. If she hath gotten any thing; but if she hath nothing, and cannot pay the fine to her husband, it excuseth her not: for if he hath no great fantasie to his wife, or that they haue little affection one vnto the other; if he will, he may put her away from him, and as then the band of Matrimonie is broken betweene them, and he may take an other wife when he will.

But if he cannot learne that his wife hath committed such a fact, by information of other men, but presumeth it of himselfe, or suspecteth that his wife hath laine with any other man, he chargeth her with it, and making her eate certaine Salt, vseth other Ceremonies of their Idolatrous Fetissos, wherewith the woman knowing her selfe to be cleere, and not to haue committed adultery with an other man, willingly taketh her oath. But knowing her selfe to be faulty, she dare not take her oath fearing, that if she should forswear her selfe, her Fetisso would make her die, whereby oftentimes the wife discouers her owne offence, and procureth the means to moue her husband to be deuorced from her, which chiefly hapneth, by meanes of the Ielousie; which the man hath of his first wife, for it causeth a great hatred and contention betweene them, because it is a great scandall vnto him, and oftentimes there groweth so great strife about it, that he seeketh to murder the man that doth the fault, and although he hath paid the fine imposed vpon him, the married man hath the Priuiledge to driue him out of the Towne.

Polygamy.

Further, when they keepe house together, if the man beginneth to thriue, and hath meanes to buy an other wife, he may not buy her without the consent of his first wife, vnlesse he were at controuersie with her, and put her away, for some thing that he could charge her withall; but with her good will he may buy another. He giueth his first wife sixe Englishen of gold, or two, three, foure or five, as much as he can get, or hath need of, keeping his other wife for his slaue, or to serue him, or for his Etigufou, or in our Language, his Whore or Concubine, to whom he beareth not so great affection, nor is not so iealous of her, as of, and to his wife, and those serue for euery man, for he may complaine of no man for her, nor cause him to pay any fine for her. His first wife waxing old, and her mind being not so much addicted vnto lust, if he perceiueth it, then he cleaueth to his yonger wife, to haue his pleasure with her, and euer after esteeming most of her, maketh his old wife doe the household worke, giuing her meat and drinke as long as she liueth, and putteth her not away, but she is forced to serue the yong wife, and shall neuer trouble her selfe with any thing, but onely to eate and drinke well, to haue a care to please her husband, and to doe whatsoeuer he commandeth.

Although a man hath as many wiues as he is able to keepe, yet all are not of one, but of severall ages, the one yonger then the other, that they may be the better serued by their wiues. For when the eldest can doe no more for age, (that he may not want worke) and that the yongest wiues might doe him more pleasure, they make most of the yongest; and euery wife dwelleth in a house by her selfe, although he had ten wiues, as many of them haue. The wife keepes her husbands money, and when he needeth any, he fetcheth some of her. They eate not one with the other, but either of them alone by themselves; the husband eateth with one of his companions that he dealeth with, or with whom he goeth to Sea: his wiues also eate with their friends or neighbours, euery one bringing their meat with them, and so make good cheare together, and at euening, the women goe home to their houses againe, and are together but in the day time. The man and wife lie each of them in a severall roome, at night, spreading a mat vpon the ground, and lay a wooden stoole vnder their heads, in stead of a pillow, and then making a little fire of wood, when it burneth they lie downe, with the soles of their feet before it, that the heat thereof might draw out the cold, which they by day haue drawne vp into them from the earth (by going bare-footed, esteeming it to be very good for them, which we must also acknowledge. Now, when he hath a desire to vse any of his wiues, either he calleth or fetcheth her, and that night helieth with her, & the next day, she goeth to her house againe, where she dwelleth, not once making any of the rest acquainted, what she did that night, or that her husband lay with her; for then they would be too iealous.

Child-birth.

Being with child, when their time of deliuerance, and bringing forth of their child into the world commeth, when she is in labour, both men, women, maids, yong men & children, run vnto her, and she in most shamelesse manner, is deliuered before them all. I would say much more hereof, but in respect of the credit of women, I will leaue it. When the child is borne, she goes to the water to wash & make cleane her selfe, not once dreaming of a moneths lying in, nor of making Caudles of Ipocras, and other wines, as women here with vs vse to doe: they vse no Nurfes to helpe them when they lie in child-bed, neither seeke to lie dainty and soft; but they presently take a spoonefull of Oyle, and a handfull of Manigette or Graine, whereof they make a drinke, and drinke it vp.

Names.

The next day after, they goe abroad in the streets, to doe their businesse, as other women doe. They giue their child such a name, as they thinke good to themselves, and blesse the same with their Fetisses, and other witchcrafts, and when time serueth, circumsise both boyes and girles: at which time they make a great feast, whereof they make great account. But where the women are most shamelesse at the time of the birth of their children, the men in three moneths after, lie not with that wife, nor once haue the vse of her body, which neuerthelesse, I thinke they doe not, for any shame or regard that they haue, to deale with that woman, but onely because they haue other wiues enough. They take the yong child as soone as it is borne, and wrapping a cleane cloth about the middle thereof, lay it downe on a mat vpon the ground, and not in a cradle, and there let it turne and sprawle about, and doe what it will, and when it is two or three moneths old, the mother ties the child with a peece of cloth at her backe, and so lets it hang there, as the high Dutches wiues vse to follow their husbands in the warres. When the child crieth to sucke, the mother casteth one of her dugs backward ouer her shoulder, and so the child suckes it as it hangs. The women goe vp and downe from place to place, and still carry their children in that sort, as lightly, as if they had nothing at their backes, the childs head lies iust vpon her shoulder, and so she goes shaking of the child most pitifully to behold, whereby we wondered that they brake not the childs ioyns, by bearing them in that sort, being so young, and yet you find very few or no lame persons in those Countreys. They teach their children

dren to goe very young, for they make no reckoning thereof, and suffer them to creepe and runne abroad when they are very little, and teach them to speake very soone, whereby you find many children there among them that can both goe and speake ere they bee a yeare old, and some of them speake so plainly, that you may vnderstand what they say in their Language, for they speake and goe farre sooner then our children doe, which we wondred at, besides this, they are strong, fat and well disposed, whereof we will speake hereafter in another place.

- The children being a moneth or two old, then they hang a Net about the bodie thereof, like a little shirt, which is made of the barke of a tree, which they hang full of their Fetisses, as golden Croffes, strings with Corall about their hands, feet, and neckes, and their haire is filled full of shels, whereof they make great account, for they say, that as long as the young childe hath that Net about him, the Deuill cannot take nor beare the child away, and leauing it off, the Deuill would carrie it away, for they say, the childe being so little, it would not bee strong enough to resist the Deuill, but hauing that Net vpon the bodie, it is armed, and then the Deuill hath no power ouer it; the Corals which they hang about the child, which they call a Fetisso, they esteeme much, for that hanging such a Fetisso about the childes necke, they say, it is good against vomiting; the second Fetisso, which they hang about his necke, they say, it is good against falling the third, they say, is good against bleeding; the fourth, is very good to procure sleepe, which; they hang about the necke thereof, in the night-time, that it may sleepe well; the fift, is good against wild beasts, and the vnwholsomenesse of the Aire, with diuers other such like Fetisses, each hauing a name a-part, to shew what vertue it hath, and what they are good for, and they credibly beleue them to be good against vomiting, falling, bleeding, (which they presently helpe) and for sleeping, they feed their young children with all kind of grosse meates, almost from the first, for when they leaue suckling (they suffer them not to suck long) then they beginne to learne the childe to eate of their grosse meates, and to drinke water; when they be vsed thereunto, then they take little heed to them, but beate the children lying downe in their house, like Dogges, rooting in the ground like Hogges, whereby it falleth out that the young children soone learne to goe.
- Euery woman bringeth vp her owne children, and each child knoweth the Mother, and remaineth with her, vntill the Father either buyeth it of her, or that it goeth away from the Mother, it oftentimes falleth out, that the Husband taketh the child from the Mother, & selleth it to other men for a slaue. When they begin to goe, they presently learne to swimme, and to runne into the water, and when they are first borne they are not blacke, but reddish, as the Brasilians are; and then by little and little begin to be blacke, and at last, to bee as blacke as Pitch, and growing bigger, run vp and downe like Sauage men, Boyes and Girles together, fighting one with another, taking each others meate from them, and from their child-hood vpwards, begin to be enuious one against the other, and so grow bigger and exercise all kind of villanie and knauerie, their Parents not once teaching them any ciuilitie, nor shewing them what they should doe, suffering both Boyes and Girles to goe starke naked as they were borne, with their priuie members all open, without any shame or ciuilitie.
- They vse to beate and chasten their children most cruelly, striking them with great staues, in such sort that we wondred that they did not breake their bones, which they doe not, but for some great cause (whereby their children respect them much) and for that they beate them cruelly, so that they doe not easily forget it. Other good Discipline they teach them not, but they grow vp like wild trees: hauing spent their time thus vnciuilly, and beginning to be eight, ten, or twelue yeares old, then their Parents begin to instruct and teach them to do some thing, and to labour with their hands, the Fathers teach their Sonnes to spinne Thred made of barkes of Trees, and to knit Nets, which hauing learned they goe to Sea with their Fathers to fish, and when they know how to rowe, and to guide a Boat, then two or three Boyes will goe out together in a Canoe or Almadia to fish, and that which they take they carrie to their Parents for food, but when they are eightene or twentie yeares old, then their Sonnes beginne to deale for themselues, and leaue their Fathers, and go and dwell two or three of them together in a house, buying or hyring a Canoe, (which is one of their Boats) and therewith goe to Sea together, and what fish they get they sell for Gold, first, keeping as much as serueth for food for themselves, with that they sell, they buy a fathome of Linnen cloth, which they hang about their bodies, and betweene their legges, wherewith they couer their priuie members, for then they begin to be shame-faced; whence they proceed furtlier and beginne to deale and traffique with Merchandize, and to carrie it aboard the ship in their Canoes, and serue Merchants to carry them to and from their ships, and so learne to deale with Gold, and to get some thing. After that, beginning to be amorous, and to looke after young Wenches, then they are esteemed to bee men, which when their Fathers perceiue, they looke them out Wiues, and then they marrie, which they doe very young, so that in those Countries, Children get Children. Touching the Girles, they also begin to worke, and that some-what sooner then the Boyes, they learne to make Baskets, Mats and straw Hats of Greene Rushes, which they fold with their hands, they also learne to make Caps, Purfes, and apparell made of barkes of Trees, dyed with all kinds of colours, lours, most cunningly done, as if they were fastened together with cords, much to bee wondred at, they also learne to grind their Corne or Millia, and thereof make Bread, which they goe and sell for their Mothers, and bring them the money to buy other meate withall, and whatsoever they get, they giue it to their Mothers, who for that (when they marrie) giue them some gift, as I haue said before. In this sort the Girles begin to labour, and to learne to doe household worke, wherein according to their manner of house keeping, they are very curious, and exceed the men in cunning workmanship.

Their limbes and members.

Long nailes, a signe of idle Gentrie.

The men in those Countries are of a very good proportion, with faire members, strong legs, and well-shaped bodies, which is easily to be seene, for that they goe almost naked of their bodies, they haue round faces, and no great lips, nor wide mouthes, as the Barbarian Moores haue, but their Noses are flat, which they make flat when they are young, for they esteeme a flat Nose to be a great ornament vnto them, and to say truth, it doth not amisse in them, for that according to the proportion of bodie, it beautifieth their faces: their eares are small, their eyes white, their eye browes very great, white teeth in their mouthes, (for they keepe their teeth very cleane, scouring them with small stickes, and thereby make them very smooth, and shining like Iuorie) they haue little beard, and are at least thirtie yeares of age, before they haue any. They haue broad sholders, thicke armes, great hands, and long fingers, and let their nailes grow very long, which they keepe very cleane with scraping, for some of them let them grow as long as the ioynt of a mans finger, which they esteeme for a great ornament, for that cause thinking themselves to be Gentlemen. The Merchants also that dwell within the Land, vse those long nailes for a great shew, for they keepe them as white as Iuorie, by scraping them, and againe they haue good vse for them, for that sometimes when they haue not a Spooone by them, and that they vntie their Purfes to weigh Gold, and wanting a Spooone to take it out, for haste they vse their long nailes, and therewith put the Gold into the Scales, and I haue seene some of them at one time, take at least halfe an ounce of small Gold like sand out of their Purfes. They haue small bellies, long legs, broad feet, and long toes, little haire vpon their bodies, curled haire vpon their heads, but not so much curled as the Tawnie Moores, for theirs is almost like bristels, and not like Wooll. In the palmes of their hands, vnder their feet, and vnder their lips, they are very white, their skins are as soft as Veluet, and smooth, which they raze not, they likewise haue a great priuie member, whereof they make great account, therein they much surpass our Countymen.

As they grow in yeares, they become blacker and blacker, at thirtie yeares of age beeing in their best time, but when they are seuentie or eightie yeares old, then their blacknesse beginnes to decay, and their bodies become yellowish, and their skins begin to be rugged, and to wrinkle like Spanish Leather; they exceed all other Moores in Africa, for proportion and stature of bodie.

Courtise and begging.

The men are industrious and subtill persons as can be, good Workmen or Labourers, strong of bodie, strait, and very vpright, ingenious to learne any thing, and readie to conceiue it: for any thing whatsoever they see done before them, they will soone imitate and counterfeit; they are of a very sharpe sight, and see further then our Netherlanders, for if there be any ships at the Sea, they will see them sooner then we; they are subtill Merchants to traffique with all, and euerie day more and more learne of the Netherlanders, so that in time they will surpass them, for they haue good skill and knowledge in the Merchandizes which we sell them, they are hard of complexion, and haue very hot stomackes, for they are able to digest raw and most strange meates (whereat we wondred) for if they had an Ostridge maw, they could not better digest such raw meate as they many times eate, as I will further declare, when I speake more of their manner of feeding. They are very enuious and spitefull one against the other, and will beare malice against a man ten yeares together, and when they haue the meanes to be reuenged, then they will make their malice knowne, and vntill then keepe it secret.

They are Idolatrous, and very superstitious in their Religion. They haue a strong complexion or saour of their bodies, much like Oyle of Palme, wherewith they often anoint themselves. They are very curious to keepe their bodies cleane, and often wash and scoure them. They are much troubled with Lice and Fleas. They are not ashamed to shew their naked bodies, but they are very carefull not to let a Fart, if any bodie be by them; they wonder at our Netherlanders, that vse it so commonly, for they cannot abide that a man should Fart before them, esteeming it to be a great shame and contempt done vnto them; when they ease themselves, they commonly goe in the morning to the Townes end (where there is a place purposely made for them) that they may not bee seene, as also because men passing by should not bee molested with the smell thereof, they also esteeme it a bad thing that men should ease themselves vpon the ground, and therefore they make houses which are borne vp aboue the ground, wherein they ease themselves, and euery time they doe it, they wipe; or else they goe to the water side, to ease themselves in the sand, and when these Priuie-houses are full, they set fire in them, and let them burne to ashes: they pisse by Iobs as Hogs doe, and not all at one time; they are very couetous, and much addicted thereunto, and they can begge so well, and are so expert therein, that they surpass all the the beggers in our Countrey, who although they had set ten or twelue yeeres ordinarily at the Church doores, in Holland or Zeland; or gone from doore to doore to begge an almes: yet they cannot haue their lessons so perfectly as these. And although they are very hard and nigardly, and will giue but little, yet when they haue gotten any thing by their begging, then they will be somewhat liberall thereof, when it costs them nothing.

They are very lecherous, and much addicted to vncleannesse; especially with yong women, Lechery. whereby they are much subiect to the Poxe, and other vncleane diseases, that are gotten thereby; which they make small account of, and are nothing ashamed of them. They are no lesse giuen to drinking; for they are great drunkards, and dainty mouthed; and can eate and drinke Drunkennesse and greedinessse. of the best. In their feeding, they are very greedy. They cannot endure that any raine should fall vpon their bodies, and therefore they shun it. They are very great liars, and not to be credited. They are likewise much inclined to theft, for they will steale like dogs, for their Kings and Lying and stealing. Captaines practise it, and they are so well vsed thereunto, that they cannot leaue stealing. They are very expert and cunning to fish, and to till the land, and in their apparell, and going very proud, they are very stout, proud and curious in all their actions. They are not to be trusted nor credited, for they are no good pay-masters, you were as good giue it, as trust them with any thing. They are of a very good memorie, and will remember a thing long. They are by nature warme and hott, and therefore cannot endure cold, they are not frugal, for whatsoever they get, they spend it presently: for it grieues them to keepe it, so that therein they are like to little children, that can keepe nothing. They are excellent Swimmers and Diuers in the water, and are so expert therein, that they much surpasse our Countrey men.

§. III.

Of their Apparell, Customes within doores, Manner of diet, Merchandising; the vse of Dache; Wares carried thither.

Although their apparell and manner of dressing is not variable, yet they take a great Cutting their haire. pride therein; as first, in cutting their haire, euery one of a seuerall fashion, and as finely as he can deuise it: some with a halfe moone, some crosse wise, others with three or foure hornes vpon their heads, and euery one a seuerall way, so that among fiftie men, you shall scarce find two or three that are cut alike. On their armes they hang Iron rings, three Rings. or foure vpon one arme cut, some round, others flat, which are raced, and markt as we make fairings for children. About their neckes they were a string of Beades, of diuers colours, which our Netherlanders bring them; but the Gentlemen weare Rings of gold about their necks, on their feet, they weare many strange wreathes, which they call Fetissos, (which name they deriue from Fetissos their Idolatry) for when they eate or drinke, then they power meat and drinke vpon them: and first giue them to eate and drinke. At their knees also they weare a string of Venice beades, 40 with some gold among them, of diuers fashions, much after the manner that our yong maids weare their Corall bracelets about their armes. They weare caps made of Barkes of trees, with a long string hanging at them, which they bind about their heads, after the Turkish manner, in stead of a hat-band, painted and dyed of diuers colours. They also make caps of Reeds, they Caps. likewise haue hats of Straw, as we haue, and some of greene Rushes, they also make caps of Dogs and Goats skins; which they spread vpon a blocke of wood, all finely made, they weare at least two fathome of Linnen about the middle of their bodies, and betweene their legs, and round about them like a girdle, and let it hang downe beneath their knees, like the Portugals Breeches; and when they goe out of doores, they take a fathome of Linnen cloth, Sey, or Stuffle, and weare it about their neckes, and crosse vnder their armes like a Cloake, and in their hands they weare 50 an Asagaie or two, and when they goe in this manner in the streets, they haue a Boy or a Slaue following them, which carrieth a stoole after them, and where they stay, there their slaues sets downe their stooles for them to sit and prate; they are very proud in their going, for they goe Pride. very slowly, and vse a long pace as they goe along through the streets, they looke forward, and neuer cast vp their eyes, vntill some body that is better then themselves, speaketh vnto them, and with them they will stand and talke, and make them an answer; but if they be such as are of meaner qualitie then themselves, to them they will make no answer: but with an angry countenance, and despitefully, saying, hold your peace, speake not to me, esteeming themselves embased, by speaking to a meaner person then themselves in the streets; for there are very great men among them, very proud in speech, and doe much honour and reuerence to strangers, to the 60 end you should doe the like to them.

When they goe to Sea, then they put off their clothes, and taking a little peece of Linnen or cloth, about a handfull broad, tie that about their bodies, and betweene their legs, before their priuy members, and when they goe on land againe, then they put it off, and wash themselves.

Salutations.

selues from head to feet, and anoint their bodies with Oyle of Palme, or fat of beasts, to make them shine; and betweene their toes put Soape, to keepe them cleane: they also vse to anoint their bodies to keepe them from the biting of Flies. In the morning, when they goe out and meet with any of their friends or acquaintance, they salute each other very solemnly, bidding them good morrow, embracing each other in their armes, & putting forth the two fore-fingers of their right hands, one to the other, they hold each other fast by them, and kinckling them twice or thrice together, at euery time bowing their heads, they say, Anzy, Anzy, which in their Language is good morrow.

Their lust.

The Portugals in Mina marry Mullato women, halfe white, halfe blacke, because white women cannot liue there. These weare their haire short, as the men, weare many Corals, and are 10

Through you is my name blasphemed amongst the Gentiles. Rom. 2. 2. Let Christians read this with shame, especially travellers. brauely apparelled. But of the Native women of these parts. First, I will tell you of their Natures, Complexions, and Conditions: from their youths vpwards, they are giuen to Lust and vncleanness, for a great while they goe with their priue members vncouered, as I said before; and as they had no shame at all, so when they begin to weare some thing vpon their bodies, they begin to expresse shamefastnesse, but then begin to be lecherous, which they naturally learne from their youth vpwards: and before the Netherlanders and Portugals dwelt among them, and Traffique in that Countrey, the women were not so proud nor curious, as they are now; but that they haue learned much of vs, by seeing that we rather desire a handsome, then an euill fauoured wench; and for that cause, they giue themselues thereunto, that they might be beloued of vs; for they esteeme it to be good fortune for them to haue carnall copulation with a Nether- 20

lander, and among themselues, brag and boast thereof. In former time, they vse to goe starke naked vntill they were very great, as yet they doe among those that dwell within the land, as the Negros themselues haue told vs; but on the Sea side they are growne more shamefast, by meanes of such as comes out of Europe to Traffique with them. They are also theeuish, but thereof they haue not so much need as the men. They are very proud in their gate and apparell, they curle and fold the haire of their heads, making a hill in the middle of their heads like a Hat, such as the Dutch Gentlewomen vse to weare, and round about the same, they make round strikes as bigge as a Dollor, which they dresse and trim so long, till it be as they would haue it; and then they anoint it with Palme Oyle, which makes it very much frizled, They haue long Combes with two teeth onely, each tooth being a finger long, which they thrust into their 30

haire, and combe it therewith; for they are troubled with Lice: they vse their combes also for a kind of salutation or reuerence, which they doe vnto men; for when they bid one good morrow, and kincke fingers together, they put their combes out of their haire, and put them in againe, which they vse for a kind of reuerence, instead of bowing their heads. Vpon their foreheades they cut three or foure slashes in the flesh, about the length of the ioint of a mans finger, and also on their cheekes not farre from their eares, which they suffer to swell, and rise vp, about the breadth of a knife, which they couer ouer with painting, and vnder their eye browes, they also make white strikes, and on their faces they set white spots, which a farre off shew like Pearles. They also race their armes and their breasts with diuers kinds of cuts, euery morning putting diuers colours vpon them, whereby they shew like blacke silke doublets cut and pinckt, 40 or like a womans Sattin stomacher, they weare eare rings of Copper or Tin, and Copper bracelets about their armes, and some of Iuorie, and vpon their legs also they weare many red and yellow Copper Rings. But a yong maid that is vnmarried, weareth many Iron Rings about her armes, sometimes thirty or forty vpon one arme: a Whore (by them called Etigafou) oftentimes weare Copper Rings vpon her legs, with Bells hanging at them, which she goes ringing through the streets. They are well proportioned and membred, much surpassing our women, in strength and agility of body, both when they are deliuered of their children, and otherwise, as I haue said before. They are very wise and diligent in house keeping, good House-wiues and Cookes, but not very skilfull to make cleane & scoure their Copper Kettles & Dishes, to make them shine. They keepe no more Household-stuffe then they haue need of, you find the women 50 more at home in their houses, then the men commonly are; for they vse not to goe abroad to prate with their neighbours, they are not ouer fruitfull: for commonly it is two or three yeeres before they are with child, which I thinke proceeds from their hot natures, and the aire of the Countrey, and secondly, because their husbands haue so many wiues, two, three, foure, fise, and fixe, and some more, each one as he hath power and abilitie to keepe them; and with them, he lieth according to their manner, euery one her turne, and vseth not one onely, but hath so much to doe with them all, that it is long before some of them are gotten with child. Their men are diligenter therein then we are, & the first thing they will tell you, is of their wives and children, for he that among them hath many wiues and children, hee is a rich man. The women teach their daughters from their youths vpwards, to bake bread, and to grind Millia, with other Housewifery; whereby it cometh to passe, that they haue good skill in house-keeping, because they are brought vp therein from their youths. They are alwaies rubbing their teeth with a certaine kind of wood, where with they make them so smooth that they shine, as is before said, as white as Iuory: and in truth those white teeth make a faire shew in their blacke faces. They 60 weare a fadome and ſome a fadome and a halfe of linnen cloth about their bodies, which hangeth from beneath their breſts or their nauels down to their knees, then they take a piece of red, blue, or yellow cloth, whereof they make a Girdle, and put it about them, and on it they hang their Kniues, Purſes with monie, and ſome Keies, and although they haue but few Cheſts or Cubboards, yet they hang Keies at their Girdles, becauſe it makes a faire ſhew. They alſo hang diuers Wiſpes of ſtraw about their Girdles, which they tie full of Beanes, and other Venice Beades, eſteeming them to be their Fetiſſos, or Saints, ſome of them take a piece of cloth, others a Mat made of barks of Trees, others a piece of a Carpet, and weare it about their bodies, and ſo euery one weares ſomething, and this they doe within the houſe, but when they goe to Market to buy ſomething, then they put off thoſe things, and goe and waſh themſelues in a Kettle of water from the head to the feet, and then they take another piece of Linnen to put about their bodies, and another Girdle, and another fadome or two of Linnen Cloth, and hang it about their bodie, from their breſts downe to their feet like a Gowne, and vpon it weares another thing of Sey or of ſtriped linnen, and that ſhe carries vpon her ſhoulders, and vnder her arme like a Cloake, and carries a wooden Platter in her hand which ſhe beares vp a high, and ſo goes to Market, and when ſhe comes home againe from the Market or other places where ſhe hath beene, ſhe puts off thoſe cloathes, and put on worſe, for they are more ſparing then the men, and therefore they carrie the Parſe, and when their Huſbands will haue any monie, they muſt come to them for it.

Apparell and ornaments.

The women haue the gouernment of their Houſes, and the men take care as much as lyes in them, to earne ſomething, but the women prouide the meate to ſerue for their daily food, although they eate a part, they buy no more meate euery day, then ſerueth them for that day, or they can eate at a meale. In the euening they goe to their houſes that ſtand without the Towne, and are full of Millia (which is their kind of Corne) where they take a certaine quantitie, as much as they need for their Houſe, and with a ſtaffe ſtampe it, as wee uſe to ſtampe Spice in a Grocers ſhop, and that is their manner of threſhing, then they fanne it in a wooden diſh, till it be cleane, but ſuch as haue ſlaues make them doe it. This Millia is a faire white Seed, when it is broken, as hereafter I will ſhew, ouer night they ſteepe this Millia with a little Mais in faire water, and in the morning after they haue waſht, and made themſelues readie, they take the Millia and lay it vpon a ſtone, as Painters doe when they grind their colours, then they take another ſtone about a foot long, and with their hands grind the Millia as ſmall as they can, till in a manner it be dough, and then it ſheweth like baked Buckway Cakes, they temper their dough with freſh water and Salt, and then make Rowles thereof as bigge as two fiſts, and that they lay vpon a warme harth, whereon it baketh a little, and this is the bread which they uſe. The Negroes of the Caſtle Damina, bake faire bread of Mais, which is almoſt like our wheaten bread, and that they cut in Rowles: they can alſo bake it ſo hard, that it will keepe two or three monethes ſweet and liard, for they furniſh their ſhips and laſts with ſuch bread, when they ſend them to the Ilands of Saint Thomas, or to Angola, others that haue not the meanes to haue ſuch bread, they goe to Market to buy it, and call it Kangues, when the Fiſher-men come out of the Sea with their fiſh, then the women carrie it to the Market, where euery one comes to buy that and fleſh, fruite, and other things. They uſe altogether raw and ſtrange kind of meates, as handſuls of Graine or Manigette, (and will drinke vp whole Romers full of Aquauite at a draught) Dogs, Cats, and filthy ſtinking Elephants, and Buffolds fleſh, wherein there is a thouſand Maggets, and many times ſtinkes like carrion, in ſuch ſort that you cannot indure the ſmel thereof; there are likewiſe little Birds as bigge as a Bul-finck, of a grey colour, with red bills, which very cunningly make their Neſts vpon the ſmalleſt ends of the branches of trees, thereby to preſerue themſelues from Snakes or other venomous beaſts. Thoſe they eate aliue, feathers and all.

I haue beene told by ſome of the Moores, that the Countrie people dwelling within the Land, eate dried Snakes, and the Boores or Slaues, as alſo the common people which dwell vpon the Sea-ſide, although they haue better prouiſion of meate then thoſe that dwell further into the Land, yet they are of ſo hot a nature, that they eat raw Dogs guts, and neuer ſee the nor roaſt them, which we our ſelues ſaw: And there was one of their Boyes left aboard a Netherlanders ſhip for a pawne for debt, which Boy was ſo greedie to eate raw meate, that although he had ſufficient meate with them in the ſhip, yet hee would eate the Hens meate out of their Troughes. This Boy made a ſticke, and at the end thereof hee draue a naile with the point vponwards, and went and lay by the Hens Cage, and when any of them put out their heads to eate meate, he ſtrooke them in the heads, and killed them, and then hee went and ſhewed the Sailers, that ſome of the Hens were dead, which he did to the end he might eate their raw guts, and would not ſtay ſo long vntill the guts were made cleane, but tooke them and eate them raw as they came out of the Hens bellies. They eate alſo great ſtore of old ſtinking fiſh, which is dried in the Sunne, but to ſay, that they eate ſuch kind of raw meates for neceſſitie and no other, were vntruth; for they alſo are very daintie, and can eate good meate when they haue it. There are women women that dwell in the Castle among the Portugals that can dresse meate well, they eate also many Hens, Goats, Oxen, and Hartes, but such meate is not eaten by the common people, but those that eate them are Gentlemen, or such as are rich, and are able to buy them; they also eate Iugnamis, Bannanas, and Patates. They haue three kind of trees, as the Palme-trees, whereof some are Females which yeeld no wine, but beare Grapes as bigge as Plummes, of an Orange colour, at the one end being some-what blackish: those Grapes they peelee to the stones, and thereof they make Oile, which they call Palme Oile, which is verie delicate and good, which they vse to dresse their meate withall, and make good sawce thereof for their fish, the thickest of this Oile they vse to anoint their bodies withall, to make them cleane, and the women vse it to frizell their haire, the veines are as great as Acornes, and as hard as a stone, at the end thereof hauing three round holes, they beate them in pieces, and within them find certaine Nuts, like little earthen pellets, much like hazell-nuts, but when you eate them, they taste of the wood, and are verie drie.

They likewise haue many Beanes and Pease, whereof some are like Turkie Beanes of a purple colour, those Beanes are good and fat, which they dresse with Oile of Palme, and it is a very excellent meate and nourisheth well, but the other kind of Beanes and Pease, they vse not to eate, for they haue no great quantitie of them, growing thereabouts. The Iugnamis also they vse in many places in stead of bread. Their drinke commonly is nothing but water, but yet in some places they brew a little Mais in water, which beeing sodden together, is almost like a kind of beere, which they also vse much to drinke and call it Poitou, others buy a pot of Palme-wine, and becaule that will not continue long, therefore foure or fise of them goe together, and buy a pot or two: a pot of theirs is ten pots of ours, and that they pay for together, which they powre into a great Cabas, which growes vpon Trees, whereof some are halfe as big as a Kilderkin, and will hold at least twelue Kans, and then sit downe round about it to drinke, whereof euerie man sendeth his louingest and truest wife a little pot full home to drinke, and the first draught that they drinke, they take it out of the Cabas with a smaller Cabas, and when the first man drinks, the rest stand vp, and taking his Cap or Hat off, lay their hands vpon his head, and with a loud voice cries, Tantosi, Tantosi; at the first draught, they drinke not the Cabas full out, but leaue a little in it, which they throw vpon the ground, saying, I. O V, as giuing their Fetissos that to drinke, and if they haue other Fetissos on their armes or feete, they spit drinke out of their mouthes vpon them, as if they gaue them drinke also; for they are of opinion, that if they doe it not, or forget to doe it, they should not drinke their wine quietly together, but that their Fetissos would let them. Naturally they are great Drinkers, and vse no lesse vnseemelineesse in their feeding, but eate as vnmanerly and greedily, as if they were a companie of Hogs: for sitting down vpon the ground to eate, they stay not till they haue eaten one morsell vp, but still cramme in, and they put not their meate into their mouthes, but pull their meate in pieces, and take it vp with their three middlemost fingers, and gaping, cast it so right into their mouthes, that they neuer faile nor cast it beside their mouthes, whereat we wondred much. They are alwayes hungry, and would willingly eate all day long, which shewes that they haue very hot mawes, and although the Countrey is very hot, whereby the heate of the Aire commonly should fill mens stomakes, yet they are hungrie, and wee Netherlanders are not weake stomaked there, but alwaies haue good appetites, whereby I am of opinion, that heate in those Countries makes men hungrie: but becaule I am no Doctor of Physicke, I will not intreate thereof. And becaule they make great account of that drinking together, they are verie earnest and industrious to get something, and to make prouision of Gold, which hauing gotten, they cannot be frugall or sparing, but presently goe and drinke it with their companions, now one, and then another, euerie one his turne, and if one gets more then his fellowes, then hee must be liberaller then his fellowes, that is, when they begin to deale with the Merchants, and to goe aboard the ships, and he that is poore or hath not much, can hardly beare companie to drinke, because they are not sparing, when they haue gotten any thing.

As I haue vnderstood by the Inhabitants of those Countries, before the Portugals came thither to deale with them, they had very little or no kind of Merchandize to traffique withall, or to liue by, but liue vpon that which they got from others by force, which was not much, specially to get any thing to apparell themselves; for before that time they went all naked, as I said before, much lesse had they any cattle or victuals for their maintenance, but only such as the Portugals brought thither, and by that meanes the Countrey was filled and replenished with diuers kinds of beasts and Corne, whereby at this day, there is almost all kind of things that are necessarie and needfull for mans sustenance, and otherwise to bee had in those Countries. And within a while after, the Portugals began to traffique and deale with the Sauage Inhabitants, they likewise began to know their Merchandize.

At the first, in former time they came and brought their Gold vnto the Portugals, and bought of them such things as they wanted, as Linnen Cloth, &c. but the people dwelling further within Land, durst not venture to come to the Portugals to deale with them, as wondring at them, them, it being a fearefull thing vnto them to see white men apparelled, and they themselves blacke and vnapparelled, (as the like happened vnto our men; for at the first they were afraid to see Blacke Moores) and therefore they brought their monie to those that dwelt on the Sea side, where the Portugals traffique, and told them what wares they would haue, and they went to the Castle, and bought such things as they desired, as Iron, Tinne, Copper Basons, Kniues, Cloth, Linnen, Kettles, Corals, and such like wares, and the Merchants that sent them to the Portugals, paid them for their paines, vpon euery Peso of Gold by them disbursed, so that if they bestowed many Pesoes, they received a good deale of monie for their Factoridge, and by that meanes they got their liuings.

- 10 But after that, when we began to traffique thither, (the first that went from hence thither out of Holland, to deale with the Negroes, beeing called Barent Erickson of Medenblicke) and found what profit the Portugals did there, we increased our Trade thither, and sent more ships with the said Baront, as a fit man for it, because he knew the Coast, as hauing beene there with the Portugals. But hauing no place vpon the Land (as the Portugals had) to carrie our wares ashore, and to lay it in Ware-houses to traffique with them as time serued, and durst not, or else might not goe on Land, we were constrained to stay with our shippes at anchor before their Townes, attending for the Merchants, that came aboard our ships with their Canoes, at which time the Negroes seeing that wee had Merchandize aboard, imboldened themselves to traffique with vs, and brought their Gold aboard our ships, and for that at this present they deale but little with the Portugals, but only with our Countreymen, therefore I will shew in what manner they deale with vs.

First Dutch Trade.

In the morning betimes, they come aboard our ships with their Canoes, or Scutes to traffique with vs: and the cause why their Merchants came so early aboard, is, for that in the morning the wind, which they call Bofone, blowes off from the Land, and then it is calme smooth water, for about noone the wind which they call Agom Breton, begins to blow out of the Sea, and then they row to Land againe: for the people that dwell within the Land, can hardly brooke the Seas, for when they are aboard the ship, they can scarce goe or stand, but lie downe and spue like Dogges, and are verie Sea-sicke; but their Rowers and Pilots that bring them aboard, are hardie enough, and neuer are sicke, by reason of their daily vsing to the Seas. But some of their

Wind in the morning from land & calme.

- 30 Merchants when they come aboard our ships, are so sicke, that they cast out all they haue within their bodies; and by reason of their beeing so sicke in faire weather, they are so afraid of the wind (when the waues goe any thing high) that they make as much haste home as they can, and some of them dare not venture vpon the Seas to goe aboard the ships, but deliuer their monie to the Pilots or Factors, telling them what Merchandize they desire to buy, and those Tolken come with the Gold aboard the ships, hauing a Purse which hangeth about their middles, wherein they put their Gold, and euery senerall mans Gold is in a piece of Cloth or Paper by it selfe, and they can tell which is euery mans, and what wares hee desireth to haue for it, and sometimes they haue twelue or ten mens Gold to bestow, which is called an English of Gold, and of some two, three, or foure, and when any of their monies is not waight, then they put it into 40 their Purse, and carrie it to the man againe, for if they should put any thing to it, to make it full waight, the Merchant would not giue it them againe, for they weigh their Gold first vpon the Land, and know how much it is before they send it aboard the ship, for they credit not one the other, and when they haue bestowed their monie, then we must giue them some-what to boot, which they call Dache.

Dache.

- When we began to traffique here in the Countie with two or three ships, as one of Middleburgh, one of Amsterdam, and one of Schiedam, and that all our ships met and lay at anchor together to sell our wares, the one ship seeing that the other traffiqued more, and vented more wares then his fellowes, to find the meanes to get the Merchants aboard their ships, they willed the Pilots (with whom they must hold friendship, for they carrie the Merchants aboard) to bring them aboard their ships, and they would giue them something for their labours, and the Pilots accordingly to get something, brought them aboard that ship, which had made them that offer, for they are verie couetous, which the other ships perceiuing, willed the Pilots to bring the Merchants aboard their shippes, and they would likewise giue them something: and they made them answere, that if they would giue them as much as the other did, they would come aboard their ships, which they promised to doe, and gaue them more Dache then the other, and by that meanes driue the Merchants, Pilots, and Tolken aboard their ships, which the other ships seeing, and thinking that their Merchants wares cost them no more then the others, gaue them more Dache then the others, and by that meanes struing one with the other, they deminished one and the others gaine, and in fine, their gifts grew to such a rate, that at this day, their Dache amounteth vnto fixe or seuen per cento.

Vndermining and defrauding Merchants.

- 60 And now it is come to passe, that whereas the Countie people and Merchants were wont to pay the litridge and brokeridge to the Pilots and Tolken, to carrie them aboard the ships, they sought to the Merchants and Countie Moores to get them into their Canoes, for greedinesse of Dache, which they got of the Factors for their labours, to bring the Merchants aboard, and thereby thereby in stead of paying them for going aboard, they giue the Merchants much Dache, in regard of the great profit they get thereby.

Wares for these parts of Guinea, and for what vſe.

Many Merchants comming to the Sea ſide to buy wares, ſome of them a hundred or two hundred miles from within the land, bring great ſtore of gold, & haue diuers ſlaues with them, which they lade with the wares which they buy in the ſhips, wherof ſome haue twenty, others thirtie, and ſome more, as they haue meanes, and according to the trade that they vſe: which Merchants or Moariſh countrey people, know the houſes or lodgings, where they vſe to lie, and waigh their money to their Tolke or Hoſte, and tell them what goods or wares they will haue; who coming aboard, commonly bring one of the Merchants with them, for they truſt not one the other, and leaue the reſt with their ſlaues vpon the land, which tell them what wares they deſire to haue; and if it be a Merchant that can ſpeake no Portugall ſpeech, they will preſently tell you, and will the Faſtor not to ſpeake Moriſh ſpeech vnto them, becauſe their Merchant is one that dwels farre within the land; thereby giuing you to vnderſtand, that they meane to deceiue him, and to beguile him of much money. The poore Merchant being ſicke, and lying in the ſhip ſpuing like a dogge, in the meane time the Brokers make the match for them, telling the Faſtors how much ware they deſire to haue for ſo much gold; for that the wares are commonly ſold all at one price: The Tolken makes not many words with the Faſtors, but ſet certaine wares before the Merchant, as little as they can to content him for his money, and the price being made with him, he weighes their gold, and takes the wares, and goes on land againe; and the Merchant being gone home, then the Pilots and Tolken come aboard the ſhips againe, to fetch that which they haue coozoned the Merchant off: ſo that oftentimes the Merchants are deceiued of a third part of their goods by ſuch practiſes: others, while he lookes about, or turnes to ſpue, ſteale a peece of the Merchants gold, and put it into their Mouthes, Eares, or Noſtreils, making the Merchant beleue that his money is too light: the Merchant for his part, ſeeing that by meanes of their theeuery his money will not reach out; becauſe it is too light, that it may weigh more then it is, blowes in the Ballance, which the Faſtors oftentimes perceiuing not, and thinking that they haue their full waight, are by that meanes deceiued, and come ſhort of their reckoning; ſo that they haue a thouſand deuices to ſteale, and to beguile the Merchants. At firſt they were woont to be very ſimple in their dealing, and truſted the Netherlanders very much, wherat we wondred: for they were of opinion, that white men were Gods, and would not deceiue them; and then tooke the wares vpon their words, without reckoning it after them, whereby they were deceiued: for, that if they bought ten fathome of Linnen cloth, they found but eight, and by that meanes, loſt two fathome, and other things after the rate, which the Faſtors did ſo groſſely, that the Merchants in the end perceiued it, and began to looke better to themſelues, and grew ſo ſubtil in their reckoning, that if they bought one hundred fathome of Linnen, they could reckon it to a fathome, and tell whether they had their meaſure or not; ſo that now if you doe them any wrong, by meaſuring or reckoning, they will not come aboard your ſhip any more; and which is more, for any bad looke, or haſtie word that you ſhall giue them, they will neuer be friends with you againe.

Troubles and warres in the Netherlands, constrained vs to ſeek Traffique here alſo, and to vndertake this voyage, by that meanes to put the Portugalls from it, which in the end we did, for that ſince the Netherlanders came hither to Traffick with the Negroes, Moores, the Portugalls haue beſt trading, and are wholly decayed. Firſt, we bring them great ſtore of ſlight Linnen cloth, whereof there is very much ſpent in thoſe Countries, for they apparell themſelues therewith, and it is the chiefeſt thing they vſe for that purpoſe: beſides this, we carry them great ſtore of Baſons, as little Baſons, Barbers Baſons, Baſons to drinke in, Platters of Copper, flat Baſons, great broad Copper pans, at the leaſt two fathome about, and ſmall Poſnets without edges: The ſmall Baſons they vſe to put Oile in, wherewith they anoint themſelues, and the greater ſort of them they ſet in the graues of the dead, & vſe them to carry diuers things in. The Barbers Baſons they vſe to waſh themſelues in, & when they cut their haire, platters they vſe to lay ouer others to couer them withall, to keepe duſt and filch from falling into their things. The great broad Pans, are by them vſed to kill a Goat or a Hogge in, and to make it cleane therein, in ſtead of a Tub. The Poſnets they vſe to dreſſe their meat in, which ſerueth them to very good purpoſe, they will not haue them with ſteales, as we vſe them here with vs, and many other ſuch like Baſons of Copper, which our ſhips bring thither in great quantities, and therewith fill the Countrey ſo full; and by meanes thereof, they are ſold as good cheape there vnto the Negros, as they are bought in Amſterdam; and although there are ſo many of thoſe Baſons brought thither, and no ware that weareth ſo much, as Linnen, yet you ſee but few old Copper things there, and therefore you muſt thinke, that there is great ſtore of people inhabiting further within the land, which vſe ſo great quantitie of ſuch things.

We carrie thither great ſtore of Kettles, which they vſe to fetch water in, out of their pits and Valleyes, and ſome red Copper pots Tinned within, wherein they vſe to put water, in ſtead of a barrell of beare to drinke; earthen pots they vſe alſo to drinke out of. Iron is vſed by them to make their weapons, as Aſſagaie, cutting Knives, Poniards, &c. The Aſſagaies & Poniards they they vse for the warres. The cutting Kniues, to Till and cut vp the ground, in stead of Spades, and some to cut wood withall, and to vse about their Building, for they haue no other Tooles: They also buy great store of Red, Blew, Yellow, and Greene Rupinsh cloth, which they vse for Girdles about their middles, to hang their Kniues, Purfes, Poniards, and such like things at. They vse white Spanish Serges to weare vpon their bodies, in stead of Clokes, Rings of Copper and Brasle, which they weare about their armes and feet for a great pride. They also vse Tin things, as Rings for their armes, but not many. They vse many Kniues which wee make with vs in Holland, and call them Docke Messen. They also vse great store of Venice Beads, of all kinds of colours, but they desire some colours more then others, which they breake in foure or fve peeces, and then grind them vpon a stone, as our children grind Cherrie stones; and then put them vpon strings, made of Barke of trees, ten or twelue together, and therewith Traffique much: Those ground Corals they weare about their neckes, hands and feet. They also vse round Beads, and specially great round Counters, which they hang and plait among their haire, and let them hang ouer their eares. Pins they vse to make Fish-hookes, Horse tailes they vse when they daunce, & also when they sit still, to keep the flies from their bodies; Looking-glasses, and small Copper milke Kans, with many such like things. But the chiefeft wares that are vttered there, and most vsed among them, is, Linnen, Cloth, Brasle, and Copper things, Basons, Kettles, Kniues, and Corals.

At first we vsed many times to deceiue them, not onely in measuring of Linnen, but in deli- uering them broken and patcht Basons, and peeced Kettles for their money; rotten Cloth, through the which they might haue sifted Beanes; Kniues that were so rustie, that they could hardly without breaking pull them out of their sheathes, with such like wares. But now by vse and experience, they haue attained to such skill in our wares, that they are almost able to surpasse vs therein. For, first, when they buy any Linnen cloth, they looke if it be not to slight and thin, and whether it be white and broad; for they are very curious to buy white and broad Linnen, and respect not the strength so much as the breadth of the Linnen: for they vse to hang it about their bodies, specially the women, which desire to haue it hang downe from vnderneath their breasts, to their knees. Secondly, they take Woollen cloth, and hold it vp a- gainst the light, to see if it be thin. They draw the Kniues out of the sheathes, to see if they be not rustie. They looke vpon the Basons one by one, to see if they haue no holes in them: or whether they be broken, and the least hole that they spie in them, they lay them away, and desire to haue others for them; and also if they be but a little foule or greasie, they will none of them: And for quantitie and qualitie make triall of all other wares, as curiously as in Eu- rope is done.

Market how they are kept No Market on their Sabbath

§. IIII.

What Custome the Merchants pay to their Kings. Their Measures, Weights, Scales, Markets: Also their Sabbath, Fetissos and superstitions.

He Kings haue their Customes dwelling vpon the Sea Coast, where the ships lie to Traffique with the Countrey people, and they are placed there, to see that the Kings lose not their Rents and Imposts, and that it may be the better paid them, and no deceit vsed, they appoint one of their Sons or some one of their neerest friends to be present with them. Those Customers receiue the Customs of the fish, which is taken in his precinct, or before his Hauen, and to that end he hath a measure to measure it withall, and if the measure be not full (of any fish whatsoever) then it payeth no Custome, but if their fish bee more then filleth that measure, then he taketh the fifth fish thereof, or as much as he thinketh good to take for his Custome, and that is presently sent to the King of that quarter by his slaues, which euery morning come thither to fetch the fish.

Customes.

Such Merchants as come thither a great way out of the Countrey, pay to the King of the Ha- uen where they goe to Traffique, the weight of sixe pence in gold, for their passage through his Countrey, and whether they intend to buy much or little, the passage money is all one, and when they haue Traffique with the Factors in the ships, and come to land, the Customer taketh a part of their goods from them, which is commonly a fourth part of that which they haue bought, and carrieth it away with him, then the Merchant takes the rest and carrieth it to his lodging, which done, he goeth backe againe to the Customer (whom they call la guarda, within Portugall is the watch) and agree with him, and pay him as little as they can, and so haue their goods againe, and if they haue bestowed lesse then two ounces of gold vpon wares, then there is no set Custome to bee paid for it, but they giue as much as they can agree vpon for it, with the Customer, and that is the Customers owne profit, in stead of his wages, but whatsoe- uer uer they buy about the value of two ounces of Gold, then they must pay an English of Gold for custome thereof, those two ounces of Gold they call Benda.

Toll.

Fines.

Also if they haue stolne any thing from any of their Countrie people, they also pay monie for it, as the case requireth. And also when they haue laien with another mans Wife, then the King hath a forfeit paid vnto him for it. And when the Countrie people come to Market with their weapons, they must leaue their Weapons in some place, or else they must pay a forfeit, which is fixe penie weight in Gold, if they come with any Armes or Weapons to their Seawtownes. And they also that counterfeit false Gold, with diuers other forfeitures, which are all paid to the King, whereof the Customer euerie three monethes maketh his account, and payeth it vnto the King. 10

Weights and Scales.

They make Weights of Copper of diuers sorts, and haue little Copper Scales which are round, and hollow like an Orange peece. A Benda is their greatest weight, which with vs is two ounces; Benda-assa, is halfe a Benda, which is an ounce. Assuwa, is two Pesos and a halfe. Eggeba, is two Pesos, or halfe an ounce. Seron, is a Peso and a halfe. Eufanno is a Peso or a Loot. Quienta, is three quarters of a Peso, each Peso is a Loot. Media taba, is a quarter of a Peso, or a small parcell. Agiraque, is halfe a Peso, or halfe a Loot, each Peso is a Loot; so that their weights are all one with ours for the names, but differ in the pound a Peso and a halfe, which is a Loot and a halfe, so that their weights are so much lighter then ours.

Measures and Telling or numbring.

They measure their Cloth by two fathome together, which they cut one from the other, and call it Iestam, and sell their Linnen in that sort among themselves, and those two fathome after our measure is a stork and three quarters, and they are verie subtil in measuring of their Linnen, and can reckon that so many of our storkes make so many of their fadomes. They cut their Woollen-cloth in pieces not about a handfull broad, which they vse in stead of Girdles about their middles, and sell the Cloth in this sort among themselves in this manner, and vse no other kind of measure thereunto. They are not verie subtil nor expert in telling, specially to reckon, for when they haue past the number of ten, they rehearse so many words one after the other for one number, that they are so cumbred, that they cannot tell how to get out of it, and so sit buzzing so long, till at last they haue forgotten their number, and are forced to begin to tell againe, but since they began to deale with the Netherlanders, and were to reckon about the number of ten, for they vse no more among them, they tell till they come to ten, and then take one of their fingers into their hands, and then tell to ten againe, and then take another finger into their hand, and so proceed till they haue both their hands full, which in all maketh an hundred, then they marke that vp, and then begin againe to tell to ten, and vse the same order as before. 30

Markets how they are kept. No Market on their Sabbath.

Euerie Towne hath Market daies specially appointed, vpon the which you find more to be bought then vpon other daies, and euerie Towne hath his Market vpon such a day, as the others haue it not, and so euerie one differeth vpon their daies, and when their Market daies come, they haue two daies Market one after the other, wherein the principall Boores or Countrie people, come from diuers places to traffique with the ships. They haue their Sunday also, but on that day they doe nothing.

Wares.

In the morning betimes, as soone as it is day, the Countrie people come with their Sugar Canes to the Market, carrying two or three bundles together vpon their heads, which are bound vp like faggots, and being in the Market they vnbind them, and so lay them downe vpon the ground, which done, the Inhabitants of that place come to buy them, some two, others three, and some more as they haue need of them, whereby they haue soone sold their Sugar Canes, for they vse many of them to eate, and as soone as they haue sold their Sugar Canes, then the women come to the Market with their wares, who bring Oranges, Limons, Bannanas, Backouens, Potatoes, Indianias, Millia, Mais, Rice, Manigette, Hens, Egges, Bread, and such like necessities, which those that dwell on the Sea-side haue need of, and are sold both vnto the Inhabitants, and to the Netherlanders in the ships, which come thither to buy it. The Inhabitants of the Sea-side, come also to the Market with their wares, which they buy of the Netherlanders, as Linnen Cloth, Kniues, ground Corals, Looking-glasses, Pinnes, arme Rings, and Fish, which their Husbands haue gotten in the Sea, whereof the women buy much, and carrie them to other Townes within the Land, to get some profit by them, so that the fish which is taken in the Sea, is carried at least an hundred or two hundred miles vp into the Land, for a great Present, although many times it stinkes like carrion, and hath a thousand Maggots creeping in it. Those women are verie nimble about their businesse, and so earnest therein, that they goe at least fise or fixe miles every day to the places where they haue to doe, and are laden like Asles: for at their backes they carrie their children, and on their heads they haue a heauie burthen of fruit, or Millia, and so goe laden to the Market, and there she buyeth fish, to carrie home with her, so that oftentimes they come as heauily laden from the Market, as they went thither. These pay no custome to the King, but if they find any Fetissos in the way as they goe (which are their Idolatrous gods) they giue them some of their fruit or Millia to eate, which is as much as if they gaue them the tenth part thereof. 60

Superstition.

Tithes.

Thole

Those women goe seuen or eight together, and as they passe along the way they are verie merrie and pleasant, for commonly they sing and make a noise; about noone the Countrey people begin to come to the Market with their Palme-wine, which they carrie in pots, some bringing one some two pots, as they are able, they come armed to the Market, hauing a hewing Knife at their Girdles, and two or three Assagayes in their hands, but when they enter into the Market, then they set their armes in a certain place appointed thereunto, and when they haue sold and goe home againe, euery man takes his weapons and goes his way, not once changing one with the other, but euery man takes his owne, and when the Netherlanders and the Negroes haue done traffiquing: when the Countrey people come to the Market with their wine, 10 looke what the Pilots or Rowers (that carried the Merchants aboard the ships) haue gotten, or that was giuen them for Dache, by the Factors, therewith they buy Palme-wine, and drinke it vp together, they pay for their Wine either with Gold, or Linnen; but for the most part, they pay for it with Gold, which they weigh verie narrowly, one vnto the other, and when there are many Merchants, and that the Wine is much desired, then it is oftentimes deerer then Spanish Wine is with vs.

Besides this, the Market folke know euery one their place, and where to sit to sell their wares, as those with fruit stand in one place, they with Sugar Canes in another place, they with Wood, Water, and Bread by themselues; and those that sell Wine in a place by 20 themselues, but the Palme-wine which is brought thither by Sea, from other places, that is neuer brought to the Market, for many times when it comes in the Canoes in the euening, when the people haue need thereof, as soone as it is brought on Land, the Negroes stand readie vpon the shoare watching for it, and going to the Merchants, euery one takes a Pot, and carries it away, so that they haue presently sold it, & the Merchant needs not feare that his Wine will sowre for want of vtterance, for they are so greedie of it, specially for to drinke, that oftentimes they fight and fall together by the eares for it.

They vse no monie nor any kind of Mint, wherewith they pay each other, but when they buy any thing they pay for it with Gold, and that by weight, and it is a verie small parcell that bath not some kind of weight to weigh it withall, and they pay each other with foure square pieces of Gold, weighing a graine or halfe a graine. The cause why they pay in this sort, 30 and haue this custome, is by meanes of the Portugals, of the Castle of Myna, which shewed them this way, for before the Portugals came thither, the Negroes knew no such thing, but when they bought any thing, they exchanged ware for ware, but the Portugals coming thither had no monie to pay them, when they bought fruits or other victuals to eat, and therefore they desired to pay with Kacrawen, in stead of monie, & so it is the custome about the Castle of Myna, that they haue great store of Kacrawen, which they vse for paymet more then in other places. In places where the Portugals are not known, the Negros vse not that kind of Mint, but sel their Gold as it commeth out of the Earth, for they know not how to melt or vse their Gold as the Negros do, that deale with the Portugals, and in stead of monie paid one the other in small stones: they vse also small pieces of Iron of a finger length, with a halfe Moone thereon, which they vse in stead 40 of monie, and haue no other kind of monie in the Golden Coast of Guinea, then such as I said before, wherewith they pay each other.

Although they are altogether wild, rough, and vnciuill, hauing neither Scripture nor Bookes, nor any notable Lawes that might be set downe, or declared to shew the manner of their policie and liuing, yet when they haue past the six daies of the weeke in labour and paines taking, to get their liuings, the seuenth day they leaue working, and reckon that to bee their day of ease, and abstinence from worke, or their Sunday, which they call Dio Fetissos, which in our speech should signifie Sunday, but they obserue it not vpon our Sunday, nor vpon the Iewes Sabbath Day, but hold it vpon Tuesday, the second working day in the weeke; what law or opinion they haue to moue them thereunto, I know not, but they hold Tuesday for their Sunday, and that day the Fishermen goe not to the Sea for fish: The women and Countrey people that 50 day bring no Wine to the Market, but all the Wine which that day they draw out of the trees, they deliuer it vnto the King, which in the euening hee giueth vnto his Gentlemen, and they drinke it among them. That day they doe no kind of worke, nor traffique with other but such as dwell on the Sea-side, refraine not for all that to goe aboard the shippes, and to buy wares of the Netherlanders. In their Markets they haue a square place foure foot euery way, supported with foure Pillars, and about two cubits high from the ground, flat on the top, and couered close with Reedes, and hanged round about Wispes or Fetissos of straw, whereon they lay Millia with 60 Palme-oile or water, and giue their god that to eat and drinke to sustaine him withall, that he should not die for hunger or thirst, thinking that he eateth and drinketh it and liues by it, but the Birds of the Aire eat the graine, and drinke the water, and when it is eaten they anoint the Altar with Oile, and set more-meate and drinke vpon it, thinking thereby to doe their god great sacrifice and seruice.

They haue also a Priest, who in their speech they call a Fetissero, hee vpon their Sabbath day The Fetissero, sits vpon a stoele, in the middle of the Market before the Altar or place whereupon they sacri- or Priest,

- fice vnto their Fetisso, then all the men, women and children come and sit round about him, and there he speaketh vnto them, & they sit still to heare him: but what it is, or what it meaneth that cannot I learne, nor perceiue, neither can you get it from them, for I haue oftentimes asked them about it, but they will not tell, but are ashamed to declare it. But I haue seene this Fetissero, haue a pot with a certaine drink, (wherein there was a Snake) standing by him, and a Wispe, and some women with their little children went to him, which children hee stroaked with colour, or with some of that drinke, and so they went away, which I ghesse to be a kind of Salve against their Fetisso, for they esteeme their Fetissos to be both good and euill. And when their Fetissero hath made an Oration vnto them, then he stands vp and smeareth the Altar with his Wispe, and drinke out of his pot, and then the people vsing certaine words and making a great noise among them, clapping their hands together, cry I. ou, I. ou, and therewith their preaching is done, and so euerie one goes home to his house.
- Their Mattins. They hang many straw Wispes vpon their heads, and thinke thereby to bee free and safe as long as they weare them, and that their Fetissos can doe them no harme. In the morning betimes when they haue washt their bodies cleane, they stroake their faces with white stripes, made of earth like chalke, which they do in honour of their Fetisso, and vse it in stead of praiers in a morning; when they eat any thing they present their Fetisso (the straw Wispes which they weare about their legges) the first bit, and also the first draught that they drinke, giuing him to drinke, which if they doe not, they thinke they shall haue no good lucke that day, for they perswade themselues that their Fetisso would not otherwise suffer them to be quiet. When the Fishermen take but small store of fish, then they thinke that their Fetisso is angrie, and therefore will giue them no fish, then they make a great crie among them, and goe to their Fetissero, and giue him Gold to coniure their Fetisso, to send them store of fish. This Coniurer presently goes, and makes all his Wiues (two, three or foure, or as many as he hath) put on their best apparell and ornaments, and with them goes howling and crying round about the Towne, striking themselues vpon their breasts, and clapping their hands flat together, and so making a great stirre and noise, goe to the Sea-side, and taking boughes from the trees, hang them about their neckes: those trees they esteeme to be their Fetissos Dufianam, who they thinke send them fish. Then, the Coniurer or he that should bewitch the Fetissos, comes with a Drumme, and plaies or sounds before the trees, which they esteeme to be good for that purpose, which done hee goes to his Wiues vpon the strand, and when they haue spoken one vnto the other a good while, he casteth Millia into the Sea for his meate, with other colours, thinking that thereby their god is appeased, and will let them take fish enough.
- When the King receiueh not custome enough, to maintaine himselfe withall, then he goeth to a tree which he esteemeth to be his Fetisso, and sacrificeth vnto it, carrying it meat and drink; then the Coniurers come and coniures the tree, to tell them whether there will any Merchants come or not, which to doe they make a heape of ashes, in forme like a Sugar-loafe, and cutting a bough from the tree sticke that in it, then they take a Basen of water and drinke out of it, and therewith sprinkle the bough of the tree, which done they speake each to other, and then againe they sprinkle more vpon it, after that they take some of the ashes, and be-dawbe their faces therewith, end in that manner vse many foolish and vaine Ceremonies, and not long after they shall heare a voice which is the Deuill, that saith something vnto them, and therewith they goe home againe, and bring word what their Fetisso hath said. They hang many of those things about their children for diseases, as is said before, as also of their drinke of ieaousie.
- When any man dieth, they also make a Fetisso, and desire it to bring the bodie into the other world, and not to trouble it in the way as it goeth, then the next our neereft kinsman killeth a Hen, and dresseth it ready to be sodden, which done, they goe and sit in a corner of their house: and with him take all his Fetissos, and place them in order, as their greatest god in the middle, and the rest of meaner sort by it, then he takes certaine beades, some made of shels, some of Beanes and great Pease, and others of feathers, mixed with Buttons made of barkes of trees, and hangs them vpon the Fetissos. After that they take the bloud of the dead Hen, and therewith spinkle their Fetisso (for a dead man must offer bloud vnto his god) then hee fetcheth certaine Herbs out of the fields, and hangs them about his necke like a chaine. In the meane time, while the man is in this sort made readie. The Hen is sodden, and being sodden then he brings it, and putting it in a Platter, sers it in the middle of the Fetissos, which done, hee beginneth to coniure, vsing many words, and casteth water or wine of Palme vpon his Fetisso, then he takes two or three of the Greene leaues, which he hath about his necke, and rolleth them betweene his hands, making a little bowle or bale thereof, which he takes in the two fore-fingers of both his hands, and thrusts it betweene his legges, twice or thrice one after the other, saying, to his Fetisso, Ancie, which is as much as if he should say, All haile. After this he wringeth the sap out of that ball, and lets it drop vpon his Fetisso; which done he laies the ball vpon the ground, and takes two or three leaues more of the Herbs he hath about his necke, and rolles them in his hands, and hauing made them in a Ball, thrusts them betweene his legges, speaking certaine words as afore said, and then lets the sap drop vpon his Fetisso, and this he doth vntill such time as he hath rolled and wrung all the Greene Herbs in that sort, which he had about his neck; then he takes all the balls or leaues together in his hand, and thereof maketh a ball as bigge as a mans fist, wherewith he wipeth his face, and that also is a Fetisso, which being done the dead bodie shall rest in peace, and therewith he packeth vp all his trinkets, and laieth them aside vntill another time, that some other bodie setteth him a worke. This kind of Superstition they esteeme for a great holinesse for their bodies, for when they goe to warre they hang such beades about their neckes, armes and legges, thinking that their Fetisso will defend them thereby, and preserve them from killing, and thinke that they need not feare any thing. They esteeme the Pittoir also for a god, for when they goe from one Towne to another, and heare it call, they are exceeding ioyfull and glad, for they say that it is a Fetisso, which speaketh vnto them, saying, that all those that then trauell in the way, shall haue no hurt, nor need feare any danger, for he will defend them from all men that seeke to molest them, and wherefoeuer they heare it crie, there they set Millia for him to eate, and pots full of water to drinke, and dare not passe that place without giuing it something, whereby in some corners of streets, and in the Woods you shall see a number of pots, and other meates as Millia, Mais, &c. which they set there to honour the Fetisso the Pittoir, whereby it appeareth that they make great account of Birds and also of some fishes, as of the Tonny, which they by no meanes will take, but esteeme it to be their Fetisso or Sea-god. They take many Sword-fishes, and cutting of the Swords they drie them, which they also esteeme for a great Fetisso. Others put their trust in some trees, and when they desire to know any thing they goe to those trees, where the Deuill oftentimes appears in forme of a blacke Dogge, or of such like things, and many times inuisibly, and maketh answer v no such things as they aske him. So that if you aske them any thing touching their beliefe, and they giue you no answer, which maketh any shew of truth, then they say that their Fetisso said so, and willed them to doe it, for they esteeme him for their god, and vse many foolish toys and vaine shewes when they pray to him, and serue him, thinking that it doth them good, and that they merit much thereby, yet it helpeth them not. But they rather find themselves deceiued, and as they deale with the Deuill, and put their trust in him, so he rewardeth them, and yet they desire not to heare of him, but feare him much.

There are some hills in those Countries, whereon oftentimes it thundereth and lighteneth, and thereby manie times some Fishermen, or other Moorees, are cast away or receiue some great hurt, which causeth them to thinke that their god is angry, and would haue some meate and drinke, or wanteth some other thing, and by that meanes they hold manie hills to be their gods, and set meate and drinke vpon them to pacifie them withall, and they dare not passe along by them, without going vp and giuing them something, fearing that if they did it not, they would doe them some hurt, and make each other beleue such things, and whatfoeuer they beleue, and once conceiue in their heads, it will neuer be extirped, but haue as firme an opinion of their Fetissos as possible may be. But when the Netherlanders saw them vse such vaine toys, which were so foolish, and laught and iested at them, they were ashamed, and durst make no more Fetissos in our presence, but were ashamed of their owne apishnesse.

We asked them of their Beliefe, and what opinion they had of diuers things; as first, when they died what became of their bodies and soules. They made vs answer, that the bodie is dead, but they knew not what any resurrection at the latter day meant, as wee doe: but when they die they know that they goe into another World, but they know not whither, and that therein they differ from brute beasts, but they cannot tell you to what place they goe, whither vnder the Earth or vp into Heauen, but when they die, they vse to giue the dead bodie something to carrie with him, whereby it is to be marked that they beleue that there is another life after this, and that there they haue need of such things as they haue here on Earth, for when they lose any thing, or when any of their friends die, then they thinke that those that are dead came and fetcht it away, and that they had need of it, but they know not what the Soule nor the Resurrection is.

Secondly, asking them of their god, they made answer, that hee is blacke like themselves, and that he was not good, but did them much hurt. Whereunto we said, that our God is white as we are, that he is good, that he doth vs much good, that he descended downe vpon Earth to saue vs, and how he was put to death by the Jewes for our sakes, that when wee die wee goe to dwell with him in Heauen, and that there we neither need meat nor drink, whereat they wondered, and willingly heard vs speake of those things, and said that we were Gods children, and that he told vs all things, but yet they murmured, saying, why doth not your God tell and giue vs all things (as well as he doth to you) and why doth he not also giue vs Linnen, Cloth, Iron, Basons, and other kinds of wares; whereunto we made answer, that our God sent vs all those things, and yet that he forgot not them, (although they knew him not) and sent them Gold, Palme-wine, Millia, Mais, Hennes, Oxen, Goats, Bannanas, Iuiamas, and other fruits, to sustaine them withall, but that they denied, or else they could not conceiue that such things came from God; but to the contrarie said that God gaue them no Gold, but that the Earth gaue it them, wherein they digge to find it: that hee gaue them no Millia nor Corne, but that they sowed it, and reapt it themselves, and that the Earth gaue it them; that the trees which they had planted gaue them their fruits, and were first brought thither by the Portugals; that yong beasts came of the old, that the Sea gaue them fish, which they tooke themselves, with many other such like things, which they would not acknowledge came from God, but from the Earth and the Sea, each according to their natures, but they acknowledge that Raine came from our Sauionr Christ, and that by meanes of our God they had much Gold, for that by meanes of the Raine they found their Gold, and their Fruits and Plants grew, and waxed ripe by meanes of the moysture, and for that we brought them euerie thing readie made to their hands, therefore they thinke that wee find all such things, and need but goe into the fields to fetch them, as they doe their Fruits.

Thunder.

And when it happened that some of our Hollanders being in their Houses, when it beganne to Raine, Blow, Thunder and Lighten (whereof they are in great feare) went forth through the streets, not once shunning the Thunder and Lightning, neither did it once hurt them, they wondred thereat, for they were afraid that if they should come out of their Houses at that time, that it would not be good for them, for that many times, (when it Thundreth and Lighteneth there) it hapneth that some of them that are traouelling abroad, are carried away by the Deuill, and throwne dead vpon the ground, whereby they are as much afraid thereof, as any man possible can be. And for that they know that our God dwels aboue in Heauen, when it Thunders and Lightens they point vpwards, and call him Iuan Goemain. And once wee had a Negro aboard our ship, whom we kept prisoner because he brought false Gold, and gaue it out for good, which Negro euerie morning tooke a Tub with water in it, and washt his face therein, which done, he tooke his hands full of water, and cast it over his head, speaking diuers words vnto himselfe, and after that spit in the water, and vsed many other Apish toyes, which wee seeing, asked him why hee did it, and hee made answere, that hee prayed his Fetisso that it might raine, that so his friends might find much Gold to release him, that hee might goe home againe.

Circumcision.

They circumcise their young children, therein following the Mabometicall Law, with diuers other opinions which they hold thereof, as thinking it euill to spit vpon the Earth, besides many other Superstitions which they vse, but affirme, that they altogether vse those toyes, and only trust in their Fetissos, were an vntruth, for many of them that can speake Portugall (as hauing dealt with them and also daily traffique with vs) beginne to leaue those foolish toyes, and to haue some vnderstanding of Gods Word, which they doe by reason that wee mocke and iest at their foolish Ceremonies, and for that they say that wee are Gods Children, therefore they beleue much of that which we say vnto them, and begin to know God, but it is without any ground, for they grounded in their owne Superstitions, because they are not otherwise instructed.

some smacke of Christianitie.

But the Negros which dwell among the Portugals, know much of God, and can speake of his Commandements, as I haue found some among them, that could tell of the birth of Christ, of the Lords Supper, of his bitter Passion, and death of his Resurrection, and diuers other such like points, concerning our Christian faith; specially, one whom I knew well, and that was my good friend: for he could write and read Portugall, and was indifferent well learned in the Scriptures. And which is more, when we spake vnto him, and argued vpon some points against the Romish faith, or against the Religion which the Portugals had taught him (for he had dwelt with a Monk in the Cattle of Mina) he would dispute the contrary with vs, and shew that it was otherwise set downe in such a Gospel, and in such an Epistle of the Apostles, & that it must so be vnderstood: whereby we may perceiue, that those among them that haue any vnderstanding of the Christian faith, are sharpe witted, and will soone comprehend any thing: but it seemeth, that it hath not pleased God to call them to the vnderstanding of the Christian faith, and therefore we are much bound to prayse and thanke God, that it hath pleased him to vouchsafe vs the knowledge of his holy Word, and to vnderstand and know what belongeth vnto our saluation.

Their houses.

Heir Houses are not very curiously made, but altogether slight, much like to a number of Hog-sties, and I am of opinion, that in many Countreys, there are better Hog-sties then their Houses are; I cannot liken them better to any other thing, then to Souldiers Cabins in Sconces and Bulwarkes: for a man might say, that they haue taken a paterne by them. To build them first, they take foure Posts or Trees, which they thrust deepe

deepe into the ground, which stand foure square; that done, they lay other Beames or Trees vpon them, and bind them fast together; then they take a number of thin small stickes, and inclose their Houses round about, and those they bind very close together, so that you can hardly thrust your hand in betweene them: then they make Morter of a certaine kind of yellow earth, which they find in the fields, and that they beat very small and thin, so long till it be like vnto Pot-earth, which they take in their hands, and dawbe it vpon the smal stickes round about their Houses, from the foot to the top, where they desire to haue it close, and with their hands thrust it in betweene the chinckes of the stickes, that it may hold fast, as if it were betweene Lathes, and when they haue made their Houses close in this manner, which is almost halfe a foot thick
 10 in the wallles; then they let it stand and drie, so hard that it is like vnto stone, and being well dried, then they make an other kind of Morter of Red earth, which is as thin as water, and take a wispe of straw in their hands, and therewith wash all their house round about within; which serueth them in stead of Painting, whereof they make great account, and take a great pride to paint their houses in such sort, some with white, some with red, and others with blacke, as best liketh them; for the first thing they shew you when you come into the Countrey is their houses. To couer them, they take two foure square Couerings of Palme tree leaues: they tie fast together, and so close, that they are able to hold out the Raine, which they lay vpon their houses for the Roofe thereof, and bind them fast together, and when it is faire cleare
 20 Sunne-shine weather, then they open the Roofe of their house, like two wings, vnder-propping it with stickes, and so let the Sunne shine into their houses, and when it raineth, they let them fall downe againe close together. Before their house they make a foure square hole, like a doore, and make a doore of Reeds, which they open and shut, and bind it too with Withes. The floores are flat and very even, couered with Red earth, as if they were paved, and in the middle thereof commonly they make a round hole to fet their pot with Palme wine in, when they drinke together: in this sort they make two or three houses close together, which are placed foure square; and in the middle of them, there is a place wherein the women dresse their meat; in which houses they dwell together, as the women in the one, the man in the other, for they are asunder one from the other, and make as many as they haue need of, and those houses they inclose round about with a pale of Reeds, or straw of Mais, a mans height, or as high as the wallles of their houses, which are also but a mans height: so that if it were not for the couering of the 30 house, which standeth paint-house wise, a man could not goe ypright in their houses. Their houses stand altogether in a heape; but because they separate them one from the other by those pales of Straw, by that meanes they shew like streets, and are somewhat separated one from the other. Their streets are so little and narrow, that but one man alone can goe in them, and when it raineth it is very slipperie to goe in their Townes, because the earth is so fattie, but when the Sunne shines, it drieth vp againe, and becomes as hard as a stone.

When you will goe into one of their houses, you must goe so long through the streets, till you find a doore open, wherein being entred, you must passe through all the Roomes, till you find the place where you would be. Their houses are not very full of House-hold stufte, but commonly they haue wooden Chests, which they buy of the Netherlanders, wherein they locke 40 vp their things, so that you see but little of their House-hold stufte abroad.

The Kings or Gouvernors houses are commonly in the Market places, which are paled alone by themselves, and separated from all the rest, hauing no other neighbours dwelling by him, but onely his wiues and children (for he is commonly better furnished thereof, then the meaner sort of men.) His house is greater and higher then the rest, and hath many roomes which passe one into the other, couered ouer with Reeds, each chamber by it selfe, wherein his men dwell, and his watch stayeth all the day long. In the middle of his house he hath a foure square place all open, but couered ouer for the Sunne, where in the day time he sitteth, with his Gentlemen that come to speake with him, and to passe the time away; at the Kings doore there are alwaies 50 two pots set deepe into the ground, which are full of fresh water, and euery day are fild with new water, which I thinke are set there for their Fetisses to drinke.

Their Townes that stand vpon the Sea-side are not very faire, but rather filthie places, and stinke like carrions, by reason of the filth which they carry and lay without, not farre from them; and many times, when the wind blowes from the Land, you may smell the stinke of them, aboue a mile and an halfe into the Sea. The Townes that lie inward to the Land, are richer of Goods and Gold, then the Sea-townes, and fuller of Houses and Men; besides that, they haue more Merchants dwelling in them: for, those on the Sea-side are not so rich, nor of so great power, as being for the most part Interpreters, Rowers, Pilots, Seruants, Fisher-men, and Slaves to the Inhabitants of the Townes. The King keeps his Court in the neereſt Towne, that standeth within the Land whereof he is King, and placeth a Captaine in the Sea-townes which are vnder his command. The Land-townes are very great, but they haue no Gates, Walls, nor Forts, nor any strength to resist the force of Enemies. I haue heard some of the Negroes that dwell within the Land, say, that there are many great Townes within the Land, much and farre exceeding the Hauen or Sea-townes.

They vse to reckon the Gold Coast to begin from Cape De tres punctas, to Rio de Volta. This Cape De tres punctas lieth vnder foure degrees and an halfe; and because it hath three Points or Heads, which reach into the Sea, therefore it is called the Cape De tres punctas; but, for that the Portugals haue a Castle there, called Aziem, the Negroes are not suffered to deale with the Hollanders.

Eastward fise miles lower there lieth a place, called Anta, and there the ships commonly cast forth their Anchors; for there the Negroes buy much Iron, and are very expert to make Ironworke. Those People traffique much with Palme-wine, whereof they haue great store, as of Hens, Goats; and diuers Fruits, Iugnamas, and Annanasos; and when the time commeth that they draw their Wine out of the Trees, then the Canoes come thither with their Negroes and Merchants, at the least, ten or twentie miles from within the Land to buy Wine, so that it is carried almost all the Coast along, and great traffique made therewith. This Wine they esteeme very good for their men to drinke, because it is not so sweet as the Wine which is farther within the Countrey, which is not mixed with Water, as this Wine is. The other Wine they esteeme to be good to be drunke by their women because it is not mixed, but is exceeding sweet, and soone makes the women merrie. A mile lower lieth Rio de St. Georgio, and a place, called Iabbe, and Cama, where the Portugals also haue a House: and because this Quarter is very fruitfull, there dwells three or foure Portugals there, which receiue the Custome of the Fish, which is taken by the Negroes in the Riuer, and buy great store of other victuals, which they send continually to the Castles of Aziem and Mina, to victuall them withall. Before this Riuer there is a great Sand, which stretcheth farre into the Sea, whereby you cannot enter into it with any ships, but onely with great Canoes. And a mile lower there lieth a Village, by the Negroes, called Agitaky: by the Portugals, Aldea de Torto; and by the Netherlanders, Comando: but yet it is not Comando, although we call it so; for Comando lieth vpon the Hill, where the Kings dwell. They of Edom, Wassa, Comando, and other Townes, come to this Hauen to buy their Wares: there we sell many Venetian Madrigetten, and Corals (for the common people traffique much therewith by grinding and selling them one vnto the other) small Copper Basons, and blue Cloth: broad Linnen is well sold there. In this place men sell not any Wares in great quantities, but all in small parcels; & for that there are so many small parcels sold there, therefore it is the worst place of all that Coast forgiuing of Dachios: and for that their Gold, for the most part, is molten, and cut in smal pieces, therefore there is much deceit therein, for they mixe much yellow Copper among it, and many times bring Copper in stead of Gold; and for those two Points it is the worst place to deale in throughout all the Coast. They haue the greatest number of Canoes in all the Countrey besides; for many times they goe to Sea early in the morning, with seuentie or eightie Canoes, and enter as farre into the Sea as you can well discerne them, and about noone-time they come home againe with their Fish, for there they are very expert in fishing. It is likewise no lesse prouided of Fruits, for there is no place in all the Land, where a man may haue greater store, nor better cheape Fruit, then there, especially a kind of Fruit, called, Bannana; and for that cause it is by vs called, the Fruit Market. When you saile somewhat lower, and are North North-east from the high Hill of Comando, there is a place called, Terra pequina. Neere to that is the Castle of Mina, with a Portugall Garrison to prohibite Trade.

Sailing a long mile lower, you come to a place called, Cape Croffo; this Cape or Point is a great place of traffique, where the French men in time past vsed much to lie with their ships, and to traffique in the Countrey, and in the yeare 1590. or 1591. there was a ship of Deepe set vpon, by them of the Castle of Mina, whereof most of the men were slaine, and the rest made Slaues; and when we began first to traffique there, in the yeare 1592. there were some of our Hollanders slaine in a Boat at the same place; but now the ships begin to traffique there againe, because of the great quantitie of Gold which is brought thither from Foetu, Abrenbon, and Mandinga, and other Townes, which lie aboue two hundred miles within the Countrey. Sailing a mile lower, you come to the chiefe place of Traffique in all the Countrey, called Mourre. A mile lower there lieth a place called, Infantin, and two miles farther there lieth a towne called Cormantin, vnder the King of Foetu. There the Hollanders fetch their hoops, to bind their water vessels withall; for there are the best. Sailing foure miles lower, you come to the high hill of Mango, whereon the Negros offer sacrifice to the Deuill, but there is no Traffique. A mile lower there is a Village called, Biamba, where they keepe good store of Cowes, for it is good Pasture ground. The Inhabitants vse great Traffique along the Coast, by selling their Cattle; and because that there, there are many proper women; diuers of the Negroes come from other places of the Countrey thither to buy women, and to fetch slaues to serue their turnes withall; The Countrey people thereabouts are good husbandmen, and sow much Millie, presse good store of Palme wine, and bring great number of yong Cattle vp. Three miles lower, there lieth a place called, Berqu, the Village lieth vpon a hill, there the French men vsed much to Anchor with their ships. Those people speake another Language, and to that place all the people forwards speake one Language. The people are very Ingenious to make all kind of things, specially of gold, for they can make faire Chaines of gold, with other faire things, as Rings, &c. There they brew a kind of drinke called Pitouw, which is much like small Beere. They haue great store of Hens, and better cheape then in other places: there also they take the greene Birds, called Parrots. The Inhabitants in their time vsed to buy great store of Iron, for they haue many Smithes, whereby they make faire Armes, but now there comes no more ships thither, they goe with their Canoes to Ackra, which lieth foure miles lower; which is a low land vpon the Strand, hauing a halfe tree made in forme of a Gibet, which they esteeme to be their Fetisso. The Portugalls were wont to haue a Castle there, but for some mischiefe that they had done to the Inhabitants, the Negroes tooke their Castle by force, slew all the Portugalls, and brake downe

 10 the Castle. There againe they vse another Language, they are a craftie and subtle people, and the subtillest of all that Coast, both for Traffique and otherwise. They haue very few Canoes to fish or goe to Sea withall; but those they haue are very great, for I haue seene one that was cut out of a tree, which was fise and thirty foot long, and fise foot broad, and three foot high, which was as bigge as a Shallop; so that it would haue held thirty men at the least. They come not often to buy wares, but obserue certaine dayes in the weeke to that purpose, and then they come with great store of money, bringing the gold as it is found in the hilles. Two miles below that, there lieth a place, called Nengo. A mile lower, lieth Temin; And a mile lower then that, another place, called Chinka, where the Hollanders begin to place boats to traffique with the Negroes, which from the yeere one thousand sixe hundred, was first begun to be known vnto vs.

20 They make warre for a small matter, for the Kings are so enuious and angry one against the other, and so proud, that they cannot endure their equalls; whereupon they challenge one the other to the Battell, and to fight together in the field. The King giues warning to the Townes vnder his command, to will the Captaines with their men to come to him, to fight against the enemies: their enemies likewise doe the like, and so make preparation to fight one against the other. The Kings of those Townes haue certaine men, that are their Souldiers or slaues (which are as much as Souldiers) who euery day watch in the Kings house, and are as it were his guard. They are very proud of their offices, and in the streets they goe stately, looking vpon themselves, some times striking with their armes ouer their heads, and sometimes leaping backward and forwards, and round about; looking fiercely, as if they would deuoure all the 30 world. They goe to the warres with the King, and if not then, they stay continually with him, to guard his person: and when the time commeth that they must fight, euery one prepareth himselfe thereunto, in the best manner that hee can. First, they paint their faces with colours, some Red, others White, and others Yellow; and also their breasts and the whole bodies with Crosses, Strikes, and Snakes, and many such like things; They also take their Beads with them, wherewith they make their Fetissos, and hang them about them, and thinke when they haue them about them, that their Fetissos will defend them, and that they shall not be slaine. They make and wreath a Ring of boughes of trees, as thicke as a mans arme, which they put about their neckes, to beare off the blowes of their Knives, in stead of Gorgets; on their heads they weare Caps made of Libards or Crocodiles skins: on their bodies they weare a Cloth Gir-
 40 dle which they thrust betweene their legges with a peece of Cloth of a handfull broad, to couer their priuities withall; for then they weare as few clothes on their backs as they can, that they may not be cumbred therewith when they fight, in their Girdles they sticke a hewing Knife or a Poniard; in their left hands bearing their shields, which are almost as long and as broad as themselves, in their right hands they hold their Affagaies, wherewith they sling each at other, some of them haue two, some three, foure, or more as they are able, and such as are not able, to haue shields and Affagaies, they carrie Bowes and sheaues of Arrowes, made of 50 skins, full of smal Arrowes with Iron heads at the ends, wherewith they wil shoot most cruelly. The Boyes or Seruants carrie the Drums into the warres, whereon they play, others haue hornes of Elephants Teeth, wherewith they blow. When all is prepared, and euerie Morinni or Gentleman with his men are readie, they all meet at the Kings Court, and so goe with their Wiues, Children, and all their Household together to the Warres, where the battaile should bee fought, and if it be a Warre which concerneth them much, and wherewith they are much moued, and prouoked to ouercome their Enemies, then they burne their owne Houses, and all their Townes, that their Enemies may haue no such aduantage against them, as also because their minds should not be moued to looke and harken home-ward, but rather to giue them the better courages to set vpon their Enemies. But if it be a Warre of no great importance, and that will be soone ended, then they burne not their Houses nor take not their wiues and children with them, but they leaue their Townes, and send their wiues and children to the next place, with whom they haue no enmitie, which take all their household-stuffe with them, leauing their exceeding strait, right and sure with their Assagaies, that they will not faile to hit a Stiuer or piece of monie as bigge as a Groat, the rest shoot with poysoned Arrowes. The Drummes and Hornes are heard to make a great noise when they fight together, and in this Warre whosoever is taken Prisoner they make him a slaue all his life long, and such as are slaine, their bodies are drest and eaten as good meate. Their Warres are not so cruell as they seeme, nor according to the noise and preparation by them made, and their Warre continueth not long, but is soone ouer-past and ended. They also burne each others Houses and Townes, and driue the Inhabitants out of them.
 60 Houses emptie, without any kind of thing in them, as if they had wholly abandoned their Townes, and when their Warre is ended, then their wiues and children rturne againe to their owne Townes withall their stuffe.

Securitie.

It hapneth oftentimes, that although they haue no great controuersie with each other, they make peace together, promising not to warre one against the other, and to assure and confirme their promises, they beleue no words, but they send each other a man for a suretie, whom they keepe by them, and this man whom they deliuer in this sort for a suretie, is one of the chiefe of their Towne, who being brought to the place where he must remaine by the Kings slaues, he himsele being brauely drest, and sitteth vpon a slaues sholder, and in that sort is carried to the King, and to him they shew much honour, and yet they watch him narrowly.

They also buy many Peeces, and begin to learne to shoot in them, and haue the vnderstanding to know that a long Peece carrieth further then a short, which both the Portugals and wee also teach them. They are very expert in making of Armes, for they make Poniards of an ell long without hilts and foure fingers broad, with two edges, the handle being of wood, with a pummell at the end, they couer the handle ouer with a plate of Gold, or with the skinne of a certaine kind of fish which they take, which with them is esteemed as much as Gold is with vs, they make sheathes of Dogs or Goates skinnies, and aboue at the end of the sheathe, in stead of a chape they put a great red shell, as broad as a mans hand, which is in great estimation with them, others that haue not the abilitie to buy such shels, make or buy hewing Kniues in fashion like a Gammon of Bacon, broad at the end and narrow before, which cut but on the one side, and in stead of a red shell, they trimme them with an Apes or a Tygres head, and those they sticke in their Girdles, on the one side, and weare them as they goe along in the streets, and carrie their Assagaies in their hands, and if they haue a seruant or a slaue, they make him beare their Assagay and Shield before them, and they follow them with a staffe in their hands. The Merchants trauell in the Countrie with their Armes, and their seruants or slaues likewise carrie Armes with them, who commonly haue Bowes and Arrowes, because they are Weapons which are least cumbersome to bee carried, for they can carrie them about their neckes.

Their Armes

Their Assagaies are made of diuers fashions and of many sorts, but for the most part of Iron, at least two foot at both ends, and that part which they hold in their hands is of wood, both the ends are as heauie of Iron one as the other, because they should weigh an euen weight, and for that one should not be heauier then the other, for if it should they could not strike nor cast right with them. They are very curious of their Armes, for they will alwaies haue sixe or seuen of those Assagaies in their Houses, which stand in the ground one by the other, with their Shields hanging by them; those Shields they make of wooden hoopes, which they fold one within the other, and so make them foure square, but some-what bowing like a Buckler, and they are commonly six foot long, and foure foot broad, in the middle they make a crosse of wood, and bind it vpon the rest of the hoopes, to hold them the faster together, thereof also they make their handles whereon they beare their Shields: some of them of the better sort couer their Shields ouer with an Oxe-hide, and put a plate of Iron vpon it two foot long, and a foot broad. They make great account of their Shields, thinking that vnder them they haue a great safeguard for their bodies. They make their Bowes of very hard wood, the stringes are made of the barkes of trees, their Arrowes are of thinne and tuffe wood, the Feathers are made of the haire of a Dogges skinne, wherewith they couer almost halfe their Arrowes, and on the ends they put small Iron heads, which heads when they goe to warre one against the other, they anoint with poyson, which is the iuyce of certaine Greene Herbs, but they must not carrie such poysoned Arrowes but in time of warre, and that vpon paine of a great forfeit, or some other punishment to be inflicted vpon them that beare such Arrowes about them, their sheafes they make of Goats skinnies, which they hang about their neckes, and put their Arrowes into it. Their Drums are made of hollow trees, which are couered ouer with Buckes skinnies, with wooden pinnes, and strike vpon them with wooden stickes made like Spooones or Ladels. Those Drums commonly lie before the Kings Captaines and Guards Houses, and are sometimes twentie foot long, whereon they play when the King makes a Feast. They also make smaller Drums of hollow trees, which they hang about their neckes, and goe about the Towne, playing on them, those Drums are round aboue, and vnder very narrow like a funnell, no man may vse them but Gentlemen. They make Hornes of Elephants Teeth, and race them finely with manie stickes in them, and in the middle of the Horne they make a small hole which is foure square, and blow at that, but no man may vse them but only the King or the Captaine.

Choice of the King.

They choole their Kings by the most voices and consents of the common people, for their King-

Kingdomes are not successiue to any of their children or Kinsmen, but when their King is dead, they choose another to gouerne them, and to possesse the Kingdome, and hee dwelleth in the deceased Kings Court, and possesseth all that he findeth therein, at his first entrie into the Kingdome, he must buy good store of Cowes, and Palme-wine, and bestow a Banket vpon his subiects, for they make great account of a King that is liberall, and feasteth them, but if their King be couetous, and seeketh to heape vp good store of Gold, they hate him, seeking all the meanes they can to find some cause to driue him out of his Kingdome, and to choose a better according to their minds. As it hapned in my time to the King of Saba, (who had bene King of Infantim) and was made King of Saba, whom they draue out of his Kingdome, and taking all his goods from him, made him goe to Infantim againe, from whence he came, and chose another in his place that pleased them better. And for that cause, the King that will bee well beloued of his subiects, euerie three monethes when his Guard or Customers come to pay him that which they haue receiued at the Sea-side, and of the Countrey people for custome, he must make a Banquet, and spend more then he receiue at that time, and then he biddeth his Morrimis (which is as much to say as a Gentleman or one of his Counsell) and buyeth many Cowes or Oxen, and also all the Palme-wine in the Countrey, that he can get which is giuen by him to the common people, who at that time are very merrie and ioyfull, singing and playing vpon their Drums. The heads of the Cowes are made cleane and fairely painted and hanged full of Fetissoes, which done, they are hang'd very orderly in the Kings thamber one vnder the other, in stead of Pictures, and for a great honour vnto the King, whereby such strangers as come to the Kings Court, may perceiue that he is a good King, and for that cause is much esteemed and beloued of his people. Besides this, they hold another Feast day euerie yeare, as being the day of their Coronation or their Fetissoes day, then the King inuitheth his Neighbour Kings and Captaines, with all his Gentlemen to a Banquet, and makes a great Feast, and that day he prayeth to his Fetisso, and he himselfe sacrificeth vnto him, which he doth but once a yeare. This Fetisso is the highest tree in the Towne, which is the Kings Fetisso, vpon this Festiuall day they vse manie Apish Toyes, as Fencing, Drumming, singing and leaping, the women also are verie merrie and dance, and euerie King holdeth his Feast day apart, and they doe it one soone after the other, which they doe in their Summer time.

The Kings Feasts

His wiues.

His Guard.

His Viador, or Treasurer.

His children.

- 30 On their Sunday at night the King makes a Feast, and buyes vp all the Palme-wine which is drawne out of the Trees that day, and biddeth his wiues and children to Supper, and his chiefest Gentlemen, at which time they are verie merrie, for hee eates but one day in a weeke with his wiues and children, and that is vpon their Sunday. These women are verie seruiceable to the King their Husband, and euerie one of them feasteth him to winne his loue, so that he wanteth no seruice at their hands: euerie one of his wiues hath his goods and riches apart by her selfe, and keepeth and feedeth her owne children, and shee that is in fauour with the King, wanteth nothing.
- 40 When the Kings wiues go abroad, they leane vpon the shoulders of other women that serue them, and are their slaues, and their children are also carried vpon the shoulders of other of the Kings slaues, hee himselfe commeth little abroad, but stayeth alwayes in his House, sometime he sitteth at his doore but not often, his House is watcht both day and night by his slaues, which watch armed in his Court, and in his Chamber, and when he goeth out they attend on him and goe round about him. In the morning betimes and late in the euening, his slaues blow those Hornes of Elephants Teeth, which make a prettie sound, for they haue the slight to draw their breath in and out as they list, and can answere one the other when they blow, when the King comes out of his Chamber, his wiues stand readie to attend on him, to wash his bodie all ouer, and then to anoint it with Palme-oile, after that hee eateth some-what, and so sets himselfe downe vpon a stoole, and in his hand hee holdeth a Horle or an Elephants tayle to keepe the Flies from his naked bodie, he is brauely drest after this manner; his Beard is knotted with golden Corals, and other costly things, on his armes and legges hee hath Rings of Gold and other faire Beades of Corall, and the like also about his necke, and so hee sitteth all the day talking with one or other, for he wanteth no company to passe the time away, they haue one attending on them, whom they call Viador (which word they haue learned of the Portugals) hee is the Kings Treasurer, and keepeth his Gold and other Riches, receiue and payeth all, and doth all other busineses for the King. This man is next vnto the King, and he commonly hath more golden Rings about his necke, armes and feet, then the King himselfe. When the Kings children are of some yeares, if they will haue any thing they must looke to get it, for the King may giue them nothing to liue idly vpon, for the common people would murmure at it, if the King should giue somewhat vnto them, he might doe wrong to his Gentlemen, but hee giueth them their Patrimoniall goods when they marrie as their custome is; and besides, that he giueth them euery one a slaue to serue their turnes with all, and they haue nothing else of their Fathers, whereby it falleth out, that when they waxe old, and seeke not to doe any thing, they are no more respected then another man is. The King keepes them with him to serue him, and when he maketh peace with any other Towne or King, then he imploresth his children, and sends his sonnes sonnes for hostages, that they may begin to be honored, and thereby attaine to great estate: the reuenues of the Fruits, Fish, Wine, and Palme-oile, which the King hath, are sufficient to maintaine the King, and his Wives, and Children. His Millie, whereof he maketh Bread, is sowed and reaped for him, at other mens charges; whereby he hath a good life (but yet miserable in respect of ours.) When the King dies he is honourably buried after their manner, and then presently they choose another, one that is not of the last Kings kindred; but they choose a strange man, whom they thinke good; and by no meanes they will choose any that in any point held with, or fauoured the last King. Having made him King, they bring him to the Palace, and he taketh the gouernment vpon him, and hath all the treasure and goods of the dead King, which he got during the time of his Raigne; and that he holdeth, so that the dead Kings Children enioy not a penie: but that which he had when he was chosen King, that they take and part among them, as their custome is. 16

Lawyers.

They vse no Counsellors, nor Attorneys, but euery man must tell his owne tale to the Iudge, who sends for the accused partie; after whose answere, the Plaintiffe speaketh againe: and in this sort they are each of them heard to speake foure or fve times, and when the one speaketh the other must hold his peace till he hath done, for they must not interrupt one the other when they speake, vpon paine of corporall punishment, so that although they bee wild men, and without any ciuilitie or good behauiour; yet therein they vse a very good and laudible custome. When the Iudge hath heard them say what they can, according to his owne mind, hee giueth Iudgement, which they must stand vnto without appeale. If it bee any thing concerning the King, whereby he is to haue any forefeiture or otherwise, the Iudge receiueth it, and demandeth it of him that is to pay it, in the Kings name, which he must pay presently without delay, and if he be not able to doe it, he must presently depart from thence to another Towne, or some other Kings Iurisdiction, and there stay till he hath contented his King, & payed his Fine. If it be a controuersie which is to be determined among them, and they cannot agree thereon, then they will seeke to kill each other, or challenge their aduerse parties to fight with them, appointing a day and place when they will meet with their Armes to end or determine their controuersie. In the meane time they make their cause knowne to some of their friends, and desire their helpe, (for each of them may haue three or foure men to helpe them) and commonly they are of their neereft friends and kindred; and when their appointed day is come, each of them goeth with his companions to the same place, and when they meet together with their Shields and Asagaies to defend themselves withall, they place themselves orderly in the field one right ouer against the other, the Plaintiffe and the Defendant standing in the middle, and so begin to cast and shoot at each other with their Asagaies, and shoot in that sort so long vntill that some of them on both sides are hurt, and fall to the ground. Then they cease their Fight, and so their quarrell endeth. But his side on whom the dead man is found to be slaine, or that hath lost the victorie, come to the other partie and desire to haue the man out of their companie, that was the cause of that Combat, in stead of the dead man that is slaine. And if he runneth away, and getteth to another Towne, they will follow him, and will neuer leaue before they haue gotten him into their hands, and none of their Kings may giue such a man freedome, nor keepe him secretly in his Towne, but if he can find him in his Towne, he must deliuer him to those that seeke after him, and if he doth it not, then they make complaint to their King, and so, many times one King makes warre vpon another for that cause; when they haue found him, he is deliuered to the wife the dead man, and shee keepeth him for her Slaue, or else shee sells him to another: but if hee hath any meanes to pacifie the woman, or the friends of that man, and to redeeme himselfe out of bondage, he may doe it, and goe freely abroad. They are very great controuersies that are ended in this manner, for they are no common men that end their quarrels in such sort. 20

Combats.

Their Lawes and execution of Iustice.

The Plaintiffe certifies the Captaine, who causeth a Drum to be sounded by one of his Slaues, and he goeth round about the Towne with the Drum about his necke, and with him there goeth two boyes more, each with a Cow-bell in their hands, without Clappers, and they strike vpon them with stickes made of wood, and when they haue gone in this sort round about the Towne (which is a signe vnto the people that Iustice is to be executed) then the Captaine with his Gentlemen comes and sit round together in the Market-place; each man with his Armes, wherewith all the people assemble together, knowing not what the matter is, and goe to the Market-place, where their common assemblies are made, the women standing in one place, the men in another, to heare what the Captaine will say; and he that is accused is presently taken, and kept prisoner in the Captaines house, and if it be a weightie matter, he is bound; if otherwise, he is onely kept by the Executioner, and he must not depart from thence before his cause be tried, in the meane time, the Captaine with his Gentlemen sit still in the Market-place, to heare the complaints made against the Prisoner, and send him word by his Slaues what accusations are laid against him, whereunto he must presently, without delay, make answere; otherwise, if he cannot excuse himselfe, he must pay the penaltie which he hath incurred; and if he cannot pay it, he must in the Kings behalfe be sold as a Slaue, towards the payment of his Fine, and euer after, while he liueth, he must be a Slaue: but if he hath done any offence that deserueth 30

ueth death, he may redeeme his life with money, if hee can agree with the King, and content him; which money is diuided among the Morinni, which haue the one halfe, and the King the other halfe, without giuing any to the friends of the dead man. And if it be one that hath incurred the danger of paying a Fine for lying with another mans wife, being accused to haue won her thereunto by false promises or by force, and hath not kept his promise with her; then the King first taketh all his goods from him, as forfeit vnto him; and the woman must pay two or three ounces of gold for a Fine vnto her husband, or as he fauoreth her, and she can agree with him; otherwise he may put her away, and take another wife, and the womans friends goe and burne, or pull downe the mans house that hath done the fact, and doe him all the mischief they can, to make him to leaue the Towne, that they may heare no more of him. In my time, while I lay there, it hapned that a man came from one Towne to another, to gather vp his debts, which man a yeere before had layne with another mans wife, and the same woman was then by chance come to the same Market, and seeing him, went straight and complained to the Ane, (which is the Captaine) who presently caused him to be taken; and their Counsell being assembled, there before them the woman complained that he had forced her, and had not paid her according to his promise: he made answere, that he did it with her good-will, and although neither of them both were of that Towne, yet their cause was heard, and as good Iustice vsed towards them, as if they had beene Inhabitants of that place, and after long disputation by them made, the Fetissero (which is the Priest that coniureth their Fetissos or gods) came thither with a certaine Drinke in a pot, and set it downe before the Captaine, the woman tooke the pot and drunke thereof, to iustifie that he had not contented her for the losse of her honour; and if hee would haue drunke thereof before the woman drunke, to iustifie that he had paid her, and owed her nothing, then he had beene quit from paying any thing; but knowing himselfe to be guiltie, he durst not drinke, but was found guiltie, and was iudged to pay a Fine of three Bendaes, which is sixe ounces of gold.

This Drinke among them is as much as an Oath, and is called Enchionkenon; which they make of the same Greene herbs whereof they make their Fetissos; and as they say, it hath such a force, that if a man drinketh it falsely, their Fetisso causeth him presently to die; but if they drinke it innocently, then their Fetisso suffereth them to liue. By reason of the great hatred and enuie which they beare one vnto the other, they accuse each other, although it bee for a thing that hath beene done ten yeeres before, so that there is no quarrell but it is called in question. And if a man hath married or bought the sister of that man that is to pay a Fine vnto the King, and is not able to doe it, then his sisters husband must ioyne with him to doe it, and helpe him to pay his Fine, so they dwell both vnder one Iurisdiction, and for that they must agree together; for before all things the King must be paid his Fines, by one meanes or other, or else they must goe out of his Countrey, and dwell in another place; and so if he be not able to pay his Fine, then he taketh all his Wiues and Children, and goeth to another Towne, and which is more, all the friends they haue dwelling in that Towne must also goe with him, and dwell all in that place, vntill they haue agreed with, and paid the King his Fine: and when they come againe, then they goe to all their acquaintance and aske them forgiuenesse, and seeke and make peace and friendship with them, as they had before; the man going to his friends, and the woman to hers. The cause why their friends also depart and leaue the Towne, is, because they should not bee molested nor troubled by the King for the same. The Fine which they pay for Theft, is sixe ounces of gold, or three Bendaes of their weight; for in that Countrey they are not put to death for it. But if they steale any thing from the Netherlanders, they pay no Fine, but onely when they steale one from another. If any man hath falsified Gold, and carried it to the Netherlanders, and that they complaine thereof vnto the King; he must pay a Fine for it, as the case requireth. If much Gold bee falsified, many times they are sold for Slaues. And all these Fines are the Kings, to maintaine his expences. If it be a case wherein any man hath deserved death, and that he cannot pay the King but with his life, then he is iudged to die, and without any more delay, the Executioner, or hee that is appointed to doe it, taketh him, and bindeth his hands behind him, and then couering his eyes, leadeth him into a Field, or a Wood, or where he thinketh best, (hauing no place purposely appointed to doe it in) and being there, maketh him kneele downe, and stoope with his head, and taking an Affagaie, steppeth backe, and strikes him into the bodie, wherewith he falleth downe, then he takes his cutting Knife, and cuts off his head, and then hee is dead; for they beleue not that a man is dead before his head is cut off, and therefore when they put any man to death, they cut off his head; which done, hee cuts his bodie in foure quarters, and casts them into the field, to bee deuoured by Beasts and Birds. But their friends come and fetch the head, and keepe it for a great Present, seething it in a Kettle, and then eate the broth thereof; which done, they take the bare Scull, and hang it by their Fetisso. The women at that time make a great noise with crying and howling, and take the quarters, and carrie them into the fields: when the execution is done, there are no Officers by, but onely the Executioner and the Partie that is to be executed; but when it is done, then they come about him, and lament the dead man, as aforesaid.

For

Lacedemonians
Theeues.

For stealing, I am of opinion, that of all the Nations in the World, they haue not their Masters. They esteeme it a shame to steale one from another, but when they haue stolne any thing from the Netherlanders, they esteeme it to be a credit vnto them and bragge thereof, for they esteeme vs to be craftie and subtill men, and when they haue stolne any thing from vs, they thinke themselves to be the subtiller and craftier, and seeke to bee honoured for doing so braue an action.

Lacedemonians.

Lead, that is nayled without vpon the ships, to keepe them from being eaten by Wormes, rustie Nayles, Greale, Weights (which they hide in their Haire, Mouthes, or Eares) any other small matters are exercise of their Theft; yea, although they be neuer so great Merchants, and bestow two or three pound of Gold with you for Merchandize, and haue no need to steale, but if any thing bee taken from them, they make so many words and such a noyse, as if it were a matter worthy of death.

They say that they may steale, and we not: I askt them the cause why; they made answer, that we are rich and had great store of wares, and brought ships full vnto them, and tooke great paines and labour to sell it, and were so long before we sold it, that they thought it fit to helpe vs therein, that we might the sooner be rid thereof, that we might fetch others, and that wee were clothed, and they went naked, and had nothing vpon their bodies, and that therefore it was freer for them then for vs to steale. When they haue taken any thing and that you misse it, you must presently search them all, for they steale very cunningly, and giue it one vnto the other, and when they come together they part it among them; when you haue found it, and know who stole it, then you must beat him well, be he neuer so great a Merchant, and the rest of the Negroes will laugh at him and mocke him, because hee did his businesse no better: but when they perceiue that their Theft is discovered, then they leape ouer-boord and get away, fearing to be beaten, and if you let them goe and beate them not at that time when you take them, then they feare a greater matter and expect more blowes, and that you will intrap them, and therefore they will commonly euer after shunne that ship and goe aboard another: but if you beate them for their labours when they doe it, they will not hate you for it, nor shunne the Ship, but will come the next day againe to deale and traffique with you.

Promises.

In their Promises or Oathes which they make vnto vs, they are vnconstant and full of vn-truth, but such promises as they make among themselves, they keepe and obserue them well, and will not breake them: when they make any Oathes or Promises, specially, when they will shew it to our Netherlanders. First, they wipe their faces vpon the sole of your foot, and then doe the like vpon their shoulders and brests, and vpon all their bodies, speaking thrice each to other, saying, Iau, Iau, Iau, euerie time clapping hands together, and stamping with their feet vpon the ground, which done, they kisse their Fetisso, which they haue vpon their legges and armes: some for the more assurance of their Promises and Oathes, will drinke certaine drinke, as I haue said before: but he that should repose much trust therein, should soone find himselfe deceiued, because they are not to be credited further then you see them.

Oathes.

¶ VI.

Of their Summer and Winter; And of their manner of Tilling and Sowing the Land; Their Corne, Rents, Raines; Beasts and Hunting: Fowles, Trees, and Fruits.

Barren Summer and fertile Winter.

Although it is alwayes warme in those Countries, yet they haue a difference in the time of the yeare, and so they account some monethes for their Summer, and some for their Winter. The difference which they haue therein is the weather; for both in Summer and Winter the trees are greene, and some of them haue leaues twice a yeare. In Summer their fields are bare, and in Winter they are full of Corne, and are very greene, so that they haue their Haruest in Winter. The Dayes and Nights are of one length, or else there is little difference: for the Sunne riseth and goeth downe there, commonly at sixe of the clocke, but it is risen at least halfe an houre aboue the Horizon, before it sheweth it selfe, so that you shall seldome see it cleerely rise and goe downe. The Fruits are there as plentiful and abundant in Winter, as in Summer. When the weather is warmest, and that the Sunne is aboue their heads. They esteeme that time to be their Winter, which beginnes in the monethes of April, May, and Iune; because as then it raineth and is very foule weather there with Thunder and Lightning, (which the Portugals call, Tranados, and they Agombreton) which foule weather and raine followeth the Sunne, and riseth vp with his highth, at that time they are most cumbred with raine: but in their Summer they are not so much troubled with it, but then the Earth dryeth and is hard and vnfruitfull, and therefore they shunne that time to sow their Millie and Mais in, but when that time is gone, to beginne their Husbandrie, they goe into the Woods or Fields, and there seeke out a good place, which they thinke fit for their pur-purpose to sow their Corne in, to serue to maintaine their Wines and Children.

No man hath any Land to himselfe which he can or may keepe to his owne vse, for the King hath all the Woods, Fields, and Land in his hands; so that they may neither sow nor plant therein but by his consent and licence, which, when they haue obtained, and haue a place permitted them to sow their Corne in, then they goe with their slaues and burne the Woods, trees, roots and shrubs with all the rubbish downe to the ground: then they goe with their long chopping-knives which they call Coddon, and scrape and raze vp the ground with Colen (and all that serueth them to fatten their ground) about a foot deepe, and let it lye eight or ten dayes, and when all of them haue tilled their ground, euery man makes readie his seed to sow it with all, vpon their Sunday, and then they go to their Kings or Gouvernors House, of that quarter: for, first, they helpe to till his ground, and to sow his Corne, and go all together to his field, and take all the rubbish out of the Earth and cast it into the middle of the field, and then once againe rake the Earth and sow their Corne in the field. They begin vpon a Sunday, and first serue their Gouvernour or King, and when they haue done his worke, the Captaine sendeth into the field a great number of Pots with Palme-wine, and a sod Goat, with good store of other meat, according to the number of Workmen, and there they sit downe together and make good cheare, and at that time they burne the roots, and sit and sing and make a great noise about them, all in the honour of their Fetisso, to the end that he should let their Corne grow well and prosperously vp. When their Captaines or Kings Land is tilled and sowed, the next day they goe to another mans ground, and doe with it as they did with the Kings ground, and there also make good cheere as they did before, and are merrie together, and so forth with the rest whome they helpe. The Corne soone groweth vp, and lyeth not long in the ground: when it is as high as a mans head, and beginnes to sprout, then they make a wooden House in the middle of the field, couered ouer with Reeds, and therein put their Children to watch the Corne, and to driue away the Birds, wherewith they are much cumbred. They weed not their Corne, but let it grow vp weeds and all.

Their Husbandrie.

The Millie hath long eares, and is a seed of colour like Hempe-seed, and long like Canarie-seed, it hath no shels, but groweth in a little huske, and is very white within. This kind of graine they alwayes had, and serue their turnes therewith before the Portugals came thither. It groweth and is ripe in three months, and when it is cut down, it lyeth a month after in the fields to dry, and then the eares are cut off and bound in sheafes, and so carryed home to their Houses. They vse the straw to couer their Houses withall. This Millie is a verie excellent graine, hath a good taste and is wholsome to eate, it is sweet in your mouth, but gnasheth in your teeth, which commeth of the stone wherewith they grind it. When they haue vsed the Land, and their Haruest done, then they sell part of their Corne to other men, which are not able to sow it, and by that meanes get a good quantitie of Gold; they giue some to their King for the rent of his Land, and carrie it home to his House, euery one as much as he thinketh good. For there is no certaine summe appointed for them to pay, but euery one giueth according to his abilitie, and the quantitie of ground that he hath vsed, and bringeth it vnto the King, so that hee hath at least fise or sixe Bendas of Gold of them at one time, which they carrie altogether to their King, who welcommeth them, and thanketh them for their Dache or Gift, and for their labours giueth them their bellies full of meate and drinke, and that they pay to the King for the farme of his Land, and no more.

Millie.

The Corne by the Indians called Mais, by the Portugals or Spaniards, Indian-wheat, and by the Italians, Turkish-corne, is a Graine almost knowne throughout all the World, and was brought out of West India into Saint Thomas Iland, and they of Saint Thomas (after they had built their Castle) brought it thither for to serue their necessitie withall, and sowed it there, for before the Portugals came into those Countries, the Indians knew it not, but they sowed it first in that Countrey, and disperfed it abroad among the wild Indians, so that now the Countrey is full thereof, and at this present there is great abundance in Guinea. They vse to mixe it with their Millie, and sometimes take halfe Millie and halfe Mais. The Negroes that dwell among the Portugals, grind it alone without any Millie, and make excellent bread thereof, wherewith they sustaine themselves, and sell it to the Portugals: they know how to bake it in such sort, that it will endure good three or foure monethes. The Children also eate it in stead of bread, which they set awhile vpon the fire, and then crush the Corne out of the huskes, such as eate much thereof and are not vsed vnto it, vse to bee Scuruie and Itchie, or else to bee troubled with great bloud Veines, for it increaseth bloud: it is no lesse nourishing then Corne in the Netherlands, and in a manner tasteth like our Corne.

Their Mais.

The people of the West Indies can make Wine of Mais, which they call, Chicka, wherewith they will make themselves drunke, as if it were of Wine made of Grapes, and for that they know, that Corne sodden or steeped in water maketh a kind of drinke, wherewith a man may make himselfe drunke. Therefore they lay this kind of Graine to soake in the water till it is soft, and then they brew thereof, as some of the Negroes in Guinea, which deale with the Portugals, also doe, and call it Poisson.

This Mais will grow in a moyst fatty and hot ground, and beares twice a yeere: it is not sowed like other Corne, but it is thrust into the ground, as we vse to doe Beanes in our Countrey: it lieth not long in the ground, but soone springeth vp, and groweth higher then a mans length above the ground, like to great Reeds that grow in the water, or in drowned land, where-with husbandmen vse to couer their shades: euery Reed hath his eares whereon the Corne groweth, and notwithstanding, that they are heauy eares, as big as yong Cucumbers, and sharpe about like the top of a Steeple, yet euery Reed hath seuen or eight eares vpon it. I haue told five hundred and fiftie Graines vpon one Reed, which came of one Graine alone. They are of diuers colours, as White, Blacke, Yellow, Purple, &c. and sometimes you shall haue three or foure colours thereof in one eare. There are two sorts thereof, great and small, the great Graine is stronger then the small. They vse the Reed to couer their houses.

Raine hurtfull. They shun the Raine, and esteeme it to be very ill and vnwholesome to fall vpon their naked bodies, which they doe not without great reason, for wee find our selues to bee much troubled therewith, when we trauell, specially when it raineth much, and maketh great Trauados, as it doth once a yeere. In those Countreys, which is in Aprill, May, and Iune; at which time there are such Tempests of Thunder, Lightning, wind, and Raine, that it is incredible, specially the Raine vnder the Equinoctiall Line, is so vnwholesome and rotten, that if a man hath bene in the Raine, and is thorow wet, and so lieth downe to sleepe in his Cabin, in his wet clothes, without putting them off, he is in danger to get some sicknesse; for it breedeth Feuers: and againe, if you drie not your wet clothes presently in the Sun, but forgetting them, chance to let them lie, they will rot with the force of the water, in such sort, that you may plucke them in peeces with your fingers. And they find no lesse vnwholesomenesse therein; for when it begins to Raine, they get them out of the way, and if any drops of water fall vpon their naked bodies, they shiuer and shake, as if they had a Feuer, and cast their armes ouer their shoulders to keepe the Raine from them: which they doe not, because the water is cold, for often times it is as warme as if it were sodden: but because of the vnwholesomenesse for their bodies, which they find thereby. And when they haue troden in the day time in the water with their feet, at night they make a fire, and lie with their soles of their feet against it, which they doe, to draw the moysture of the water, which is gotten into their bodies, out againe at their feet: then they anoint their bodies with Palme Oyle, which they vse also for a beautifying to make their bodies shine, and that they doe to shunne the Raine water within those Countreys (as many men write) is very vnwholesome, and thereof many and dangerous diseases are ingendred.

I haue omitted the fish and fishing: their beasts, &c. They haue Elephants, Leopards, Tigers, Cats of the Mountaine, Monkeys, Foxes, Harts and Hinds; it is said, that in this Countrey there are white Elephants: but I could neuer vnderstand it from the Negros themselves.

Great Snakes. There are the greatest and most venomous Snakes that euer was seene, there was one in my time taken there (as the Negroes told me) which was thirty foot long, and as much as fixe men could carrie; There is also a beast like a Crocodile, but it neuer goeth into the water, as the Crocodile doth; which is called Languad.

Spiders. There are Spiders as big as the palme of a mans hand, and great store of them. Camelions and Agtissen a great number, but they esteeme not them to be venomous, for they drie many of them & eat them. There are many Dogs & Cats, such as we haue, but their Dogs haue sharper snowts then ours, and their chaps full of wooll, they cannot barke nor make a noise, they are very faire beasts for colour, as blacke, red, white, and yellow Spaniels, &c. They are also a little smaller footed then ours, so that they are not much vnlike the Dogs in our Countrey, but they are vnlike to ours in one thing, for when you strike them, they run away, and make no noise, nor once offer to bite you; but when you run away from them, and are afraid of them, they will leape at you, and bite you by the legges: those Dogs they vse for their necessitie, and eate them, and in many places of the Countrey they are brought and driuen to the Market like sheepe or hogges, being tied one to the other with strings, they are called Ekie, or Cabra de matto, which is a wild sheepe, it is the first gift which a man of that Countrey giueth when he buyeth his Gentilitie, they make much of our Dogs in these Countreys, for when they barke, they thinke they speake; and for that cause esteeme greatly of them.

Cats. Cats also are there much esteemed, because they take Mice, wherewith the Inhabitans of the Townes are much troubled, they are called Ambaio, they haue very faire skins, and are very good Mousers, they vse also to eate them, they were first carried hither out of Europe.

Elephants. If they know where any Elephants are, they vse all the meanes they can to take them, for they eate them also, although they should stinke like a Carrion, and that a thousand Maggots crept out of them. Where they know that they vse often times to come, they make great pits, which they couer ouer with straw and foule leaues of trees, which the Elephant knowing nothing of, goeth that way as he was wont to doe, and fallies into the pit, and cannot get out againe.

The Negroes hearing that hee is fallen into the pit, run thither with their weapons and smite him into the body with Aslagaies, and so kill him; which done, they leape into the pit, and cut him in quarters, and euery one may go and fetch his part thereof when he will, of the hide they make stools to sit on: the taile is giuen to the King to beat the Flies from his naked body, and are much esteemed off there; with no lesse subtiltie they take the Leopards; for they doe them more hurt then other beasts: and because it is a cruell beast to spoyle and destroy men, keeping in the way where men should passe along. In euery foure cornered way, or at the end of the street, they make houses with wooden pales, which are like to Rat traps, wherein they put Hens, Sheepe, and other things which he desireth to eat, where the Leopard coming to eat his prey, is taken with the fall of the trap, and kild with an Aslagaie; they esteeme much of the skin, whereof they vse to cut Girdles, and to make Caps. There are no Horses in that Countrey, and when there were some brought vnto them for a great Present, they kild them, and ate them: because their flesh seemed sweet vnto them. Leopards.

The Oxen and Cowes that are found in that Countrey are not very great; but of bignesse like great Calues: their hornes stand backward on their heads, they are not milkt, for they giue none; they can hardly bring vp their yong Calues, by reason of the small moysture that the Cowes giue their Calues, by meanes of the drie Countrey wherein they are, and by reason of the heat of the land. Oxen.

The Hens and Goats, (which with them are sheepe) that they haue there, were brought them thither by the Portugalls of S. Thomas, the Hens prosper and encrease well there, and are so fat with the Millie that groweth there, as if they were Capons; but they are commonly smaller then ours, the Egges which they lay are no greater then Pidgeons Egges. The Doues which they haue there, were also brought them thither by the Portugals, and are called Abrauma, which is as much to say, as Birds brought thither vnto them by white men. They are very like to our Pidgeons, but their heads are lesse, like Sea-mewes, there is no great store off them in the Countrey. Hennes.
Doues.

The Hogs also were brought them by the Portugals, and are called Ebbio; they are very little, but very sweet and pleasant to eat, but not so good as the Hogs in Mosambique, where the Hogs flesh is as daintie as Hens flesh: and because it is a very vnwholesome place, they giue their sicke men Hogs flesh to eat, in stead of Hens flesh: they haue also not long since gotten some Geese out of a ship of Holland, which they call Apatta, which are there much esteemed of because they are but few. Hogges.

The Countrey is full of Monkies, of diuers formes, for some of them haue white beards, and blacke Moustachoes, with speckled skins, their bellies white, and vpon their backes they haue a broad Tawnie stroke, with blacke Pawes and a black Tayle, and by vs are called Beard-men. There are some called white Noses, because no part of them is white but onely their Nose, there is a third sort called Boertkens, those shun men very much, and stinke filthily, by nature they are very crafty: the fourth, are very like to the Jacken, which are found in the Graine Coast; there are also many Monkies of diuers other fashions, they take the Apes and Monkies with springes which hang vpon the trees, where into the Apes and Monkies leape, and are taken by the Negroes. Muske Cats are there in great abundance, the Portugals call them Cato degalia, which is Agalia Cats; the Negroes call them Kankan, those kind of Cats are also found in East India, and in Iana, but they are not so good as those in Guinea; or of the golden Coast, they are there called Castory, those Cats are much esteemed of by the Portugals, whereby they reape great profit, specially by their Agaly or Muske, which they take from them, and make them cleane, and then it is put into glalles, and carried into Lisbon, it is a kind of beast much giuen to bite, and to eat flesh; because they giue them flesh (as Hens, Pidgeons, Goats, and other costly meats) to eat. They ease themselves in a place apart, and leaue it, and neuer lie in it; it is almost like a Foxe, but their tayles are like other Cats, their skins are speckled like a Leopards skin: the Negroes take many of them in the woods when they are yong, and so bring them vp: but because they haue no skill there how to vse them, they sell them to strangers. The Male Cats are the best, and yeeld the most Agalia, by reason that the Females pisse in the cod wherein the Muske groweth; and pisse it out with their water; when you perceiue that they teare their bagge, you must take their Agalia from them, for they doe it to be rid of it: the wilder and worse they are to rule, so much the costlier and better their Agalia is. Monkies.
How taken.
Musk-cats.

There are Hares also in this Countrey, specially in a place called Akra, in forme like ours, and because that Countrey is low Sandy Ground, therefore they are found more there then in any other part of that Coast: when the Negroes will take them, they goe a great number of them together, to the place where the Hares are, euery one taking with him two or three cudgels of wood, as long as a mans arme, and there they compass the field round about, and standing about their holes, make such a noyse and crying, and clapping their stickes one vpon the other, that the Hares are so feared therewith, that they leape out of their holes, and are by them kild with those Cudgels, which they cast at them, and by that meanes get many of them. Harts and Harts. Hinds are sometimes found there also, but in some places more then others, they are of the same fashion that ours are in the Low-countreyes, but they haue another kind of hornes then ours, they haue no expresse kind of Instruments to take them withall : but when they see them goe to the water to drinke, they strike them into the bodie with an Aslagaie and kill them. Hunting to take wild beafts is lawfull for any man to vse in those Countreys, if they can take them, without punishment for doing it: There are many other kinds of beafts of such, seuerall sorts, that a man cannot tell what to make them; but for that the Netherlanders that vse to Guinea, dare not goe farre into the Countrey to take wild beafts, least they should be taken and intrapped by the Portugals or their adherents, and made slaues all their liues long : therefore there are many wild beafts that are not knowne by vs, and which the Inhabitants themselues know not, nor can not tell by what names to call them.

Parrots.

Parokites.

The Birds that are found there, are of diuers sorts, and are little birds like vnto ours; first, there are blew Parrots, whereof there are great store, which being yong, are taken out of their nests, and made tame, hauing not flowne abroad, they are better to teach, and to learne to speake; but they will not prate so much as the greene Brasilian Parrots doe. They haue also an other kind of greene Birds, as big as Sparrowes, like the Catalinkins of West India, but they cannot speake. Those Birds are called Asuront, and by our Netherlanders, called Parokites. They are taken with Nets, as you vse to take Sparrowes. They keepe much in low Land, where much Corne or Millie groweth; for they eat much thereof. Those Birds are very kind one to the other; for when you put a male and a female in a Cage, they will alwaies sit together without making any noyse. The female is of such a nature, that when she is coupled with the male, she respecteth him much, and letteth him sit on the right hand, setting her selfe on the left hand; and when he goes to eat, shee followeth him; and so they liue together quietly, being almost of the nature of the Turtle-doues. They are of a very faire greene colour, with a spot of orange-tawnie vpon their Noses.

There are another kind of Parokiten, which are much like them, being of the same nature and condition, but are of colour as red as bloud, with a spot of blacke vpon their Noses, and a black Taile, being somewhat greater then the Parokites. There are other Birds not much vnlike to Gold-finches, all their bodies being yellow, those Birds make not their Nests in the field, for feare of Snakes, and other venomous beafts; but make their nests very craftily vpon the branches of high trees, and there lay their egges to keepe themselues from venomous beafts. They haue other small Birds, not much vnlike to hedge Sparrowes; but they keepe in the Fields among Corne, those Birds they thrust into their mouthes aliue, and eat them Feathers Bones and all: they haue store of Muschen, with many other kind of small Birds.

Fierce Birds.

Pheasants.

Pea-cockes.
Pittoirs.Speckled Crows.

Burning Flies.

The haue a kind of Birds like Eagles, which haue heads like Turtle-cocks, those Birds are hurtfull, and very fierce, and doe much harme to the Negroes, whereby they are much troubled, and therefore they carry them meat vp to the hilles, and call them Pastro de Diago: which is the Birds of their god, and therefore they doe them no hurt, knowing well that they would reuenge themselues well enough: they lie alwayes in myre and durt, and stinke as ill as a priuie, and you may smell them as farre off. They haue some water Snites, but not many. And Turtle-Doues, which haue a blacke stroke about their neckes like a crowne. There are many Pheasants, not much vnlike ours for fashion, but haue not such feathers, for they are speckled blacke and white, and without long tayles as ours haue; they are not of so good a taste as other common Hens are. Peake-cockes also I haue seene there, not much vnlike our Peake-cockes; but there is some difference in the Feathers, for some of them are of other colours. Pittoirs I haue seene there, as I said before, which they esteeme for a great Fetisso, and a South-sayer. Cranes also there are many, and Kites also of the same fashion that our Holland Kites are. There is a kind of Birds also there, which are like Storkes, but they haue not so long red Bills, and make not such a noise. Speckled Crows, and gray Sea-mewes are there in great abundance, with diuers other kinds of Birds, not much vnlike ours, but if you marke them well, there is difference betweene them, as some in their feathers, others in their Bills, the third in their feet, and the fourth in their heads, so that there is some difference, although they resemble much; and because Birds are little taken and shot in those Countreyes, for that they haue no kind of Instruments to doe it withall, there are great store in the Countrey, and by that meanes, both the beafts and the Birds waxe very bold. There are many Owles and Bats which flie by night, and store of great greene Frogs, and gray Grashoppers, and many great land Crabs, which keepe in the earth, and are of a purple colour, which they esteeme for a great present. When I went by night to walke in the fields, I saw things in the grasse that shine like fire coales, which I tooke vp and tied them in my handkercher, which made it show with the light of the beast as if it had burnt: and when I went into the Towne to the Negroes, and shewed it them, they wondered thereat, and the next day when I lookt on them, they were small blacke Flies, like Spanish Flies, but were as blacke as Pitch: Flies, Mothes, and Bees are there also to be seene. The Bees make their Hiues vpon trees. There are great store of blacke Ants, which make holes in the earth, like field Mice, the Ants doe much hurt to the Bees, and eat vp there Hony and Waxe.

Ban-

Bannana, in Brasilia, Pacona; and the tree Paguoner, in Malabar, Patan, &c. is the fruit whereof John Huyghen writeth, and calleth it Indian Figs, this tree hath no branches, the fruit groweth out of the tree, and hath leaues at least a fathome long, and three spannes broad. Those leaues among the Turkes are vsed for Paper, and in other places the Houses are couered therewith, there is no wood vpon the tree, the out-side (wherewith the tree is couered when it be-10 ginneth to waxe old) is like the middle part of a Siue, but opening it within, there is nothing but the leaues, which are rolled vp round and close together, it is as high as a man, on the top the leaues begin to spring out, and rise vp an end, and as the young leaues come forth the old wi-
 20 ther away, and begin to drie vntill the tree comes to his growth, and the fruit to perfection: the leaues in the middle haue a very thicke veine, which diuideth it in two, and in the middle of the leaues, out of the heart of the tree, there groweth a flowre as bigge as an Eltridge Egge, of a russet colour, which in time waxeth long like the stalke of a Colewoort, whereon the Figges grow close one by the other, when they are still in their huskes, they are not much vnlike great
 30 Beanes, & so grow more and more vntill they be a span long, and foure thumbes broad like a *Cu-
 40* cumber, they are cut off before they are ripe, and are in that sort hanged vp in bunches, which oftentimes are as much as a man can carrie. It also yeeldeth good Tremuells like Milke (when the tree is cut downe) which commeth out of the bodie thereof, hauing hanged three or foure
 50 dayes, they are through ripe, the tree beares but one bunch at a time, whereon there is at least one hundred Figges and more, and when they cut off the bunch of Figges, the tree also is cut
 60 downe to the ground, the root staying still in the Earth, which presently springeth vp againe, and within a moneth hath his full growth, and all the yeare long no time excepted. The tree beareth fruit, the fruit is very delicate to eate, you must pull off the huske wherein the fruit
 70 lyeth, very delightfull to behold, the colour thereof is whitish and some-what yellow, when you bite it, it is soft, as if it were Meale and Butter mixed together, it is mellow in byting, it cooleth the maw, much thereof eaten maketh a man very loose and raw in the throte, it ma-
 80 keth women lecherous if they eate much thereof. Some are of opinion, because it is so delicate a fruit, that it was the same tree that stood in Paradise, whereof God forbad Adam and Eue to eate. It smels like Roses, and hath a very good smell, but the taste is better. The Portugals 90 will not cut it through with a Knife, but breake it, by reason of a speciall obseruation which they haue in the cutting thereof, which is, that then it sheweth like a crosse in the middle of the fruit, and therefore they thinke it not good to cut it.

Bannanas, or Indian Figges.

The Bachouens (by vs so called) are very like the Bannanas, for the condition and forme is all one, only that the fruit is smaller, shorter, white of colour within and sweeter of taste, and is esteemed to be wholsomer to be eaten then the Bannanas, but there is no such great quantitie
 10 of them, and for that they were first brought out of the Kingdome of Congo, into other Coun-20 tries, they haue gotten the name thereof.

Bachouens, or Bannanas de Congo.

The Annanas is also a delicate and pleasant fruit for smell, and of the best taste that any fruit can be, it hath also diuers seuerall names, there are two sorts, the Male and the Female, the Ca-30 narians call it, Ananasa; the Brasilians, Nana; those of Hispaniola, Iaiama, and the Spaniards in 40 Brasilia, Pinas, because one of them found that and the Pinas first in Brasilia, it is as great as a 50 Mellon, faire of colour, some-what yellow, Greene and carnation, when it begins to bee ripe, the greenenesse thereof turneth into an Orange colour, it is of a pleasant taste, and hath a fine
 60 smell like an Apricocke, so that it is to be smelt farre off, when you see the fruit as farre off, being 70 Greene, it shewes like Artichokes, and is eaten with Wine, it is light of digestion, but eating 80 much thereof it inflameth a mans bodie. In Brasilia there is three sorts thereof, each hauing a 90 seuerall name: first, Iaiama; the second, Boniamia; the third, Iaiagma: but in Guinea there is but 100 one sort. The time when they are in their flowre is in Lent, for then they are best, it growes 110 halfe a fathome aboue the ground, the leaues thereof are not much vnlike Semper Vnum, when 120 they are eaten, they are cut in round slices, and sopt in Spanish wine; you cannot eate enough 130 thereof, it is verie hot of nature, and will grow in moist ground, the sops that you take out of 140 the Wine tastes like sweet Muske, and if you doe not presently wipe the Knife wherewith 150 you cut the fruit, but forgetting it let it lye halfe an houre, it will bee eaten in, as if there had 160 beene strong water laid vpon it, being eaten in abundance and without knowledge, it causeth 170 great sicknesse.

Annanas.

There are great store of Iniamus growing in Guinea, in great fields, which are sowed and planted like Turnips, the root is the Iniamus, and groweth in the Earth like Earth-nuts, those 10 Iniamus are as great as a yellow root, but thicker and fuller of knots, they are of a Mouse-co-20 lour, and within as white as a Turnip, but not so sweet, being put in a Kettle and sodden with 30 flesh, and then peeled and eaten with Oyle and Pepper, they are a very delicate meate, in ma-40 ny places it is vsed for bread, and is the greatest meate that the Negroes eate.

Iniamus.

The Battatas are somewhat redder of colour, and in forme almost like Iniamus, and taste like Earth-nuts, those two kinds of fruit are very abundant in Guinea, they are commonly 10 roasted, or else eaten with a hodge-pot in stead of Parfenips or Turnips.

The Palme-wine tree is almost like the Cocos tree, or a Lantor, with diuers others, and are of three or foure sorts, most of them haue all one kind of leafe, but in manner of wood they are vnlike, for this tree is shorter of wood then the rest, the Wine is drawne out of those trees by boring them, from whence there issueth a sap like Milke, which is very coole and fresh to drinke, at the first when it is drawne, it is pleasant and sweet, hauing stood a while, it is as sowre as Vineger, so that you may vse it in a Sallet, but being drunke sweet and fresh, it causeth a man to void vrine well, whereby in those Countries, there are very few found, that haue the disease of the Stone; drinking much thereof a mans head will soone be light, the lightnesse which a man hath in his head thereby, causeth it not to ake. When it commeth first out of the tree it is sweeter of taste, then when it hath stood awhile, but yet it is esteemed to bee better when it hath stood awhile, and is some-what settled, then presently to bee drunke, for it standeth seething and bubling, as if it hung ouer the fire and sod, so that if it were put into a Glasse and stopt vp, without letting any ayre come into it, the force thereof would breake the Glasse in pieces, but being a meale tyde olde, it is nothing worth, because it is so sowre, and then it is of another colour verie waterish, therefore it is much mixed with water and seldome comes pure to the Market, as it is taken out of the tree, which is done partly to increase their Wine, as also that then it is the sweeter to drinke, and hath the taste of Syder, and the colour of Must, when the tree is old, and will yeeld no more Wine at the top, it is cut downe at the foot, and a fire made at the root thereof, where they set a pot whereinto the Wine (by meanes of the heate) runneth, the tree beeing changed, and yeelding no more profit, there groweth another tree out of the roote thereof, but it is halfe a yeare old before it giueth any Wine. In the morning betimes an houre before day, the Wine is drawne out and brought to the Market at noone-time.

Palmitas tree.

The Palmitas tree is not much to be seene in Guinea, but for that a Negro in that Countrey shewed me some of the fruit thereof, I thought good to say something of it in this place, it is a tree without branches, on the top of the tree the fruit groweth, and it is almost like the Ananas when it is ripe. It is outwardly of a faire gold colour, and within it hath graines like Pomegranates, they are of a very sweet taste, the other is hard and vnfit to eate.

LIB. VII.

Of their Gentlemen, and how they are made; Their Dancings, Sports, Diseases, Cures, Visitations, Mournings, Funerals: and of their Gold.

Ambition of Gentrie.

Here are many Genelemen in that Countrey, but of small meanes, for assoone as they haue bought their Gentilitie, they are then poorer, and in miserable estate then they were before, and for that they thinke to be men of great account when they are Gentlemen, they seeke much after it, and begin to gather some wealth from their youths vpwards to obtayne the place of a Gentleman. First, they giue three gifts to be made a Gentleman, the first gift is a Dogge, which they call Cabro de Matto, which is as much to say, as a Field-sheepe. The second Gift, is a Sheepe or a Goat. The third Gift, is a Cow, with many other things, and then he is made a Gentleman. These Gifts are giuen among those that are Gentlemen, and are giuen the one now, the other at another time, as the man that is made a Gentleman can best doe it, and hath the meanes to performe it, and then hee makes the Capitaine acquainted with it, which done, he buyeth a Cow, which is carryed and tyed in the Market place, and then it is made knowne to the people, that such a man shall bee made a Gentleman at such a time, in the meane time all those that are Gentlemen make themselues as fine as they can to goe with him, and to fight and shew many Apish Toyes. The man that is to bee made a Gentleman, makes all things readie, as meate and drinke to entertayne his Guests, and to bid them welcome in good sort, he buyeth Hens and many pots of Palme-wine, and sendeth euery Gentleman a Hen and a pot of Palme-wine home to his House, to make merrie withall.

Creation.

When the Feast day comes, the Inhabitants assemble together vpon the Market place, the men (as he masters) goe and sit on the one side, hauing many Instruments, as Drums, Hornes, Bels and other things with them. The Capitaine armeth himselfe, and with him hath many young Batchelors with Shields and Assagaies, their faces being coloured and their bodies painted with red and yellow Earth, which makes them looke like a company of yong Deuils. The man that is made a Gentleman is accompanied with a number of other Gentlemen, hauing a Boy behind him which carryeth his stoole to sit vpon when hee goes to speake with any man, and his fellow Gentlemen come to salute him, and wish him good fortune in his new estate, at which time they take a great deale of straw in the one hand, and lay it vnder his feet, which he treadeth vpon (the like also they vse when their owne friends come to visit them, and bring them them any Presents, which they vse for a great honour.) The wiues of the Gentlemen goe to her, to doe all the honour they can to the wife of the Gentleman that maketh the Feast, and dresse her finely, folding her haire with many golden Fetisses, and Crosses, putting about her neeke a Ring of gold, and in the one hand shee carrieth a Horse-taile, and on her right arme shee hath a Ring of gold, at each end thereof hauing a round thing like the Lid of a Pot, all made of gold; and being readie, they are placed in order, as their manner is, one after the other; then the Cow is led forth, and then all the Gentlemen in the Towne come and follow them, as it were on Procession, dancing and leaping round about the Towne, and when they come againe into the Market-place, the Cow is bound to a stake, and there they make a great noise with Drummes and Pipes, and the young Bachelors with fencing and leaping, with their Shields and Aslagies, now in one place, then in another, making, as they thinke, great ioy about the Gentleman; euery man seeking to excell each other, and to get most praise and commendation.

The women also make no lesse adoe with singing and dancing, sometimes carrying both the Gentleman and his wife, vpon a stoole, round about the Towne, casting white Meale in their faces, and in that sort make great pastime three dayes together, and euery night they are led home to their houses, and watcht by the other Gentlemen. The next day he is fetcht by a great number of people, and great honour done vnto him as before; at which time hee hangs a white Flag out of his house, which doth signifie ioy, or open house. The third day, the Cow is killed by the Executioner, and quartered; and euery man hath a piece of the flesh thereof, that they also may be participants of the Feast: but the man and the woman that maketh the Feast, may not eate of the Cow, for they make them beleue, that if they eate any thereof, they shall die within a yeere after. The Feast day being ended, the head of the Cow is carried home to his house, which he hangeth vp, and painteth it with diuers colours, hanging many straw Fetisses vpon it, which is a signe of his Gentilitie, and a warrant to proue him to be made a Gentleman.

Then he hath great priuiledge, for he may buy Slaues, and doe other things which before he might not haue done. When he is made a Gentleman he is very proud thereof; for, the first thing that they will tell vnto a Stranger, is, that they are Gentlemen, and that they haue many Slaues, esteeming themselues to be great Masters; but it falleth out oftentimes, that after their feasting is done, and he made a Gentleman, that then hee is poorer then he was before, because he disbursed all his money to get it, and then he must goe out to fish againe and doe other things, if he will get his liuing. This kind of Gentilitie costs him about eight Bendas, which is a pound of gold; but deducting that which is giuen for Presents of other men which bring them to him, each man according to his meanes and abilitie, it standeth him not in aboue halfe a pound of gold. Those Gentlemen haue a Fellowship among them, and euery yeere make a Feast, and then bid their Friends to be merrie with them, and make good cheere; at which time they hang their Cowes or Sheepes heads, with Millie strawes, and paint them with white colour, signifying thereby the remembrance of their Feast. Besides this, the Gentlemen haue an other Feast amongst them, vpon the sixth day of Iuly, at which time they paint their bodies with white and red stripes, and hang a Garland made of greene boughs and straw about their necks, which they weare all that day, that you may know the Gentlemen from the rest, and then also they hang their Cowes and Goats heads full of Fetisses, as before; in the euening they meet together at a Banquet, in the house of the Captaine, where they are very merrie together, eating and drinking their heads and bellies full, till they are drunke.

They make themselues very fine, especially the women, when they goe to dance, wherein they take a great pride. They hang many Copper, Tin, and Iuorie Rings about their armes, and on their legs they put Rings with many Bells, that they may sound when they dance. Their heads are frizled, and dressed with a tuft of haire. They wash their bodies faire with water, and then anoint them with Palme-oile, to make them shine. Their teeth also they rub with a hard sticke: then they put a piece of white linnen about their bodies, which hangs from ynderneath their breasts, downe below their knees; and commonly about euening they assemble together, and goe to the Market-place to dance there. Others haue instruments whereon they play, as some Copper Basons, whereon they strike with wooden Sticks. Others haue wooden Drums, cut out of an hollow Tree, covered ouer with a Goats Skin, and play vpon them. Others haue round Blockes, cut very handsomly and euenly, whereon also they strike with wooden Sticks. Others haue Cow-bells. Some haue small Luits, made out of a piece of wood like a Harpe with sixe strings of Reeds, whereon they play with both their hands, euery one hauing their seuerall Instruments, and each keeping good correspondence with their fellowes Instruments. Others sing, and begin to dance two and two together, leaping and stamping with one of their feet vpon the ground, knocking with their fingers, and bowing downe their heads, and speaking each to other; in their hands carrying Horse-tailes, which they cast sometimes on the one shoulder, then vpon the other, vsing certaine order in their sports, one following the other, and each doing as the other doth. Other women take straw, which they let fall to the ground, ground, and then dancing vpon it, cast it vp againe into the aire with their feet, and catch it as it falleth with their hands, so that they play many apish and childrens sports, thinking that they doe excellent well; but they desire not to be seene by strangers, because they laugh and iest at them, and then they are ashamed.

The yonkers.

This continuing an houre or an houre and an halfe, euery one goes home againe, as hauing ended their sports. There are houses also among them, wherein young men and maids vse to dance and play. The young Bachelors vse to drinke themselves drunke, and by night runne through the streets with their Armes and Aslagies, making a great noise with crying and shouting, as if a companie of young Devils ran about the streets; and meeting with other companies, with whom hauing some words, they fight together; wherein they are so earnest one against the other, that they are almost readie to kill each other, and many times cannot leaue off. They will not lightly beginne to quarrell, for they are not so hastie, but will indure much, specially of strangers, before they will quarrell; but if they once beginne, they are not easily pacified, but are very earnest and hastie to set vpon their aduerse Parties, and to be reuenged, though it should cost them their liues, and they haue very quicke hands to thrust and to strike.

Their wounds and maladies.

Their bodies are subiect to many sicknesses and diseases, which they esteeme but little, and make no account of wounds or hurts. The sicknesses wherewith they are most troubled, are Poxe, Clap-dollars, Botches, Wormes, paine in the head, and burning Feuers. These diseases they get from foule and filthie women, whereunto they are much addicted, and although they haue any diseases by such meanes, which are not without much danger, yet they esteeme not much of them, but passe them away as if they ayled nothing, and are not faint-hearted, but of a hard complexion; suffering their wounds to swell and putrifie, without any meanes of remedie applied thereunto; for they neither haue nor vse any Physicke among them, to ease them in their sickness, nor Surgeons or Physicians to heale their wounds, but suffer their wounds and diseases to haue their course, vnlesse any of our Surgeons giue them any Physicke or Surgerie. For the Pox and Clap-dollars they vse much Salsaparillia, which the Hollanders ships bring them; which Salue they seethe with salt water, and drinke the water for drinke against the Pox, and such like diseases, and also against the Wormes that are in their legs, (as I will declare more at large) wherewith also we are much troubled, whereunto they vse no remedie at all, but suffer their legs to continue so, vntill they heale and waxe better of themselves. For the paine of the head they vse certaine Pap, which they make of greene leaues, and therewith anoint the place where their paine is; and if they haue any swelling about their bodies, which breaketh not out, then they take a knife and cut two or three long slashes therein, and so giue the wound a meanes to worke, and to heale vp, and grow together againe; which is the cause that they haue so much knobd flesh, and so many slashes in their bodies: but is well to be discerned, whether they be cut and made in their flesh to beautifie and set out themselves, or wounds and sores that are healed vp againe. They also vse no letting of blood, but onely make a hole in their bodies with a knife to let their blood come out: when they haue any other naturall sicknesses, they will not helpe nor comfort one the other; but if any of them be sicke, they will shun him as it were the plague, and spurne the sicke man like a Dog, and not once helpe him with a drop of Oyle or Water, although they haue neuer so much need; no, not the Father to the Sonne, but let them lie like Beasts, and die with hunger and sickness; so that they are not skilfull to helpe sicke persons.

Wormes in the legs.

Barbarous Inhumanitie.

Quarrels.

They make difference betweene the word Morian and Negro, for they will not bee called Morians, but Negroes or Prettoes, (which is as much to say) as Blacke men; for they say that Morian is as much to say, as Slaue or Captiue, and also a man that knowes nothing, or that is halfe a Foole; and therefore they will not be called Morians, but Negroes or Prettoes; for if you call them Morians, they will hardly speake vnto you, nor make you any answere. They make one the other Slaues, but in other sort then in Congo or Angola, for there you can lade no ships full of Slaues; but to the contrarie, they desire much to haue them, and buy them: yet there are both Slaues and Captiues; and for that in those Countries they take no great paines, nor need any great number of Slaues, therefore there is no great quantitie of them to be had, to sell them as they doe in other Countries, but onely among them of the Land, that haue need of them. Again, no man may buy or sell them, but such as are of great account and Gentlemen. They are marked with an Iron in their bodies, that if they chance to runne away, they may be knowne againe by their markes.

Such as are blind, or haue any other imperfections in their bodies, as being lame or Criples, and by reason thereof cannot get their liuings, the King placeth them with Smiths, to blowe their Bellows; others with those that presse Palme-boyle, or grind Colours, whereunto such deformed persons are fit; or to such Occupations and labours wherewith they can helpe themselves, and get their victuals; so that there you see none such as begge their victuals, but they are put in some place or other to earne their meate; so that the Inhabitants giue no meate one to the other. The Kings of the Townes haue many Slaues, which they buy and sell, and get much by them; and to be brieft, in those Countries there are no men to be hired to worke or goe of any errand for money, but such as are Slaues and Captiues, which are to spend their dayes in slaerie.

Hatred and enuy is much vsed in those Countries, and to whomsoever they once beare hatred and enuy, they will hate them cruelly, and doe them all the hurt and villany that they can; on the other side, they beare a villany long in their minds, and will keepe malice in their hearts seven or eight yeeres, and when time serueth them, then show it openly; no lesse hatred and enuy is borne by one Towne vnto another, speaking all the villany they can, and extolling themselves as much as they may, to haue the honour of Traffique, and to the end that the ship should come and Anchor before their Townes, and by that meanes to bring the Countrey Merchants to Traffique there, wherein they are very diligent: and although one Towne lyeth but three or foure miles one from the other; yet they are as enuious one against the other as possible they can be, and report as hardly of their neighbours as they can imagine; that so they may get the Netherlanders to Traffique with them: and to that end, they strue to shew more friendship to the Netherlanders, one then the other, to draw vs to affect them, and bring the trade of Merchandize vnto them.

The men commonly liue there till they be old, as it seemeth by their faces and outward appearance, and as we conceaue; but they cannot reckon their owne ages, nor tell how many yeeres they haue liued. When they begin to be old, then they are not well proportioned nor seemely; but looke euill fauouredly, with gray beards, yellow wrinckled skins, like Spanish Leather, which proceedeth of the anointing of their bodies with Palme Oyle. They are likewise leane of Legs and Armes, and wholly mishapen, specially olde women, with their long breasts, which then shew and hang vpon their bodies like old Hogs bladders, they would not willingly be old; because as then they are not esteemed of, but much despised, and not respected, and as from their youths vpwards, to the best time of their liues, they still waxe of a fairer blacke colour, so when they are past that time, they begin to decay, and to lose their perfect blacknesse.

In their winter time, they are very sickly, & then commonly there is a great mortalitie among them, by meanes of the vnwholesomenesse of the aire, which they then endure: and when they die, their friends come to the dead mans house, and weepe and sorrow grievously for him, speaking vnto him, & asking him why he died, with many such like foolish Ceremonies, They take the dead body and lay it on a mat vpon the ground, & wind it in in a woollen, purposely made in that Countrey, of colour red, blew, blacke and white. Vnder his head they lay a wooden stoole, and couer or dresse his head with a Goats skin, and strew all the body ouer with ashes, and dust of Barkes of trees; they close not his eyes together, they lay his armes downe by his sides, and so let him lie halfe a day in the aire. If it be a man, his best beloued wife goes and sits downe by the body, and if it be a woman, the man goes and sits downe by her, crying and weeping, hauing in their hands a wispe of straw, or of Barkes of trees, wherewith crying and howling ouer the dead body, he or she wipeth his face, sometimes saying vnto it, Auzy, and making a great noyse; in the meane time, the friends or neighbours come to visite the dead, and to mone him for his misfortune, others (as the neere friends) being women, goe round about the house, singing and beating vpon Basons, sometimes comming to the dead body, and goe round about him singing and leaping, and kincking of hands, making a great noyse, and then againe goe round about the house singing and playing vpon Basons, which they doe twice or thrice one after the other.

In the meane time, preparation is made for the buriall, and to make good cheere together, after it is ended; to the which end, they dresse certaine Hens, and a Sheepe, and other meats which they are accustomed to eate, and while the dead bodie is aboue the ground, the eldest Morinni of that quarter, goes about from house to house with a Bason, whereon euery one must put the value of twelue pence in gold, with the which money they buy a Cow, which Cow is giuen to a Fetissero that vlieth to coniure their gods, to will him to coniure the Fetisso, to suffer the dead body to remaine and rest in peace, and to bring him into the other world, and not to molest him in the way, with this Cowes blood hee coniureth his Fetisso; (for a dead man must smeare his Fetisso with blood) then they bind the dead body vpon a planke, and carry him to the graue singing and leaping: the bodie is carried by men, and the women follow after one by one, about their heads hauing a Crowne or Garland of straw, and a staffe in their hands: the man, if it be a woman, goes next to the dead body crying to the graue, else there goes no man after it, vnlesse the dead body chanceth to be borne to another place to be buried; as sometimes it hapneth that they carry the dead body twenty miles off, from the place where he died, to be buried there: and then many men go armed with the body, to conuey it to the buriall: the body is carried to the earth, & the graue-maker maketh a graue about foure foot deepe, and there in he is laid; ouer the graue there are many sticke of wood aid, close one by the other: the women creepe to and fro ouer the graue, making a great noyse, with howling and crying, and ouer that, they lay the earth, and place it, and bind it about the same, as if it were a Chest: all his goods, as Apparell, Weapons, Pots, Basons, Toolles, Spades, and such Household-stuffe, wherewith he earned his his liuing, are carried to the graue, and buried with him, which are set round about the graue, to serue his turne withall in the other world, as they did when he liued vpon the earth; other of the dead mans friends, bring some thing also to set in the graue for a memorie, which is put into the graue with the rest of his goods. If he were one that delighted much in drinking, & loued Palme well when he liued: they will set a pot of Palme-wine by him in his graue, because hee should not die for thirst, and what in his life he vsed, that is giuen him, and buried in his graue with him. If it be a woman that died in trauell of her child, the child is laid in the mothers right arme, and buried with her; aboue vpon the graue, there is a straw house made like a Sepulchre, wherein all the household-stuffe and other things are set. The graue-makers fee, is to haue halfe the goods that are set into the graue, but the friends of the dead content him, and he is paid for it; because they should let the goods stand still vntoucht: for it is a great credit to the friends of the dead to leaue good store of goods vpon the graue with the dead body; which they let stand there so long, till it be cleane consumed, and none of them will euer offer to take any of it away by any meanes whatsoeuer. The body being buried, they goe altogether to the Sea-side, or to some ot her Riuer, where the women goe in, & stand vp to their middle in waters, and taking vp water in their hands, cast it in their owne faces, and vpon their bodies, and wash their breasts, and all their bodies. Other women in the meane time play vpon Basons, and such like instruments, one of those women take the man or woman, whose husband or wife is dead, and leading them into the water, laid them therein flat vpon their backs, and take them vp againe; which they doe diuers times, speaking one vnto the other, and making great complaints. When he or she is well and cleane washt from the head to the foot, she leadeth them out of the water againe, and puts their clothes vpon their bodies again, & then they go together to the dead-mans house to make good cheere, and to drink themselues drunk. If it be a man that died that had children, the women must not retaine nor keepe any of his goods for the behoofe of the children: but must giue all the mans goods (both that which he had to his marriage, and which he got by his labour while he liued) vnto his Brethren, if he hath any liuing, and must not keepe any thing from them. If he hath no brethren, then the father if he be liuing, taketh all his sonnes goods, and inioyeth it. If it be a woman that dieth, then the husband must deliuer her marriage goods to her brethren, as aforesaid, without keeping any thing thereof for his children, so that no children in those Countreyes inherite their Fathers good, neither are they their Fathers heires: No more may the wife inherite any of her husbands goods, but it is all diuided among his brethren; but while their wiues liue, they giue her what they thinke good of that which they gaine, so yong maids and men must endeouour themselues to get some thing in their youths, that they may haue some thing when they marry and keepe houses.

Kings Funerals.

For the Kings death, more sorrow is made by some of the Gentlemen, who in the Kings life serued him: when he is dead, giue him a slaue to serue him, & other men one of their wiues to wait on him, and to dresse his meat: others bring one of their sonnes to goe with the King into the other world; so that there are a number of people that are appointed to goe with the King to the other world: which are killed, and their heads cut off, but they know nothing thereof, for such men and women as giue them to the King when he is dead; tell not them that they shall be put to death, to goe into the other world with the King; but when the time comes, that the buriall is to be solemnised, they send them on some message, or to fetch water, and so following them, strike them through the body with an Asagaie, and kill them in the way: which done, they carry the dead body to the Kings house, whereby they shew what faithfull seruants they were vnto their King while he liued: others also doe the like, and those dead bodies are smeared with blood, and buried with the King in his graue, that they may trauell together. If any of his wiues loued him intirely, they suffer themselues to be kild with the rest, and are buried with him, that they may raigne together in the other world. The heads of the dead men and women, are set round about the Sepulchre and graue of the King, for a great brauerie and honour vnto him. Vpon the graue they set all kinds of meat and drinke, that they may eate some thing, and verily beleue that they eate and drinke it, and that they liue thereby, and for that cause the pots of Palme-wine, and of water, are continually fild vp: all his stuffe, as Armes and Clothes are buried with him, and all his Gentlemen that serued him, haue euery one of them their Pictures made of Clay, after the life, and fairely painted, which are set and placed orderly round about his graue, one by the other; so that their Kings Sepulchers are like houses, and as well stufte as if they still liued: which Sepulchres are so much esteemed off, that they are watcht both by night and by day, by armed men: to the end, that if he desireth to haue any thing, they should straight bring it him.

Gold how esteemed and found.

Gold at this day is as much esteemed off by them, as it is with vs, (of whom they say, Gold, is our God) and more too, for they are greedier and earnestest to haue it then we are, because they marke and see that the Hollanders take so much paines for it, and giue more Merchandise for it in Exchange, then euer the Portugals did.

For I am of an opinion, that there are few Negroes that dwell on the Sea side, that know where the Mines are, or that euer saw them, also there was neuer any Portugall or Netherlander

der at them, or neere them, but the Mines are well kept, and lookt vnto by the owners thereof; so I haue heard by some Negroes, that each King hath his Mines, and causeth the gold to be digged by his men, and selleth it to other Merchants, and so it passeth from one to another.

In what manner the gold is found in Guinea, I know not, but as some Negroes haue told me, they finde gold in deepe pits; which they digge vp, and that with the water it is driuen downe like Sand, at which waters and running springs, many people sit with spoones in their hands, and take vp the gold, sand and all, and put it into a Basen.

Some peeces are couered ouer with Chalke, and Earth, wherein they are found, the small gold; which is found in the Sand, they purge and make cleane in cleare running water, but yet they let some Sand and Grauell remaine among it, it is found in no great quantities, (as they themselves say) but with great paine and labour, for it costs many men their liues, which are smothered in the Mines; and a man that can find two or three Englishen of gold in a day, hath done well, and hath earned a good dayes hire. The halfe which is found is the labourers, and the other halfe is for the King, or for him that oweth the Mine; This I haue beene told by some of the Negroes. Gold by them is called Chika, and some great Merchants that dwell about the Maïne, bring the gold aboard the ships to buy wares, as it comes out of the Mine, and that is esteemed to be the best gold, wherein there is lest deceit, but the receiuer must looke well to it, to blow the sand cleane out of it, and to beat the yeallow earth with the stones out of it, with a hammer, and so he cannot lose by it: neuerthelesse, the gold that is brought rough out of the Mine, is esteemed to be better and richer, and more worth in euery Marke then the other.

It falleth out oftentimes, that some gold is more worth then others, which hapneth by meanes of the receiuers negligence, and many times as the Mines of gold fall out; for some of them are finer gold then others: and also the deeper that the Mines are digged, the gold falls out to be worse, and is more mixed with siluer, euen in the earth it selfe, then the gold that lieth higher in the earth.

Besides this, meane Merchants bring much molten gold, as Crakawen, arme Rings, Iewels, False gold, and other things, wherein there is most falshood vsed: for such Negroes as haue but small meanes to Traffique with vs, are more vsed and addicted to the falsifying of gold, then others are, wherein they vse great subtiltie, but we our selues are oftentimes the cause thereof; for we bring and sell them the matter, and the Instruments which they vse therein; and so deceiue our selues, and make a rod for our owne breeches: but they were wont to falsifie it more then now. For the Portugals hanged vp some for it. They haue good knowledge in Gold, and can soone perceiue whether it be good or falsified; but of other Iewels, as Pearles, Diamonds, Rubies, Emralds, and such like precious stones, they haue no knowledge, but they know fine red Corals wel, which are much esteemed off by them.

Siluer also is well, and too much knowne among them; because they vse it to falsifie Gold withall, and to make it of lesse value then it is. They learned of the Portugals to melt gold. They also haue found the meanes to put an edge of gold round about siluer, and Red Copper mixed together, letting the false mettle remaine in the middle of the peece, and so when hee that receiueth it, is in haste, and toucheth it but on the edge thereof, (where it is not falsified) with his Touch-stone, it passeth for good: but such must bee cut in sunder with a hammer, and then the falsifying is perceiued, and when they could find no meanes to falsifie the small fine Chika Foetu Gold, so that the receiuers had no suspicion thereof, and tooke the lesse heed there vnto, wee our selues brought them tooles to doe it withall: for wee brought them Files, and Sawes to sell, so that they filed the yellow Copper, and mingled it among the smal gold, that it could hardly be perceiued: because it was no smal, which was the subtillest falsifying of gold by them vsed, but when we blew the sand & dust out of it, then the Copper shewed it selfe, whereby it appeareth that the Negroes haue many wayes and deuises to falsifie gold, but such as looke narrowly vnto them, will not be deceiued: but to trie their falsifyings, the best way is to touch their gold, and to be warie of deceit, and of receiuing bad gold. An other way is to looke speedily vnto the Negroes themselves; To see if they haue bad gold or not, for when they bring bad gold, they will be in great feare, with your handling thereof, and when you offer to trie their gold, they will refuse it, and alter their colours, and shake and quauer withall.

The wormes in the legges and bodies, trouble not euery one that goeth to those Countreyes, but some are troubled with them, and some not, and they are found in some men sooner then in others, some haue a worme before the Voyage is done, and while they are still vpon the Coast, some get them while they are vpon the way, others haue them after their Voyage is full ended, some foure moneths after, some nine moneths after, and some a yeere after they haue made a Voyage thither: others haue made two or three Voyages thither, and neuer were troubled with those wormes.

Troublesome long-wormes.

At Boghar in Bactria, there are the like, supposed to come by drinking bad water in that place, as M. Ant. ten-kinson observed

The Negroes themselves are much troubled with them, specially those that dwell about the castle of Mina, and it is a thing to be wondered at, for the Negroes that dwell but 25. miles lower Eastward, are not troubled with wormes as their neighbors are. And another* (whereof John Huyghen speaketh in his Itinerario) are troubled therewith, for the Islands of East India, West India, China, Brasil, and other strange Countries are not troubled therewith, nor know not thereof, and which is more; They of the Island of Saint Thomas, which men esteeme to be the vnwholesomest place in the world, and wherein so many men are sicke, and lose their liues, know not what those wormes meane, but wondred much thereat, when it was shewed them of such as had beene with the Hollanders in Guinea. The Negroes themselves knew not whereof they are ingendred, but the greatest presumption is, that they proceed and breed of the water which men buy of the Negroes, which they take out of Wells or Pits, and it is very likely (as we find by the experience) that they breed of the water; for in Ormuz, or in those parts, the fresh water is fetcht vp in pots by diuers, eightene fathome deepe vnder the salt water, which those people drinke, because they are there also troubled with wormes, and as some men write: the Indians themselves say, that they come of the water. Such as haue them are in great paine, for some of them can neither goe nor stand; some neither sit nor lie, others lie wholly in dispaire, as if they were sencelesse, and sometimes are faine to be bound; some haue them with a feuer, or shaking, as if they had a feuer; some get them on a sudden, others haue them before they know it, and haue little paine therewith; so that the wormes shew themselves diuers wayes: they appeare with a little Blain, others with a spot like a Flea-biting, others with a little swelling; so that you may often see the worme betweene the skin and the flesh, others shew themselves with bloody vains, &c. It must shew it selfe before men vse any remedie for it: neuerthelesse, it sheweth it selfe many times too much, and too soon, for it were better that it came not so soon, nor appeared at all, but suffered men to be at ease, it will seeke to helpe it selfe, and thrust out his nose, which a man must then take hold on, least he creepe in againe: he sheweth himselfe in diuers places, as in a mans legges, in the sole of the foot, in the armes, knees, buttocks, and commonly in places of a mans bodie, where there is much flesh; and some men haue them in their priue members, and which is more, in their cods, with great grieve and paine: for those that haue them there, indure extreme paine. But it is true, that one man hath lesse paine with them then another, and shal also be sooner healed of them then another: which commeth by the handling or dealing with them, for it is very good, when a man findeth himselfe to be troubled with them, to be quiet, specially being in his legs, and not go much, and to keepe the place warme where they begin to appeare; for thereby they shal indure lesse paine, for they come better out of a mans flesh with warmth, then with cold and disease. For some men haue little respected themselves when they haue had the wormes, so that they appeared with a great swelling, whereby they indured much paine, and were in hazard to loose their legges or their armes. When it comes forth so farre, that a man may lay hold on it, then they must draw him out till hee stayeth, and then hee must let it rest till hee beginneth to come forward againe; and as much thereof as is come out of the bodie, must bee woound vpon a sticke, or bound close to the hoole, with a thrid that hee creepeth not in againe. When hee commeth out euery time, he bringeth good store of matter with him, and a man must euery day looke vnto it, and draw him so long, till he be out, but you must not draw him too hard, least he should breake, so that by reason of the poyson that is in him, the wound will fester: It hapneth oftentimes, that after there is one worme drawne out of a mans body, that there commeth another in the same place, & hath his issue out at the same hole. Some men are soner rid of them then another, for some are eased in three weeks and lesse time, and some are three months in healing of them, some men haue more wormes then others, for some haue but one worme, and others ten or twelue, as I my self knew one that had ten wormes, hanging out at his body all at one time; and I haue known men that had wormes that began to open themselves, and crept in againe, and consumed away, so that they had no more trouble therewith but the next Voyage after. They are of diuers lengths, and greatnesse, some are of a fathome long, some shorter, as it falls out; in thickenesse they differ much, some are as thicke as great Lute-strings, and like common peare wormes, others like small Lute-strings, and some as small as silke or fine thred, some say that they are not liuing, and that they are but bad sinowes and no wormes. I haue not long since seene a man that had certaine wormes which shewed themselves, and the Surgeon drew a worme out with one pull, and the worme being drawne out, and held vp on high, wrung and writhed it selfe, as if it had beene an Eele, and was about five quarters long, and as thicke as a Lute-string, if it were but a sinow, it would haue no life in it, and therefore they are naturall wormes. The Negroes vse no kind of Surgerie for them, but suffer them to haue their course, and wash the sore with Salt-water, which they say is very good for it.

Note that our returne backe from Moure, we vse to put off from that place, from whence you must set sayle with a wind from the land, and hold your course as neere by as you can, losing no wind, and yet you shall hardly get aboute S. Thomas, or Rio de Gabon, because of the streame which driueth you East & by North, & East North-east towards the land. To the Bouthes of

Fernando

Fernando Poo, which you must beware off, for he that falleth into that Bonthe, will hardly get out, because of the streame, and is in danger to be cast away in that place, or else he must haue some stormes or winds out of the North, and so come out Southward, otherwise it is hardly to be done; for there are some, who hauing had the wind a little contrary, were fixe or seuen weekes before they could get to Cape Lope Gonselues. Heere you must note, that the neerer you come to the Equinoctiall line, the wind bloweth the more Southerly, so that as you passe vnder the line, the wind bloweth South, and South and by East, and somewhat higher, you must also note, when you see great flying Fishes, that you are not farre from Saint Thomas, or about Ile De Principe.

§. VIII.

The passage from the golden Coast to the Kingdome of Benni, or Rio de Benni, and Rio Floreado: The Citie, Court, Gentry, Apparell: also other places adioyning, described.

OR that the gold Coast reacheth no further then from Cape De tres Punctas, to Rio de Volta, therefore those that will goe from the golden Coast, to the Kingdome of Benni, hold their course along by the land, and along by the Riuer of Rio de Valto, Rio de Ardra, and Rio de Lago. These Riuer were neuer entred into, because there is nothing to be had in them, but a little quantitie of Elephants Teeth; so that the labour to fetch it, is not worth the paines, by meanes of the dangers that a man incurreth by entering into the Riuer, by reason of Sands. Before at the mouth of the Riuer of Focrado, there lieth an Iland, and the Riuer is so indifferent great, that a man may well know it. The land reacheth most (being about forty miles) to Rio de Ardra. This Riuer is much vsed to be entred into by the Portugals, and is well knowne, not because of any great commoditie that is therein to be had; but because of the great number of slaues which are bought there, to carry to other places, as to Saint Thomas, and to Brasilia, to labour there, and to refine Sugar: for they are very strong men, and can labour stoutly, and commonly are better slaues then those of Gabon, but those that are sold in Angola are much better. In this Riuer there is no speciall thing found, which is of any value, but some Blew, Greene, and Blacke stones, wherewith they grind colours, and for their fairenesse are desired of other Negroes, specially in the golden Coast of Guinea, where they are much esteemed of by them. There both the men and women are starke naked, vntill they be sold for slaues, so that they are not ashamed to shew themselves one to the other, as they themselves affirme, and by reason proue, saying, that a man more coueteth and desireth a thing that he seeth not, or may not haue, then that he seeth or may borrow or haue, and for that cause they hide not their priuie members. There the Portugals Traffique much with Barkes to buy slaues, and the Inhabitants are better friends with them, then with any other Nation; because they come much there, and for that no other Nations come to buy slaues there, but the Portugals onely. And there are some Portugals dwelling there, which buy much wares and Merchandizes, such as there to bee had. From Rio de Ardra, to Rio de Lago, is ten miles, and in that Riuer there is nothing else to buy, and therefore it is not much vsed, so that Rio de Ardra, is more vsed then Rio de Volta, and Rio de Lago; from Rio de Lago to Rio de Benni, is about twenty miles, so that Benni is esteemed to be part of the golden Coast, that is about one hundred miles from Mourre, so that in two dayes with helpe of the streame, a man may get thither, where as men are wont to be fixe weekes: before they could turne backe againe from whence they came.

The Towne seemeth to be very great, when you enter into it, you goe into a great broad street, not paved, which seemeth to be seuen or eight times broader then the Warmoes street in Amsterdam; which goeth right out, and neuer crooketh, and where I was lodged with Matheus Cornelison, it was at least a quarter of an houres going from the gate, and yet I could not see to the end of the street, but I saw a great high tree, as farre as I could discerne, and I was told the street was as much longer. There I spake with a Neetherlander, who told me that he had beene as farre as that tree, but saw no end of the street; but perceiued that the houses thereabouts bee much lesse, and some houses that were falling downe: so that it was to be thought, that the end thereof was thereabouts, that tree was a good halfe mile from the house where I was lodged, so that it is thought that that street is a mile long besides the Suburbs. At the gate where I entered on horse-backe, I saw a very high Bulwarke, very thicke of earth, with a very deepe broad ditch, but it was drie, and full of high trees; I spake with one that had gone along by the ditch, a good way, but saw no other then that I saw, and knew not well whither it went round about the Towne or not, that Gate is a reasonable good Gate, made of wood after their manner, which is to be shut, and there alwayes there is watch holden. Without this Gate, there is a great Suburbe: when you are in the great Street aforesaid, you see many great Streets on the sides thereof, which also goe right forth, but you cannot see to the end of them, by reason of their great length, a man might write more of the situation of this Towne, if he might see it, as you may the Townes in Holland, which is not permitted there, by one that alwaies goes with you, some men say, that he goeth with you, because you should haue no harme done vnto you, but yet you must goe no farther then he will let you.

Their Houses.

The Houses in this Towne stand in good order, one close and euen with the other, as the Houses in Holland stand, such Houses as Men of qualitie (which are Gentlemen) or others dwell in, haue two or three steps to goe vp, and before, there is, as it were, a Gallerie, where a man may sit drie; which Gallerie euery morning is made cleane by their Slaues, and in it there is a Mat 10 spred for men to sit on, their Roomes within are foure-square, ouer them hauing a Roofe that is not close in the middle, at the which place, the raine, wind, and light commeth in, and therein they lie and eate their meate; but they haue other places besides, as Kitchens and other roomes. The common Houses are not such, for they haue but one Wall before, wherein there is a wooden Doore, they know not how to make Windowes, but such light and aire as they haue, comes in at the roofe of the House.

The Court.

The Kings Court is very great, within it hauing many great foure-square Plaines, which round about them haue Galleries, wherein there is alwaies watch kept; I was so farre within that Court, that I passed ouer foure such great Plaines, and wheresoeuer I looked, still I saw Gates vpon Gates, to goe into other places, and in that sort I went as farre as euer any Netherlander 20 was, which was to the Stable where his best Horses stood, alwaies passing a great long way: it seemeth that the King hath many Souldiers, he also hath many Gentlemen, who when they come to the Court ride vpon Horses, and sit vpon their Horses as the women in our Countrie doe, on each side hauing one man, on whom they hold fast; and the greater their estate is, the more men they haue going after them. Some of their men haue great Shields, wherewith they keepe the Gentleman from the Sunne; they goe next to him, except those on whom hee leaneth, the rest come after him, playing some on Drums, others vpon Hornes and Fluits, some haue a hollow Iron whereon they strike. The Horse also is led by a man, and so they ride playing to the Court. Such as are very great Gentlemen haue another kind of Musicke, when they ride to the Court, which is like the small Nets wherewith men in our Countries goe to the 30 Fish-market, which Net is filled full of a certaine kind of thing, which they strike vpon with their hands, and make it rattle, in like sort as if their Nets were filled full of great Nuts, and so a man should strike vpon it: those great Gentlemen haue many Seruants, that goe after them striking vpon such Nets. The King hath very many Slaues, both men and women, whereof there are many women Slaues seene, carrying of Water, Iniamus, and Palme-wine, which they say is for the Kings wiues. There are also many men Slaues seene in the Towne, that carrie Water, Iniamus, and Palme-wine, which they say is for the King; and many carrie Grasse, which is for their Horses; and all this is carried to the Court. The King oftentimes sendeth out Presents of Spices, which are carried orderly through the streets, and as the other things aforesaid are carried, so they that carrie them goe one after the other, and by them, there goeth one 40 or two with white Rods, so that euery man must step aside and giue them place, although hee were a Gentleman.

Sixe hundred Wiues.

The King hath many Wiues, and euery yeere goes twice out of his Court, and visiteth the Towne, at which time he sheweth all his Power and Magnificence, and all the Brauerie he can, then he is conuoyed and accompanied by all his Wiues, which are aboue sixe hundred in number, but they are not all his wedded Wiues. The Gentlemen also haue many Wiues, as some haue eightie, some ninetie and more, and there is not the meanest Man among them but hath ten or twelue Wiues at the least, whereby in that place you find more Women then Men.

Gentlemen their making.

They also haue seuerall places in the Towne, where they keepe their Markets; in one place they haue their great Market day, called Dia de Ferro; and in another place, they hold their 50 little Market, called Ferro: to those places they bring all things to sell, as quicke Dogs, whereof they eate many, roasted Apes, and Monkies, Rats, Parots, Hens, Iniamus, Manigette in bon-ches, dried Agedissen, Palme-oyle, great Beanes, diuers sorts of Kankrens, with many other kinds of Fruits, and Beasts, all to eate. They also bring much Wood to burne, Cups to eate and drinke in, and other sorts of wooden Dishes and Cups for the same purpose, great store of Cotton, whereof they make Clothes to weare vpon their bodies. Their Apparell is of the same fashion as theirs of the Golden Coast is, but it is fairer and finelier made; but to shew you the manner thereof it would be ouer-long. They also bring great store of Iron-worke to sell there, and Instruments to fish withall, others to plow and to till the land withall; and many Weapons, as Assagaies, and Kniues also for the Warre. This Market and Traffique is there very orderly 60 holden, and euery one that commeth with such Wares or Merchandises to the Market, knowes his place where to stand, to sell his Wares in the same, they also sell their Wiues as they doe in the Golden Coast.

The

The Gentlemen goe with great Maiestie to the Court, hauing diuers kinds of Musicke with them, and are waited on by diuers other Negroes, one hauing a Drum whereon he playes, others with other Instruments; vpon the Horse there is a little wooden Stoole set, and on the Horse necke they hang a Cow-bell, which rings when the Horse goes; there goes two Negroes by him, on either side one, on whom he leaeth. Those Negroes that attend on him, come euery morning to the Gentlemans doore, and stay there till he comes out, to wait on him. Their Horses are very little, not much greater then Calues in our Countrey, which is the cause that our Horses are so much esteemed of in that Coast. The King hath many Souldiers which are subiect vnto him, and they haue a Generall to command ouer them, as if he were their Captaine:

Their fashions.

10 This Captaine hath some Souldiers vnder him, and goes alwaies in the middle of them, and they goe round about him, singing and leaping, and making great noise, and joy. Those Captaines are very proud of their Office, and are very stately, and goe exceeding proudly in the streets. Their Swords are broad, which hang about their necke in a leather Girdle which reacheth vnder their armes: they also vse Shields and Aslagais, as they in the Golden Coast doe.

They cut their Haire diuersly, each after the best manner that they can. Their apparell also is the like, and vse strange customes, not one like vnto another, all finely made of Cotton, ouer the which they commonly weare Holland Cloth. The young Maides and Boyes goe starke naked, vntill they marrie, or that the King giueth them licence to put on some Apparell; then

20 they make great ioy, because of the friendship the King therein sheweth vnto them, and then they make their bodies very cleane, and strike it ouer with white Earth, and are very stately, sitting in great glorie and magnificence. Their friends come vnto them, to congratulate them, as if the were a Bride. They are circumcised, both Boyes and Girles. They cut three great streakes in their bodies on either side, each streak being three fingers broad, which they doe from their shoulders downe to their waistes, which they thinke to be a great good deed tending to their saluation. They are very conscionable, and will doe no wrong one to the other, neither will take any thing from strangers, for if they doe, they should afterward be put to death, for they lightly iudge a man to die for doing any wrong to a stranger, wherein they vse strange Iustice: they bind the Offenders armes behind at his backe, and blind his eyes, then one of the

30 Iudges comes and lifts him vp with his armes, in such manner, that his head lieth almost vpon the ground, then comes the Executioner and cuts off his head; which done, his bodie is quartered, and the quarters cast into the fields to bee deuoured by certaine Birds, which Birds they feare much, and no man dares doe them any hurt, nor chase them, for there are men purposely appointed to giue them meat and drinke, which they carrie with great magnificence, but no man may see it carried, nor bee present, but those that are appointed to doe it; for euery man runnes out of the way when they see those men come to carrie the Birds meate, and they haue a place where the Birds come purposely for it. They respect strangers very much, for when any man meeteth them, they will shun the way for him and step aside, and dare not bee so bold to goe by, vnlesse they be expressly bidden by the partie, and prayed to goe forward, and although 40 they were neuer so sore laden, yet they durst not doe it; for if they did, they should be punished for it: They are also very couetous of honour, and willingly desire to be praised and rewarded for any friendship they doe.

Vpon the Iland of Corisco, or about Rio de Angra, in the mouth whereof the Iland of Corisco lieth. The Iland of Corisco is a bad place to dwell in, for no man dwelleth in it, for there is nothing to be had in it but fresh Water and Wood, so that the ships that come from the Golden Coast, and fall vpon it, provided themselves there, of Water and Wood. Within the Riuer there lieth three other small Ilands, which also are worth nothing, because they yeeld no profit, and there is nothing abounding in them but Wood. Those Ilands at this day are called (for before they had no names) the Ile De Moucheron, because one Balthasar de Moucheron had by his 50 Factors found them, wherein he caused a Fort to be made, in the yeere 1600. thinking to dwell there, and to bring great Traffique from other places thither. But they of Rio de Gabom, vnderstanding that there were Strangers inhabiting in them, sought all the meanes they could to murder them, and to take both the Fort and their Goods from them, which they did, before they had dwelt foure moneths there, (vnder a Captaine called Edward Hesius) and tooke the Sconce from them by force, murdering all the men that were in it, and called it the Iland of Corisco, which name it had of the Portugals, because vpon that Iland there are many Tempests of thunder and lightning, and great store of Raine, and therefore it is not good to inhabite in, and there will nothing grow therein but Cucumbers. It is well provided of fresh Water, excellent faire red Beanes, and Brasill wood, so exceeding faire and glistering, when it is shauen, 60 as any Glasse can be, which is so hard, that without great paine and labour it cannot be cut downe. The Iland is almost a great mile in compasse, but it is a bad anchoring place, when the Trauaes come.

Rio de Angra

Moucheron.

From Rio de Angra, to Rio de Gabom, is fiftene miles. The Inhabitants of Rio de Gabom, are not friends with them of Rio de Angra, for they oftentimes make warre one against the other, and then againe make peace, so that the friendship betweene them is very small, they haue a King among them, but they are not so mightie as those of Rio de Gabom, but better people to deale withall then those of Gabom, for since the time that they of Gabom, tooke the Skonce and the goods of Moncherom, and kild the men, they of Rio de Angra would haue nothing to doe with them, but were grieued that it was done, but because they feared them of Rio de Gabom, and of Pongo; they durst not withstand them: with those Negroes there is much Traffique to be had, and there are many Teeth to buy, but not so many as in Rio de Gabom, but when you Traffique there you must not stay long with your shallop or boate there, for if you deale not with them for their Teeth in two or three dayes, you shall not deale with them at all, for by reason that few Pinnasses or shallops come thither to Traffique, therefore the Negroes bring all their Teeth thither at the first, to barter for other Wares. Their speech is not like theirs of Gabom, but for opinion and religion they are almost one, and agree therein.

R. Gabom.

The Riuer of Gabom, lyeth about fifteene miles Southward from Rio de Angra, and eight miles Northward from Cape De Lopo Gonsalues, and is right vnder the Equinoctiall Line, about fifteene miles from Saint Thomas, and is a great Land well and easily to bee knowne.

Pongo.

At the mouth of the Riuer there lyeth a Sand three or foure fathome deepe, whereon it beateth mightily, with the streame which runneth out of the Riuer into the Sea. This Riuer in the mouth thereof is at least foure miles broad, but when you are about the Iland called Pongo, it is not aboue two miles broad, on both sides the Riuer there standeth many trees. The Iland lyeth neere to the North, then the South, and a little further there is an Iland wherein there is good prouision to be had, as of Bannanas, Iniamus, and Oranges; about two miles within the Riuer you haue eight fathome deepe, good anchor ground. This Coast reacheth North and South, the depth a good way from the Land about a mile or a mile and an halfe; is, twelue and thirteene fathome, and halfe a mile from the Land, it is foure, fise, sixe, and seuen fathome, you may goe neere about it, because all along that Coast it is good anchor ground, by night you haue the wind off from the Land, and by day from the Sea. This Riuer hath three mightie Kings in it, which raigne therein, as one King on the North point, called Caiombo, and one vpon the South point, called Gabom, and one in the Iland, called Pongo, which hath a monitrous high hill; hee of Pongo is strongest of men, and oftentimes makes warre vpon him of Gabom, hee of Caiombo, is a great friend to him of Pongo, and the Inhabitants of the South point of the Riuer, are great friends with those of Cape De Lopo Gonsalues.

Three Kings.

Cape Gonsalues.

The twelfth of December, we got to Cape Lopo Gonsalues, where we found three ships lying at anchor, two of Zeland, and one of Schiedam. Touching their Religion, they neither know God nor his Commandements, some of them pray to the Sunne, others to the Moone, others to certaine trees, or to the Earth, because they receiue food from thence, so that they esteeme it a great fault to spit vpon the Earth, they goe little abroad in the streets, but when they goe abroad, they carrie a great broad Knife in their hands: both the men and the women haue their bodies pinkt in diuers sorts, strange to behold, wherein they put certaine Grease, mixt with colour, they will not drinke before they first put some of it out of the Pot or Kan, and when they eat they vse not to drinke, but when they haue dined, then they drinke a great draught of water, or of Palme-wine, or else of Malaffo, which is mixed or made of Honey water. In the morning as soone as it is day, they goe to salute their Commander, or Chauenson, and to bid him good morrow, and when they come to him they fall downe vpon their knees, and clapping both their hands together, say, Fino, Fino, Fino, whereby they wish peace, quietnesse, and all good vnto him.

Incestuous customes.

Apparell and ornaments.

They are much addicted to Theeuerie, and to steale some-thing, specially from Strangers, whereof they make no conscience, but thinke they doe well, but they will not steale one from another. The women also are much addicted to Leacherie and Vncleannesse; specially, with strange Nations, whereby they thinke they get great credit, and which is more, the men offer their wiues vnto strangers that come thither, and the King himselfe presenteth and honoureth Strangers with some of his Wiues, whereof he hath a great number. They haue a filthy custome among them, which is, that the King when any of his Daughters waxe great, hee taketh and keepeth them for his Wiues, and the vse of their bodies. The like is done by the Queenes his Wiues, when their Sonnes beginne to be great, for they lie with them, as well as the King doth with his Daughters. Their apparell is fairer then theirs on the Golden Coast, for they trimme their bodies more; about their middles to hide their Priuities. They weare a Mat made of barks of trees, which is coloured red, with a kind of red wood wherewith they dye it, vpon those Mats, they hang some Apes and Monkeyes skinned, or of other wild beasts, with a Bell in the middle, such as Cowes and Sheepe haue about their neckes. They paint their bodies red, with a colour made of red wood, which is verie good, but much lighter then Brasil-wood, oftentimes they make one of their eyes white, the other red or yellow, with a streake or two in their faces, some weare round Beades about their neckes made of barks, some small, some great, not much vnlike the Boxes, which men in Hamborough hang vp to put money in for the poore, but they will not suffer you to looke what is in them. The men and women also for the most part

goe bare-headed, with their haire ihoared and pleated diuersly, some of them weare Caps made of the barks of Cocos or Indian Nut-trees, others weare bunches of feathers made fast to their haire with little Irons, some of them haue holes in their vpper lips, and through their Noses, wherein they put pieces of Elxen bones, as thicke as a Doller with a stalke, which shutteth the hole, which being thrust in comes out at the Nose, and ouer their mouthes, which serueth their turnes well and to good purpose, when they are sicke and fall into a swoond, and that men cannot open their hands by force, then they take that bone and crush the sap of some Greene herbe through it, wherewith they come to themselves again, so that they serue them for two purposes.

Some weare Rings in their lips and in the middle part of their Noses, some thrust small Hornes or Teeth through them, and weare them so, which they thinke to bee a great ornament vnto them, others boare a hole in their neather lips, and play with their Tongues in the hole; many of their men and women weare Rings in their eares, whereof some weigh at least a pound weight, some haue stickes thrust through them, of fise or sixe fingers long, most of them, specially the men weare a Girdle about their middles made of Buffols skin, with the haire still on it, which meeteth not together before by almost a hand breadth, with a piece thereof sticking out at each end, which is tyed together with a small cord of Threed, vpon their bellies they carrie a broad Iron Knife, the sheath thereof also being of Iron: some of those Girdles are a hand broad, and some two or three handfuls broad. Besides those, they vse another sort of Kniues, with two or three points, which are very fearefull to behold, wherewith they cast at a man, and wheresoever they hit they take hold.

They are better armed for weapons then they of Myna, or the Golden Coast, their Armes are Pikes, or Assagaies, Bowes, and Arrowes, long Targets made of barks of Trees. Their Drummets are narrow below and broad aboue, their Pikes are very cunningly made, for they are very curious Workmen in Iron; the women carrie their Husbands Armes for him, and when they will vse them, their Wiues giue them: they are cruell and fierce against their Enemies, and fight one against the other by Land and by Water in Canoes, and when they take any of their Enemies (they were wont in times past to eat them, but now they doe it not) they put them to great torture.

The women also set themselves out verie faire (as they thinke) and weare many red Copper and Tinne Rings vpon their armes and legges, some one, others two; which many times weigh three or foure pound weight, which are so fast and close about their armes, that men can hardly imagine how they get them on; those Rings also are worne by some men, but more by women. The women weare Aprons made of Rushes, which I haue seene them make. Touching their clothes and setting forth of their bodies, it is beastly and vnseemely. They haue no lesse vnseemelineffe in their eating and house-keeping, for they liue like beasts, and sleepe vpon Mats laid vpon the ground, which they make very cunningly. The chiefe meate they eate is Iniamus, Batates, and Bannanas. The Bannanas they vse in stead of bread, when it is well dried, they also eate fish and flesh, with Roots and Sugar-canes: they lay all their meate in one dish, and sit round about it, and eate like a company of beasts. Their King called, Mani, eateth his meate out of a Tinne Platter, but the rest in wooden Platters, sitting vpon a Mat spread vpon the ground.

The greatest labour the women doe, is to fetch water, to gather fruit, and to dresse their meate: their Houses are finely made of Reeds, and covered ouer with Bannanas leaues, and better and cleaner then the Houses in the Golden Coast. The King hath a faire House greater then any in all the Towne; he is called Golipatta, hee is brauely set out with many Beads made of beanes and shels, which are dyed red, and hanged about his necke, and vpon his armes and legs, they strike their faces with a kind of white colour, they are very much subiect to their Kings, and doe him great honour when they are in his presence: before his House there lyeth an Iron Peece, with certaine Bases which he bought in former time of the Frenchmen. They are verie subtile to learne how to vse all kind of Armes; specially, our small Gunnes. Their Winter is from April to August, at which time it is exceeding hot, and few cleere daies, and then it raineth mightily with great drops, which fall so hot vpon the stones that they presently dry vp, by which meanes also the waters are thicke and slimie, in the Riuer and also vpon the shoare. There is good fishing, Oysters grow on the branches of the Trees, which hang downe into the water. They draw their speech long, so that it is better to learne then theirs in the Golden Coast. The Cape is low Land, and is well to be knowne, for there is no Land thereabouts, that reacheth so farre Westerly into the Sea as that doth, it lyeth about a degree Southward from the Equinoctiall Line. When you are at the Cape, there is a Riuer which lyeth South-east from it, about three miles, whereinto the shallops commonly saile, to barter for some Teeth, which are there to bee had in the Village, which lyeth about foure miles vpwards within the Riuer: In this Riuer: there are many Sea-horses, and Crocodiles, so that it is thought that hee Riuer of Nilus ioyneth thereunto, and hath an issue there into the Sea: In this Countrey there are many cruell and strange beasts, as Elephants, Buffols, Dragons, Snakes, Apes, Monkeyes, which are very fearefull to behold, and very hurtfull.

Those people are better to be dealt withall, then they of Gabom, and we find not, that they beare any spight or malice to the Netherlanders, (as they of Gabom haue done) in Anno 1601. to a ship called the Palme-tree, and to another, called the Moorein of Delft, as also to a Spanish Barke, who in short time, one after the other they fell vpon, and taking them, kild all the men and eate them, with diuers other such trickes more by them done: but for that it is good for the ships in that place to lie and refresh themselues, to fetch water, and to Calke them: therefore all the ships lie most at this place, to make themselues ready, and fit to returne backe againe. About this Cape there lie many Sands, whereon a ship might soone smite, but behind the bankes there is no feare, the Lead will giue a man meanes to find his way well enough.

Voyage.

N the yeere 1589, Abraham Cocke of Lime-house, began his Voyage toward the Riuer of Plate, with two Pinnasses of fiftie Tuns a peece: The one was called, the May-morning; the other, the Dolphine. We sailed from the Riuer of Thames, the twentieth of Aprill; and the fixe and twentieth of the same moneth, we put into Plimmoth, where we tooke in some prouision for the Voyage. The seuenth of May we put to Sea, and with foule weather were beaten backe againe into Plimmoth, where we remained certaine dayes, and then proceeded on our Voyage: and running along the Coast of Spaine, and Barbarie, we put into the Roade of Sancta Cruz, and there set our Light-horse-man together, which we carried in two pieces; Abraham Cocke made great account hereof, thinking that this Boat should haue made his Voyage. This done, we put to Sea, and running along the Coast of Guinea, wee were becalmed, because wee wer so neere the Coast. Heere our men fell sicke of the Scuruie, in such sort, that there were very few sound. And being within three or foure Degrees of the Equinoctiall line, we fell with the Cape De las Palmas, where we had some refreshing, wherewith our men recovered. The people of the Cape de las Palmas made much of vs, saying, that they would trade with vs: but it was but to betray vs. For they are very trecherous, and were like to haue taken our boat, and hurt some of our men. From this Cape we lay South-west off, but the Current and the Calmes deceiued vs; so that we were driuen downe to the Ile of Saint Thome, thinking that we had beene farther off to the Sea then we were. And being in distresse for wood and water, we went in on the South end betweene San Tome, and the Ilands Das Rolas: where we rode very smooth, and with our Light-horse-man went on shoare, thinking to haue watered: but wee found none in the Iland. Heere we had great store of Plantans and Oranges. We found a Village of Negroes, which are sent from San Tome, for the Portugals of San Tome do vse, when their slaues be sicke or weake, to send them thither to get their strength againe. For the Ilands are very fruitful; and though there be no fresh water, yet they maintaine themselues with the wine of the Palme trees. Hauing refreshed our selues with the fruit of this Iland, we burned the Village. And running on the East side of San Tome, we came before the Towne; but we durst not come neere: for the Castle shot at vs, which hath very good Ordnance in it.

Then we lay East and by South toward the Maine, and in foure and twentie houres, we had sight of the Cape De lopo Gonsalues: and being within three Leagues of the said Cape, we cast about and stood againe toward the Iland of San Tome, and turned vp on the West side of the Iland: and comming to a little Riuer, which runneth out of the Mountaines, we went on shore with our Light-horse-man, with fixe or seuen Buts to fill with water. But the Gouernour had imbosked one hundred men of the Iland; and when we were on shore, they came vpon vs, and killed one of our men, and hurt another: wherefore we retired to our Boat, and gate aboard.

Then Abraham Cocke determined to fetch the Coast of Brasill, and lay West South-west into the Sea: and being some fiftie Leagues off, we fell into a Scull of Dolphins, which did greatly relieue vs: for they did follow our ship all the way, till we fell with the land: which was some thirtie dayes. And running along the Coast of Brasil, till we came to Ilha Grande, which standeth in five Degrees Southward of the line: we put in betwixt the Iland and the Main, and haled our ships on shoare, and washed them, and refreshed our selues, and tooke in fresh water. In this Iland are no Inhabitants, but it is very fruitfull. And being heere some twelue dayes, there came in a little Pinnasse, which was bound to the Riuer of Plate, which came in to water, and to get some refreshment: and presently we went aboard, and tooke the Portugall Merchant out of the Pinnasse, which told Abraham Cocke, that within two moneths there should two Pinnasses come from the Riuer of Plate, from the Towne of Buenos Aieres.

From this Towne there come euery yeere foure or five Carauels to Bahia in Brasil, and to Angola in Africa: which bring great store of Treasure, which is transported ouer land out of Pern, into the Riuer of Plate. Then Abraham Cocke desirous to make his Voyage, tooke some of the Dolphin men into his ship, and sent the Dolphin home againe, which had not as yet made any Voyage. This Portugall Merchant carried vs to a place in this Iland, where there was a banished man, which had planted great store of Plantans; and told vs, that we might with this fruit goe to the Riuer of Plate: for our bread and victuals were almost all spent.

The Dolphin sent home.

Ile de Labos Marinos.

With this hard allowance we departed from this Iland, and were fixe and thirtie dayes before we came to the Ile de Labos Marinos, which is in the mouth of the Riuer of Plate. This Iland is halfe a mile long, and hath no fresh water; but doth abound with Seales and Sea-morses: in such sort, that our Light-horse-man could not get on shoare for them, without we did beat them with our Oares: and the Iland is couered with them. Vpon these Seales we liued some thirtie dayes, lying vp and downe in the Riuer, and were in great distresse of victuals. Then we determined to run vp to Buenos Aieres, and with our Light-horse-man to take one of the Pinnasses that rid at the Towne. And being so high vp the Riuer as the Towne, wee had a mightie storme at South-west, which draue vs backe againe, and we were faine to ride vnder Isla Verde, that is, the Greene Iland, which is in the mouth of the Riuer on the North side.

Here we were all discomfoted for lacke of victuals, and gaue ouer the Voyage, & came to the Northward againe, to the Ile de Sant Sebastian, lying iust vnder the Tropicke of Capricorne. There we went on shoare to catch fish, & some went vp into the woods to gather fruit: for we weare all in a manner famished. There was at that time a Canoe fraught with Indians, that came from the Towne of Spiritu Sancto. These Indians landed on the West side of the Iland, and came through the woods, and tooke five of vs, and carried vs to the Riuer of Ianeiro. After this mischance, our Captaine Abraham Cocke went to Sea, and was neuer heard of more.

When wee that were taken had remained foure moneths in the Riuer of Ianeiro, I and one Torner were sent to Angola in Africa to the Citie of Saint Paul, which standeth in nine Degrees to the Southward of the Equinoctiall line. Heere I was presently taken out of the ship, and put into prison, and sent vp the Riuer Quansa to a Towne of Garrison, which is one hundred and thirtie miles vp the Riuer. And being there two moneths, the Pilot of the Gouernors Pinnasse died: then I was commanded to carrie her downe to the Citie, where I presently fell sicke, and lay eight moneths in a poore estate: for they hated me because I was an English-man. But being recouered of my sicknesse, Don Iohn Hurtado de Mendoza, who then was Gouernor, commanded me to goe to the Riuer of Congo, called Zaire, in a Pinnasse, is to trade for Elephants teeth, Wheate, and Oyle of the Palme-tree. The Riuer Zaire is fiftie Leagues from the Citie to the Northward, and is the greatest Riuer in all that Coast. In the mouth of this Riuer is an Iland, called the Ile de Calabes, which had at that time a Towne in it. Heere we laded our Pinnasse with Elephants teeth, Wheate, and Oyle of the Palme, and so returned to the Citie againe.

His trading on the Coast, offer to escape, imprisonment, exile; escape, and new imprisonment: his sending to Elambo, and Bahia Das Vaccas; Many strange occurrences.

Hen I was sent to Longo, which is fiftene Leagues to the Northward of the Riuer Zaire: and carried all Commodities fit for that Countrey; as long Glasse-beads, and round Blew beads, and Seed beads, and Looking-glasses, Blew and Red course cloth, and Irish Rugs, which were very rich Commodities. Heere wee sold our cloth at a great rate, for we had for one yard of cloth, three Elephants teeth, that weighed one hundred and twenty pound: and we bought great store of Palme-cloth, and Elephants tayles. So in little time, we laded our Pinnasse. For this Voyage I was very welcome to the Gouernour; who promised me my liberty, if I would serue him. So I went in his Pinnasse two yeeres and a halfe vpon the Coast.

Then there came a ship of Holland to the Citie, the Merchant of which ship promised to carrie me away. And when they were readie to depart, I went secretly aboard; but I was bewrayed by Portugals, which sailed in the ship, and was fetched on shoare by the Sergeants of the Citie, and put in Prison, and lay with great bolts of Iron two moneths, thinking that the Gouernour would haue put me to death: but at last, I was banished for euer, to the Fort of Massangano, to serue in the Conquest of those Parts. Here I liued a most miserable life for the space of sixe yeeres, without any hope to see the Sea againe.

In this Fort there were Egyptians and Moriscoes, that were banished as my selfe. To one of these Egyptians I brake my mind, and told him, that it were better for vs to venture our liues for our libertie, then to liue in that miserable place. This Egyptian was as willing as my selfe, and told me, he would procure ten of his conlorts to goe with vs. So we got three Egyptians, and seuen Portugals. That night, we got the best Canoe that we could find, and went downe the Riuer Coanza: and being as farre downe as Mani Cabech, which is a little Lord in the Prouince of Elamba, we went on shoare with our twelue Muskets, Powder, and Shot. Heere we sunke our Canoe, because they should not know where we went on shoare. We made a little fire in the Wood, and scorched Gmie Wheat, which we brought from Massangano to relieue vs, for we had none other food.

Assoone as it was night, wee tooke our iourney all that night, and the next day without any water at all. The second night, we were not able to goe, and were faine to digge and scrape vp rootes of Trees, and sucke them to maintaine life. The third day, wee met with an old Negro, which was traouiling to Mani Cabech, we bound his hands behind him, and made him leade vs the way to the Lake of Casanfa. And traouiling all the day in this extreme hot Countrie, we came to the Bansa, or Towne of Mani Casanfa, which lieth within the Land twelue leagues from the Citie of San Paulo. Here we were forced to aske water: but they would giue vs none.
Then we determined to make them flee their houses with our shot: but seeing that we were desperately bent, they called their Lord Mani Casanfa, who gaue vs water and faire speeches, desiring vs to stay all night, onely to betray vs: but we departed presently, and rested that night in the Lake of Casanfa.

The fourth day at night, we came to the Riuer which is toward the North, and passed it with great danger. For there are such abundance of Crocodiles in this Riuer, that no man dare come neere the Riuer side, where it is deepe. The fift day at night, wee came to the Riuer Dande, and traouiled so farre to the Eastward, that we were right against the Serras, or Moun-taines of Manibangono, which is a Lord that warreth against the King of Congo, whither wee intended to goe. Here we passed the Riuer, and rested halfe the night. And being two leagues from the Riuer, we met with Negroes, which asked vs, whither we traouiled. Wee told them, that we were going to Congo. These Negroes said, that we were in the wrong way, and that they were Mascongors, and would carrie vs to Bambe, where the Duke of Bambe lay.

So wee went some three miles East vp into the Land, till wee perceiued that we were the wrong way: for we traouiled by the Sunne, and would goe no farther that way: and turned backe againe to the Westward, they stood before vs with their Bowes, Arrowes and Darts, readie to shoot at vs. But we determining to goe through them, discharged sixe Muskets together, and killed foure; which did amaze them, and made them to retire. But they followed vs foure or fife miles, and hurt two of our companie with their Arrowes. The next day, we came into the borders of Bamba, and traouiled all that day. At night, we heard the surge of the Sea.
The seuenth day in the morning, we saw the Captain of the Citie come after vs with Horsmen, and great store of Negroes. Hereupon our companie being dismayed, seuen of our faint-hearted Portugals hid themselves in the Thicket. I and the foure Egyptians thought to haue escaped:
but they followed vs so fast, that we were faine to goe into a little Wood. Assoone as the Captaine had ouertaken vs, he discharged a volley of shot into the Wood, which made vs lose one another.

Thus being all alone, I bethought my selfe, that if the Negroes did take me in the Woods, they would kill me: wherefore, thinking to make a better end among the Portugals and Mullatos, I came presently out of the Wood with my Musket readie charged, making none account of my life. But the Capitaine, thinking that we had beene all twelue together, called to me, and said, Fellow Souldier, I haue the Gouernours pardon, if you will yeeld your selues, you shall haue no hurt. I hauing my Musket readie, answered the Capitaine, that I was an Englishman, and had serued sixe yeeres at Massangano, in great miserie; and came in companie with eleuen Portugals and Egyptians, and here am left all alone; and rather then I will be hanged, I will die amongst you. Then the Capitaine came neere vnto me, and said, Deliuer thy Musket to one of the Souldiers, and I protest, as I am a Gentleman, and a Souldier, to saue thy life, for thy resolute mind. Whereupon I yeelded vp my Musket and my selfe.

Then the Capitaine commanded all the Souldiers and Negroes to search the Woods, and to bring them out alieue or dead; which was presently done. Then they carried vs to the Citie of San Paulo: where I, and the three Egyptians lay in Prison three moneths, with Collars of Iron, and great Bolts vpon our legs, and hardly escaped.

At that time the Gouvernour sent foure hundred men, that were banished out of Portugall, vp into the Countrey of Elambe. Then I was with Proclamation through the Citie banished for ever to the Warres, and marched with them to Sowonfo, which is a Lord, that obeyeth the Duke of Bambe: from thence to Samanibansa, and then to Namba Calamba, which is a great Lord, who did resist vs: but we burned his Towne, and then he obeyed vs, and brought three thousand warlike Negroes to vs. From thence to Sollancango a little Lord, that fought very desperately with vs, but was forced to obey: and then to Combrecaianga, where we remayned two yeares. From this place wee gaue many assaults, and brought many Lords to subiection. Wee were fiftene thousand strong, and marched to the Outeiro, or Mountaine of Ingombe. But first we burned all Ingafia, which was his Countrey, and then we came to the chiefe Towne of Ingombe, which is halfe a dayes journey to goe vp.

Foure hundred banished Portugals employed in the Warres. Sowonfo. Namba Calamba. Sollancango. Combrecaianga. Ingafia. Ingombe.

This Lord came vpon vs with more then twentie thousand Bowes, and spoyled many of our men. But with our shot we made a great spoyle among them, whereupon he retyred vp into the Mountaine, and sent one of his Captaines to our Generall; signifying, that the next day hee would obey him. Thenext day he entred our Campe in great pompe with Drums, Petos, and Pongoes, or Waytes, and was royally receiued: and he gaue great Presents, and greatly enriched the Generall, and them which marched vp. Vpon the toppe of the Mountaine is a great Plaine, where he hath his chiefe Towne; verie fresh, full of Palme-trees, Sugar-canes, Potatos, and other roots, and great store of Oranges and Limons. Here is a Tree that is called Engeraiy, that beareth a fruit as big as a Pome-water, and hath a stone in it, present remedie for the Wind Cholicke, which was strange to the Portugals. Here is a Riuer of fresh water, that springeth out of the Mountaine, and runneth all along the Towne. Wee were here fise dayes, and then we marched vp into the Countrey, and burned and spoyled for the space of sixe weekes; and then returned to Engombe againe with great store of slaues, sheepe and Goates, and great store of Margarite stones, which are currant money in that Land. Here we pitched our Campe a league from this pleasant Mountaine, which remayned twelue monethes: but I was shot in my right legge, and many Portugals and Mullatos, were carryed to the Citie to be cured.

A fruit good for the Collick

Then the Gouvernour sent a Frigar to the South-ward with sixtie Souldiers, my selfe beeing one of the company, and all kind of Commodities. We turned vp to the South-ward till wee came into twelue degrees. Here we found a faire sandie Bay. The people of this place brought vs Cowes and Sheepe, Wheate and Beanes; but we stayed not there, but came to Babia das Vacas, that is, the Bay of Cowes, which the Portugals call, Babia de Torre, because it hath a rocke like a Towre. Here wee roade on the North-side of the Rocke in a sandie Bay; and bought great store of Cowes, and Sheepe bigger then our English Sheepe, and very fine Copper. Also we bought a kind of sweet wood, called Cacongo, which the Portugals esteeme much, and great store of Wheate and Beanes. And hauing laded our Barke wee sent her home: but fiftie of vs stayed on shoare, and made a little Fort with rafters of wood, because the people of this place are treacherous, and not to to bee trusted. So in seuentene dayes wee had fise hundred head of Cattell: and within tenne dayes the Gouvernour sent three shippes and so wee departed to the Citie.

In this Bay may any ship ride without danger, for it is a smooth Coast. Here may any shippe that commeth out of the East Indies refresh themselves. For the Portugals Carracks now of late come along that Coast, to the Citie to water and refresh themselves. These people are called, Endallambondos, and haue no gouernment among themselves: and therefore they are verie trecherous, and those that trade with these people must stand vpon their owne guard. They are very simple and of no courage, for thirtie or fortie men may goe boldly vp into the Countrey, and fetch downe whole Heards of Cattell. We bought the Cattell for blue glasse-beads of an inch long, which are called Mopinder; and payd fiftene beads for one Cow.

This Prouince is called, Dombe, and it hath a ridge of high Serras, or Mountaines, that stretch from the Serras, or Mountaines of Cambambe, wherein are Mines; and lye along that Coast South and by West. Here is great store of fine Copper, if they would worke in their Mines: but they take no more, then they weare for a brauerie. The men of this place weare skinnes about their middles, and beads about their neckes. They carrie Darts of Iron, and Bow and Arrowes in their hands. They are beastly in their liuing, for they haue men in womens apparell, whom they keepe among their wiues.

Discoverie of the Gagas; Their Warres, Man-eating; Over-running Countries: His Trade with them, betraying, escape to them, and living with them, with many strange Adventures. The Gagas are the greatest Man-eaters in the World.

Mofarigosat, a great Negro Lord.

Our second Voyage turning vp along the Coast, we came to the Morro, or Cliffe of Benguele, which standeth in twelue degrees of Southerly latitude. Here we saw a mighty Cape of men on the Southside of the riuer Cona. And being desirous to know what they were, we went on shore with our Boat; & presently there came a troop of five hundred men to the water side. We asked them, Who they were? then they told vs, that they were the Gagas, or Gindes; that comes from * Serra de Lion, and passed through the Citie of Congo; and so trauelled to the East-ward of the great Citie of Angola, which is called Dongo. The great Gaga, which was their Generall, came downe to the waters side to see vs. For hee had neuer seene white men before. He asked, wherefore we came? we told him, that wee came to trade vpon the Coast: then he bade vs welcome, and called vs on shoare with our Commodities: we laded our ship with slaues in seuen dayes, and bought them so good cheape, that many did not cost one Riall a piece, which were worth in the Citie twelue Millie-reys.

Being readie to depart the great Giaga stayed vs, and desired our Boat to passe his men ouer the Riuer Cona: for he determined to ouer-runne the Realme of Benguele, which was on the North-side of the Riuer Cona. So we went with him to his Campe, which was very orderly intrenched with piles of wood. We had Houses provided for vs that night, and many burthens of Palme-wine, Cowes, Goats, and Flowre.

In the morning before day the Generall did strike his Gongo, which is an Instrument of War that soundeth like a Bell; and presently made an Oration with a loud voice, that all the Campe might heare, that he would destroy the Benguelas, with such couragious and vehement speeches, as were not to be looked for among the Heathen people: and presently they were all in armes, and marched to the Rivers side, where he had provided Gingados. And beeing readie with our Boat and Gingados, the Generall was faine to beate them backe, because of the credit who should be first. We carried ouer eightie men at once; and with our Muskets we beat the enemy off, and landed, but many of them were slaine. By twelue of the clocke all the Gagas were ouer.

Then the Generall commanded all his Drums, Tauales, Petes, Pongos, and all his Instruments of warlike Musicke to strike vp, and gaue the on-set, which was a bloudie day to the Benguelas. These Benguelas presently broke and turned their backs, and a very great number of them were slaine, and were taken Captiues, man, woman and child. The Prince Hombiangymbe was slaine, which was Ruler of this Countrey, and more then one hundred of his chiefe Lords, and their heads presented, and throwne at the feet of the great Gaga. The men, women, and children, that were brought in captiue alieue, and the dead CorpSES that were brought to bee eaten, were strange to behold. For these Gagas are the greatest Canibals and Man-eaters that bee in the World, for they fed chiefly vpon mans flesh, hauing all the Cattell of that Countrey.

They settled themselves in this Countrey, and tooke the spoile of it. Wee had great Trade with these Gagas five monethes, and gained greatly by them. These Gagas were not contented to stay in this place of Benguela, although they lacked almost nothing. For they had great store of Cattell and Wheate, and many other Commodities, but they lacked Wine: for in these parts there are no Palme-trees.

After the five monethes were expired, they marched toward the Prouince of Bambala, to a great Lord, that is called Calicansamba, whose Countrey is five dayes journey vp into the Land. In these five monethes space we made three Voyages to the Citie of San Paul, and comming the fourth time we found them not.

Being loth to returne without Trade, wee determined to goe vp into the Land after them; So we went fifty on shore, and left our ship riding in the Bay of Benguela to stay for vs; and marching two dayes vp into the Countrey, we came to a great Lord, which is called Mofarigosat: and comming to his first Towne, we found it burned to the ground, for the Gagas had passed and taken the spoyle. To this Lord we sent a Negro, which we had bought of the Gagas, and liued with vs, and bid him say, that he was one of the great Gagas men, and that hee was left to carrie vs to the Campe. This Lord bade vs welcome for feare of the great Gaga: but hee delayed the time, and would not let vs passe, till the Gaga was gone out of his Countrey. This Lord Mofarigosat, seeing that the Gagas were cleere of him, began to palter with vs, and would not let vs goe out of his Land, till we had gone to the warres with him; for hee thought himselfe a mightie mightie man hauing vs with him. For in this place they neuer saw white man before, nor Gunnes. So we were forced to goe with him, and destroyed all his Enemies, and returned to his Towne againe. Then we desired him, that he would let vs depart: But he denyed vs, without we would promise him to come againe, and leaue a white man with him in pawne.

These Portugals and Mulatos being desirous to get away from this place, determined to draw lots who should stay: but many of them would not agree to it. At last they consented together that it were fitter to leaue me, because I was an Englishman, then any of themselves. Here I was faine to stay perforce. So they left me a Musket, Powder, and ihot; promising this Lord Mofarigofat, that within two monethes they would come againe, and bring an hundred men to helpe him in his Warres, and to trade with him: but all was to shift themselves away, for they feared that he would haue taken vs all Captines. Here I remayned with this Lord till the two monethes were expired, and was hardly vsed, because the Portugals came not according to promise.

The chiefe men of this Towne would haue put me to death, and stripped me naked, and were readie to cut off mine head. But the Lord of the Towne commanded them to stay longer, thinking that the Portugals would come. And after that I was let loose againe, I went from one Towne to another, shifting for my selfe, within the liberties of this Lord. And beeing in feare of my life among them, I ranne away, purposing to goe to the Campe of the Gagas.

And hauing trauelled all that night, the next day I came to a great Towne, which was called, Cashil, which stood in a mightie ouer-growne thicket. Here I was carried into the Towne to the Lord Cashil; and all the Towne great and small came to wonder at mee, for in this place there was neuer any white man seene. Here were some of the great Gagas men, which I was glad to see, and went with these Gagas to Calicansamba, where the Campe was.

This Towne of the Lord Cashil is very great, and is so ouer-growne with Olicondie Trees, Cedars, and Palmes, that the streets are darkened with them. In the middle of the Towne there is an Image, which is as bigge as a man, and standeth twelue foot high: and at the foot of the Image there is a Circle of Elephants Teeth, pitched into the ground. Vpon these Teeth stand great store of dead mens skuls, which are killed in the warres, and offered to this Image. They vse to powre Palme-wine at his feet, and kill Goats, and powre their bloud at his feet. This Image is called Quesango, and the people haue a great beliefe in him, and sweare by him; and doe beleue when they are sick, that Quesango is offended with them. In many places of this Towne were litle Images, and ouer them great store of Elephants Teeth piled.

The streets of this Towne were paved with Palme-canes very orderly. Their Houses were round like an Hiue, and within hanged with fine Mats very curiously wrought. On the South-east end of the Towne was a Mokiso, which had more then three Tunnes of Elephants Teeth piled ouer him.

From this Towne of Cashil, I trauelled vp into the Countrey with the Gagas two dayes, and came to Calicansamba, where the great Gaga had his Campe, and was welcome to him. Among the Caniball people, I determined to liue, hoping in God, that they would trauell so farre to the West-ward, till we should see the Sea againe; and so I might escape by some ship. These Gagas remayned foure monethes in this place, with great abundance and plentie of Cattle, Corne, Wine, and Oyle, and great triumphing, drinking, dancing, and banquetting with mans flesh, which was an heauie spectacle to behold.

At the end of foure monethes they marched toward the Serras, or Mountaines of Cashindabar, which are mightie high, and haue great Copper-mynes, and they tooke the spoyle all the way as they went. From thence they went to the Riuer Longa, and passed it, and settled themselves in the Towne of Calango, and remayned there fife or sixe monethes. Then wee arose, and entred into the Prouince of Tondo, and came to the Riuer Gonsa, and marched on the South-side of the Riuer to a Lord that was called Makellicolonge, neere to the great Citie of Dongo. Here we passed ouer mightie high Mountaines, and found it very cold.

Hauing spent sixteene moneths among these Canibals, they marched to the Westward againe, and came along the Riuer Gonsa, or Gunza, to a Lord that is called Shillambansa, Vnkle to the King of Angola. We burned his chiefe Towne, which was after their fashion very sumptuously builded. This place is very pleasant and fruitfull. Heere we found great store of wild Peacocks, flying vp and downe the Trees, in as great abundance as other Birds. The old Lord Shillambansa was buried in the middle of the Towne, and had an hundred tame Peacokes kept vpon his Graue: which Peacokes he gaue to his Mokiso, and they were called Angello Mokiso, that is, The Devils or Idols Birds, and were accounted as holy things. He had great store of Copper, Cloth, and many other things laid vpon his Graue; which is the order of that Countrey.

From this place we marched to the Westward, along the Riuer Coanza, and came right against the Serras, or Mountaines of Cambambe, or Serras de Prata. Here is the great fall of water, that falleth right downe, and maketh a mightie noyse, that is heard thirtie miles. Wee entred into the Prouince of Casama, and came to one of the greatest Lords, which was called Casama.

Langere. He obeyed the Great Gaga, and carried vs to a Lord, called Casoch, which was a great Warriar; for he had some seuen yeeres before, ouerthrowne the Portugals Campe, and killed eight hundred Portugals, and fortie thousand Negroes, that were on the Portugals side. This Lord did stoutly withstand the Gagas, and had the first day a mightie battaile: but had not the victorie that day. So wee made a Sconse of Trees after their fashon, and remayned foure moneths in the Warres with them. I was so highly esteemed with the Great Gaga, because I killed many Negroes with my Musket, that I had any thing that I desired of him. He would also, when they went out to the Warres, giue charge to his men ouer me. By this meanes I haue beene often carried away in their armes, and saued my life. Here we were within three dayes Iourney of Massangano, before mentioned, where the Portugals haue a Fort: and I sought 10 meanes, and got to the Portugals againe with Merchant Negroes, that came to the Campe to buy Slaues.

There were in the Campe of the Gagas, twelue Captains. The first, called Imbe Calandola, their Generall a man of great courage. He warreth all by enchantment, and taketh the Deuils counsell in all his exploits. He is alwaies making of sacrifices to the Deuill, and doth know many times what shall happen vnto him. Hee beleueth that hee shall neuer die but in the Warres. There is no Image among them, but he vseth certaine ceremonies. He hath straight Lawes to his Souldiers: for, those that are faint-hearted, and turne their backs to the Enemie, are presently condemned and killed for cowards, and their bodies eaten. He vseth euery night to make a warlike Oration vpon an high Scaffold, which doth encourage his people.

It is the order of these people, wheresoeuer they pitch their Campe, although they stay but one night in a place, to build their Fort, with such wood or trees as the place yeeldeth: so that the one part of them cutteth downe trees and boughs, and the other part carrieth them, and buildeth a round Circle with twelue Gates. So that euery Captaine keepeth his Gate. In the middle of the Fort is the Generalls house, intrenched round about, and hee hath many Porters that keepe the Doore. They build their houses very close together, and haue their Bowes, Arrowes, and Darts, standing without their Doores: And when they giue alarme, they are suddenly all out of the Fort. Euery companie at their Doores keepe very good watch in the night, playing vpon their Drums and Tauals.

These Gagas told vs of a River that is to the Southward of the Bay of Vaccas, that hath great 30 store of Gold: and that they gathered vp great store of graines of Gold vpon the Sand, which the fresh water drieth downe in the time of raine. We found some of this Gold in the handles of their Hatchets, which they vse to engraue with Copper, and they called it Copper also, and doe not esteeme it.

These Gagas delight in no Countrey, but where there is great store of Palmares, or Groues of Palmes. For they delight greatly in the Wine, and in the Fruit of the Palme, which serueth to eat and to make Oyle: and they draw their Wine contrarie to the Imbondos. These Palme-trees are fixe or seuen fathoms high, and haue no leaues but in the top: and they haue a deuice to goe vp to the top of the Tree, and lay no hands on it, and they draw the Wine in the top of the tree in a Bottle.

But these Gagas cut the Palme-trees downe by the roote, which lie ten dayes before they will giue Wine. And then they make a square hole in the top and heart of the Tree, and take out of the hole euery morning a quart, and at night a quart. So that euery Tree giuerh two quarts of Wine a day for the space of fixe and twentie dayes, and then it drieth vp.

When they settle themselves in any Countrey, they cut downe as many Palmes as will serue them Wine for a moneth: and then as many more. So that in a little time they spoile the Countrey. They stay no longer in a place, then it will afford them maintenance. And then in Haruest time they arise, and settle themselves in the fruitfulest place that they can find; and doe reape their Enemies Corne, and take their Cattell. For they will not sowe, nor plant, nor bring vp any Cattell, more then they take by Warres. When they come into any Countrey that is strong, 50 which they cannot the first day conquer, then their Generall buildeth his Fort, and remayneth sometimes a moneth or two quiet. For he saith, it is as great warres to the Inhabitants to see him settled in their Countrey, as though he fought with them euery day. So that many times the Inhabitants come and assault him at his Fort: and these Gagas defend themselves and flesh them on for the space of two or three dayes. And when their Generall mindeth to giue the onset, he will in the night put out some one thousand men: which do emboske themselves about a mile from their Fort. Then in the morning the great Gaga goeth with all his strength out of the Fort, as though he would take their Towne. The Inhabitants comming neere the Fort to defend their Countrey, being betweene them, the Gagas giue the watch-word with their Drummes, and then the embosked men arise, so that very few escape. And that day their Generall ouer- 60 runneth the Countrey.

The great Gaga Calando hath his haire very long, embroydred with many knots full of Bamba shells, which are very rich among them, and about his necke a Collar of *Malo*es, which are also shells, that are found vpon that Coast, and are sold among them for the worth of twen-tie

tie shillings a shell: and about his middle he weareth Landes, which are Beades made of the Oltridges Egges. He weareth a Palme cloth about his middle, as fine as Silke. His body is carved and cut with sundry workes, and euery day anointed with the fat of men. Hee weareth a peece of Copper crosse his nose, two inches long, and in his eares also. His body is alwaies painted red and white. He hath twenty or thirty wiues, which followed him when he goeth abroad; and one of them carrieth his Bow and Arrowes, and foure of them carry his Cuppes of drinke after him. And when hee drinketh, they all kneele downe, and clap their hands and sing.

Cruell brauery

They vse this ceremony in Florida.

Their women weare their haire with high trompes, full of Bamba shells, and are anointed with Cinnet. They pull out foure of their teeth; two aboue and two below for a brauery: And those that haue not their teeth out, are loathsome to them, and shall neither eate nor drinke with them. They weare great store of Beades about their neckes, armes and legs; about their middles, Silke cloathes.

Foolish Gallantry.

The women are very fruitfull, but they enioy none of their children: For as soone as the woman is deliuered of her Childe, it is presently buried quicke; So that there is not one Childe brought vp in all this Generation. But when they take any Towne, they keepe the Boyes and Girles of thirteene or foureteene yeares of age, as their owne children. But the men and women they kill and eate. These little Boyes they traine vp in the warres, and hang a collar about their neckes for a disgrace, which is neuer taken off till he proueth himselfe a man, and bring his enemies head to the Generall: And then it is taken off, and he is a Free-man, and is called Generation of Vipers. A generation without generation of Gaga. Panizaries. Boyes trayned vp in the wars.

Gonso, or Souldier. This maketh them all desperate, and forward to be free, and counted men: and so they doe increase. In all this Campe there were but twelue naturall Gagas that were their Captaines, and foureteene or fifteene women. For it is more then fiftie yeares since they come from Serra de Lion, which was their natiue Countrey. But their Campe is sixteene thousand strong, and sometimes more.

These Gagas came from Serra Leona.

When the great Gaga Calandola, vndertaketh any great enterprize against the Inhabitants of any Countrey, he maketh a sacrifice to the Diuell, in the morning before the Sunne riseth. He sitteth vpon a stoole, hauing on each side of him a man Witch: then he bath fortie or fiftie women which stand round about him, holding in each hand a Zeneras, or wilde horses tayle, where with they doe flourish and sing. Behind them are great store of Petes, Ponges, and Drummes, which alwaies play. In the midst of them is a great fire; vpon the fire an earthen pot with white powders, where-with the men Witches doe paint him on the forehead, temples, thwart the breast and belly, with long ceremonies and enchanting tearmes. Thus he continueth till sunne is downe. Then the Witches bring his Casengala, which is a weapon like an hatchet, and put it into his hand; and bid him bee strong against his enemies: for his Mokiso is with him. And presently there is a Man-childe brought, which forth-with he killeth. Then are foure men brought before him; two whereof, as it happeneth, he presently striketh and killeth; the other two, he commandeth to be killed without the Fort.

His solemne sacrifice to the Devill.

Zebra.

Butcherly rites.

Here I was by the men Witches commanded to goe away, because I was a Christian. For then the Diuell doth appeare to them, as they say. And presently he commandeth fise Cowes to be killed in the Fort, and fise without the Fort: And likewise as many Goates, and as many Dogges; and the blood of them is sprinkled in the fire, and their bodies are eaten with great feasting and triumph. And this is vsed many times by all the other Captaines of their Armie.

When they bury the dead, they make a vault in the ground, and a seate for him to sit. The dead hath his haire newly imbroydred, his body washed, and anointed with sweete powders. He hath all his best robes put on, and is brought betweene two men to his graue, and set in his seate, as though he were aliue. He hath two of his wiues set with him, with their armes broken, and then they couer the vault on the top. The Inhabitants when they dye, are buried after the same fashion, and haue the most part of their goods buried with them. And euery moneth there is a meeting of the kindred of the dead man, which mourne and sing dolefull songs at his graue, for the space of three daies; and kill many Goates, and powre their blood vpon his graue, and Palme-Wine also; and vse this ceremony as long as any of their kindred be aliue. But those that haue no kindred think themselves vnhappy men, because they haue none to mourne for them when they dye. These people are very kind one to another in their health; but in their sicknesse they doe abhorre one another, and will shun their company.

Buriall of their dead. Cruel funerals.

Vnkind kinde.

BEing departed from the Gagas, I came to Mafangano, where the Portugals haue a Towne of Garrison. There was at that time a new Gouernor, which was called, Seignior Iuan Continbo: who brought authority to conquer the Mines or Mountaines of Cambamba: and to performe that seruice, the King of Spaine had giuen him seauen yeares custome, of all the Slaues and Goods that were carried thence to the West-Indies, Brasil, or whither soeuer: with condition, that he should build three Castles; one in Demba, which are the salt Mines; the other, in Cambamba, which are the Siluer Mines; and the other in Bahia das Vaccas, or The Bay of Comes. This Gentleman was so bountifull at his comming, that his fame was spread through all Congo, and many Mulatos and Negroes came voluntarily to serue him. And being some fixe moneths in the Citie, he marched to the Outaba of Tombe: and there shipped his Souldiers in Pinnasses, and went vp the Riuer Consa, or Coanza, and landed at the Outaba of Songo, sixtie miles from the Sea. This Lord Songo is next to Demba, where the Salt Mines be. In this place there is such store of Salt, that most part of the Countrey are perfect cleere Salt, without any earth or filth in it: and it is some three foot vnder the earth as it were Ice: and they cut it out in stones of a yard long, and it is carried vp into the Countrey, and is the best commoditye that a man can carry to buy any thing whatsoeuer.

Here the Gouernour stayed ten daies, and sent a Pinnasse to Mafangano, for all the best Souldiers that were there. So the Captain of the Castle sent me down among an hundred Souldiers, and I was very well vsed by the Gouernor; and he made me a Sergeant of a Portugall Company, and then he marched to Machimba; from thence to Cauro, and then to Malombe, a great Lord. Here we were foure daies, and many Lords came and obeyed vs. From thence we marched to a mightie Lord, called Angoykayongo, who stood in the defence of his Countrey, with more then sixtie thousand men. So we met with him, and had the victory, and made a great slaughter among them. We tooke captiues all his Women and Children, and setled our selues in his Towne, because it was a very pleasant place, and full of Cattle and victuals. And being eight daies in this Towne, the Gouernour sickned and dyed, and left a Captaine in his roome to performe the seruice.

After we had beene two moneths in the Countrey of Angoykayongo, we marched toward Cambambe, which was but three daies iourney, and came right against the Serras da Prata, and passed the Riuer Coanza, and presently ouer-ranne the Countrey, and built a Fort hard by the Riuers side. Here I serued two yeares. They opened the Siluer Mines: but the Portugals did not like of them as yet; because they yeelded small store of Siluer. This new vp-start Gouernour, was very cruell to his Souldiers, so that all his voluntary men left him; and by this meanes he could goe no farther. At this time, there came newes by the Iesuites, that the Queene of England was dead; and that King Iames had made peace with Spaine. Then I made a petition to the Gouernour, who granted me licence to goe into my Countrey: And so I departed with the Gouernor and his Traine to the Citie of Saint Paul.

But he left five hundred Souldiers in the Fort of Cambambe, which they hold still. Then I went with a Portugall Marchant to the Prouince of Bamba: and from thence to the Onteiro, or Citie standing vpon a Mountaine of Congo; from thence to Gongon and Batta: and there wee sold our commodities, and returned in fixe moneths to the Citie againe. Then I purposed to haue shipped my selfe for Spaine, and thence homewards. But the Gouernour denyed his word, and commanded me to prouide my selfe within two daies, to goe vp to the Conquest againe. This Gouernour had serued his three yeares, and the Citizens looked euery day for another out of Portugall. So I determined to absent my selfe for ten or twentie daies, till the other Gouernour came, and then to come to the Citie againe. For euery Gouernour that commeth, maketh Proclamation for all men that be absent, to come with free pardon.

The same day at night, I departed from the Citie, with two Negro Boyes that I had, which carried my Musket, and fixe pounds of Powder, and an hundred Bullets, and that little prouision of victuals which I could make. In the morning I was some twentie miles from the Citie, vp along the Riuer Bengo, and there I stayed certaine dayes; and then passed Bengo, and came to the Riuer Dande, which is to the North-ward; purposing to know what newes was in the Citie, for I was neere the high-way of Congo: And one of my Negroes inquired of those that passed, and brought me word; That it was certaine, that the new Gouernour came not that yeare. Now I was put to my shifts, whether I would goe to the Citie againe and be hanged, or to stay and liue in the Woods: for I had runne away twice before. So I was forced to liue in the Wood a moneth, betwixt the Riuers of Dande and Bengo.

Then

Then I went to Bengo again, to Mani Kaswea, & passed ouer the Riuer, and went to the lake, of Casansa. Here is the greatest store of wild beasts, that is in any place of Angola. About this lake I staid six monethes, & liued only vpon dried flesh, as Buffes, Deere, Mokokes, Impolancas, and Ro-bucks, and other sorts which I killed with my Musket, and dried the flesh, as the Sauages doe, vpon an Hurdle three foot from the ground, making vnderneath it a great fire, and laying vpon the flesh greene boughes, which keepe the smoke and heate of the fire downe, and dry it. I made my fire with two little stickes, as the Sauages vse to doe. I had sometimes Guiney Wheate, which my Negro Boy would get of the Inhabitants for pieces of dried flesh. This Lake of Casansa doth abound with fish of sundry sorts. I haue taken vp a fish, that hath skipped out of the water on shoare, foure foot long, which the Heathen call Sombo. Thus after I had liued sixe monethes with dried flesh and fish, and seeing no end of my miserie, I wrought meanes to get away.

The Lake of Casansa.

The manner of the Sauages drying of their flesh.

In this Lake are many little Islands, that are full of trees, called Memba, which are as light as Corke, and as soft. Of these trees I built a Iergado, with a Knife of the Sauages that I had, in the fashion of a Boat, nayled with wooden pegs, and rayled round about, because the Sea should not wash me out, and with a Blanket that I had, I made a sayle, and prepared three Oares to row withall. This Lake of Casansa is eight miles ouer, and issueth into the Riuer Bengo. So I entred into my Gingado, and my two Negro Boyes, and rowed into the Riuer Bengo, and so came downe with the current twelue leagues, to the barre. Here I was in great danger, because the Sea was great; and being ouer the barre, I rowed into the Sea, and then sayled afore the wind along the Coast, which I knew very well, minding to goe to the Kingdome of Longo, which is toward the North: and being that night at Sea, the next day I saw a Pinnasse come before the wind, which came from the Citie, and was bound to San Thome, and shee came neere to mee. The Master was my great friend, for we had beene Mates together, and for pitie sake he tooke me in, and set me on shoare in the Port of Longo; where I remayned three yeares, and was well beloued of the King, because I killed him Deere and Fowles with my Musket.

He made a Boat with a Knife.

The Lake of Casansa falleth into Bengo.

Hee was three yeares in Longo.

30 Of the Prouince of Engoy, and other Regions of Loango, with the Customes there obserued by the King and people.

From the Point of the Palmar, which is the North-side of the Riuer Zaire, is the Port of Gabenda, where many ships vse to water and refresh themselves; and it is five leagues Northwards. This place is called Engoy, and is the first Prouince of Longo, and is full of Woods and Thickets. And seuen leagues North-wards of that place is the Riuer Cacongo; a very pleasant place and fruitfull. Here is great store of Elephants Teeth: and a Boat of ten tunnes may goe vp the Riuer.

Puntada Palmar.

Engoy is the first Prouince of Longo.

The Riuer Cacongo.

40 The Mombales haue great Trade with them, and passe the Riuer Zaire in the night, because then it is calme; and carrie great store of Elephants Teeth to the Towne of Mani Sonna, and sell them in the Port of Pinda to the Portugals, or any other stranger, that first commeth.

The Mombales.

And foure leagues from Cacongo, is the Riuer of Caye, or Longo Leuyes. This Towne of Caye is one of the foure Seates or Lordships of Longo: and then the Angra, or Gulfe das Almadias. In this Gulfe or Bay are great store of Canoes and Fishermen, because the Sea is smother there, then vpon the Coast. And two leagues North-ward is the Port of Longo. And it is a sandie Bay, and a ship may ride within a Musket shot of the shoare in foure or five fathomes.

The Riuer of

Caye, and some Golfam das Almadias.

The Port of Longo.

50 The Towne of Mani Longo is three miles from the waters side, and standeth on a great Plaine. This Towne is full of Palme and Plantan Trees, and very fresh: and their Houses are builded vnder the Trees. Their streets are wide and long, and alwayes cleane swept. The King hath his Houses on the West-side, and before his doore hee hath a Plaine, where hee sitteth, when hee hath any feasting or matters of warres to treat of. From this Plaine there goeth a great wide street some Musket shot from the place; and there is a great Market euery day, and it doth begin at twelue of the clocke.

The King hath his Houses on the West-side.

60 Here is great store of Palme-clothes of sundry sorts, which is their Merchandizes: and great store of Victuals, Flesh, Hens, Fish, Wine, Oyle and Corne. Here is also very fine Logwood, which they vse to dye withall: it is the root of the Logwood, which is the best; and Molango of Copper. Here is likewise great store of Elephants Teeth, but they sell none in the Market place. The King hath ten great Houses, and is neuer certaine to be found, but in the afternoone, when he commeth to sit. And then he keepeth alwayes one House. The House is very long, and at twelue of the clocke it is full of Noblemen. They sit vpon Carpets vpon the ground. The House is alwayes full of people till mid-night. The last King Gembe, neuer vsed to speake in the day, but alwayes in the night. But this King speaketh in the day: howbeit, hee spendeth most of the day with his Wiues. And when the King commeth in, he goeth to the vpper end of the House, where hee hath his seate, as it were a Throne. And when the King is set, they clap their their hands and salute him, saying in their Language; Byani Pemba, Ampola, Moneya, Quesinge.

The King Ma-
comas, or wiues. On the South-side of the Kings Houses he hath a circuit or Village, where his Wiues dwell: and in this circuit no man may come in paine of death. He hath in this place one hundred & fifty Wiues and more. And if any man be taken within this Circuit, if he be with a woman, or doe but speake to her, they be both brought into the Market place, and their heads bee cut off, and their bodies quartered, and lye one day in the streets. The last King Gymbe, had foure hundred children by his women.

Strange cu-
stome of drinking. When the King drinketh he hath a cup of wine brought, and he that bringeth it hath a Bell in his hand, and as soone as he hath deliuered the cup to the King, hee turneth his face from the King, and ringeth the Bell: and then all that be there fall downe vpon their faces, and rise not till the King haue drunke. And this is very dangerous for any stranger, that knoweth not the fashions: for if any seeth the King drink, he is presently killed, whatsoeuer he be. There was a Boy of twelue yeares, which was the Kings Sonne; This Boy chanced to come vnadvisedly when his Father was in drinking: presently the King commanded he should be well apparelled, & victuals prepared. So the youth did eat & drink: afterward the King commanded that he should be cut in quarters, and carryed about the Citie; with Proclamation that he saw the King drinke. Likewise for his Dyet, when it is dinner time, there is an House of purpose, where hee alwayes eateth; and there his Dyet is set vpon a Bensa, like a Table: then hee goeth in and hath the doore shut. So when he hath eaten, then he knocketh and commeth out. So that none see the King eat nor drinke. For it is their Beliefe, that if hee bee seene eating or drinking, hee shall presently dye. And this is an order with all the Kings that now are, or shall succeed, vnlesse they abolish this cruell custome.

Arrogating to giue raine.
It raineth here in December. This King is so honoured, as though hee were a God among them: and is called Sambe and Pongo, that is, God. And they beleue that he can giue them raine, when hee listeth. So once a yeare when it is time to raine; which is in December, the people come to begge raine, and bring their gifts to the King: for none come emptie. Then he appointeth the day, and all the Lords farre and neere come to that Feast with all their troupes, as they goe in the warres. And when all the troupes of men be before the King, the greatest Lord commeth forth with his Bow and Arrowes, and sheweth his skill with his weapons, and then he hath a merrie conceit or iest, that he speaketh before the King, and kneeleth at his feet, and then the King thanketh him for his loue: and in like manner they doe all. The King sitteth abroad in a great place, and hath a Carpet spread vpon the ground, which is some fiftene fathomes about of fine Ensacks, which are wrought like Veluet, and vpon the Carpet his seat, which is a fathome from the ground. Then he commandeth his Dembes to strike vp, which are Drums, so great that they cannot carrie them, and others that are very great. He hath also eight Pongos, which are his Wayters, made of the greatest Elephants Teeth, and are hollowed and scraped light: which play also. And with the Drums and Waytes they make an hellish noyse. After they haue sported and shewed the King pleasure, he ariseth and standeth vpon his Throne, and taketh a Bow and Arrowes in his hand and shooteth to the Skie, and that day there is great reioycing, because sometimes they haue raine. I was once there when the King gaue raine, and it chanced that day to raine mightily, which made the people to haue a great beliefe in their folly.

Some white children borne
among them. Here are sometimes borne in this Countrey white children, which is very rare among them, for their Parents are Negroes. And when any of them are borne, they bee presented vnto the King, and are called Dondos. These are as white as any white man. These are the Kings Witches, and are brought vp in Witchcraft, and alwayes wayte on the King. There is no man that dare meddle with these Dondos. If they goe to the Market, they may take what they list, for all men stand in awe of them. The King of Longo hath foure of them.

Their Mekisso and Checocke.
A Village called Kinga. This King is also a Witch and beleueth in two Idols, which are in Longo. The one is called, Mokisso à Longo, the other is called, Checocke. This last is a little blacke Image, and standeth in a little house, at a Village that is called, Kinga, which standeth in the landing place of Longo. This house of Checocke standeth in the high-way, and they that go by clap their hands, which is the courtesie of the Country. Those that be Crafts-men, as Fishermen, Hunters & Witches do, offer to this Idol, that they may haue good lucke. This Checocke doth sometimes in the night come and haunt some of his best Beloued: sometimes a man, sometimes a Boy, or a Woman. And then they be franticke for the space of three houes. And whatsoeuer the franticke Person speaketh, that is the will of Checocke. And they make a great Feast and dancing at his house.

Mokisso Gom-
beri. There is another Mokisso, which is also in Kinga, and it is called, Gomberi. It is the name of a woman, and is in an houle, where an old Witch dwelleth, and shee is called, Ganga Gomberi, which is, the Priest of Gomberi. Here once a yeare is a Feast made, and Ganga Gomberi speaketh vnder the ground. And this is a common thing euery yeare. I haue asked the Negroes what it was, and they told me, that it is a strong Mokisso, that is come to abide with Checocke.

Colour of their children when they are borne. The children in this Countrey are borne white, and change their colour in two dayes to a perfect blacke. As for example, the Portugals which dwell in the Kingdome of Congo, haue some-

Sometimes children by the Negro Women, and many times the Fathers are deceived, thinking when the child is borne that it is theirs, and within two dayes it proueth the sonne or daughter of a Negro; which the Portugals doe greatly grieve at: for they reioyce when they haue a Mulato child, thought it be a battard.

The Towne of Longo standeth in the middest of the foure Lordships; and is gouerned by foure Princes, which are the Kings sisters sonnes. For the Kings sonnes neuer come to be Kings. The first is, Mani Cabango. The second, Mani Salag. The third Mani Bock. The fourth, Mani Cay. This Mani Cay is next to be King, and hath his Traine and Court as a Prince. And when the King dieth, he commeth presently into the seat of the King. Then Mani Bock commeth to Cay: Mani Salag commeth to Bock, and Mani Cabango commeth to Salag. And then they prouide another to goe to Cabango. So there be foure Princes that wait to be Kings, when their turnes come. The Mother of these Princes is called, Mani Lombo: and shee is the highest and chiefe woman in all the Land. Shee maketh choice of her husband, and when shee is wearie of him, she putteth him away, and taketh another. Her children are greatly honoured; and whosoever passeth by them, kneele downe and clap their hands, which is the curtesie of the Countrey. These Lordships are champaine grounds, and full of Corne, and Fruit. The men in this Kingdome make great store of Palme-cloth of sundrie sorts, very fine and curious. They are neuer idle: for, they make fine Caps of needle-worke, as they goe in the streets.

There is a place two leagues from the Towne of Longo, called Longeri, where all their Kings be buried: and it is compassed round about with Elephants teeth pitched in the ground, as it were a Pale, and it is ten roods in compasse.

These people will suffer no white man to be buried in their Land. And if any Stranger or Portugall come thither to trade, and chance to die, he is carried in a Boat two miles from the shoare, and cast into the Sea. There was once a Portugall Gentleman, that came to trade with them, and had his house on shoare. This Gentleman died, and was buried some foure moneths. That yeere it did not raine so soone as it was wont, which beginneth about December: so that they lacked raine some two moneths. Then their Mokiso told them, that the Christian which was buried, must be taken out of the earth, and cast into the Sea. And so he was taken vp, and cast into the Sea; and within three dayes it rained: which made them haue a great beliefe in the Deuill.

§. V P.

Of the Prouinces of Bongo, Calongo, Mayombe, Manikesocke, Motimbaz: of the Ape-monster Pongo, their hunting, Idolatries; and diuers other obseruations.

TO the Eastward of Longeri is the Prouince of Bongo, and it bordereth vpon Mocoke, the Great Angeca is King. In this place is great store of Iron, and Palme-cloth, and Elephants teeth, and great store of Corne. To the North-east, is the Prouince of Cango, and it is foureene dayes journey from the Towne of Longo. This place is full of Mountaines and rockie ground, and full of Woods, and hath great store of Copper. The Elephants in this place doe excell. Here are so many, that the people of Longo fetch great store of Elephants teeth, and bring them to the Port of Longo.

To the Northwards of Longo three leagues is, the Riuer Quelle: and on the North side is, the Prouince of Calongo. This Countrey is alwaies tilled, and full of Corne: and is all plaine and champaine ground, and hath great store of Honie. Here are two little Villages, that shew at Sea like two homocks: which are the markes to know the Port of Longo. And fifteene miles Northward is the Riuer Nambo: but it hath no depth for any Barke to goe in. This Prouince, toward the East, bordereth vpon Bongo; and toward the North, vpon Mayombe, which is nineteene leagues from Longo, along the Coast.

This Prouince of Mayombe is all Woods and Groues; so ouergrowne, that a man may trauaile twentie dayes in the shadow without any Sunne or heat. Here is no kind of Corne nor Graine: so that the people liueth onely vpon Plantanes, and Roots of sundrie sorts very good, and Nuts, nor any kind of tame Cattell, nor Hens. But they haue great store of Elephants flesh, which they greatly esteeme; and many kind of wild Beasts; and great store of Fish. Here is a great sandy Bay, two leagues to the Southward of Cape Negro, which is the Port of Mayombe. Sometimes the Portugals lade Logwood in this Bay. Here is a great Riuer, called Banna: in the Winter it hath no barre, because the generall winds cause a great Sea. But when the Sunne hath his South declination, then a Boat may goe in: for then it is smooth because of the raine. This Riuer is very great and hath many Ilands, and people dwelling in them. The Woods are so couered with Baboones, Monkies, Apes, and Parrots, that it will feare any man to trauaile in them alone. Here are also two kinds of Monsters, which are common in these Woods, and very dangerous.

The greatest of these two Monsters is called, Pongo, in their Language: and the lesser is called, Engeco. This Pongo is in all proportion like a man, but that he is more like a Giant in stature, then a man: for he is very tall, and hath a mans face, hollow eyed, with long haire vpon his browes. His face and eares are without haire, and his hands also. His bodie is full of haire, but not very thicke, and it is of a dunnish colour. He differeth not from a man, but in his legs, for they haue no calfe. Hee goeth alwaies vpon his legs, and carrieth his hands clasped on the nape of his necke, when he goeth vpon the ground. They sleepe in the trees, and build shelters for the raine. They feed vpon Fruit that they find in the Woods, and vpon Nuts, for they eate no kind of flesh. They cannot speake, and haue no vnderstanding more then a beast. The People of the Countrey, when they trauaile in the Woods, make fires where they sleepe in the night; and in the morning, when they are gone, the Pongoes will come and sit about the fire, till it goeth out: for they haue no vnderstanding to lay the wood together. They goe many together, and kill many Negroes that trauaile in the Woods. Many times they fall vpon the Elephants, which come to feed where they be, and so beate them with their clubbed fists, and pieces of wood, that they will runne roaring away from them. Those Pongoes are neuer taken aliue, because they are so strong, that ten men cannot hold one of them: but yet they take many of their young ones with poisoned Arrowes. The young Pongo hangeth on his mothers bellie, with his hands fast clasped about her: so that, when the Countrey people kill any of the femals, they take the young one, which hangeth fast vpon his mother. When they die among themselues, they couer the dead with great heapes of boughs and wood, which is commonly found in the Forrests.

The Morombes vse to hunt with their Countrey Dogs, and kill many kinds of little beasts, and great store of Pheasants. But their Dogs be dumbe and cannot barke at all. They hang wooden clappers about their neckes, and follow them by the ratling of the clappers. The Huntsmen haue Petes, which they whistle their Dogs withall. These Dogs in all this Coun-trie are very little, with prickt eares, and are for the most part red and dunne. The Portugall ma-stie Dog, or any other great Dog are greatly esteemed, because they doe barke. I haue seene a Dog sold vp in the Countrey for thirtie pounds.

In the Towne of Mani Mayombe is a Fetisso, called Maramba: and it standeth in an high basket made like an Hiue, and ouer it a great house. This is their house of Religion: for they beleeue onely in him, and keepe his lawes, and carrie his Reliques alwaies with them. They are for the most part Witches, and vse their witchcraft for hunting and killing of Elephants, and fishing, and helping of sicke and lame men: and to fore-cast iourneyes, whether they shall speed well or euill. By this Maramba are all thefts and murthers tried: for in this Countrey they vse sometimes to bewitch one another to death. And when any dieth, their neighbours are brought before Maramba: and if it be a great man that dieth, the whole Towne commeth to sweare. The order is, when they come before Maramba, to kneele and claspe Maramba in their armes, and to say, Emeno, eyge bembet Maramba: that is, I come to be tried, O Maramba.
And if any of them be guiltie, they fall downe starke dead for euer. And if any of them that sweare hath killed any man or child before, although it be twentie yeeres past, hee presently dieth. And so it is for any other matter. From this place as farre as it is to Cape De lops Gon- salues, they are all of this superstition. I was twelue moneths in this place, and saw many die after this sort.

These people be circumcised, as they be through all Angola, except the Kingdome of Congo, for they are Christians. And those that will be sworne, to Maramba, come to the chiefe Gan- gas, which are their Priests, or Men-witches; as Boyes of twelue yeeres of age, and men and women. Then the Gangas put them into a darke house, and there they remaine certaine dayes with very hard diet: after this they are let abroad, and commanded not to speake for certaine dayes, what iniurie soeuer they be offered: so that they suffer great penurie before they bee sworne. Lastly, they are brought before Maramba, and haue two markes cut vpon both their shoulders before, like an halfe Moone; and are sworne by the bloud that falleth from them, that they shall be true to him. They are forbidden some one kind of flesh, and some one kind of fish, with many other toyes. And if they eate any of this forbidden meate, they presently sicken and neuer prosper. They all carrie a relique of Maramba in a little boxe, and hang it about their neckes, vnder their left armes. The Lord of this Prouince of Mayombe, hath the Ensigne or shape of Maramba carried before him, whither soeuer he goeth; and when he sitteth downe, it is let before him; and when he drinketh his Palme-wine, the first cup is powred at the foote of the Mokiso, or Idoll; and when he eateth any thing whatsoeuer, the first piece he throweth toward his left hand, with enchanting words.

From Cape Negro Northward is a great Lord, called Mani Seat; which hath the greatest store of Elephants teeth of any Lord in the Kingdome of Longo: for, his people practise nothing else but to kill Elephants. And two of those Negroes will easily kill an Elephant with their darts. And here is great store of Logwood.

There is another Lord to the Eastward, which is called Mani Kefock, and he is eight dayes journey from Mayombe. Heere I was with my two Negro Boyes, to buy Elephants haire and tayles; and in a moneth I bought twentie thousand, which I sold to the Portugals for thirtie Slaves, and all my charges borne. From this place I sent one of my Negro Boyes to Mani Seat with a Looking-glasse: he did esteeme it much, and sent me foure Elephants teeth, (very great) by his owne men; and desired me to cause the Portugals, or any other shippe, to come to the Northward of the Cape Negro, and hee would make fires where his landing place is: For there was neuer yet any Portugall, or other stranger in that place.

Twentie thousand Elephants tayles. A Trade a litle North ward of Cape Negro, which is about sixteene degrees to the South of the line. The Matimbos a people of very small stature, a kind of Pigmies. Women vsing Bowes and Arrows. Elephants, whether they shed their teeth.

To the North-east of Mani Kesock, are a kind of little people, called Matimbos; which are no bigger then Boyes of twelue yeares old, but are very thicke, and liue onely vpon flesh, which they kill in the Woods with their Bowes and Darts. They pay tribute to Mani Kesock, and bring all their Elephants teeth and tayles to him. They will not enter into any of the Marombos houses, nor will suffer any to come where they dwell. And if by chance any Maramba, or people of Longo passe where they dwell, they will forsake that place, and go to another. The Women carry Bow and Arrowes as well as the Men. And one of these will walke in the Woods alone, and kill the Pongos with their poysoned Arrowes. I haue asked the Marombos, whether the Elephant sheddeth his teeth or no? And they say no. But sometimes they finde their teeth in the Woods, but they find their bones also.

When any man is suspected for any offence, he is carried before the King, or before Mani Bomma, which is as it were a Iudge vnder the King. And if it be vpon matter that hee denyeth, and cannot be proued but by their oath; then the suspected person is thus sworne. They haue a kind of roote which they call Imbondo. This roote is very strong, and is scraped into water. The vertue of this roote is, that if they put too much of it into the water, the person that drinketh it cannot voyd yrine: and so it striketh vp into the braine, as though hee were drunke, and he falleth downe as though he were dead. And those that fall are counted as guiltie, and are punished.

The vertue of the roote Imbondo. He told me that this roote makes the water as bitter as Gall (he tasted it) and one roote will serue to try one hundred. They which haue drunke and made water after are cleared, before which if dizziness take them, they cry, Vndoke, Vndoke.

In this Countrey none of any account dyeth, but they kill another for him: for they beleeue they dye not of their owne naturall death, but that some other hath bewitched them to death: And all those are brought in by the friends of the dead which they suspect; so that many times there come fise hundred men and women to take the drinke, made of the foresaid roote, Imbonda. They are brought all to the High-streete or Market place, and there the master of the Imbonda sitteth with his water, and giueth euery one a cup of water by one measure; and they are commanded to walke in a certaine place till they make water, and then they be free: But he that cannot yrine, presently falleth downe, and all the people great and small fall vpon him with their knives, and beate and cut him into pieces. But I thinke the Witch that giueth the water is partiall, and giueth to him whom he will haue to dye the strongest water, but no man can perceiue it that standeth by. And this is done in the Towne of Longo, almost euery week in the yeare.

and presently execute them. See my Relat. l. 7. c. 10. which I writ from his mouth. Neither may this be ascribed to the vertue of the herbe, but to the vice of the Deuill, a murtherer and his Instruments. The Ganga or Priest. And therefore that coniecture seems vnprobable. For how could an ordinary tryall of life where are so many so perilous; and therefore curious (more then) spectators, not perceiue this in so long and frequent experience, which costs so many their dearest friends their dearest life? I thinke rather that this was the transcribers coniecture. I remember no such scruple in his Narrations to me, who knowes not the Deuils ambition of Deity, and cruell Misanthropie or man-hating? This is his Apish imitation of Diuinity, and those Rites prescribed for triall in case of Iealousie, Num. 5. In Guinea like triall is made by Salt, and also by the Fetisseroes pot. In Benomotapa, by a water also: in the Maromba triall before, and Motamba triall by hot Iron in Angola; the Plough-shares in old times with vs: and the tryall of Witches still in the East parts by water, &c. were not vnlike in deceiueable superstition.

§. VII.

Of the Zebra and Hippopotamus: The Portugals Warres in those parts: The Fishing, Graine, and other things remarkable.

IN this Kingdome there is no kind of tame Cattle but Goats; for none other Cattle will liue here. Oxen and Kine haue beene brought hither, but they presently dye: The Hennes in this place doe so abound, that a man may buy thirtie for the worth of sixe pence in Beads. Heere is store of Pheasants, and great plenty of Partridges, and wilde Fowle. Here is a kind of Fowle that liues in the Land bigger then a Swan, and they are like an Heron, with long legges, and long neckes, and it is white and blacke, and hath in her breast a bare place without Feathers, where she striketh with her Bill. This is the right Pelican, and not those Sea Birds which the Portugals call Pelicans, which are white, and as bigge as Geese, and those abound in this Countrey also.

Plenty of wilde Fowle. The right Pelican.

Here is also the Zeuera or Zebra, which is like an horse; but that his mane, his taile, his strakes of diuers colours downe his sides and legges, doe make a difference. These Zeueras are all wilde, and and liue in great heards, and will suffer a man to come within shot of them, and let them shoote three or foure times at them before they will runne away.

Moreouer, there are great store of Sea or Riuer Horfes, which feed alway on the Land; and liue onely by Graffe, and they be very dangerous in the water. They are the biggest creature in this Countrey, except the Elephant: They haue great vertue in the clawes of their left forefoote, and haue foure clawes on euery foot, like the clawes of an Oxe. The Portugals make Rings of them, and they are a present remedy for the Fluxe.

The ZEVERA or ZEBRA.

The Port-wars in Congo.

The Generall of the blacke Campe.

The Portugals make warre against the Negroes in this manner. They haue out of Congo a Noble-man, which is knowne to be a good Christian, and of good behauiour. He bringeth out of Congo some one hundred Negroes that are his followers. This Macicongo is made Tandala, or Generall ouer the blacke Campe; and hath authoritie to kill, to put downe Lords, and make Lords, and hath all the cheefe doings with the Negroes. And when any Lord commeth to obey; first he commeth to the Tandala and bringeth his present; as Slaues, Kine, and Goats: Then the Tandala carrieth him before the Portugall Gouvernour, and bringeth two Slaues for the Gouvernours Page before he goeth in. Then he must haue a great gift for the Gouvernour; which is sometimes, thirtie or fortie Slaues, besides Cattle. And when he commeth before the Gouvernour, he kneeleth downe and clappeth his hands, and falleth downe with his face vpon the ground, and then he riseth and saith; I haue beene an enemy, and now I protest to be true, and neuer more to lift my hand against you. Then the Gouvernour calleth a Souldier which hath deserued a reward, and giueth the Lord to him. This Souldier seeth that he haue no wrong: and the Lord acknowledgeth him to be his Master; and he doth maintaine the Souldier, and maketh him rich. Also, in the warres he commandeth his Masters house to be built before his owne: and whatsoever he hath taken that day in the warres, he parteth with his Master. So that there is no Portugall Souldier of any account, but he hath his Negro Sona, or Lord.

Their Fishing on the Coast.

They vse vpon this Coast to Fish with harping Irons, and waite vpon a great Fish that cometh once a day to feed along the shoare, which is like a Grampas. Hee runneth very neere the shoare, and driueth great skuls of Fish before him: and the Negroes runne along the shoare, as fast as they are able to follow him, and strike their Harping Irons round about him, and kill great store of Fish, and leaue them vpon the Sand till the Fish hath done feeding; and then they come and gather their Fish vp. This Fish will many times runne himselfe on ground, but they will will presently shoue him off againe, which is as much as foure or fise men can doe. They call him Emboa, which is in their speech, A Dogge; and will by no meanes hurt or kill any of them. Also, they vse in the Bayes and Riuers, where shoald water is, to Fish with Mats, which are made of long Rushes, and they make them of an hundred fathoms long. The Mats swim vpon the Water, and haue long Rushes hanged vpon one edge of the Mat, and so they draw the Mat in compasse, as we doe our Nets. The Fishes fearing the Rushes that hang downe, spring out of the water, and fall vpon the Mat that lyeth flat on the water, and so are taken.

A strange kind of fishing with Mats.

They haue foure sorts of Corne in Longo: The first, is called Mafanga, and it groweth vpon a straw as bigge as a Reede, and hath an eare a foote long, and is like Hemp-seed. The second, is called Masembala. This is of great increase: for of one kernell there springs foure or fise Canes, which are tenne foote high, and they beare halfe a pinte of Corne a peece. This graine is as big as Tares, and very good. Thirdly, they haue another that groweth low like Grasse, and is very like Mustard-seed: and this is the best. They haue also the great Guiney Wheate, which they call Maf-impota. This is the least esteemed.

Foure sorts of corne in Longo.

They haue very good Peason, somewhat bigger then ours: but they grow not as ours do. For the poodes grow on the rootes vnderneath the ground; and by their leaues they know when they be ripe. They haue another kind of Peason, which they call Wandos. This is a little tree; and the first yeare that it is planted, it beareth no fruit: but after it beareth fruit three yeares, and then it is cut downe.

Two sorts of Peason: how they grow.

Their Plantan trees beare fruit but once, and then are cut downe: and out of the root thereof spring three or foure young ones.

They haue great store of Hony, which hangeth in the Elicondy Trees. They gather it with an hollow piece of Wood or Chest, which they hang in the top of the Tree, and once a yeare it is full, by smoake rewarding the laborious Creatures with robbery, exile, death.

Their Hony.

THIS Alicunde or Elicondy Tree is very tall, and exceeding great; some as big as twelue men can fathome, spreading like an Oake; some of them are hollow, and from the liberall skies receiue such plentie of water, that they are Hospitall entertainers of thousands in that thirstie Region.

I added this that followes out of his owne reports to my selfe. Other like things you may find from his relation scattered in my Pilgrimage.

Once haue I knowne three or foure thousand remaine at one of those Trees, and thence receiuing all their watery promise for foure and twentie houres, and yet not emptie. The Negroes climbed up with pegges of hard Wooke (which that softer easily receiueth, the smoothnesse not admitting other climbing) and I thinke that some one Tree holds fortie tunne of water. This Tree affords no lesse bountifull hospitality to the backe then belly, yeelding (as her belly to their bellies, so) her backe to their backs: excepting that this is better from the younger Trees, whose tenderer backs being more seasonable for Discipline, are soundly beaten (for mans fault, whence came the first nakednesse) whereby one fathome cut from the Tree, is extended into twentie, and is presently fit for wearing, though not so fine as the Iuzanda tree yeelds. This tree yeelds excellent cloath from the inner backe thereof by like bearing. Of their Palme Trees, which they keepe with watering and cutting euery yeare; they make Velvets, Sattins, Taffataes, Damaskes, Sarcenets, and such like; out of the leaues cleansed and purged, drawing long threads, and euen for that purpose. They draw Wine (as is said) from the Palme Tree; there is another kind of Palme Tree, which beareth a fruite good for the stomacke, and for the Linner most most admirable.

The Iuzanda.

One Crocodile was so huge and greedy, that he deuoured an Alibamba, that is, a chained company of eight or nine Slaves; but the indigestible Iron paid him his wages, and murdered the murtherer, found after in his belly. I haue seene them watch their prey, haling in gennet, Man or other Creature into the water. But one Souldier thus wrapt in shallower water, drew his knife, tooke his Taker in the belly and slue him.

CHAP. IIII.

A report of the Kingdome of Congo, a Region of Affrica: Gathered by PHILIPPO PIGAFETTA,* out of the Discourses of Master ED-VVARD LOPES a Portugall, translated out of Italian into English, by Master ABRAHAM HARTVELL, and here abreuiated.

* Anno 1588.

§. I.

The iourney by Sea from Lisbone to the Kingdome of Congo: Of the Ayre, Winds, Raines, Temperature thereof.

IN the yeare 1588. when Don Sebastian King of Portugall, embarked himselfe for the Conquest of the Kingdome of Morocco: Edward Lopes borne at Be-neuentum (a place foure and twentie miles distant from Lisbone, neere vpon the South shore of the Riuer Tagus) sayled likewise in the moneth of Aprill towards the hauen of Loanda, situate in the Kingdome of Congo, in a ship called S. Anthony, belonging to an Vncle of his, and charged with diuers marchandises for that Kingdome: And it was accompanied with a Patache (which is a small vessell) whereunto the ship did continually yeeld good guard, and ministred great releefe, conducting and guiding the same with lights in the night time, to the end it should not lose the way, which the shippe it selfe did keepe. He arriued at the Island of Madera, belonging to the King of Portugall, distant from Lisbone about fixe hundred miles, where he remained fiftene daies, to furnish himselfe with fresh Victuall and Wine; which in great abundance groweth in that Island, yea and in mine opinion the best in the world, whereof they carry abroad great store into diuers Countries, and especially into England. He provided there also sundry other Confections and Conserues of Sugar, which in that Island are made and wrought both in great quantity, and also singular excellency. From this Island they departed, leauing all the Cana-ries belonging to Castile, and tooke hauen at one of the Islands of Cape Verde, called S. Anthony, without hauing any sight thereof before they were come vpon it: and from thence to another called S. Iacopo, which commandeth all the rest, and hath a Bishop & a Chaplaine in it, that rule and gouerne them: and here they provided themselves againe of victuals. These Islands of Cape Verde were established by Ptolomee in the Tables of his Geography, to be the beginning of the West, together with the Cape or Promontorie which he termeth Coron vltimum, or the Islands Macarie or Blessed, which we commonly call Fortunate. In these Islands of Cape Verde: the Portugals do often arriue, and in those Countries do Traffike with sundry marchandises, as little balles of diuers coloured Glasse, and other such things, wherein those people doe greatly delight, and Holland cloath, and Caps and Kniues, and coloured Clothes: In exchange whereof they bring backe againe, Slaues, Waxe, Hony, with other kind of food, and Cotten-cloth of sundry colours.

Now the shippe called S. Anthony, holding on his course, met with the generall windes, * and then turned their Prow and their Sayles, by North, and by North-west on the right hand towards the Kingdome of Congo. And sayling on-wards closely with the halfe shippe, they came in twelue daies and twelue nights, to the Island of S. Elena, not looking for the same, nor thinking of it. This Island was so called, because on the Feast day of S. Helena, which falleth vpon the third day of May, it was by the Portugals first descried. And as it is very small, so is it (as it were) singular by it selfe: for being situate in the height of sixteene degrees towards the Antarctike, it containeth in compasse nine miles about, and is farre distant from the firme Land.

From the Island of S. Helena, they made sayle with the same weather, and so within the space of seuentene daies came to the hauen of Loanda, which is in the Prouince of Congo, the winds being somewhat more calme then they were afore. This is a very sure and great hauen, so called of an Island of the same name, whereof we shall speake hereafter.

There are two courses of sayling from the Island of Cape Verde to Loanda; the one of them now declared, which being neuer vsed afterwards, was at the first attempted and performed by the same shippe wherein Signor Odoardo went, being then guided by Francisco Martinez the Kings Pilot, a man very greatly experienced in those Seas, and the first that euer conducted vessell by that way: the other is atchieued by passing along the Coast of the firme Land.
 From the Island of San Iacomo, they came to Cape Das Palmas, and from thence direct themselues to the Island of San Thomas, which lyeth vnder the Equinoctiall; so called, because it was discovered vpon that day, wherein the Feast of that Apostle is vsed to be celebrated. It is distant from the firme Land, one hundred and eightie miles, right against the Riuer, called Gaban, which is so termed because it is in shape very like to that kind of Vesture, that it is called a Gaban, or a Cloke.

The Hauen thereof is fore-closed with an Iland that raiseth it selfe in the Channell of the Riuer, whereunto the Portugals doe sayle with small Barkes from Saint Thomas Iland, carrying thither such things as vsually they carrie to the Coast of Guinea, and from thence carrying backe with them Iuorie, Waxe and Honey, Oyle of Palme, and Blacke-moore slaues. Neere to the Iland of Saint Thomas, towards the North lyeth another Iland, called the Ile of the Prince, distant from the firme Land one hundred and fife miles, being of the same condition and Trafficke, that the Ile of Saint Thomas is, although in circuit some-what lesse. This Iland of Saint Thomas is in fashion almost round, and in breadth containeth sixtie miles, and in compasse one hundred and eightie. Very rich it is and of great trafficke, discovered at the first and conquered by the Portugals, at such time as they began the conquest of the Indies. It hath diuers Hauens, but the principall and chiefeft of all, whereinto the Vessels arriuing there, doe with-draw themselves, is in the place, where the Citie standeth.

The Iland breedeth an infinite deale of Sugar, and almost all kinds of victuals. In the Citie there are some Churches, and a Bishop, with many Clerkes and one Chaplain or Priest. There is also a Castle, with a Garrison and Artillerie in it, which beate vpon the Hauen, beeing a verie great and a safe Port, where many ships may ride. But a very strange and admirable thing it is, that when the Portugals did first come thither, there was no Sugar there planted, but they brought it thither from other Countreies: as they did Ginger also, which tooke roote, and grew there in most abundant manner. The soyle indeed is moyst, and as it were appropriated to foster the Sugar-cane, which without any other watering, multiplyeth of it selfe, and fructifieth infinitely: the reason whereof is, because the dew falleth there like raine, and moysteneth the Earth.

There are in this Iland aboue seuentie Houses or Presses for making of Sugar, and every Presse hath many Cottages about it as though it were a Village, and there may bee about some three hundred persons that are appointed for that kind of worke: They doe every yeare loade about fortie great ships with Sugar. True it is, indeed, that not long agoe the Wormes (as it were a plague to that Land) haue deuoured the roots of the Canes, and destroyed the fruits of their Sugar, in such sort as now of the fortie ships, they doe not loade aboue fife or sixe Vessels with that Merchandize.

The Iland of Saint Thomas holdeth Trafficke with the people that dwell in the firme Land, which do vsually resort to the mouthes or entries of their Riuers: The first whereof (to begin withall) is named the Riuer of Fernando di Poo, that is to say, of Fernando Pouldre, who did first discover the same, and lyeth in fife degrees towards our Pole. Right against the mouth of it, riseth an Iland of the same name, lying thirtie and sixe miles distant from it. The second Riuer is called Bora, that is to say, Filth: The third, La riniera del Campo. The fourth, di San Benedetto. and the fifth, that of Angra, which in the mouth of it hath an Iland, called di Corisco, that is to say, Thunder. All these doe Trafficke the same Merchandizes, which we mentioned before.

But to returne to the Voyage of Saint Thomas: departing from thence towards the South, we found the Cape of Lupo Gonzale, which standeth in the altitude of one degree beyond the Equinoctiall towards the Pole Antarctike, one hundred and fife miles distant from the foresaid Ile. And from thence they saile with Land winds, creeping still all along the Coast, and euery day casting Anchor in some safe place either behind some point, or else in some Hauen, vntill they come to the mouth of the greatest Riuer in Congo, called in their Tongue Zaire, which signifieth in Latine, Sapio, (in English, I know.) From whence if yee will goe through to the Hauen of Loanda, ye must saile the length of one hundred and fourescore miles.

The Kingdome * of Congo in the middle part thereof, is distant from the Equinoctiall towards the Pole Antarctike (iust where the Citie called Congo doth lye) seuen degrees and two thirds: so that it standeth vnder the Region which ancient Writers thought to be vnhabitable, and called it Zona Torrida.

The habitation there is exceeding good, the Ayre beyond all credit temperate, the Winter nothing so rough, but is rather like Autumne in Rome. The people vse no Furrer, nor change of apparell, they come not neere the fire, neither is the cold in the tops of the Mountaynes greater then that which is in the Plaines: but generally in Winter time, the Ayre is more hot then it is in Summer, by reason of their continuall raines, and especially about two houres before and after noone, so that it can hardly be endured. The men are blacke, and so are the women, and some of them also somewhat inclining to the colour of the wild Oliue. Their hayre is blacke and curled, and some also red. The stature of the men is of an indifferent bignesse, and excepting their blacknesse they are very like to the Portugals. The apples of their eyes are of diuers colours, blacke and of the colour of the Sea. Their lips are not thicke, as the Nubians and other Negroes are: and so likewise their countenances are some fat, some leane, and some betweene both, as in our Countreies there are, and not as the Negroes of Nubia and Guinea, which are very deformed. Their nights and their dayes doe not greatly differ, for in all the whole yeare yee shall not discerne the difference betweene them to bee more then a quarter of an houre.

The Winter in this Countrey (to speake at large) beginneth at the same time, that our spring heere beginneth, that is to say, when the Sunne entreth into the Northerne Signes, in the moneth of March. And at the same time that wee haue our Winter, when the Sunne entreth into the Southerne Signes in the moneth of September, then beginneth their Summer. In their Winter it rayneth fve monethes almost continually, that is to say, in Aprill, May, Iune, Iuly and August. Of faire dayes they haue but a few, because the raine falleth so greatly, and the drops of it are so big, as it is a wonder to see. These waters doe maruellously supple the ground, which is then very dry, by reason of the heate of the Summer past, wherein it neuer rayneth for the space of sixe monethes together, and after the ground is full, and as it were ingorged with water, then do the Riuer swell beyond all credit, and are so replenished with troubled waters, that all the Countrey is surrounded by them.

The winds in this Countrey in Winter time

The winds which blow in these Moones through all this Region, are the very selfe-same that Cesar calleth by a Greeke word Etesy, that is to say, Ordinary every yeare: whereby are meant those winds that in the Card are noted from the North to the West, and from the North to the North-east. These winds do driue the Cloudes to the huge and high mountaynes, whereupon they rush with very great violence, and being there stayed of their owne nature, they are afterwards melted into water. So that when it is likely to raine, you shall see the Cloudes standing (as it were) vpon the tops of their highest hills.

The cause of the increase of Nilus, and other Riuer in Aethiopia. The Riuer Niger, or Senega, runneth Westward.

And hence ariseth the increasing and augmentation of the Riuer that spring in Aethiopia, and especially of Nilus and others, that discharge themselues into the East and West Ocean. And in the Kingdome of Congo and Guinea, through which runneth the Riuer Niger, so called by the ancient Writers; and by the new, termed Senega; you shall see the said Riuer increase at the very selfe-same time that Nilus doth; but indeed carrieth his waters towards the West, directly against the Islands of Cape Verde, whereas Nilus runneth by the Ile of Meroe in Egypt towards the North, refreshing and watering all those Regions that are full of scorching Heates, and Wildernes, and Deserts.

Nilus runneth North-ward. It seldome raineth in Egypt but onely in Alexandria, and the rains which there fall are vnwholsome.

Now, for as much as in the Regions of Congo and Aethiopia, it is alwayes woont to raine every yeare at a certaine set time, the swelling and ouer-flowing of the Riuer there, is of no great consideration, nor any strange accident to make account of. But in the Countries, that are farre distant and very dry, as in Egypt, where it neuer raineth (sauing onely in Alexandria, and the Territories thereof) it is accounted a marvellous matter, to see euery yeare so great a quantitie of thicke troubled water come vpon them, from places so remote, at a certaine set time, without missing: which water doth quicken the ground, and ministreth food both to man and beast.

Their winds in Summer time.

This is then the cause of the increase of Nilus, and other Riuer in that Climate, whereof the Ancients of olde times made so great doubt, and inuented so many Fables and Errours.

But in their Summer, which is our Winter, there blow other winds that are quite opposite to the former, euen in Diametro, and are noted in the Card, from the South to the Southeast, which out of all question must needs be cold, because they breathe from the contrarie Pole Antarcticke, and coole all those Countries, euen for all the World as our winds in Summer doe coole our Countries. And whereas, there with them, these winds doe make the Ayre very faire and cleere, so doe they neuer come vnto vs, but they bring with them great store of raine.

Cooling of hot Regions by the breeze or winds.

And certainly, if the breath of these winds did not refresh and coole these Countries of Aethiopia, and Congo, and other places neere about them, it were not possible for them to endure the heate, considering that euen in the night time they are constrained to hang two couerings ouer them to keepe away the heate. The same cooling and refreshing by winds, is common also to the Inhabitants of the Ile of Candie, and of the Islands in Archipelago, and of Cyprus, and of Asia the lesse, and of Soria, and of Egypt, which doe liue (as it were) with this refreshing of the fore-said winds of the North-west, and of the West: so that they may well bee called as they are in Greeke, Zephers, quasi ζωοφόροι, breeders of life.

No Snow nor Ice in Aethiopia or Congo.

Let it be also remembred, that in the mountaines of Aethiopia, and of Congo, and the Regions neere adioyning, there falleth no Snow, neither is there any at all in the very tops of them, sauing onely towards the Cape of Good Hope, and certaine other hills, which the Portugals call, Sierra Nevada, that is to say, the Snowie Mountaines. Neither is there any Ice or Snow to bee found in all the Countrey of Congo, which would be better esteemed there then Gold, to mingle with their drinckes: So that the Riuer there doe not swell and increase by melting of Snow, but because the raine doth fall out of the Cloudes for fve whole Moones continually together, that is to say, in Aprill, May, Iune, Iuly, and August: the first raine sometimes beginning on the fifteenth day, and sometimes after. And this is the cause why the new waters of Nilus, which are so greatly desired and expected by the Inhabitants there, doe arriue sooner or later in Egypt.

¶ I I.

Of the circuit of the Kingdome of Congo, and of the borders and confines thereof; As also of diuers bordering Nations: and remarkable Rarities therein.

THe Kingdome of Congo, is distinguished by foure borders: The first, of the West, which is watered with the Ocean Sea: The second, of the North: The third, of the East; and the last, which is towards the South.

And to beginne with the border lying vpon the Sea, the first part of it is in the Bay; called Seno delle Vacche, and is situate in the height of thirteene degrees vpon the Antarctike-side, and stretcheth all along the Coast vnto foure degrees and a halfe on the North-side, neere to the Equinoctiall; which space containeth six hundred and thirtie miles. This Seno delle Vacche, is a Hauen but of a moderate bignesse, and yet a good one, and able to receiue any ship that arriueeth. It is called Seno delle Vacche, that is to say, The Bay of Cowes, because thereabouts there are pasturing very many Herds of that kind of Cattle. The Countrey is plaine, and aboundeth with all manner of victuals, and there you shall find some kind of Metals to be publickely sold, especially siluer, and it is subiect to the King of Angola.

The Westerne border of Congo.
The Bay of Cowes.

A little more forward lyeth the Riuer Bengleli, where a certaine Lord, beeing subiect to the King of Angola, doth specially command: and about the said Riuer is a great compasse of Countrey, much like to the former. And a little further runneth the Riuer Songa, so called by the Portugals: wherein you may sayle fife and twentie miles vpwards in a Countrey also like to the former.

The Riuer Bengleli.
The Riuer Songa.

Then followeth the Riuer Coanza, which issueth out of a little Lake, fed by a certaine Riuer that floweth out of a great Lake, being the chiefe and principall Spring or Head of Nilus, whereof in the other part of this Discourse wee shall haue occasion to write. Coanza, at the mouth of it is two miles broad, and you may sayle with small Barkes vpwards against the streame about one hundred miles, but hath no Hauen. And here it is to bee noted, that all this Countrey which we haue here described, was wont to be subiect to the King of Congo: but a while agoe the Gouvernour of that Countrey is become the absolute Lord thereof, and professeth himselfe to be a friend to the King of Congo, but not his Vassall: and yet sometimes he sendeth the King some Present, in manner of a tribute.

The Riuer Coanza.

Beyond the Riuer Coanza, is the Hauen of Loanda, being in ten degrees, made (as it is said) by a certaine Iland, called Loanda, which signifieth in that Language, Bald, or Shauen; because it is a Countrey without any hills and very low: for, indeed, it scarce rayseth it selfe aboue the Sea. This Iland was framed of the sand and durt of the Sea, and of the Riuer Coanza, whose waues meeting together, and the filthy matter sinking downe there to the bottome, in continuance of time it grew to be an Iland. It may be about twentie miles long, and one mile broad at the most, and in some places but onely a bow-shoot. But it is a maruellous thing, that in such a sandie ground, if you shall digge to the depth of two or three hand-breadthes, you shall find sweet water, the best in all those Countries. Wherein also there is a very strange effect, that when the Ocean ebbeth, this water becommeth somewhat salt, but when it floweth to the top, it is most sweet. A thing that falleth out also in the Iland of Cadis in Spaine, by the report and testimonie of Strabo.

Strange water springs.

This Iland is the Mine of all the Money which the King of Congo spendeth, and all the people thereabouts. For vpon the shoares you shall haue certaine women, that vse to diue and ducke into the Sea, two yards deepe and more, and fill their baskets with sand, and afterwards diuide the grauell from certaine small Shel-fishes that are among it, which are called Lumache: and when these Lumache are seuered by themselves, then doe they picke out the Males from the Females, which they may easily doe, because the Female is more fine then the Male, and greatly esteemed for her colour, which is very neat, bright and pleasant to the sight. These Lumache doe breed in all the shoares of the Kingdome of Congo, but the best of all are those of Loanda, because they looke very fine, and of a very bright colour, some gray or ash-coloured, and some of other colours not so precious.

The money of Congo.

The Lumache of Loanda.

And here you must note that gold and siluer and metall is not of any estimation, nor in vse of money in these Countries, but onely these Lumache: so that neither with gold nor siluer, in masse or in coine you shall buy any thing there, but with these Lumache you shall buy both gold and siluer, or any thing else.

No metall-money.

In this Iland there are seuen or eight Townes, called in that Countrey Language, Libata, the principall whereof is Spirito Sancto: and therein dwelleth the Gouvernour which is sent from Congo, to minister Iustice and to gather the treasure of the moneyes of these Lumache. Here are also Goates and Sheepe, and Bores in great numbers, which being tame at the first, doe afterwards become wild and liue in the Woods. Here groweth also a tree, called Enxanda, which is a great one and alwayes greene, and endued with a singular qualitie. For from the boughes of it that sprout vpwards, there hang downe certaine threeds (as it were) which creeping in- to the Earth doe take roots, and out from these roots doe rise other trees, and so they multiply. And within the outmost barke thereof, there groweth a certaine kind of Pill like fine Linnen, which being beaten and cleansed, they spread out in length and in breadth, and therewith they cloath their men and women, that are of the basest sort.

Spirito Sancto.

The tree Enxanda.

Their Boats or Canoes.

In this Iland they haue certaine vessels made of the bodies of Palme-trees, ioyned together and framed after the manner of our Boates, with a prow and a sterne, wherein they passe from place to place, both with Oares and Sayles. In these Boates they vse to fish about the Riuer, which are indeed exceeding full of fish, and sometime also they will goe ouer to the firme Land.

Shel-fishes growing on trees.
Ambixamatate.

In that part of this Iland, which is towards the maine Land, in certaine low places there grow certaine trees (which when the water of the Ocean ebbeth) discouer themselves: and at the feet thereof you shall find certaine other Shel-fishes cleauing as fast to the trees as may bee, ha- uing within them a great fish as bigge as a mans hand, and very good meate. The people of the Countrey know them very well, and call them Ambixamatate, that is to say, The fish of the Rocke. The shels of these fishes, they vse to burne, and thereof make very good Lime to build withall. And being like the corke or barke of the tree, which is called Manghi, they dresse their Oxe-hides withall, to make their shooe soles the stronger.

What kind of money is vsed in sundrie Countries.

To be brieft, this Iland bringeth forth neither Corne nor Wine, but there is great store of vi- suall brought thither from all parts thereabouts, to fetch away these Lumache. For as in all o- ther places all things may be had for money of metall, so all things here are had for Lumache. Whereby may be noted, that not onely here in this Kingdome of Congo, but also in her Neigh- bour Ethiopia and in Africa, and in the Kingdome of China, and certaine others of the Indies; they vse moneyes of other matter then of metall, that is to say, neither gold, nor siluer, nor cop- per, nor any other mixture tempered of these.

Pepper money, &c.

For in Ethiopia, their money is Pepper: and in the Kingdome of Tombuto, which is about the Riuer Niger, otherwise called Senega, their money is Cockles or Shel-fish: and among the Azanaghi, their moneyes are Porcellette: and in the Kingdome of Bengala, likewise they vse Porcellette, and metall together. In China they haue certaine Shel-fishes, called also Porcellette, which they vse for their money: and in other places Paper stamped with the Kings Seale, and the barkes of the tree called Gelsomora.

Great store of Whales.

Neere to this Iland towards the outward Coast to the Sea, there swimme an innumerable sort of Whales, that looke blacke, and fighting one with another doe kill themselves: which afterwards being by the waues cast vp vpon the shoare, as bigge as a midling Merchants ship; the Negroes go forth with their Boats to fetch them, and to take the Oyle out of them, which being mingled with Pitch they vse to trimme their Vessels withall. Vpon the ridges or backs of these creatures, there grow many Shel-fishes, made like Snailles, Cockles, and Whelkes: whereof Signor Odoardo affirmed, that he had seene great store. He was also of opinion that Amber commeth not from these fishes. For ouer all the Coast of Congo, where there is an infinite number of them, you shall not find either Ambergriz, or any other Amber, blacke or white in any place.

Villa di San Paulo.

Vpon the firme Land directly ouer against the Iland is a Towne, called Villa di San Paulo, al- together inhabited with Portugals, and their Wiues, which they brought with them out of Spaine: and yet it is not fortified. All this Channell is very full of fish, especially of Sardinaes, and of Anchiones; whereof there is so great store, that in the Winter time they will of them- selves leape vp to Land.

Store of fish.

Other kinds of most excellent fishes there are, as Soles, and Sturge- ons, and Barbelles, and all manner of daintie fish; and great Crabs, in strange abundance, and all very wholsome: so that the greatest part of the people that dwell about the bankes there, doe liue vpon them.

The Riuer Bengo.

Into this Channell runneth the Riuer called Bengo, which is a very great one, and nauigable vpwards twentie fve miles. This Riuer with that other of Coanza, whereof I told you before, do make the Ile of Loanda, because when their waters doe meete together, they leaue their sand & filth behind them, and so increase the Iland. There runneth also into it another great Riuer cal- led Dande; which will receiue Vessels of an hundred tunne: and then another Riuer called Lem- ba, which neither hath Hauen, neither doe any ships enter into it. Very neere vnto this there is also another Riuer called Ozone, which issueth out of the same Lake, whence Nilus likewise springeth, and it hath a Hauen. Next to Ozone, there is another called Loze, without any Ha- uen: and then another great one with a Hauen called Ambriz, which runneth within foure leagues neere to the Royall Citie of Congo. Last of all, is the Riuer Lelunda, which signifieth a Trowt fish, and watereth the roots of that great Hill, whereon the Palace of Congo standeth, called by the Portugals, the Oteiro. This Riuer Lelunda, springeth out of the same Lake, from whence Coanza issueth, and taketh into it by the way another Riuer, that commeth from the great Lake: and when it doth not raine, then you may passe ouer Lelunda on foot, because it hath so little store of water in it.

Next vnto this is the Zaire, a huge Riuer and a large, and indeed the greatest in all the Kingdome of Congo. The originall of this Riuer commeth out of three Lakes: one is the great Lake from whence Nilus springeth; the second, is the little Lake aboue mentioned; and the third, is the second great Lake which Nilus engendreth. And certainly, when you will consider the abundance of water that is in this Riuer, you will say, that there was no need to haue any fewer or lesser springs to make so huge a streame as this carrieth. For in the very mouth of it, which is the onely entrance into it, the Riuer is eight and twentie miles broad, and when it is in the height of his increase he runneth fresh water fortie or fiftie miles into the Sea, and sometimes eightie, so that the passengers doe refresh themselves withall, and by the troublefomenesse of the 10 water they know the place where they are. It is nauigable vpwards with great Barkes about fise and twentie miles, vntill you come to a certaine straight betweene the Rockes, where it falleth with such a horrible noyse, that it may be heard almost eight miles. And this place is called by the Portugals, Cachuiera, that is to say, a Fall, or a Cataract, like to the Cataracts of Nilus. Betweene the mouth of this Riuer, and the fall thereof, there are diuers great Ilands well inhabited, with Townes, and Lords obedient to the King of Congo, which somtimes for the great enmitie that is among them, doe warre one against another in certaine Boats, hollowed out of a stocke of a tree, which is of an vnmeasurable bignesse, and these Boats they call Lungo.

The greatest Boates that they haue, are made of a certaine tree, called Licondo, which is so great, that sixe men cannot compasse it with their armes, and is in length of proportion answerable to the thicknesse, so that one of them will carrie about two hundred persons. They row 20 these Boates with their Oares, which are not tyed to any loopes, but they hold them at liberty in their hands, and moue the water therewith at pleasure. Euery man hath his Oare, and his Bow, and when they fight together they lay downe their Oare and take their Bow. Neither do they vse any other Rudders to turne and gouerne their Boats, but onely their Oares.

The first of these Ilands, which is but a little one, is called, the Ile of Horses, because there are bred and brought vp in it great store of those creatures that the Greekes call Hippopotami, that is to say Water-horses. In a certaine Village within this Iland doe the Portugals dwell, hauing withdrawne themselves thither for their better securitie. They haue their Vessels to transport 30 them ouer the water to the firme Land, vpon the South banke of the Riuer, which Land is called the Hauen of Pinda, where many ships doe ride that arriue therein.

In this Riuer there are liuing diuers kinds of creatures, and namely, mightie great Crocodiles, which the Countrey people there, call Caiman, and Water-horses aboue named: And another kind of creature, that hath (as it were) two hands, and a tayle like a Target, which is called, Ambize Angulo, that is to say, a Hog-fish, because it is as fat as a Porke. The flesh of it is very good, and thereof they make Lard, and so keepe it: neither hath it the saueur or taste of a fish, although it be a fish. It neuer goeth out from the fresh water, but feedeth vpon the grasse that groweth on the bankes, and hath a mouth like the muzzell of an Oxe. There are of these fishes, 40 that weigh fise hundred pounds apiece.

The fishermen vse to take them in their little Boats, by marking the places where they feed, and then with their hookes and forkes, striking and wounding them, they draw them dead forth of the water: and when they haue cut them in pieces, they carrie them to the King. For whosoeuer doth not so, incurreth the penaltie of death, and so doe they likewise that take the Trowt, and the Tench, and another fish called Cacongo, which is shaped after the likenesse of a Salmon, sauing that it is not red: but indeed so fat it is, that it quencheth out the fire whiles it is roasted or broyled. Other fishes also there are that are called Fishes Royall, which are carried to the King, vpon very seuer and rigorous punishments.

Beyond this Riuer of Congo, there commeth downe another Riuer, which the Portugals call,
La Baia de las Almadias, that is to say, the Gulfe of Barkes, because there are great store of them, 50 that are made there, by reason of the abundance of Woods and Trees that grow thereabouts, which are fit for that vse, and wherewith all the Countries round about doe furnish themselves.
At the mouth of this Bay there are three Ilands, one great Ile in the middle of the Channell, which maketh a conuenient Hauen for small Vessels, and two other lesse, but none of them inhabited.

A little higher runneth another streame, not very great, which is called, De las Barreras Rossas, of the red Clay-pits, because it floweth from among certaine Rockes of Hills, whose Earth is dyed with a red colour: where also there is a very high Mountaine, called by the Portugals, La Sierra Complida, that is to say, the long Mountaine.

And yet going vp a little further, there are two Gulfes of the Sea in the likenesse of a paire of Spectacles, wherein is a good Hauen, called La Baia d'Aluaro Gonzales, that is, The Gulfe of Aluaro Gonzales. Beyond all these, are certaine hills and shoares, not worth the remembrance, vntill you come to the Promontorie, that is called by the Portugals, Capo de Ca- terina, which is the border of the Kingdome of Congo towards the Equinoctiall, and is distant from the Equinoctiall Line two degrees and a halfe, which is one hundred and fiftie Italian miles.

Now from Cape De Caterina on the North side, beginneth another Border or Coast of the Kingdome of Congo, which Eastward stretcheth it selfe to the place where the Riuer Vumba ioyneth with the Riuer Zaire, contayning the space of fixe hundred miles and more. Beyond this Coast of Congo towards the North, and vnder the Equinoctiall Line vpon the Sea shoare, and about two hundred miles within Land, (comprehending in that reckoning the aforesaid Gulfe of Lope Gonzales) the People called the Bramas doe inhabite in a Countrey, that is now called the Kingdome of Loango; and the King thereof, Mani Loango, that is to say, The King of Loango. The Countrey hath great abundance of Elephants, whose teeth they exchange for Iron, whereof they make their Arrow heads, their Kniues, and such other instruments. In this Countrie also, they weaue certaine Cloth of the leaues of Palme-trees, in sundrie sorts: as we shall tell you in some other place of this narration.

The King of Loango is in amitie with the King of Congo, and the report is, that in times past he was his vassall. The People are circumcised after the manner of the Hebrews, like as also the rest of the Nations in those Countries vse to be.

Beyond the Kingdome of Loango, are the People called Anziques, of whom wee shall deliuer vnto you a historie, which in trueth is very strange, and almost incredible, for the beastly and cruell custome that they vse in eating mans flesh; yea, and that of the neereft kinf-folkes they haue. This Countrey towards the Sea on the West, bordereth vpon the People of Ambiu; and towards the North, vpon other Nations of Africa, and the Wildernesse of Nubia; and towards the East, vpon the second great Lake, from whence the Riuer of Congo springeth, in that Part which is called Anzicana; and from the Kingdome of Congo, it is diuided by the Riuer Zaire, wherein there are many Ilands (as before is told you) scattered from the Lake downwards, and some of them belonging to the Dominion of the Anziques, by which Riuer also they doe traffique with the People of Congo. In this Kingdome of the Anziques, there are many Mines of Copper; and great quantitie of Sanders, both red and grey: the red is called Tanilla, and the grey (which is the better esteemed) is called Chicongo, whereof they make a powder of a very sweet smell, and diuers medicines. They doe also mingle it with the Oyle of Palme-tree, and so anoynting all their bodies ouer withall, they preferue themselves in health. But the Portugals vse it being tempered with Vinegar, which they lay vpon their pulses, and so heale the French Poxe, which they call in that Language, Chitangas. Some doe affirme, that this grey Sanders is the very Lignum Aquila, that groweth in India: and Signor Odoardo affirmed, that the Portugals haue proued it for the head-ache, by laying it on the coales, and taking the smoake of it. The pith and innermost part of the Tree is the best, but the outter part is of no estimation.

They make great store of Linnen of the Palme-tree, both of sundrie sorts and colours, and much Cloth of Silke, whereof wee will discourse more hereafter. The People are subiect to a King that hath other Princes vnder him. They are very active and warlike. They are readie to take Armes; and doe fight on foot. Their weapons are different from the weapons of all other people round about them: for, their Bowes are small and short, made of wood, and wrapped about with Serpents skins of diuers colours, and so smoothly wrought, that you would thinke them to be all one with the wood: and this they doe, both to make the Bowe stronger, and also to hold it the faster. Their Strings are of little wooden twigs like reeds, not hollow within, but sound and pliable, and very daintie; such as the Canalieros of Portugall doe carrie in their hands to beate their Palfreyes withall. They are of an ash-colour, and of a Lion-tawney, somewhat tending to blacke. They grow in the Countrey of the Anziques, and also in the Kingdome of Bengala, through which the Riuer Ganges runneth. Their Arrowes are short and slender, and of a very hard wood, and they carrie them on their Bow-hand. They are so quicke in shooting, that holding eight and twentie Shafts or more in their Bow-hand, they will shoot and discharge them all, before the first Arrow light on the ground: yea, and sometimes there haue beene seene diuers stout Archers, that haue killed birds as they flie in the aire.

Other weapons also they make, as Axes and Hatchets, which they vse and frame after a strange manner: for, the handle is shorter by the halfe then the Iron is, and at the lowest end of it there is a pommell, for the faster holding of it in the hand; and all covered ouer with the foresaid skinn of a Serpent. In the vppermost end of it, is the Iron very bright and shining, fastned to the wood with plates of Copper, in the manner of two nailes, as long as the handle: it hath two edges, the one cutteth like a Hatchet, and maketh a wound after the fashion of an halfe roundell; the other is a Hammer. When they fight with their Enemies, or defend themselves from their Arrowes, they are so exercised with a wonderfull speed and nimblenesse to manage their weapons, that whirling them round about, as it were in a circle, they keepe all that compasse of the ayre which is before them; so that when the Enemy shooteth, and the Arrow beginne to fall, it lighteth vpon the Hatchet, being so swiftly and vehemently whirled about, that it breaketh the force of the Arrow, and so it is repulsed: then doe they hang the Hatchet vpon their shoulder, and begin to shoot themselves. They haue also certaine short Daggers, with sheaths of the Serpents skins, made like Kniues with an haft vnto them, which they vse vse to weare acrosse. Their Girdles are of diuers sorts; but the Men of warre haue their Girdles of Elephants skin, three good fingers broad: and because they are at the first two fingers thicke, and very hard to handle handsomely, by the heat of the fire they bow them round, and so with certaine buttons tye them ouerthwart about them. The men are very actiue and nimble, and leape vp and downe the Mountaines like Goats. Couragious they are and contemne death: men of great simplicitie, loyaltie, and fidelitie, and such as the Portugals doe trust more then any other. In so much as Signor Odoardo was wont to say, that if these Anzichi would become Christians (being of so great fidelitie, sinceritie, loyaltie, and simplicitie, that they will offer themselues to death, for the glorie of the world, and to please their Lords will not sticke to giue their owne flesh to bee deuoured) then would they with a farre better heart and courage indure martyrdom, for the name of our Redeemer Iesu Christ, and would most honourably maintaine our Faith and Religion, with their good testimonie, and example against the Gentiles.

The nature of the Anzichi.

Vain-glorious madnesse.

The nature of the Anzichi is such, that they will offer themselues to death, for the glorie of the world, and to please their Lords will not sticke to giue their owne flesh to bee deuoured.

Moreover, the said Signor Odoardo did likewise affirme, that there was no conuersing with them, because they were a sauage and beastly people, sauing onely in respect that they come and traffique in Congo, bringing thither with them Slaues, both of their owne Nation, and also out of Nubia (whereupon they doe border) and linnen Cloth (whereof we will tell you hereafter,) and Elephants teeth: in exchange of which chaffare they recarrie home with them, Salt, and these Lumache, which they vse in stead of money and Coyne; and another greater kind of Lumache, which come from the Ile of Saint Thomas, and which they vse to weare for Brooches to make themselues fine and gallant withall. Other Merchandises, also they carrie backe with them, which are brought out of Portugall, as Silkes, Linnen, and Glasses, and such like. They vse to circumsise themselues. And another foolish custome they haue, both men and women, as well of the Nobilitie, as of the Commonaltie, euen from their childhood, to marke their faces with sundrie slashes made with a knife, as in due place shall be further shewed vnto you.

Their merchandise.

Circumcision.

The Anzichi are circumsised, and marked in their faces.

A shambles of mans flesh.

Blind subiection.

A strange beastly custom

They keepe a Shambles of mans flesh as they doe in these Countries for Beefe and other vituals. For their Enemies whom they take in the Warres, they eate; and also their Slaues, if they can haue a good market for them, they sell: or if they cannot, then they deliuer them to the Butchers, to be cut in pieces, and so sold, to be roasted or boiled. And (that which a marvellous historie to report) some of them being wearie of their liues, and some of them euen for valour of courage, and to shew themselues stout and venturous, thinking it to bee a great honour vnto them, if they runne into voluntarie death, thereby to shew that they haue a speciall contempt of this life, will offer themselues to the butcherie, as faithfull subiects to their Princes, for whose sakes, that they may seeme desirous to doe them notable seruice, they doe not onely deliuer themselues to bee deuoured by them, but also their Slaues, when they are fat and well fed, they doe kill and eate them. True it is, that many Nations there are, that feed vpon mans flesh, as in the East Indies, and in Brassill, and in other places: but that is onely the flesh of their aduersaries and enemies, but to eate the flesh of their owne friends, and subiects, and kinfolk, it is without all example in any place of the World, sauing onely in this Nation of the Anzichi.

Their Apparell.

Their Language.

The Easterne border of Congo. The Mountaines of Cryshall.

The Mountaines of the Sunne.

The Mountaines of Sal-Nitrum.

The ordinarie apparell of these people is thus: The common sort goe naked from the girdle vpwards, and without any thing vpon their heads, hauing their haire trussed vp, and curled. The Noblemen are apparelled in Silkes and other Cloth, and weare vpon their heads, blue and red, and blacke colours, and Hats and Hoods of Portugall Veluet, and other kinds of Caps vsuall in that Countrey. And indeed, they are all desirous to haue their apparell handsome and neat, as their abilitie will suffer them. The women are all couered from top to toe, after the manner of Africa. The poorer sort of them doe gird themselues close from the girdle downewards. The Noble women and such as are of wealth, doe weare certaine Mantles, which they cast ouer their heads, but keepe their faces open and at libertie: and Shooes they haue on their feet, but the poore goe bare-foot. They goe very quicke and lightsome. Their stature is comely, and their conditions faire and commendable. Their Language is altogether different from the Language of Congo, and yet the Anzichi will learne the Language of Congo very soone and easily, because it is the plainer Tongue: but the People of Congo doe very hardly learne the Language of the Anzichi. And when I once demanded what their Religion was, it was told mee they were Gentiles, and that was all that I could learne of them.

The East Coast of the Kingdome of Congo, beginneth (as we haue told you) at the meeting of the Riuer Vumba, and the Riuer of Zaire; and so with a line drawne towards the South in equall distance from the Riuer Nilus, which lieth on the left hand, it taketh vp a great Mountaine which is very high, and not inhabited in the tops thereof, called the Mountaine of Cryshall, because there is in it great quantitie of Cryshall, both of the Mountaine and of the Cliffe, and of all sorts. And then passing on farther, includeth the Hills that are called Sierras de Sol, that is to say, the Hills of the Sunne, because they are exceeding high. And yet it neuer snoweth vpon them, neither doe they beare any thing, but are very bare and without any trees at all. On the left hand there arise other Hills, called the Hills of Sal-Nitrum, because there is in them great store shore of that Minerall. And so cutting ouer the Riuer Berbela, that commeth out of the first Lake, there endeth the ancient bound of the Kingdome of Congo on the East.

Thus then the East Coast of this Kingdome is deriued from the meeting of the two foresaid Rivers, Vumba and Zaire; vntill you come to the lake Achelunda, and to the Countrey of Malomba; contayning the space of fixe hundred miles. From this line which is drawne in the Easterne Coast of Congo to the Riuer Nilus, and to the two Lakes (whereof mention shall be made in conuenient place) there is the space of one hundred and fiftie miles of ground well inhabited, and good store of Hills, which doe yeeld fundrie Metals, with much Linnen, and Cloth of the Palme tree.

The Arte of making Silkes, in this Eastern Coast, of Palm-trees.

And seeing wee are now come to this point of this discourse, it will be very necessarie to declare vnto you the maruellous Arte which the people of this Countrey, and other places thereabouts doe vse in making Clothes of fundrie sorts, as Veluets shorne and vnshorne, Cloth of Tissue, Sattins, Taffata, Damaskes, Sarcenets, and such like, not of any silken Stuffle, (for they haue no knowledge of the Silke-wormes at all, although some of their apparell bee made of Silke that is brought thither from our Countries.) But they weaue their Clothes afore-named of the leaues of Palme-trees, which Trees they alwaies keepe vnder and low to the ground, euery yeere cutting them, and watering them, to the end they may grow small and tender against the new Spring. Out of these leaues, being cleansed and purged after their manner, they draw forth their threeds, which are all very fine and daintie, and all of one euennesse, sauing that those which are longest, are best esteemed: for, of those they weaue their greatest pieces. These Stuffles they worke of diuers fashions, as some with a nappe vpon them like Veluet, on both sides, and other Cloth, called Damaskes, branched with leaues, and such other things; and the Broccati, which are called High and Low, and are farre more precious then ours are. This kind of Cloth no man may weare but the King, and such as it pleaseth him. The greatest pieces are of these Broccati: for they containe in length foure or fise spans; and in breadth, three or foure spannes, and are called Incorimbas, by the name of the Countrey where it groweth, which is about the Riuer Vumba. The Veluets are called Enfachas, of the same bignesse; and the Damaskes, Infulas; and the Rasi, Maricas; and the Zendadi, Tangas; and the Ormesini, Engombos. Of the lighter sort of these Stuffles they haue greater pieces, which are wrought by the Anzichi; and are fixe spannes long, and fise spannes broad, wherewith euery man may apparell himselfe according to his abilitie. Besides that, they are very thicke and sound to keepe out the water, and yet very light to weare. The Portugals haue lately begun to vse them for Tents and Bootheres, which doe maruellously resist both water and wind.

The Southerne Coast. The Mountaine of Siluer.

This Easterne Coast (as it is before set downe) endeth in the mountaine, called Serras de Plata, that is, the Mountaines of Siluer; and there beginneth the fourth and last border of the Kingdome of Congo, towards the South, that is to say, from the foresaid Mountaine to the Bay of Cowes on the West, containing in length the space of foure hundred and fiftie miles. And this Southerne Line doth part the Kingdome of Angola in the middle, and leaueth on the left hand of it, the foresaid Mountaines of Siluer; and farther beyond them towards the South, the Kingdome of Matama; which is a great Kingdome, very mightie, and absolute of it selfe, and sometimes in amitie, and sometimes at vtter enmitie with the Kingdome of Angola.

The King of Matama.

The King of Matama is in Religion a Gentile, and his Kingdome stretcheth towards the South to the Riuer Braunagal, and neere to the Mountaines, commonly called the Mountaines of the Moone; and towards the East bordereth on the Westerne bankes of the Riuer Bagamidri, and so crosseth ouer the Riuer Coari.

This Countrey aboundeth in Vaults of Crystall and other Metals, and all manner of victuall, and good aire. And although the people thereof, and their neighbour borderers doe traffique together: Yet the King of Matama, and the King of Angola, doe oftentimes warre one against the other, as we told you before: And this Riuer Bagamidri diuiderh the Kingdome of Matama from the Kingdome of Monomata, which is towards the East, and whereof Iohn de Barros doth most largely discourse, in the first Chapter of his tenth Booke.

¶ V I.

Of Angola, the Warres betwixt Congo and Angola: their manner of warfare.

The present Kingdome of Congo bounded. Of Bamba, one of the sixe Princes of Congo, and the Creatures therein.

OWARDS the Sea-coast there are diuers Lords, that take vpon them the Title of Kings: but indeed they are of very base and slender estate: Neither are there any Ports or Hauens of any account or name in the Rivers there. And now, forasmuch as we haue oftentimes made mention of the Kingdome of Angola, this will bee a very conuenient place for vs to intreat thereof; because it hath bene heretofore said, that the King of Angola, Angola, being in times past but a Gouvernour or Deputie vnder the King of Congo; although, since that time he is become a Christian, he made himselfe a free and an absolute Prince, and vsurped all that Quarter to his owne Iurisdiction, which before he had in regiment and gouernment vnder another. And so afterwards in time conquered other Countries thereabouts; inso-much, as he is now growne to be a great Prince, and a rich, and in power little inferiour to the King of Congo himselfe, and therefore either payeth tribute, or refuseth to pay tribute vnto him, euen at his owne good pleasure.

The King of Angola freeth himselfe from subiection to the King of Congo, since Congo receiued the Faith.

It came to passe, that Don Giouanni the Second, being King of Portugall, planted the Christian Religion in the Kingdome of Congo; and thereupon, the King of Congo became a Christian. After which time the Lord of Angola was alwaies in amitie, and (as it were) a Vassall of the forenamed King of Congo, and the People of both Countreies did traffique together one with another, and the Lord of Angola did euery yeere send some Presents to the King of Congo. And by licence from the K. of Congo, there was a great trade betweene the Portugals and the People of Angola, at the Hauen of Loanda, where they bought Slaves, and changed them for other merchandises, and so transported all into the Ile of S. Thomas. Whereby it came to passe, that the traffique was here united with the traffique of S. Thomas: so that the ships did vse first to arrive at that Island, and then afterward passed over to Loanda. And when this trade began in proceesse of time to encrease, they dispatched their ships from Lisbone to Angola of themselves, and sent with them a Gouvernour, called Paulo Diaz of Nouais, to whom this businesse did (as it were) of right appertaine, in regard of the good deserts of his Ancestors, who first discovered this Traffique. To this Paulo Diaz, did Don Sebastiano King of Portugall grant leaue and authoritie to conquer, for the space of three and thirtie leagues upwards along the Coast, beginning at the Riuer Coanza towards the South, and within the Land also, whatsoeuer hee could get towards all his charges for him and his heires. With him there went many other ships that opened and found out a great trade with Angola, which notwithstanding was directed to the foresaid Hauen of Loanda, where the said ships did still discharge themselves. And so by little and little he entred into the firme Land, and made himselfe an house in a certaine Village, called Anzelle, within a mile neere to the Riuer Coanza, because it was the more commodious and nigher to the traffique of Angola. When the trade here began thus to encrease, and merchandises were freely carried by the Portugals, and the People of Congo to Cabazo, a place belonging to the Lord of Angola, and distant from the Sea, one hundred and fiftie miles, there to sell and barter them, it pleased his Lordship to giue out order, that all the Merchants should be slaine, and their goods confiscated, alledging for his defence, that they were come thither as spies, and to take possession of his estate: but in truth it is thought that he did it onely to gaine all that wealth to himselfe, considering that it was a People that did not deale in the habite of Warriors, but after the manner of Merchants. And this fell out in the same yeere, that the King Don Sebastiano was discomfited in Barbarie.

John the Second, King of Portugall, first brought Christianity into Congo.

Paulo Diaz, the first discoverer of this traffick, Don Sebastiano King of Portugall.

Paulo Diaz buildeth an house in Anzelle. The Author calleth him Lord, because he was then but a petie King.

When Paulo Diaz understood of this course, he put himselfe in Armes against the King of Angola, and with such a troupe of Portugals as he could gather together, that were to be found in that Countreie, and with two Gallies and other vessels, which he kept in the Riuer Coanza, he went forward, on both sides of the Riuer conquering, and by force subdued many Lords, and made them his Friends and Subjects. But the King of Angola perceiuing that his Vassals had yeilded to the obedience of Paulo Diaz, and that with all prosperous successe he had gained much Land upon him, hee assembled a great Armie to goe against him, and so utterly to destroy him. Whereupon Paulo Diaz requested the King of Congo, that he would succour him with some helpe to defend himselfe withall, who presently sent vnto him for ayde, an Armie of sixtie thousand men, vnder the conduct of his Cousin Don Sebastiano Mani-bamba, and another Captaine, with one hundred and twentie Portugall Souldiers, that were in those Countries, and all of his owne pay for the atchieving of this enterprise. This Armie was to ioyne with Paulo Diaz, and so altogether to warre against the King of Angola: but arriving at the shoare, where they were to passe over the Riuer Bengo, within twelue miles of Loanda, and where they should haue met with many Barkes to carrie the Campe to the other shoare, partly because the said Barkes had slacked their coming, and partly because much time would haue bene spent in transporting so many men, the whole Armie tooke their way quite over the Riuer, and so going on forwards, they met with the People of the King of Angola, that were readie to stop the Souldiers of Congo from entring vpon their Countreie.

Paulo Diaz, in Armes against the King of Angola.

P. Diaz demandeth succour of the King of Congo.

The militarie order of the Mociconghi (for by that terme wee doe call the naturall borne People of the Kingdome of Congo, as we call the Spaniards, those that are naturally borne in Spaine) and the militarie order of the People of Angola, is almost all one: for both of them doe vsually fight on foot, and diuide their Armie into severall troupes, fitting themselves according to the situation of the Field where they doe encampe, and aduancing their Ensignes and Banners in such sort as before is remembered. The remoues of their Armie are guided and directed by certaine severall sounds and noyses, that proceed from the Captaine Generall, who goeth into the midst of the Armie, and there signifieth what is to be put in execution; that is to say, either that they shall ioyne battell, or else retire, or put on forward, or turne to the right hand, and to the left hand, or to performe any other warlike action. For by these severall sounds distinctly deliuered from one to another, they doe all understand the commandements of their Captaine, as we here among vs doe understand the pleasure of our Generall by the sundrie stroakes of the Drum, and the Captaines sounds of the Trumpet.

Three principall sounds they haue which they vse in Warre: One which is uttered aloud, by great Rattles, fastned in certaine Wooden Cases, hollowed out of a tree, and couered with Leather, which they strike with certaine little handles of Iuory. Another is made by a certaine kind of Instrument, fashioned like a Pyramis turned upward: for the lower end of it is sharpe, and endeth as it were in a point, and the upper end waxeth broader and broader, like the bottome of a Triangle, in such sort, that beneath they are narrow and like an Angle, and aboue they are large and wide. This Instrument is made of certaine thinne plates of Iron, which are hollow and emptie within, and very like to a Bell turned up-side-downe. They make them ring, by striking them with wooden wands: and oftentimes they doe also cracke them, to the end that the sound should be more harsh, horrible, and warlike: The third Instrument is framed of Elephants teeth, some great, and some small, hollow within, and blownen at a certaine hole which they make on the side of it, in manner of the Fife, and not aloft like the Pipe. These are tempered by them in such sort, that they yeeld as warlike and harmonious Musicke, as the Cornet doth, and so pleasant and iocund a noyse, that it moueth and stirreth up their courages, and maketh them not to care for any danger whatsoeuer. Now of these three senerall sorts of warlike Instruments, there are some bigger, and some lesse. For the Captaine Generall carrieth alwaies with him the greater sort, to the end that by them he may giue signification to the whole Campe what they shall doe. The particular bands and troupes of the Armie haue in like manner their smaller sort, and euery Captaine in his senerall Regiment hath also one of the smallest, which they strike with their hands. Whereupon it falleth out, that when they heare the sound of the generall Rattle, or Cornet, or the other third kind of Instrument, euery part of the Army doth presently answer in the same note, signifying thereby, that they haue well understood the good pleasure of the Captaine, and so consequently the under Captaines doe the like. Neither doe they onely vse these Instruments and sounds vniuersally, but also when they are in fight and in skirmish, the valiant and couragious Souldiers go before the rest, and with this kind of bells, which they strike with their wooden wands, they dance, and encourage their fellowes, and by the note doe signifie unto them in what danger they are, and what weapons they haue met withall.

The Military apparell of the better sort, and of the Lords of the Moci-Conghi, is this. On their heads they carie a Cap, which is garnished with sundry Plumes of the feathers of the Estridge, of the Peacocke, of the Cocke, and of other kinds of Birds, which make them to seeme men of greater stature then they are, and terrible to looke upon. From the girdle upwards they are all naked, and haue hanging about them from their necke, both on the right side and on the left, euen as low as to both their flankes, certaine chaines of Iron, with Rings vpon them as bigge as a mans little finger, which they vse for a certaine militarie pompe and brauery. From the girdle downe-wards they haue breeches of Linnen, or Sendale, which are couered with Cloath, and reach downe to their heeles, but then they are folded againe upwards, and tucked vnder their girdle. Vpon their girdle, which (as we told you) is made with exquisite and curious worke, they doe fasten certaine bells, very like to the instruments that are before named, which in moouing of themselves, and in fighting with their enemies, doe ring and make a noyse, and adde courage vnto them, while they are in combat with their aduersaries. Vpon their legges they haue likewise their Buskins, after the Portugall fashion. Their Armour we haue already declared, that is to say; Bow and Arrowes, Sword, Dagger and Target: but yet with this caueat, that whosoever weareth a Bow, he weareth also a Dagger, but no Target: for those two weapons may not be worne together, but Sword and Target they may lawfully weare both at once.

The common Souldiers goe all naked from the girdle-stead upwards, and haue the rest of their bodies armed with Bow and Arrowes, and Daggers. These are they that doe first offer the skirmish, going out before the rest of the Army, as it were senerally and dispersedly prouoking to fight, and receiuing the shot from a farre off, they turne and winde this way and that way, and doe nimbly leape from one side to another, to the end they may auoyd the lighting of their enemies Arrowes. Besides these, there are also certaine quicke and gallant young men, that runne out before the rest, which with the ringing of their bells (as before is said) are as it were comforters of their fellowes, and when they haue fought so much, that the Captaine thinketh them to be euen weary, then doth he call them backe with the sound of one of those instruments aboue mentioned: so that perceiuing the medley to wax hot, they turn about and retire themselves backe againe, and others succede in their places, which course is still obserued and kept vntill such time, as both the Armies doe indeed ioyne all their maine forces together, and so fight it out.

In the place aboue described, there were sundry encounters on the one side, and on the other. And in the first batailes the people of Congo remained Conquerors: but afterward, when they had diuers times fought together with great losse on both sides, and victuals began now to faile, and consequently men waxed sicke and died, the Campe of the King of Congo was dissolved, and euery man returned to his owne home.

In this meane while Paulo Diaz, though he could not ioyne his forces with the Army of his friends that came to succour him, yet set himselfe forwards, and passing ouer the Riuer stayed at Luiola, because it was a place very strong, and fit to resist the King of Angola. The situation of Luiola is this: The two Riuers, Coanza and Luiola doe ioyne together about one hundred and fife miles from the Sea shore, and a little aboue the said ioyning, these Riuers doe seuer themselves, for the space of an Harquebisse shot, so that they make as it were an Island betweene them. In which Island, at the meeting of the two Rivers there riseth a hill, which Paulo Diaz surprized and fortified for his better safety. And whereas in times past, there was neuer any habitation there, now at this present it is growne to be a pretty Countrey inhabited by the Portugals.

From this place thus surprized by Paulo Diaz, and called Luiola, you may saile along the River with certaine small vessels, euen to the Sea, and goe by land without any danger for the space of one hundred and fife miles. Neere thereunto are the hills, that are called the hills of Cabambe, producing infinite store of Siluer: which the said Diaz doth euery day by little and little endeavour to conquer. And these hills are the grand quarrell betweene him and the people of Angola. For knowing that the Portugals doe esteeme greatly of these hills, in regard of the 10 Siluer pits which are there in great abundance; they doe vse all the force and skill they can to keepe the Portugals from them. They fight also with them in diuers other places: for the Portugals passing ouer the River Coanza, do continually make in-roades into the Countreies that are subiect to the King of Angola.

The weapons of these peoples, are Bowes sixe handfull long, with strings made of the barks of Trees, Arrowes of Wood, lesse then a mans little finger, and sixe handfulls long. They haue Iron heads, made like a hooke, and feathers of Birds in the tops of them: and of these Arrowes they vse to carry to the number of sixe or seuen vpon their Bow hand, without any Quiuer at all. Their Daggers are fashioned with a haft after the manner of a Knife, which they weare at their girdle, on their left side, and hold them aloft in their hands, when they fight with them.

20 By their Militarie actions and proceedings, you may obserue their great skill and good order in matter of warre. For in diuers batailes that were betweene them and the Portugals, it was plainly seene how they could chuse their aduantages against their enemies, as by assaulting them in the night time, and in rainy weather, to the end that their Harquebusses and Gunnes should not take fire; and also by diuiding their forces into many troopes, to trouble them the more. The King doth not vse to goe to the warre in his owne person, but sendeth his Captaines in his stead. The people are also accustomed to flye and runne away incontinently, as soone as they see their Captaine flaine, neither can they be perswaded to stay by any reason or argument, but presently yeeld vp the field. They are all Foot-men, neither haue they any Horses at all: and therefore the Captaines, if they will not goe on foote, cause themselves to bee 30 carried on the shoulders of their Slaues, after one of the three manners, which we will shew vnto you hereafter.

Their militarie actions.

This Nation goeth out to warre, in number almost infinite, and very confusedly: they leaue no man at home that is fit to carry a weapon: they make no preparation of victuals necessarie for the Campe: but such as perhaps haue any, conuey it with them vpon the shoulders of their Seruants, and yet they haue sundry sorts of creatures that might bee managed, and serue their turnes to draw, and to carry, as in the second part of this Treatise shall be described vnto you. And thereupon it falleth out, that when they come into any Countrey with their whole Army, all their food is quickly quite consumed, and then hauing nothing left to feed vpon, they dissolue their hoast euen in the greatest necessitie of prosecuting their enterprife, and so are inforced by 40 hunger to returne into their owne Countreies.

They are greatly giuen to Divination by Birds: If a Bird chance to flye on their left hand, or cry in such manner, as those which make profession to vnderstand the same, do say, that it fore-sheweth ill lucke and aduersity, or that they may go no further forwards, they will presently turne backe and repaire home: which custome was also in the old time obserued by the ancient Romans, and likewise at this day by sundry other Pagans.

They are giue

by Birds.

Now if it shall seeme strange to any man, that so few Portugall Souldiers, as Paulo Diaz retaineth there with him, and others of the Portugall Nation, which Trafficke into the Realme, and releue him with succours, being in number but three hundred at the most, accounting their Slaues, and also the Male-contents, the Rebels and Fugitiues of Angola, which daily resort vnto him, and amount not in all to the quantitie of fiftene thousand men, should be able to make so gallant a resistance against that 50 innumerable rabble of Negroes, being subiect to the King of Angola, which are gathered there together (as it is said) to the number of a Million of soules. I answer, that great reason may be alleadged for the same. For the Armie of the Negroes is all naked, and utterly destitute of all prouision and furniture for Armour of defence: And as for their weapons of offence, they consist onely but of Bowes and Daggers (as I told you.) But our few Portugals that are there, are well lapped in certaine Iackets that are stuffed and basted with bombaste, and stitched and quilted very soundly, which keepe their Armes very safe, and their bodies downe-wards as low as their knees: Their heads also are armed with cappes made of the same stuffe, which doe resist the shot of the Arrow, and the stroke of the Dagger: Besides that, they are girt with long swords, and some Horsemen there are among them that carry 60 speares for their weapons. Now you must vnderstand that one man on horse-backe, is of more worth then a hundred Negroes, because the Horsemen doe afright them greatly: and especially of those that doe discharge Gunnes and Peeeces of Artillarie against them, they doe stand continually in an extreame bodily feare. So that these few being well armed, and cunningly and artificially ordered, must needs overcome the other, though they be very many in number. This Kingdome of Angola, is full of people ple beyond all credite: For every Man taketh as many Wines as he listeth, and so they multiply infinitely: But they doe not use so to do in the kingdome of Congo, which lieth after the manner of the Christians.

This Kingdome also is very rich in Mines of Silver, and most excellent Copper; and for other kinds of Metall, there is more in this kingdome then in any other Countrey of the world whatsoever.
Fruitfull it is in all manner of food, and sundry sorts of Cattell, and specially for great heards of Kine.
True it is, that this people doe lorne Dogges flesh better then any other meate: and for that purpose they feed and fatten them, and then kill them and sell them in their open shambles. It is constantly affirmed, that a great Dog accustomed to the Bull, was sold by exchange for two and twentie Slaves, which after the rate of ten Duckets a poll, were worth in all two hundred and twentie Duckets: in so high a price and account doe they hold that Creature.

The Monyes that are used in Angola, are much different from the Lumache of Congo: for they of Angola doe use Beads of Glasse, such as are made in Venice, as bigge as a Nut, and some of lesser quantitie, and of diuers and sundry colours and fashions. These doe the people of Angola make, not onely to use them for money, but also for an ornament of their men and women, to weare about their necks and their armes, and are called in their tongue Anzolos: but when they are threaded upon a string like a paire of Beads, they call them Mizanga.

The King of Angola is by religion a Gentile, and worshippeth Idols, and so doe all the people in his Kingdome. It is true, that he hath greatly desired to become a Christian, after the example of the King of Congo. But because there hath not beene as yet any possibilitie to send Priests vnto him, that might illuminate and instruct him, he remaineth still in darknesse. The foresaid Signor Odoardo told mee, that in his time the King of Angola sent an Ambassadour to the King of Congo, requesting that hee would send him some religious persons to informe him in the Christian Religion: but the King of Congo had none there that he could spare, and therefore could send him none. At this day, both these Kings doe Trafficke together, and are in amitie one with another: the King of Angola hauing now cleared and discharged himselfe for the iniuries and slaughters that were committed upon those of Congo, and upon the Portugals at Gabazo.

The language of the people of Angola is all one with the language of the people of Congo, because (as we told you before) they are both but one Kingdome. Onely the difference betweene them is, as commonly it is betweene two Nations that border one upon another.

We haue signified vnto you heretofore, that the Bay of Cowes doth diuide the Kingdome of Angola in the middest; and hitherto we haue treated but of the one halfe thereof: Now wee will describe vnto you the second part of it, which lyeth from the said Bay of Cowes towards the South. From this Bay then, to the blacke Cape, called Cape Negro, by the Coast of the Ocean, they doe reckon two hundred and twenty miles, of such Countrey and soyle as the former is, and possessed by many Lords that are subiect to the King of Angola. From Cape Negro there runneth a line towards the East, through the middest of the Mountaines, that are called, Monti Freddi, that is to say, The cold Mountaines: which also in some certaine parts of them, that are higher then the rest towards the Equinoctiall, are tearmed by the Por-tugals, Monti Nensi, or Snowy Mountaines, and so endeth at the rootes of other Mountaines, that are called the Mountaines of Crystall. (Out of these Snowy Mountaines doe spring the waters of the Lake Dumbea Zocche.) This foresaid line, from the Mountaine of Crystall, draweth on-wards towards the North through the Mountaines of Silver, till you come to Ma-lemba, where we told you the Kingdome of Congo was diuided, and parted the Riuer of Coari in the midst. And this is the Countrey possessed by the King of Angola, whereof I haue no more to say, then is already set downe, neither of the qualities of his person, nor of his Court.

Beginning therefore at the Riuer Coanza, and drawing towards the Equinoctiall three hundred seuentie five miles, you shall finde the Riuer, that they call Las Barreas Vermellias, or the Redde Pits, which are indeed the ragged ruines of certaine Rockes worne by the Sea; and when they fall downe, doe shew themselues to bee of a red colour. From thence by a direct line vpon the North, that which the King possesseth, is foure hundred and fifty miles. And then the said line diuiding it selfe towards the South, passeth by the hills of Crystall (not those that we told you before did belong to Angola, but others that are called by the same name) and so by the Mountaines of Salnitro, trauersing the Riuer Verbela, at the rootes of the Mountaines of Silver, it endeth at the Lake Aquelunda, which is the space of five hundred miles. The fourth line runneth along the Riuer Coanza, which issueth out of the said Lake, and containeth three hundred and sixtie miles. So that the whole Realme now possessed by Don Aluaro, the King of Congo is in compasse, one thousand sixe hundred eightie five miles. But the breadth thereof beginneth at the mouth of the Riuer Zaire, where the point is, which in the Portugall speech is called, Padraon, and so cutting the Kingdome of Congo in the middle, and crossing over the Mountaines of the Sunne, and the Mountaines of Crystall, there it endeth, containing the space of sixe hundred miles, and within one hundred and fiftie miles, neere to the Riuer Nilus.
Very true it is indeed, that in ancient time the Predecessors of this Prince did raigne ouer many other Countries thereabouts, which in proceesse of time they haue lost: and although they bee now

now in the gouernment of others, yet doe the Kings of Congo, retaine still to this day the titles of those Regions, as for example, Don Aluaro, King of Congo, and of Abundos, and of Mata-ma, and of Quizama, and of Angola, and of Cacongo, and of the seuen Kingdomes of Congere, Amolaza, and of the Pangelungos, and Lord of the Riuer Zaire, and of the Anziquos, and Anziquana, and of Loango.

The title or style of the King of Congo.

This Kingdome is diuided into fixe Prouinces, that is to say, Bamba, Songo, Sundi, Pango, Batta, and Pemba. The Prouince of Bamba, (which is the greatest and the richest) is gouerned by Don Sebastian Mani-Bamba, cousin to the King Don Aluaro last deceased, and it is situated vpon the Sea-coast, from the Riuer Ambrize, vntill you come to the Riuer Coanza towards the South. This Don Sebastian hath vnder his Dominion many Princes and Lords, and the name, of the greatest of them are these, Don Antonio Mani-Bamba, who is Lieutenant and Brother to Don Sebastian, and Mani-Lemba another, and Mani-Danda, and Mani-Bengo, and Mani-Loanda, who is Gouernour of the Island of Loanda, and Mani-Corimba, and Mani-Coanza, and Mani-Cazzanzi. All these doe gouerne all the Sea-coast but within Land, for that part which belongeth to Angola, there are another people called the Abundos, who dwelling on the borders of Angola, are subiect to the said Mani-Bamba, and they are these, Angaza, Ching-bengo, Motollo, Chabonda, and many others of baser condition.

The first Prouince is Bamba, and the description of it. Sebastian chiefe Gouernour of Bamba, and those that rule vnder him.

Note, that this word Mani, signifieth a Prince or a Lord, and the rest of the word is the name of the Countrey and Lordship, where the Lord ruleth. As for example, Mani-Bamba signifieth the Lord of the Countrey of Bamba, and Mani-Corimba, the Lord of the Countrey of Corimba, which is a part of Bamba, and so likewise of the rest. This Prouince of Bamba consisteth with Angola on the South, and vpon the East of it towards the Lake Achelunda, lyeth the Countrey of Quizama, which is gouerned like a Common-wealth, and is diuided among a number of Lords, who indeed liuing at their owne libertie, doe neither obey the King of Congo, nor the King of Angola.

Mani, what it signifieth. The Confinnes of Bamba. The Countrey of Quizama. Bamba the principall Prouince of all Congo.

And to be short, these Lords of Quizama, after they had a long time quarrelled with Paulo Diaz, yet at last they became his subiects, because they would auoyd the yoke of the King of Angola, and by their good aid and assistance, doth Paulo Diaz greatly helpe himselfe against the said King of Angola.

Bamba yeeldeth for a need 400000. men of warre.

Now, the aforesaid Countrey of Bamba, (as we haue told you) is the principall Prouince of all the Realme of Congo, and indeed the very Key, and the Buckler and the Sword, and the defence thereof, and (as it were) the frontier which opposeth it selfe against all their Enemies. For it resisteth all the reuolts and rebellions of those quarters, and hath very valorous people in it, that are alwayes readie for to fight, so that they doe continually keepe their Aduersaries of Angola in great awe: and if it happen at any time that their King stand in need, they are alwayes at his command to annoy the other Countreies whensoever. When need requireth, he may haue in Campe foure hundred thousand men of Warre, and yet that number is but onely the fixt part of the whole Kingdome, though indeed it be the better part and the stronger. The principall Citie of this Prouince lyeth in the Plaine which is betweene the Riuer Loxe and Ambrize, and is called Panza (which is a common name for euery Towne.) There dwellerh the Lord of the Prouince, and it is distant from the Sea one hundred miles. In this Signorie also doe the hills begin, where the Mines of silver and other metals are found, and so stretch out towards the Kingdome of Angola. It is very rich, for vpon the Coast of the Sea there, they haue great store of the Lumache, which are vsed for moneyes ouer all the Kingdome of Congo: Besides, there is also a greater Trafficke and Market for slaues, that are brought out of Angola, then in any place else. For there are yearely bought by the Portugals aboue fise thousand head of Negroes, which afterwards they conueigh away with them, and so sell them into diuers parts of the World.

Panza the principall Citie of Bamba. Mines of silver and other metals. Incredible numbers of slaues yearely sold to the Portugals. One M. T. Turner which liued there, told me of 10000. slaues out of these parts of Africa yearely can yeeld, and that one Portugall in Brasil had 10000.

The people of this Prouince, are in Armes the most valiant of all the Kingdome of Congo. They goe armed like the Slanonians, with long and large Swords, that are brought them out of Portugall. There are among them very mightie men, that will cleaue a slaue in the middest at one blow, and cut off the head of a Bull at one stroke with one of those Swords. And (that which is more, and will peraduenture seeme incredible) one of these valiant men did beare vpon his arme a certaine Vessell of Wine, which was the fourth part of a Butte, and might weigh about three hundred twentie fise pound, vntill it was cleane emptied. Moreouer, they doe carrie Bow and Arrowes, whereat they are very quicke and nimble, and withall their long Targets made of the Dants skinne, whereof wee told you before, when wee made mention of the Anzichi.

Certaine creatures in Bamba Prouince. Elephants.

The creatures that are found in this Prouince, are first the Elephants, which do breed ouer all the Kingdome of Congo, but principally in the Countrey of Bamba, because it aboundeth in Woods, in pastures and in waters.

An Elephants foot foure span broad. The Elephant liueth 150. yeares.

Signor Odoardo told mee, that hee had oftentimes taken the measure of an Elephants foot in the dust, and one of them was in plaine Diameter foure spannes broad. But in these quarters they say that the Elephants doe liue one hundred and fiftie yeares, and that vntill the middle of their age they continue still in growing. And to confirme this truth he added, that hee had seene and weighed diuers of their Teeth (which are not of horne, as some thinke) and their waight amounted to two hundred pounds apiece, after the rate of twelue ounces to euery pound. In the Language of Congo, the Elephants Tooth is called Mene-Manzao, that is to say, The Tooth of an Elephant.

Certain haire in the Elephants tayle, very precious.
M. Iobson gaue me one of these tayles with such blacke strong haire.

Their Eares are greater then the greatest Targets that the Turkes vse to weare, in length fixe spannes, in shape like an Egge, and towards their shoulders they grow to be narrower and sharper. With their Eares, and with their Trunke, and with their Tayle, they beat away the Flies that trouble them.

They haue in their Tayle, certaine haire or bristles as bigge as Rushes or Broome-sprigs, of a shining blacke colour. The older they be, the fairer and stronger they bee, and of great price among them.

And for the cause lately rehearsed, many there are, which wayting for the Elephants, when they ascend some steepe and narrow way, doe come behind them, and with very sharpe Kniues cut off their Tayles: the poore beast being not able in those straites to turne backe to reuenge it selfe, nor with his Trunke to reach his Enemy. And this they doe, onely to haue those haire, which they sell for two or three slaues a piece. Other light and couragious persons there are, that trusting much to their swiftnesse in running, doe lye in a waite, and set vpon the poore beasts behind, whiles they are in feeding, and at one blow attempt to cut off their Tayles, and to endeavour to saue themselves by running away in a round. For the greatnesse of the beast is such, as out-right it is very swift, because it maketh very large strides, though indeed but slow, and in the plaine is farre quicker then any lustie Horse: but in turning round it loseth much time, and so the Huntsman escapeth in safetie.

The manner of the Elephants feeding their want of knees is a fable

In their feeding, they vse to shake and root vp the great Trees with the force of their shoulders, and strength of their whole backes: But the smaller Trees they take betweene both their Teeth, and so bow them and plucke them downe, that they may feede vpon the leaues of them: insomuch, as sometimes they breake one of their Teeth with so doing. And this is the cause why you shall find diuers of them in the fields that haue lost their Teeth. They chawe their meate with their short Teeth, which are not seene as their two long Tuskes are: and they carrie it to their mouth by their long Snout, or Trunke, which is to them in stead of an arme and a hand. The tip of their Trunke is fashioned and diuided into little slits, and (as it were) fingers, wherewith they will take vp very small things, as Nuts, and Strawes, and Berries, and so reach them to their mouth, as I, Philippo Pigafetta haue seene my selfe at Lisbon.

The shee-Elephant.

The Females of these Creatures, doe beare their brood in their wombe for the space of two yeares and no more: And for as much as the yong Elephant cannot so quickly be brought vp, (for it groweth very slowly) the Milke is kept from it, and so it waxeth apt to feed of it selfe. And therefore Mother Nature hath provided that the Elephants are not great with young, but from seuen yeares to seuen yeares.

The Elephants
skinne.

Their skinne is hard beyond all credit. For being foure fingers thicke, it cannot be pierced, no not with the shot of an Harquebuss.

The manner
of taking the Elephants.

The people of that Countrey haue not the skill to tame these beasts. Whereby they might reape great commoditie and profit, for carrying their stuffe from place to place for diuers other good vses. But yet they take them; by digging certaine deepe Trenches in the places, where they vse to pasture, which Trenches are very narrow at the bottome, and broad aboue, to the end the beast may not helpe himselfe, and leape out when hee is fallen into them. These Trenches they couer with Soddes of Earth, and Grasse, and leaues, because the beast should not see their traine, but passing ouer them remayne there entrenched. Whereupon the Gentleman beforenamed told me, that he had seene with his owne eyes a very strange and admirable thing in Coanza; namely, that a young Elephant following his Damme, fell downe by chance into one of these Pits, and after that she could not with all her skill and strength draw him out of it, she buried him therein, and couered him with Earth, with branches and with boughes, insomuch as she filled the pit vp to the top, to the end that the Hunters should not enioy her Calfe, choosing rather to kill it her selfe, then to leaue it to the mercie of the cruell Huntsmen. This louing and kind Mother, not fearing the people (that stood round about her, and shouted against her, and threatned her with sundry weapons, and vttered strange clamours and noyses to affray her, and cast many fires at her) but assuring her selfe in her owne strong and valiant nature, did labour and toyle from morning till night, that she might draw her Calfe out of the pit: and when shee found that it was not possible for her to archieue what shee desired, then she couered it in manner as we haue told you.

A strange effect of nature.

The nature of the Elephant.

The Elephant is a very gentle beast, and trusteth greatly in his naturall strength. Hee feareth nothing, nor hurteth any man that doth not trouble him: and haunteth neere to mens houses, without doing any harme at all. If hee espie men that goe in his walke, hee will not meddle with them, vnlesse they seeke to molest him: sauing that sometimes peraduenture he will gently with his Snout, hoise them vpwards into the Ayre, whom hee meeteth withall in his way, and and that is all the hurt he will doe vnto them. These Elephants doe greatly delight in waters. For Signor Odoardo affirmed, that in the way betweene Cazanza and Loanda, in a little grassie Valley he had seene about one hundred of them in a company, old and young that followed their Dammes: they vse to goe together in Herds, as Kine, and Camels, and other such like gentle Creatures doe, and not alone like Lions and other such wild beasts.

There are brought into the Countries of the Anzichi, some of the Hornes that grow vpon the nose of the Rhinoceros, that are both of great value and estimation, and also vsed for the helpe of diuers Diseases.

Rhinoceros, of Abadas.
Lions.

There are in the Region of the Anzichi, Lions also, like the Lions that breed in other parts of the World, but they doe not vse to haunt the Region of Bamba: But in Bamba there are verie great store of Tygres, which are of the very same shape that those in Florence are, which Signor Odoardo saw there, and testified to be very Tygres indeed. They will not set vpon any men that are white, but onely such as are blacke: And it hath beene found, that when the white and the blacke haue slept together in the night-time, they haue slaine the black to deuoure them, and spared the white.

Tygres.

When they are hungry, they will be so bold as to fetch Cattle, euen out of the yards that are about the houses without any feare at all, when they cannot find any victuals abroad in the fields. They are very dangerous and hurtfull to all kinds of Creatures whatsoever they bee, and in that Language they are called, Engoi.

They are as fierce and cruell beasts as the Lion, and roare as the Lion doth. They are also altogether like the Lion, sauing onely in the colour of their haire; for the Tygre is spotted, but the Lion all of one colour. They vse to take and kill these Tygres after diuers manners. For besides that, which hath beene before spoken, they poyson them with Sublimate, or some other venome, mingled with flesh which is laid for them. Or else they tye young Goates at certaine Lines made like snares, and fastned about the stocke of a Tree, so that when the beast commeth to her prey, the Engine openeth it selfe, and the more the beast striueth withall, the more it is intangled, and so at last is hanged therein.

The manner
of taking the tame Tygres.

Signor Odoardo told me, that he had gotten one of them, that was fifteene dayes old, and hee brought it vp with Goats Milke: which being afterwards growne bigger would follow him like a Dogge: and although it were tame, yet it would not willingly suffer any other to touch it, besides his Master. He would also roare mightily, and when hee was angry, his eyes would looke very terribly and fearefully. But in proceffe of time this Tygre killed a Dogge, belonging to the house, and also a Zebra, that were very deare to their Master, and thereupon, perceiuing how perillous a beast it was, hee slue it with an Harquebuss-shot. Hee reported, moreouer, that the Mostacchios of the Tygre are held in that Region to be mortall Poyson: for beeing giuen in meates, it procureth a man to die, as it were in a madnesse: And therefore the King doth punish all those that bring him a Tygres skin without the Mostacchios.

A tame Tygre.

There breedeth likewise in this Countey another Creature, which they call a Zebra, commonly found also in certaine Prouinces of Barbary and Africa, which although it be altogether made like a great Mule, yet is not a Mule indeed, for it beareth young ones. It hath a most singular skin, and peculiar from all other Creatures. For from the ridge of the chin downe towards the belly, it is straked with rowes of three colours, blacke, white, and browne Bay, about the breadth of three fingers a piece, and so meet againe together in a Circle, euery row, with his owne colour. So that the necke, and the head, and the Maine (which is not great) and the eares, and all the legs are so interchanged with these colours, and in such manner and order, as with out all faile, if the first strake beginne with white, then followeth the second with blacke, and in the third place the Bay: and so another course beginning in white, endeth still in Bay. And this rule is generally and infallibly obserued ouer all the bodie. The Tayle is like the Tayle of a Mule, of a Morell colour, but yet it is well coloured, and hath a glistering glosse. The feet like the feet of a Mule, and so are the hooves. But touching the rest of her carriage and qualities, she is very lustie and pleasant as a Horse: and specially in going, and in running, shee is so light and so swift, that it is admirable. Insomuch as in Portugall and in Castile also, it is commonly vsed (as it were for a Prouerbe) as swift as a Zebra, when they will signifie an exceeding quiknesse. These Creatures are all wild, they breed euery yeare, and are there in such abundance that they are innumerable. If they were made tame, they would serue to runne and to draw for the warres, and for many other good vses, as well as the best Horses that are.

The Zebra.

Necessitie hath taught them to vse men in steed of labouring Cattell. For either they lay themselves all along in certaine Litters (as it were) or else set themselves vpright, with shadowes ouer them to keepe them from the Sunne, and so they cause themselves to bee carryed too and fro, by their slaues, or by other men that for wages are alwayes readie at Poste-houses to that purpose. They that meane to iourney with speed, doe take with them many slaues, and when the first number are weary, then doe the second number vndertake the burden, and so successuely change one after another, as the Tartarians and Persians vse to doe with their Horses: and these men being thus accustomed to these labours, (and so often changing) will goe as fast as any Po-stilion gallop.

The Dante.

There are also to be found in this Countrie, certaine other foure-footed beasts, somewhat lesse then Oxen, of colour Red, with hornes like Goats hornes, which are very smooth and glistering, and inclining to blacke, whereof they make diuers pretie knackes, as they doe likewise of the Buffes hornes. They haue their heads and their haire, like the heads & haire of Oxen: and their skins are of great estimation; and therefore they are carried into Portugall, and from thence into Germanie to be dressed, and then they are called Dantes. The King of Congo is very desirous to haue some men that had skill to cleanse them, and dresse them, and to make them fit for vse, to end he might employ them for Armour of defence. And yet those Nations doe already vse them for Shields and Targets; and doe find that they will resist the blow of a weapon, and especially the shot of an Arrow. They kill them with Harquebusses, and with Arrowes. But if they doe espie the Huntsman, they will set vpon him, and being by nature very fierce, and courageous, they will so knocke him and thumpe him with their feet, and their Muzzle (because they cannot doe him any harme with their hornes) that they will leaue him either halfe dead, or starke dead. There is also an infinite number of wild Buffes, that goe wandering about the Desarts, in the Kingdome of the Anzichi; and wild Asses likewise, which the Greekes call Onagri.

Wild Buffes.
Wild Asses.

Empalanga.

There are besides these, other beasts, called Empalanga, which are in bignesse and shape like Oxen, sauing that they hold their necke and head aloft, and haue their hornes broad and crooked, three hand-breadths long, diuided into knots, and sharpe at the ends, whereof they might make very faire Cornets to sound withall: and although they liue in the Forrests, yet are they not noysome nor harmefull. The skins of their neckes are vsed for shoo-soles, and their flesh for meate. They might likewise be brought to draw the Plough, and doe good seruice in any other labour, and tilling of the ground. Moreouer, they feed great herds of Kine, and tame Oxen, tame Hogs, and wild Boares, flockes of Sheepe and Goats. Signor Odoardo affirmed, that the Goats and the Sheepe doe bring forth two, and three, and foure Lambs or Kids at a time, and two, when they haue fewest, and neuer one alone at any time.

Other fruitfull Cattell.

Wolues.

There are Wolues also which loue the Oyle of Palmes, beyond all measure. They will smell this Oyle as farre off, and steale it in the night time out of their houses of straw, and sometimes from those that carrie it by the way, whiles the poore soules doe rest themselves and sleepe. The Oyle (as shall be told you) is made of the Palme-tree; it is thicke and hard, like Butter. And it is a maruell to see, how these Wolues doe take a Bottle that is full of this liquor betweene their teeth, and so cast it on their shoulders, and runne away withall, as our Wolues here doe with a Sheepe. There are very great store of Foxes, that steale Hennes as our Foxes doe. And farther in this Countrie of Bamba, there is an innumerable quantitie of hunting game, as Stags, fallow Deere, Roe-buckes, and Gazels, whereof he affirmed that he had seene exceeding great herds, as also of Conies and Hares, because there were no Hunters to kill them.

Hunting game.In Pemba, Ciuet-cats.

In the Region of Pemba there are many wild Ciuet-cats, which the Portugals call Algazia, and some of these, the people of that Countrie had made tame, that they might enioy their Ciuet, in the smell whereof they doe greatly delight. But this was before the Portugals did trafficke with those Countries. And in Manibatta there are caught many Sables, with very white haire, and exceeding fine, called Incire: but no man may weare these skinnes vnlesse the Prince permit him so to doe; for, it is held in great estimation, and euery Sable is worth a Slaue. Towards the Anzichi they catch Marterns also, wherewith they apparell themselves, as in due place we will note vnto you. Apes, Monkies, and such other kind of beasts, small and great of all sorts there are many in the Region of Sogno, that lieth vpon the Riuer Zaire.

Cucurynba.

Of Adders and Snakes you shall find some that are five and twentie spanne long, and five span broad: and the bellie and the mouth so large, that they can swallow and receiue into their bellie a whole Stag, or any other creature of that bignesse. And it is called, that is to say, A great Water-adder. It will goe forth of the water vp to the Land to prey for his victuals, and then returne into the Riuer againe, and so it lieth in both the Elements. It will get it selfe vp vpon the boughs and branches of Trees, and there watch the Cattell that feed thereabouts, which when they are come neere vnto it, presently it will fall vpon them, and wind it selfe in many twines about them, and clap his taile on their hinder parts, and so it straieth them, and biteth so many holes in them, that at last it killeth them. And then it draweth them into some Wood, or other solitarie place, where it deuoureth them at pleasure, skinnes, hornes, hooves and all. Now it falleth out, that when it is thus full, and (as it were) great with so monstrous a meale, it becommeth almost drunke, and very sleepe, so that any child may kill it. And in this sort will it remaine full and satisfied for the space of five or sixe dayes together, and then returne againe to prey. These Adders doe change their skinnes in their ordinarie seasons; yea, and sometimes after they haue eaten so monstrously, and the said Sloughs, when they are found, are gathered vp, and reserued for a shew of so vnmeasurable a Creature. These Adders are also greatly esteemed by the Pagan Negroes, for they doe vse to roast them, and eate them for meate, and make more account of them then they doe of Hennes, or any such delicate flesh. They find great store of them, when they haue occasion to burne their thicke Woods: for there they shall haue haue them lying on the ground, roasted with the fire. Besides these there are Vipers also, well knowne vnto that People. Which Vipers are so venemous, that such as are bitten by them, doe die within the space of foure and twentie houres. But the Negroes are acquainted with certaine herbs that will heale their wounds.

There are also certaine other Creatures, which being as big as Rams, haue wings like Dragons, with long tailles, and long chaps, and diuers rewes of teeth, and feed vpon raw flesh. Their colour is blue and greene, their skinne bepainted like scales; and two feet they haue, but no more. The Pagan Negroes, doe vse to worship them as Gods, and at this day you may see diuers of them, that are kept for a wonder. And because they are very rare, the chiefe Lords there doe curiously preserue them, and suffer the people to worship them, which tendeth greatly to their profit, by reason of the gifts and oblations which the people offer vnto them. There are there also to be found Chamelions.

Other Serpents there are that are venemous, that carrie vpon the tippe of their tayle, a certaine little roundell like a Bell, which ringeth as they goe, so as it may be heard.

Estridges are found in those Parts of Sundi, and of Batta, that are towards the Muzambi. The young Estridges doe spring out of their egges; being warmed and disclosed by the eye and heate of the Sunne. Their feathers are vsed in stead of Ensignes and Banners in Warre, mingled with some plumes of the Peacocke, and are fashioned in the likenesse of a shadow against the Sunne. And forasmuch as I am fallen into the speech of Peacocks, I must tell you by the way, that in the Parts of Angola, there are Peacocks brought vp priuately in a certaine Wood that is compassed about with walls: and the King will not suffer any other bodie to keep those Birds but onely himselfe, because they are for the Royall Ensignes, as I told you before.

There are also Indie-cocks, and Hens, and Geese, and Duckes of all sorts both wild and tame: Partridges, so many as children take them with gins. Other Birds they haue likewise, as Pheasants, which they call Gallignoles, Pigeons, Turtles, and of these small Birds, called Becca-fichi, an infinite number. Birds of prey, as Eagles Royall, Faulcons, Gerfaulcons, and Sparrow-hawks, and others, great store, which notwithstanding the people neuer vse to hawke withall. Birds of the Sea, as Pelicanes (for so the Portugals doe call them) white and great, which swimme vnder the water, and haue their throats so wide, that they will swallow a whole fish at once.

This Bird hath so good a stomacke, and naturally so hot, that it easily digesteth the Fish that it swalloweth whole, and the skinne of it is so hot, that the people of that Countrie doe vse to weare them, and to warme their cold stomackes withall, and therefore make great reckoning of them. There are many white Herons, and grey Bittours, that feed in the Washes there, and are called, Royall Birds. Other Fowles there are of the likenesse of a Crane, with a red bill and red feet, as bigge as Storkes, and their feathers for the most part red and white, and some darke grey. Goodly Birds they are to looke to, and the people of the Countrie doe call them Flemmings, because they doe much resemble them, and are good meat to eate.

They haue Parrots of grey colour, great and very talkatiue: and others of greene colour, but they are little ones, and not so talkatiue. They haue likewise certaine small little Birds, which they call Birds of Musicke, and yet greater then the Canarie Birds, of feather and bill red: some greene, with their feet and bill onely blacke: some all white: some grey or dunne: some all blacke, and this kind is more sweet in their notes then all the rest afore-named; for you would thinke that they talked in their singing. Others there are of diuers colours, but they doe all sing in sundrie sorts, so that the chiefe Lords of those Countries, from ancient times to this day, haue continually kept them in Cages, and greatly esteemed them for their song.

§. II. III.

Of the fine other Prouinces of Congo, to wit, Sogno, Sundi, Pango, Batta, and Pemba.

His Countrie is bounded with the Riuer Ambrize, towards the North in seuen degrees and an halfe, and so trauersing the Riuer Lelunda, and the Riuer Zaire, it endeth at the Rockes, called Berreuras Vermellias, that is to say, the Red pits, which are in the Borders of the Kingdome of Loango. In the midst of this Prouince there is a certaine Territorie, called by the same name Sogno, where the Gouvernour of the Countrie dwelleth. The chiefe Lords that rule this Prouince, are called Mani-Sogno, that is, Princes of Sogno, and are commonly of the bloud Royall. The Prince that gouerneth there at this day, is called Don Diego Mani-Sogno. He hath vnder his dominion many other petie Lords, and other Prouinces, that in old time were free, and liued by themselves, as the People of Mombalus, situate somewhat neere to the Citie of Congo, which are now subiect to this government. And on the other side of the Riuer Zaire towards the North, is the Prouince of Palmar, that is to say, of Palmes, because there is great store of Palme-trees growing therein. Other Lords there are, that border vpon the King of Loango, who was sometime subiect to the King of Congo; but in proceffe of time he became a free Lord, and now professeth himselfe to bee in amitie with the King of Congo, but not to be his vassall. The people that are vnder these Lords in those borders, are called the Bramas: and they reach within the Land, vnder the Equinoctiall line towards the East, to the bounds of Anzicana, all along the Mountaines which diuide them from the Anzichi vpon the North. They are called by the people of Loango, Congreamolal, because they were subiect to Congo.

The commodities of Segno.

In this Countrey of Loango there are many Elephants, and great store of Iuory, which they doe willingly exchange for a little Iron, so that for the naile of a ship (be it neuer so small) they will giue a whole Elephants tooth. The reason thereof, is either because there groweth no Iron in that place, or else they haue not the skill to get it out of the Mines where it groweth: But all the Iron they can get, they imploy for the heading of their Arrowes, and their other weapons, as we told you when we spake of the Bramas.

The manner of the life of the Inhabitants.

They make great store of Cloth of the Palme trees, whereof we made mention before: but these are lesser, and yet very fine. They haue great abundance of Kine, and of other cattell, before named. They are in Religion Pagans: their apparell after the fashion of the people of Congo: They maintaine warre with their bordering neighbours, which are the Anzichi, and the Inhabitants of Anzicana; and when they enterprise warre against the Anzichi, then they craue ayde of the people of Congo, and so they remaine halfe in freedome, and halfe in danger of others. They worship what they list, and hold the Sunne for the greatest God, as though it were a man, and the Moone next, as though it were a woman. Otherwise euery man chooseth to himselfe his owne Idoll, and worshippeth it after his owne pleasure. These people would easily embrace the Christian Religion: For many of them that dwell vpon the borders of Congo, haue beene conuerted to Christendome: and the rest, for want of Priests, and of such as should instruct them in the true Religion, do remaine still in their blindnesse.

Sunne worshipped.

The third Prouince Sundi, & the description thereof.

Sundi, is the neereft of all to the Citie of Congo, called, Citta di San-Saluatore, the Citie of Saint Sanious, and beginneth about fortie miles distant from it, and quite out of the Territorie thereof, and reacheth to the Riuer Zaire, and so ouer the same to the other side, where the Caduta or Fall is, which we mentioned before: and then holdeth on vp-wards on both sides towards the North, bordering vpon Anzicana, and the Anzichi. Towards the South it goeth along the said Riuer Zaire, vntill you come to the meeting of it with the Riuer Bancare, and all along the bankes thereof, euen to the rootes of the Mountaine of Cryfall. In the bounds of the Prouince of Pango, it hath her principall Territorie, where the Gouvernor lyeth, who hath his name from the Prouince of Sundi, and is seated about a daies iourney neere to the Fall of the Riuer, towards the South.

The chiefe Towne of Sundi.This Prouince of Sundi, is alwaies gouerned by the heire apparent of the King of Congo.

This Prouince is the chiefeft of all the rest, and (as it were) the Patrimony of all the Kingdome of Congo: and therefore it is alwaies gouerned by the Kings eldest Son, and by those Princes that are to succeed him. As it fell out in the time of their first Christian King, that was called Don Iohn: whose eldest sonne, that was Gouverneur heere, succeeded him, and was called Don Alfonso. And euer sithence, the Kings of Congo haue successiuelly continued this custome, to conigne this gouernment to those Princes which are to succeed in the Kingdome: As did the King that now is called Don Aluaro, who was in this gouernment before Don Aluaro the King his father died, and was called Mani-Sundi.

In all the kingdome of Congo, no man hath any thing of his owne whereof he may dispose, or leaue to his heires, but all is the Kings.

And heere by the way you must note, that in all the Kingdome of Congo, there is not any person that possesseth any proper goods of his owne, whereof he may dispose, and leaue to his heires: but all is the Kings, and he distributeth all Offices, all Goods, and all Lands, to whomsoever it pleaseth him; yea, and to this Law, euen the Kings owne sonnes are subiect. So that if any man doe not pay his tribute yearly (as he ought) the King taketh away his Gouernment from him, and giueth it to another. As it happened to the King that now liueth, who at the time that Signor Odoardo was at the Court, being of his owne nature very liberall, and bountifull beyond measure, and one that bestowed much vpon his seruants, could not discharge those impositions that the King had laid on him. Whereupon he was by the King depriued of his reuenues, of his gouernment, and of his royall fauour; that is to say, in that language, he was Tombocado, as we will declare more at full in the second part of this Discourse.

The manner of the life of Sundi Inhabitants.

Many Lords there are that are subiect to the Gouverneur of Sundi. The people doe Trafficke with their neighbour Countries, selling and bartring diuers things. As for example, Salt, and Cloathes of sundry colours, brought from the Indies, and from Portugall, and Lumachette, to serue for their Coyne. And for these commodities they doe exchange cloath of Palme Trees, and Iuory, and the skinned of Sables and Marternes, and certaine girdles wrought of the leaues of Palme trees, which are greatly esteemed in those parts.

There groweth in these Countries great store of Cryfall, and diuers kinds of Metall: but Iron they loue above all the rest, saying, That the other Metals are to no vse: for with Iron they can make Knives, and Weapons, and Hatchets, and such like Instruments, that are necessary and profitable for the vse of mans nature.

The Prouince of Pango in ancient time was a free Kingdome, that was gouerned of itselfe, and and bordereth on the North vpon Sundi, on the South vpon Batta, on the West vpon the Countrey of Congo, and on the East vpon the Mountaines of the Sun. The principall Territorie, where the Gouernors dwelling is, hath the same name that the Prouince hath, (viz:) Pango. It standeth vpon the Westerne side of the Riuer Barbela, and in old time was called, Pangue-lingos: and intime afterwards, the word was corrupted and changed into Pango. Through the midst of this Prouince runneth the Riuer Barbela, which fetcheth his Originall from the great Lake, (whence the Riuer Nilus also taketh his beginning) and from another lesser Lake, called Ache-lunda, and so dischargeth it selfe into Zaire. And although this be the least Countrey of all the rest, yet doth it yeeld no lesse tribute then the rest.

The fourth Prouince Pango, and the description thereof. Pango the chiefe town of this Prouince Barbela.

- 10 This Prouince was conquered after the Countrey of Sundi, and made subiect to the Princes of Congo: and is now all one with it, both in speech and manners; neither is there any difference at all betweene them. The present Gouernor thereof is called, Don Francesco Mani-Pango, and hath remained in the government of this Region for the space of fiftie yeares, and no man euer complained of him.

Don Francesco, chiefe Gouernor of Pango.

The bounds of Batta are towards the North, the Countrey of Pango: on the East it taketh quite ouer the Riuer Barbela, and reacheth to the Mountaines of the Sunne, and to the foote of the Mountaines of Sal-Nitre. And on the South from the said Mountaines, by a line passing through the meeting of the Riuers Barbela and Cacinga, to the Mountaine Brusciato, that is to say, Scorched.

The fift Prouince Batta, & the description thereof.

- 20 Within these bounds is Batta contained, and the principall Citie where the Prince dwelleth, is likewise called Batta. In ancient time it was called Aghirimba, but afterwards the word was corrupted, and it is now called Batta. It was in old time a very strong and a great Kingdome, and voluntarily of it selfe, without any warre it ioyned it selfe with the Kingdome of Congo, peraduenture because there were some dissention among their Lords: and therefore it hath more preheminance then the rest of the Prouinces of the Kingdome of Congo, in priuiledges and liberties. For the Government of Batta is alwaies assigned to one, that is of the blood of the Kings of that Countrey, at their choise and pleasure, having no more respect to one then to another, so that he be of the stocke and blood Royall, neither to the eldest sonne, nor to the second. Neither yet goeth this Government by inheritance, but the King of Congo (as is told you before) doth dispose it at his owne pleasure to whom he thinketh best, to the end they should not vsurpe it by way of succession, or by rebellion. He dwelleth neerer the King then any other Gouernour or Lord of the Kingdome of Congo, and is the second person therein, neither may any man gaine-say his arguments and reasons, as they may any of the rest, for it is so decreed among them. Now if the line of the King of Congo should chance to faile, so that there were none of that blood to succeed, the succession shall fall vpon the Gouernour of Batta. He that now gouerneth there, is called, Don Pedro Mani-Batta.

Batta, the chiefe towne of all Batta.

1583. State ceremony.

- 40 Sometimes he eateth at the Kings owne Table, but yet in a baser seat then the Kings seat is, and that also not sitting, but standing; which is not granted to any other Lord of Congo, no nor to the sonnes of the King himselfe. His Court and his traine, is little lesse then the Court and traine of the King of Congo. For he hath Trumpets and Drums, and other instruments going before him, as becommeth a Prince.

He doth hold continuall warres with the Pagans that border vpon him, and he is able to gather together about seuentie or eightie thousand fighting men. And because he doth still maintaine warre with the people that are next him, he hath libertie granted vnto him to entertaine Harquebusiers, that shall be of his owne naturall subiects. For the King of Congo will not suffer any other Gouernor of any other Prouinces, nor any of their children, to haue any Harquebusiers that are borne within their Countrey, but onely the Portugals.

The King of Congo will not suffer any naturall borne subiect in Congo, to haue an Harquebusse.

- 50 Towards the East of Batta, beyond the Mountaines of the Sunne, and of Sal-Nitre, vpon the bankes of the East and West of the Riuer Nilus, and in the borders of the Empire of Mohenbe-Muge there liueth a Nation, which by the people of Congo, are called Giaquas, but in their owne language they are called Agag: Very fierce they are and warlike, much giuen to fight and pillage, and make continuall inroades into the Countreies neere adioyning; and sometimes among the rest into the Prouince of Batta. So that this Countrey must needs be in continuall Armes, and stand vpon good guard, and maintaine Harquebusiers to defend themselves from them.

The Giaquas. Of these, see Andrew Battell, which liued and warred with them.

The conditions of the people of Batta.

- 60 The Prince of Batta hath many Lords vnder him: and the naturall people of this Prouince are called Monsobos, and their language is well vnderstood by the Inhabitants of Congo. They are farre more rude and rusticall then the Moci-Congi, and the Slaues that are brought from thence, doe prooue more obstinate and stubborne, then those that come from other Countreies.

The sixt Prouince Pemba, and the situation thereof.

Don Antonio chiefe Gouernor of Pemba.

- The Prouince of Pemba is seated in the heart and middle of the Kingdome of Congo, compassed and comprised within the bounds before described, whose Gouernor is called Don Antonio Mani-Pemba, second sonne to King Don Aluaro, that dead is, and brother to the King that reigneth at this present. And for as much as his father did loue him dearly, he assigned vnto him him this Gouvernement, because he knew not what better thing to giue him, sauing the Realme it selfe : which in deed he would willingly haue bestowed on him, for that hee was more like vnto him in quality and nature then his eldest sonne was. But it would not be by reason of the law of the Kingdome, which would not haue yeelded thereunto.

This Countrey is the very Centre, and middest of all the State of Congo, and the originall of all the ancient Kings, and the Territorie where they were borne, and the chiefe and principall seat of all the other Prouinces and Principalities. And therefore the chiefe and royall Citie of all that Empire, is assigned to this Prouince, whereof we will hereafter deliuer you a full information. The Gouvernor of Pemba dwelleth in a Territory of the same name, situate at the foote of the scorched Mountaine, along the River Loze, which riseth out of the Lake, and runneth through the Region of Bamba into the Sea. The Courtiers and Lords, and Seruitors belonging to the King of Congo, haue their goods and possessions, and reuenues in this Prouince; because it is neere to the Court, and very conuenient for the conueighing of their victuals, and their other stufte vnto the Court. Some of these Lords, in that part specially, that bordereth vpon the aforesaid Prouince of Bamba, haue much adoe to keepe fight and defend themselves from the people of Quizama, because they are neere vnto them. For this people (as we told you) did rebell against the King of Congo, and reuolted from him, and doe professe that they will be at libertie, and gouerned of themselves.

Of the situation of the Royall Citie of the Kingdome of Congo: Of their first conuersion and Warre, thence arising betwixt the Kings two Sonnes.

The Territory of the chiefe Citie in all Congo, containeth in compasse
miles about.

Although the chiefe and Royall Citie of the Kingdome of Congo be after a sort comprehended within the Prouince of Pemba, yet notwithstanding for as much as the gouernment thereof, and the Territorie thereunto belonging, which may in compasse amount to the space of twentie miles about, doth depend wholly of the King of Congo himselfe, we will place it in a seuerall Regiment, and intreat of it by it selfe.

This

This Citie is called San Saluatore, or Saint Sauoir, and in times past in that Countrie Language it was called Banza, which generally signifieth The Court, where the King or the Gouverneur doeth ordinarily sojourne. It is seated about one hundred and fiftie miles from the Sea, vpon a great and a high Mountaine, being almost all of a Rocke, but yet hauing a veyne of Iron in it, whereof they haue great vse in their housing. This Mountaine hath in the toppe of it a great Plaine, very well manured and furnished with Houses and Villages, contayning in circuit about ten miles, where there doeth dwell and liue; the number of one hundred thousand persons.

The chiefe Citie, called San Saluatore.
The situation of the Citie.
The Mountain whereupon it standeth.

The soyle is fruitfull, and the aire fresh, wholsome, and pure: there are great store of Springs, of indifferent good water to drinke, and at certaine times doe not harme any man: and of all sorts of Cattell great abundance. The top of the Mountaine is seuered and distinguished from all the rest of the Hill which is about it, and therefore the Portugals doe call it, The Otheiro, that is to say, A view, or a Watch-tower, or a Singular height, from whence you may take a sight of all the Champaine round about: onely towards the East, and towards the Riuer, it is very steepe and rockie.

The Otheiro.

For two causes did the Princes of this Kingdom place this habitation in the foresaid height of this Mountaine. First, because it lieth in the very middest, and (as it were) in the Centre of all the Realme, from whence hee may presently send aide to any part of his Kingdome, that may stand in need of reliefe: and secondly, because it is situated in a Territorie that is by Nature mounted aloft, hauing a very good aire, and of great safetie; for it cannot be forced. By the chiefe common high-way that goeth vnto the Citie, and looketh towards the Sea, being distant from thence one hundred and fiftie miles (as hath bene told you) which way is very large and competent, though it goe somewhat about in compasse, you shall ascend fise miles from the bottome to the top of the Mountaine. At the foot thereof on the East side there runneth a Riuer, whereunto the women doe descend by the space of a miles walke to wash their clothes. In diuers other parts thereof there are sundrie valleys planted and manured: neither doe they suffer any part of the Countrie thereabouts to be left vntilled or vnused, because it is the Countrie where the Court remaineth.

The reason why they build in this place.

1. In the middest of the Realme.
2. In a high place.

Five miles from the bottome of the Hill to the top. A Riuer at the Hill foot.

The particular situation of the Citie.
A seuerall place for the Portugals.
The Kings Palace.
The principall Church and Market place.

The Citie is seated in a corner or angle of the hill towards the South-east, which Don Alfonso the first Christian King did compasse about with walls, and gaue vnto the Portugals a seuerall place for themselves, shut vp likewise within walls. Then did he also inclose his owne Palace and the Kings Houses with another wall, and in the middest betweene these two enclosures left a great space of ground, where the principall Church was built, with a faire Market place before it. The doores and gates as well of the Lodgings of the Lords, as of the Portugals Inhabitations, doe open on the side of the said Church. For, in the vppermost end of the Market place doe diuers great Lords of the Court dwell, and behind the Church doeth the Market place runne into a narrow street, where there is also a gate, and beyond that gate many houses towards the East. Without these walls, (which doe enclose the Kings houses, and the Citie of the Portugals) there are a number of other buildings, erected by diuers Lords, every man making his seuerall choise of the place which he thinketh most fit and conuenient for his dwelling neere vnto the Court. So that the greatnesse of this Citie cannot well be determined or limited. Beyond these walls also, that thus doe compasse this Citie; there is a great champaine Plaine, full of Villages, and sundrie Palaces, where every Lord possesseth (as it were) a whole Towne within himselfe. The circuit of the Portugals Citie containeth about a mile; and the Kings houses as much. The walls are very thicke: the gates are not shut in the night time, neither is there any watch or ward kept therein.

Good store of waters

And although that Plaine doeth lie very high and aloft, yet is there great abundance of waters in it, so that there is no want thereof. But the Court and the Portugals Citie doe all drinke of a certaine Fountaine that springeth continually, towards the North, and lieth downe the hill, as farre as a Gunne will shoot: and from hence they doe fetch all their water, and bring it to the Citie in vessels of Wood, of Earth, and Leather, vpon the backs of their Slaves.

The Plaine very fruitfull.
Seuerall sorts of Graine.
Luco, Millet.

All this Plaine is very fruitfull, and well manured. It hath Meadowes full of Grasse, and Trees that are alwaies greene. It beareth sundrie sorts of Graine, but the principall and best of all is called Luco, which is very like to Mustard-seed, but that it is somewhat bigger. When it is grinded with Hand-querns (for so they vse to do) it yeeldeth a very white Meale, whereof they make Bread, that is both white, and also of a very good saueur, and wholsome withall: neither doth it giue place to our Wheat in any sort, sauing that they doe not celebrate the Sacrament with it. Of these Graines there now is great store, ouer all the Kingdome of Congo: but it is not long since that this Seed was brought thither from that part of the Riuer Nilus, where it falleth into the second Lake. There is also a white kind of Millet, called the Mazza of Congo, that is to say, The Corne of Congo: and another Graine which they call Maiz, but they make no account of it, for they giue it to their Hogs: neither doe they greatly esteeme of Rice. The foresaid Maiz they commonly terme by the name of Mazza-Manputo, that is to say, the Portugals Corne; for they call a Portugall Manputo.

There are moreouer diuers and sundrie sorts of Trees, that beare very great store of Fruits, insomuch as the greatest part of the people doe feed vpon the Fruits of the Countrey, as Citrons, Lymons, and specially Oranges, very full of liquor, which are neither sweet nor sowre, and are ordinarily eaten without any annoyance or harme at all. And to shew the fruitfulness of this Countrey, the said Signor Odoardo reported, that he had seene from a kernell of the fruit of a Pome-Citrone, which was left within the rind thereof, there sprung vp within the space of foure dayes a pretie tall sprig. Other Fruits there are, which they call Banana, and wee verily thinke to be the Muses of Egypt and Soria, sauing that in those Countreies they grow to be as bigge as Trees; but here they cut them yeerely, to the end they may beare the better. The Fruit is very sweet in smell, and of good nourishment. In these Plaines there grow likewise sundrie kinds of Palme-trees; one that beareth Dates, and another that beareth the Indian Nuts, called Cocoas, because they haue within them a certaine shell that is like to an Ape: and thereupon they vse in Spaine to shew their children Coccola, when they would make them afraid. Another Palme-tree there groweth also very like to the former, but of a more strange and singular propertie: for it yeeldeth Oyle, Wine, Vinegar, Fruit and Bread. The Oyle is made of the shell of the fruit, and is of the colour and substance of Butter, sauing that it is somewhat greenish. They vse it, as other people doe vse Oyle and Butter, and it will burne like Oyle. They anoint their bodies withall; and besides, it is very good to eate. They presse it out of the Fruit, as Oyle is pressed out of the Oliues, and then they boyle it, and so preserve it. The Bread is made of the stone of the fruit it selfe, which is like to an Almond, but somewhat harder: and within the same is there a certaine kernell or pith, which is good to eate: very wholesome and of good nourishment. The whole Fruit, together with the outter shell is Greene; and they vse to eate it both raw and roasted. The Wine is drawn from the top of the Tree, by making an hole therein, from whence there distilleth a liquor like Milke, which at the first is sweet, but afterwards sowre, and in proceesse of time becommeth very Vinegar, to serue for Sallets. This Wine they drinke cold, and it moueth to vrine very much: so that in those Countreies, there is not a man that is troubled with Grauell or Stone in the bladder. It will make them drunke, that drinke too much of it: but indeed it is of a very good nutriment.

There are other Trees, that beare a certaine fruit, called Cola, as big as a Pine-apple, which hath within it other fruits like Chest-nuts, wherein are foure seuerall shells or skins, of red and Carnation colour. These they vse to hold in their mouthes, and chaw them, and at last to eate them, for the quenching of their thirst, and better relishing of their water. They comfort and preserve the stomacke, but aboue all other qualities, they are singular good against the diseases of the Liuer. And it is said, that the Liuer of a Henne, or of any other like Bird, which is putrified, and stinketh, being sprinkled ouer with the matter of this fruit, returneth into his former estate, and becommeth fresh and sound againe. This food is commonly and generally vsed among them all, and there is very great abundance of it: and therefore it is good cheape. Other kinds of wild Palme-trees there are, which yeeld diuers fruits that are eaten: and their leaues reserued to make Mats, wherewith their houses are couered; and Baskets and Skeps, and such other like Instruments that are necessarie for their daily vses. Other Trees there are likewise, called Ogheghe, which beare a fruit which is like a yellow Plumme, and is very good to eate, and hath a very sweet smell withall. Of these Trees they cut off the boughs, and plant them so thicke together, that they touch one another, and stand closely all in a ranke; so that when they are growne great, they make a strong Fence or wall about their houses, which being afterwards couered with Mats, it resembleth a handsome Court or Closse, wherein they vse to walke, (as it were) in an Arbour that maketh a great shadow, and defendeth them from the heate of the Sunne. In the midst of these enclosures, they vse to build certaine houses of wood, couered with straw, and diuided into sundrie conuenient roomes, all on the ground without any Stories or Sollers aboue them. These they doe line with very faire and delicate Mats, and furnish them with other ornaments in very handsome manner.

There are to be found among them many masses and lumpes of stone, which are of such thicknesse and hugenesse, that you may cut out a whole Church, euen of one whole piece; yea, and of the same kind of stone, whereof the Obelisco is made, that is erected before Porta del Popolo in Rome. Besides this, there are whole Mountaines of Porphyrie, of Iasper, and of white Marble, and of other sundrie colours, which here in Rome are called, Marbles of Numidia, of Africa, and of Ethiopia: certaine Pillars whereof, you may see in the Chappell of Pope Gregorie.

Other Stone there is, that is speckled with graines or strakes, but among all the rest, that kind is most admirable, which hath in it faire Iacynthes, that are good Iewels. For the strakes being dispersed like weynes ouer all the bodie of their Mother-stone, if you shall diuide them, and plucke them out as you would picke the kernells out of a Pomegranate, they will fall into graines and little pieces of perfect Iacynth. But if you please to make Pillars, or Obeliskes, or other such like memorials, of the whole masse, you shall see them shine and sparkle, full of most faire and goodly Iewels.

There

There are also other kinds of rare stones, which make a shew of metall in them, as of Copper, and of sundry other colours, that are very fresh, and bright, and smooth, whereof you may make Images, or any other worke of singular beautie. True it is, indeed, that they want Masons, and Cutters, and Playsterers, and Carpenters, and other such Artificers: for when the Churches, and the walls, and the other fabrickes in those Countries were built, the Workmen were brought thither out of Portugall.

Want of workmen to build.

There are also Tamarindes, and Cassia, and Ceders in such multitudes growing all along the River of Congo, besides other Trees of an unmeasurable length and thicknesse, that an infinite number of ships and houses may be builded of them. Their Gardens doe beare all manner of Herbes and Fruits, as Pompions, Melions, Cucumbers, Coleworts, and such like, besides other sorts that doe not agree with our Climates of Europe.

Stuffe for building ships and housing. Herbs & fruits.

The King of Portugall, Don Giouanni the second, being desirous to discover the East Indies, sent forth diuers ships by the Coast of Africa to search out this Navigation, who hauing found the Islands of Cape Verde, and the Ile of Saint Thomas, and running all along that Coast, did light vpon the River Zaire, whereof we haue made mention before, and there they had good Trafficke, and tryed the people to bee very courteous and kind. Afterwards hee sent forth (for the same purpose) certaine other Vessels, to entertaine this Trafficke with Congo, who finding the Trade there to bee so free and profitable, and the people so friendly, left certaine Portugals behind them, to learne the Language, and to Trafficke with them: among whom one was a Masse-priest. These Portugals conuersing familiarly with the Lord of Sogno, who was Uncle to the King and a man well stricken in yeares, dwelling at that time in the Port of Praza (which is in the mouth of Zaire) were very well entertained and esteemed by the Prince, and reuerenced as though they had bene earthly Gods, and descended downe from Heauen into those Countries. But the Portugals told them that they were men as themselves were, and professors of Christianitie. And when they perceived in how great estimation the people held them, the foresaid Priest and others began to reason with the Prince touching the Christian Religion, and to shew vnto them the errors of the Pagan Superstition, and by little and little to teach them the Faith which we professe, insomuch as that which the Portugals spake vnto them, greatly pleased the Prince, and so he became conuerted.

The first trafficke of the Portugals into Congo.

Mani-Sogno, the Kings Vncle, entertayneth the Portugals.

Mani-Sogno, conuerted and become a Christian.

With this confidence and good spirit, the Prince of Sogno went to the Court, to enforme the King of the true Doctrine of the Christian Portugals, and to encourage him that he would imbrace the Christian Religion which was so manifest, and also so wholesome for his soules health. Hereupon the King commanded to call the Priest to Court, to the end he might himselfe treat with him personally, and vnderstand the truth of that which the Lord of Sogno had declared vnto him. Whereof when hee was fully informed, he conuerted and promised that he would become a Christian.

The King of Congo, promisseth to become a Christian.

And now the Portugall ships departed from Congo, and returned into Portugall: and by them did the King of Congo write to the King of Portugall, Don Giouanni the second, with earnest request, that he would send him some Priests, with all other Orders and Ceremonies to make him a Christian. The Priest also that remayned behind, had written at large touching this businesse, and gaue the King full information of all that had happened, agreeable to his good pleasure. And so the King tooke order for sundry Religious persons, to be sent vnto him accordingly, with all Ornaments for the Church and other seruice, as Crosses and Images: so that he was thoroughly furnished with all things that were necessarye and needfull for such an action.

The King of Portugall sendeth Priests to the King of Congo to instruct him.

The ships returne from Portugall, 1491.

Mani-Sogno & his traine entertayneth the Portugals.

Mani-Sogno buildeth a Church.

In the meane-while, the Prince of Sogno, ceased not day and night to discourse with the Portugall Priest, whom hee kept in his owne House, and at his owne Table, as well that hee might learne the Christian Faith himselfe, as also instruct the people therein: so that hee began to fauour Christianitie with all his power.

At last the ships of Portugall, arrined with the expected provisions (which was in the yeare of our Salvation 1491.) and landed in the Port which is in the mouth of the River Zaire. The Prince of Sogno with all shew of familiar ioy, accompanied with all his Gentlemen, ranne downe to meete them, and entertayned the Portugals in most courteous manner, and so conducted them to their Lodgings. The next day following, according to the direction of the Priest that remayned behind, the Prince caused a kind of Church to be builded, with the bodies and branches of certaine trees, which hee in his owne person, with the helpe of his Seruants, most deuoutly had felled in the Wood. And when it was couered, they erected therein three Altars in the worship and reuerence of the most holy Trinitie, and there was baptised himselfe and his young Sonne, himselfe by the name of our Saviour, Emanuel, and his childe by the name of Anthony, because that Saint is the Protector of the Citie of Lisbon.

The men and women before this had no proper names agreeable to reasonable creatures, but the common names of Plants, of Stones, of Birds and of Beasts. But the Princes and Lords had their denominations from the Places and States which they gouerned. As for example, the foresaid Prince, which was the first Christian in Congo, was called Mani-Sogno, that is to say, The Prince of Sogno, and when hee was christned, was called Emanuel, but at this day they haue all in generall such Christian names as they haue learned of the Portugals.

After a Masse was celebrated and sung, one of the Priests that came from Portugall went vp, and made

A sermon containing the sum of Christian Religion. Mani Sogno rehearseth the Sermon to his people.

The Portugals goe to the Court to baptise the King.

How beautiful are the feet of them that bring tidings of peace? The Courtiers of Congo meet the Portugals.

The King himselfe receiveth them.

The Portugall Embassadour declareth his Embassage. The King reioyceth at the Embassage. The people reioyce at it.

The King vieweth the Presents sent vnto him by the King of Portugall.

Consultation among the Portugals for the Christning of the King, and for the building of a Church.

An insurrection rayfed by the Deuill, to hinder the progresse of Christian Religion.

made a briefe Sermon in the Portugall Language, declaring the summe of the new Religion, and faith of the Gospell which they had receined. This Sermon, the Priest that was left behind, having now learned the Congo speech, did more at large expound to the Lords that were in the Church: for the Church could not possibly hold the innumerable multitude of the people that were there gathered together, at the conuersion of their Prince: who afterwards came abroad vnto them, and rehearsed the whole Sermon, with great loue and charitie, mouing and exhorting them to imbrace likewise the true beliefe of the Christian Doctrine.

When this was done, all the Portugals put themselves on their way towards the Court, to baptise the King, who with a most feruent longing attended the same. And the Gouvernour of Sogno tooke order that many of his Lords should wait vpon them with Musicke, and singing, and other signes of wonderfull reioysing; besides, diuers slaues which he gaue them to carrie their stuffe, commanding also the people, that they should prepare all manner of victuall to bee readie in the streets for them. So great was the number of people, that ranne and met together to behold them, as the whole Champaigne seemed to bee in a manner couered with them, and they all did in great kindnesse entertaine and welcome the Portugall Christians, with singing and sounding of Trumpets and Cymbals, and other Instruments of that Countrey.

And it is an admirable thing to tell you, that all the streets and high-ways, that reach from the Sea, to the Citie of Saint Sauours, being one hundred and fiftie miles, were all cleansed and swept, and abundantly furnished with all manner of victuall and other necessities for the Portugals. Indeed, they doe vse in those Countries, when the King or the principall Lords goe abroad, to cleanse their wayes and make them handsome.

Three dayes iourney from the place whence they departed, they descryed the Kings Courtiers, that came to meet them, to present them with fresh victuals, and to doe them honour: and so from place to place they encountred other Lords, that for the same purpose were sent by the King to receiue the Christians, who were the Messengers and Bringers of so great a ioy. When they were come within three miles neere to the Citie, all the Court came to entertaine and welcome the Portugals, withall manner of pompe and ioyfulnesse, and with Musicke and Singing, as in those Countries is vsed vpon their solemnest Feast-dayes.

And so great was the multitude of people, which abounded in the streets, and that there was neither Tree nor Hillocke higher then the rest, but it was loden with those that were runne forth and assembled to view these Strangers, which brought vnto them this new Law of their Saluation. The King himselfe attended them at the gate of his Palace, in a Throne of Estate erected vpon a high Scaffold, where he did publikely receiue them, in such manner and sort as the ancient Kings of that Realme were accustomed to doe, when any Embassadors came vnto him, or when his Tributes were payed him, or when any other such Royall Ceremonies were performed.

And first of all, the Embassadour declared the Embassage of the King of Portugall, which was expounded and interpreted by the foresaid Priest, that was the principall Author of the conuersion of those people. After the Embassage was thus deliuered, the King rayfed himselfe out of his Seate, and standing vpright vpon his feet, did both with his countenance and speech, shew most eident signes of the great ioy, that he had conceined for the comming of the Christians, and so sate downe againe. And incontinently all the people with shouting, and sounding their Trumpets, and Singing, and other manifest arguments of reioycing, did approue the Kings words, and shewed their exceeding good liking of this Embassage. And further in token of obedience, they did three times prostrate themselves vpon the ground, and cast up their feet according to the vse of those Kingdomes.

Then the King tooke view of all the Presents that were sent him by the King of Portugall, and the Vestments of the Priests, and the Ornaments of the Altar, and the Crosses, and the Tables, wherein were depainted the Images of Saints, and the Streamers, and the Banners, and all the rest, and with incredible attention, caused the meaning of euery one of them to be declared vnto him, one by one. And so withdrew himselfe, and lodged the Embassadour in a Palace made readie of purpose for him, and all the rest were placed in other Houses of seuerall Lords, where they were furnished with all plentie and ease.

The day following, the King caused all the Portugals to be assembled together in priuate: where they deuised of the course that was to be taken for the Christning of the King, and for effecting the full conuersion of the people to the Christian Faith. And after sundry Discourses, it was resolved and concluded, that first of all a Church should bee builded, to the end that the Christning, and other Ceremonies thereunto belonging, might be celebrated therein with the more Solemnitie: and in the meane-while the King and Court should be taught and instructed in the Christian Religion. The King presently commanded, that withall speed provision should be made of all manner of stuffe necessary for this Building, as Timber, Stone, Lime, and Bricke, according to the direction and appointment of the Work-masters and Masons, which for that purpose were brought out of Portugall.

But the Deuill who neuer ceaseth to crosse all good and holy proceedings, rayfed new dissensions and conspiracies, by procuring a rebellion among certaine people of the Anzichi, and of Anzicana, which dwell dwell upon both the bankes of the River Zaïre, from the foresaid falls upwards, to the great Lake, and are subiect and belonging to the King of Congo. Now this monstrous River being restrayned and kept backe by these falls, doth swell there mightily, and spreadeth it selfe abroad in a very large and deepe channel. In the breadth whereof there are many Islands, some small and some great, so that in some of them, there may be maintayned about thirtie thousand persons. In these Islands and in other places adioyning to the Rivers thereabouts, did the people make an insurrection, and renounced their obedience to the King, and slue the Governours that he had sent thither to rule.

The King must needs goe himselfe in person to pacifie these broyles: howbeit, he resolved to bee baptised before his going, and so was enforced to forbear the building of the Church of Stone, and withall speed, in stead thereof to erect one of Timber, which Church hee in his owne person with the aduice of the Portugals, did accomplish in such manner and sort as it ought to bee, and therein did receiue the Sacrament of holy Baptisme, and was named Don Giouanni, and his Wife Donna Eleonora, after the names of the King and Queene of Portugall, and the Church it selfe intituled and dedicated to Saint Sauour.

The same day, wherein the King was baptised, diuers other Lords following his example were baptised likewise, hauing first learned certaine Principles of the Christian Faith. And when all this was done, the King went in person to disperse the turbulent attempts of his Aduersaries, against whom hee found the Prince his Sonne, and the Lord of Batta already fighting with a formall Armie. But at the arrinall of the King, the Enemies yeilded, and submitted themselues to the obedience which before they performed: and so he returned in triumph to the Citie of Congo, and the Prince his Sonne with him, who presently was desirous to become a Christian, and was christned by the name of the first Prince of Portugall, called Alfonso: and with him also were christned many Gentlemen and Cavalieros, and other of his Seruants, that came with him out of his Prouince.

The Kings second Sonne, would not agree to receiue the new Religion, many other Lords fauoured him, who being addicted rather to the sensualitye of the flesh, then the puritie of the minde, resisted the Gospel, which began now to be preached, especially in that Commandement, wherein it is forbidden, that a man should haue any mo Wives but one.

The eldest Brother Don Alfonso, did with great seruencie, defend Christianitie, and burned all the Idols that were within his Prouince. The second Brother (called Mani-Pango, because hee was Gouernour of the Countrey of Pango) did resist it mightily, and had gotten the greatest part of the principall Lords of Pango to be on his side. For there were diuers of the new christned Lords, whose Ladies seeing themselues seperated, and forlorne of their Husband-Lords by force of the Christian Law, did take it as a great iniurie and scorne done vnto them, and blasphemed and cursed this new Religion beyond all measure. These Lords united themselues together with others, and began to plot Trecherie against Don Alfonso, hoping that if they could rid him out of the World, the Christian Faith would utterly cease of it selfe. And therefore Mani-Pango and his Complices gaue intelligence to his Father, that the Prince Don Alfonso fauoured the Christian Faction, onely to the end that vnder the colour of his countenance and fauor, they might raise an Insurrection & Rebellion against him, & so drine him out of his Kingdom.

The King gaue credit to their informations, and deprived his Sonne of the Government wherein hee was placed: But the Prouidence of God which reserued him for a greater matter, did relieue him by the good mediation and counsell of his friends, who entreated the King his Father, that hee would not be moued to anger, before he had examined the Answeres and Reasons of the Prince his Sonne. Wherein the King was especially perswaded by Mani-Sogno, who (as wee told you) was before christned, and called, Don Emanuel, and by good hap was in Court at that present. This man (being the ancientest Courtier and Lord of that time, singularly well beloued of the King and all his people) did with sound reasons and dexteritie of wit, procure the King to reuoke the sentence, with a speciall charge, that hee should not proceed with such rigour against the Gentiles, for the propagation and exaltation of the Christian Religion. But he being full of seruent charitie, and godly spirit, ceased not (for all that) to aduance the Faith of the Gospel, and to put the Commandements of God in execution.

Whereupon his Aduersaries who neuer rested from their former attempt, were continually at the Kings elbow, and sought by all cunning shifts and secret demises, to destroy that which the good Prince had builded, especially when they saw that the Prince of Sogno was departed from Court, and returned into his gouernment. So that no bodie being now left to protect and defend the Christian Religion, the King began to doubt of the Faith, which with so great zeale he had before imbraced: and therefore sent to his Sonne, that he should come againe to the Court, to make account of those Reuenues that hee had gathered within the Countrey of his Gouernment, with a full intent and meaning, indeed, to deprive him, when his accounts should be finished.

But he, in the meane-while, his Father being an old man, did by meanes of a naturall infirmitie depart out of this life. And his Mother who alwaies persuered constant in the Catholike Faith, louing her eldest Sonne most entirely, concealed the Kings death for the space of three dayes, being therein ayded and assisted by some of her trustie friends, & gaue it out, that the King had taken such order as no man might come vnto him to trouble him. In the meane season, she did secretly signifie to her Sonne, the death of his Father, which she would keepe close till his comming, and charged him without any delay, and in all haste to speed him to the Court.

This shew did by certaine Runners, that from place to place, in conuenient distances and iourneyes, are alwaies readie like Postes, to conuey the precepts and commandements of the King ouer all the Realme. Whereupon he presently caused himselfe to be carried poste both day and night, by certaine Slaues according to the vse of that Countrey, and in one day and two nights, with most exquisite diligence, accomplished the iourney of two hundred miles, and so arrived at the Citie, before he was expected.

Now together with the death of the King, there was also published the succession to the Crowne of Don Alfonso, being then present, who in his owne person did accompanie the corps of his dead Father to the buriall, with all the Lords of the Court, and all the Christian Portugals, which was solemnized after the manner of Christendome, with seruice and prayers for the dead, and all this with such funerall pompe, as was neuer seene before among those people. But they which heretofore were aduersaries to this new King, doubting of their owne safetie, if they should remaine in the Court, united themselves with Mani-Pango, who was now departed into the Prouince of his owne Gouvernement, and while his father liued, was wholly employed in fighting against the Mozombi, and certaine other people that had rebelled against him.

Mani-Pango and his forces set forwards to the besieging of the Citie, with so great a noyse of warlike Instruments, and cries, and shottings, and terrible threatnings, that the poore few, which were in the Citie, as well Christians as others, fainted in their hearts, and failed in their courage, and came and presented themselves before the King, saying, that he had not power enough to resist so powerfull an Enemy, and therefore they thought it better for him to grow to some concord and composition, and to abandon the new Religion, which he had lately begun to professe, to the end he might not fall into the hands of his cruell aduersaries. But the King being resolute, and full of religious constancie, reproveth their cowardise, and called them dastards, and base people; and willed them, if they had any mind or desire to forsake him, and goe to the Enemy, that they should so doe. As for himselfe, and those few that would follow him, he did not doubt, but assuredly trust, though not with the possibilitie or strength of Man, yet with the fauour of God, to vanquish and overcome that innumerable multitude. And therefore hee would not request them either to ioyne with him, or to put their lines in hazard against his aduersaries for his sake, but onely they might rest themselves and expect the issue that should follow thereon.

He did presently cause a Crosse to be planted, and erected in the midst of the Market place, right against the Church, which his Father had builded. This Crosse was of a wonderfull length, for it was fourescore spanne long, and the Crosse-barre in proportion answerable thereunto. The Crosse is to be seene in the same place, wherein it was erected, at the front of the Church, which Church was called Saint Crosses, of the Crosse there planted. This Crosse the last King, that dead is, Don Aluaro, Father to the King that now is, renewed and made another of the same bignes that the first was of.

Mani-Pango terrified with visions, and not with his brothers forces, overcome with feare and danger ranne away, and fell into the Snares and Nets which he himselfe had laid for the Christians; For, lighting among the foresaid Stakes, he was with one of them thrust into the bodie, and so being surprized with an euill death, he finished his life, as it were in a rage. For you must understand, that the sharpe ends of the said Stakes, were envenomed with a certaine poyson, which taking hold of the blood, and entring somewhat into the flesh, would kill without all cure or remedie. By this victorie and death of his brother, did the King remaine in securitie and libertie.

All things well established, the King Don Alfonso tooke order, that they should presently goe in hand with the fabricke of the Principall Church, called Saint Crosses, which was so named of the Crosse that was there planted, (as wee told you before) and also because upon the Feast day of the holy Crosse, the first stone was laid in the foundation thereof. Moreover, he commanded that the men should bring stones, and the women should fetch sand from the Riuer, for the furthering of this worke. The King would needs be the first Porter himselfe, and upon his owne shoulders brought the first basket of stones, which he cast into the foundation, and the Queene her basket of sand likewise, thereby giving an example to the Lords and the Ladies of the Court to doe the like, and to encourage and hearten the people in so holy an action. And so this fabricke being furthered by so good Work-masters and Workmen, in a very short time was fully finished, and therein were celebrated Masses, and other Diuine Service, with great solemnitie, besides, a number of Lords and others, that were there baptised and christned: so that the multitude of such as came to be partakers of the holy Baptisme abounded so greatly, that there were not Priests enough to execute that office.

After this the King dispatched away the Portugall Embassadour, who till this time had remained at the Court, by reason of these troubles: and with him he sent also another Embassadour of his owne, called Don Roderico, and diuers others that were of kinne both to himselfe and to his Embassadour, to the end that they should learne, both the Doctrine of the Christians in Portugall, and also their Language, and further declare unto the King all these accidents that hapned.

Moreover, hee caused the Lords of all his Prouinces to be assembled together, in a place appointed for that purpose, and there publikely signified unto them, that whosoever had any Idols, or any thing else that was contrarie to the Christian Religion, he should bring them forth and deliuer them over to the Lieutenants of the Countrey. Otherwise, whosoever did not so, should be burned themselves, without remission or pardon. Which commanded was incontinently put in execution. And a wonderfull thing it is to be noted, that within lesse then one moneth, all the Idols, and Witcheries and Characters, which they worshipped and accounted for Gods, were sent and brought vnto the Court. Many there were, that carried a deuotion to Dragons with wings, which they nourished and fed in their owne primate houses, giuing vnto them for their food, the best and most costly Viands that they had. Others kept Serpents of horrible figures: Some worshipped the greatest Goats they could get; some Tygres, and other most monstrous creatures; yea, the more uncouth and deformed the Beasts were, the more they were honored. Some held in veneration certaine vncleane Fowles, and Night-birds, as Bats, Owles, and Scritch-Owles, and such like. To be brieft, they did choose for their Gods diuers Snakes, and Adders, and Beasts, and Birds, and Herbs, and Trees, and sundry Characters of Wood and of Stone, and the figures of all these things aboue rehearsed, as well painted in Colours, as grauen in Wood and in Stone, and in such other stuffe. Neither did they onely content themselves with worshipping the said Creatures, when they were quicke and aline, but also the verie skinned of them when they were dead, being stuffed with straw.

The act of this their adoration, was performed in diuers sorts, all wholly addressed, and directed to expresse their humilitie, as by kneeling on their knees, by casting themselves groueling upon the earth, by defiling their faces with dust, by making their prayers vnto their Idols, in words and in actions, and by offering vnto them the best part of the substance which they had in their possession. They had moreover, their Witches, which made the foolish people to beleene that their Idols could speake, and so deceived them: and if any man being in sicknesse or infirmitie, would recommend himselfe vnto them, and afterwards that man recovered his health, the Witches would perswade him that the Idoll had bene angry with him, but now was appeased, and had healed him.

20 The King caused fire to be set vnto their Idols, and utterly consumed them. When he had thus done, he assembled all his people together, and instead of their Idols which before they had in reuerence, hee gaue them Crucifixes, and Images of Saints, which the Portugals had brought with them, and enjoined euery Lord, that euery one in the Citie of his owne Government and Regiment, should build a Church, and set up Crosses, as he had already shewed vnto them by his owne example. And then he told them, and the rest of his people, that he had dispatched an Embassadour into Portugall to fetch Priests, that should teach them Religion, and administer the most holy and wholesome Sacraments to euery one of them, and bring with them diuers Images of Christ, of the Virgin Mother, and of other Saints to distribute among them. In the meane while, he willed them to be of good comfort, and to remaine constant in the faith. But they had so liuely imprinted the same in their hearts, that they neuer more remembered their former beliefe in false and lying Idols.

He ordained moreover, that there should be three Churches builded. One in reuerence of our Sauour, to giue him thanks for the victorie which he had granted vnto him, wherein the Kings of Congo doe lye buried, and whereof the Citie Royall tooke the name, (for as it was told you before, it is called, S. Sauours.) The second Church, was dedicated to the blessed Virgin, the mother of God, called, Our Ladie of Help, in memorie of the succour which he had against his enemies: And the third, was consecrated to S. Iames: in honour and remembrance of the Miracle which that Saint had wrought by fighting in the fauour of the Christians, and shewing himselfe on Horse-backe in the heate of the battaile.

Not long after this, the ships arrived from Portugall, with many men that were skilfull in the holy Scriptures, and diuers religious Friars of the Orders of S. Francis, and of S. Dominick, and of S. Austine, with sundry other Priests, who with great charitie and feruency of spirit, sowed and dispersed the Catholike Faith ouer all the Countrey: which was presently embraced by all the people of the Kingdom, who held the said Priests in so high reuerence, that they worshipped them like Saints, by kneeling vnto them, and kissing their hands, and receiuing their blessing, as often as they met them in the streetes. These Priests being arrived into their severall Prouinces, did instruct the people in the Faith of Christ.

The death of the King DON ALFONSO, and the succession of DON PEDRO. How the Island of S. THOMAS was first inhabited, and of the Bishop that was sent thither: The Kings lineage extinct: Inuasion of the Iagges: Their sauage conditions.

60 While these matters were thus in working for the seruice of God, and that Christianitie was now begun and increased with so happy successe, it pleased God to call away to himselfe the King DON ALFONSO, who at the time of his death, discoursed of the Christian Religion, with so great confidence and charitie, as it evidently appeared, that the Crosse and Passion, and the true beliefe in our Sauour Iesus Christ, was imprinted in the root of his heart. To DON PEDRO, his sonne and successour, he did especially and principally recommend the Christian doctrine, which indeed following the example of his father, hee did maintaine and vphold accordingly.

The third Bishop of S. Thomas, & of Congo

Thomas was inhabited with Portugals, by the Kings commandement. For before those dayes, it was all waste and desert within Land, and inhabited onely vpon the shoare by a few Saylers that came from the Countries adioyning. But when this Iland in proceffe of time was well peopled with Portugals, and other Nations, that came thither by licence of the King, & became to be of great Trafficke, and was Tilled and Sowed, the King sent thither a Bishop, to gouerne the Christians that were in that Iland, and those also that were in Congo: which the said Bishop did accomplish presently vpon his arriuall, and afterwards in Congo, where hee tooke possession of his Pastorall charge. When he was come into the Kingdome of Congo, it was a thing incredible to see, with how great ioy he was entertained by the King and all his people.

For from the Sea side, euen unto the Citie, being the space of one hundred and fiftie miles, he caused the streetes to be made smooth and trim, and to bee conered all ouer with Mats, commanding the people, that for a certaine space seuerally appointed vnto them, they should prepare the waies in such sort, that the Bishop should not set his foot vpon any part of the ground which was not adorned. But it was a far greater wonder, to behold all the Countrey thereabouts, and all the Trees, and all the places that were higher then the rest, swarming with men and women that ran forth to see the Bishop, as a man that was holy and sent from God, offering vnto him, some of them Lambs, some Kids, some Chickens, some Partridges, some Venison, and some Fish, and other kinds of victuals in such abundance, that he knew not what to doe withall, but left it behind him; whereby he might well know the great zeale and obedience of these new Christians. And aboue all other things it is to be noted for a memorable matter, that the Bishop going on his way, there met him an innumerable multitude of men, and women, and griles, and boyes, and persons of fourescore yeares of age, and aboue, that crossed him in the streets, and with singular tokens of true reliefe required the water of holy Baptisme at his hands: neither would they suffer him to passe untill he had giuen it them: so that to satisfie their desires, hee was greatly stayed in his voyage, and was faine to carrie water with him in certaine vessels, and Salt, and other prouision necessary for that action.

And now I will tell you, he arriued at the Citie of Saint Sauours, where he was met by the Priests, and by the King, and by all the Court, and so in procession entred into the Church, and after due thanks giuen to God, he was conducted to his lodging, that was assigned vnto him by the King. And then presently he beganne to reforme and reduce to good order, the Church it selfe, and the Friers, and Priests that dwell therein: ordaining the said Church to be the Cathedrall Church of Saint Crosses, which at that time had belonging vnto it eight and twentie Canons, with their Chaplaines, and a Master of the Chappell, with Singers, and Organs, and Bels, and all other furniture meete to execute Diuine seruice. But this Bishop who laboureth in the Lords Vineyard, sometimes in Congo, and sometimes in the Ile of Saint Thomas, going and comming continually by ship, the space of twentie daies, and still leaning behind him, his Vicars in the place where he himselfe was absent, at the last dyed, and was buried in the Iland of Saint Thomas.

After this Bishop, succeeded another Bishop in Congo, being a Negro, and descended of the blood Royall, who before had bene sent by King Altonso first into Portugall, and afterwards to Rome, where he learned the Latine tongue, and the Christian Religion, but being returned into Portugall, and landed out of his ship, to goe and enter vpon his Bishopricke of Saint Sauours, he dyed by the way: whereupon the Kingdome remained without a Pastor for the space of diuers yeares. Don Pedro also the King aforesaid, dyed likewise without Children; and there succeeded him his Brother, called, Don Francisco, who in like manner lasted but a while: and then was created the fift King, named Don Diego, who was next of all the race Royall: A man of haughtie courage, and magnificall, and witty, of a very good disposition, wise in counsell, and aboue all other qualities, a maintainer of Christian Faith: and in briebe, so great a Warriour he was, that in few yeares he conquered all the Countries adioyning. He loued the Portugals very much, so that he forsooke the vsuall garments of his owne naturall Countrey, and attired himselfe after the Portugall fashion. He was very sumptuous, as well in his apparell, as also in the ornaments and furniture of his palace: he was besides very courteous and liberal, and would bestow largely, both vpon his owne Subiects, and also vpon the Portugals. With great cost would he provide and buy such stuffe as pleased him, and would often say, that Rare things should not be in the hands of any but onely of Kings. He vsed to weare one suite of apparell but once or twice, and then he would giue it away to his followers. Whereupon the Portugals perceiuing, that he did so greatly esteeme cloath of Gold and Arras, and such other costly household-stuffe, they brought great store thereof out of Portugall, so that at that time, Arras-hangings, and Cloth of Gold, and of Silke, and such like Lordly furniture, began to be of great estimation in that Kingdome.

In the time of this King, there was a third Bishop of Saint Thomas, and Congo, by Nation a Portugall, who with the vsuall ceremonies was entertained both by the way, and also in the Court at Saint Sauours. And now euery man esteemed himselfe not onely to be as good as the Bishop, but also to be a farre better man then he was; and therefore would yeeld no obedience to their Prelate. But the King like a good Catholike, and a faithfull, did alwaies maintaine the Bishops part, and to cut off these troubles and stirres, he sent some of these Priests to prison into Portugall, and others into the Ile of Saint Thomas, and some others went away with all their substance of their owne accord.

Also after the death of this King, there started vp three Princes at once to challenge the succession.

cession. The first was the Kings Sonne, whom few of them fauoured, because they desired to haue another, so that hee was slaine incontinently. The two other that remained were of the blood Royall: one of them was created King by his fauourites and followers, with the good liking of the greater part of the people, but vtterly against the minds of the Portugals, and certaine of the Lords, who aymed and endeauoured to set vp the other. In so much as the foresaid Lords, together with the Portugals, went into the Church to kill the King elected: making this reckoning with themselves, that if they slue him, the other must of necessitie bee made King. But at that very selfe-same time, those of the contrary faction had slaine the King that was already made by the Portugals, perswading themselves assuredly, that he being dead, there would be no difficultie for them to obtaine the State for their King, because there was none other left, that by law could challenge the Scepter Royall. And thus in an houre, and in two seuerall places, were these two Kings murdered at once.

In these conspiracies and slaughters, when the people saw that there were no lawfull persons left to enioy the Royall Crowne, they laid all the blame vpon the Portugals, who were the causers of all these mischiefs: and thereupon they turned themselves against them, and slue as many of them as they could find: Onely they spared the Priests, and would not touch them, nor any other that dwelt in other places.

The Portugals
slaine and dispersed.

Seeing therefore (as before is said) that there was none of the blood Royall left to be placed in the Gouvernment, they made choise of one Don Henrico, Brother to Don Diego the King deceased. And this Henrico going to waire against the Anzichi, left behind him in his stead for Gouvernour, vnder the Title of King, one Don Aluaro, a young man of five and twenty yeares of age, sonne to his Wife by another Husband. But Don Henrico dyed shortly after the warre was ended, and thereupon the said Don Aluaro was with the common consent of them all elected King of Congo, and generally obeyed of euery man. And thus failed the Royall stocke of the ancient Kings of Congo, in the person of Don Henrico.

Don Henrico

King Henrico dieth, and Don Aluaro succeedeth: and so the stocke of

But Don Aluaro was a man of good iudgement and gournment, and of a milde disposition, so that he did presently appease all these tumults in his Kingdome, and caused all the Portugals that by the last warres were dispersed ouer all the Countreys thereabouts, to be gathered together, as well religious persons as lay men, and by their meanes he was much better confirmed in the Catholike Faith, then he was before.

Moreover, he vsed them very courteously, and cleared them of all faults that were laid to their charge, declaring vnto them by gentle discourses, that they had not beene the occasion of the former troubles, as euery man would confesse and acknowledge: and to that effect hee determined with himselfe to write a large information touching all these accidents to the King of Portugall, and to the Bishop of Saint Thomas, which he did accordingly, and dispatched certaine Messengers vnto them with his letters.

When the Bishop of Saint Thomas understood these newes, he was very glad thereof, and whereas before he durst not aduenture to goe into the Kingdome of Congo in the heate of all those troubles, he did now presently take ship and sayled thither, where he employed himselfe wholly with all his authoritie, to pacifie his former dissensions, and to set downe order for all such matters as concerned the worship of God, and the office of his Priests. And a while after he had so done, he returned to his habitation in the Ile of Saint Thomas, where by meanes of sicknesse he finished his daies. And this was the third time, that those parts remained without a Bishop.

S. Thomas dieth.

Now it came to passe, that for want of Bishops, the King and the Lords, and the people likewise began to waxe cold in the Christian Religion, euery man addicting himselfe licentiously to the libertie of the flesh, and especially the King, who was induced therunto by diuers young men of his owne age, that did familiarly conuerse with him. Among whom there was one principall man, that was both a Lord, and his Kinsman, called Don Francisco Bullamatore, that is say, Catch-stone. This man, because he was a great Lord, and wholly estranged from all instructions of Christianitie, walked inordinately after his owne pleasure, and did not sticke to defend openly, That it was a very vaine thing to keepe but one Wife, and therefore it were better to returne to their former ancient custome. And so by his meanes did the Deuill open a gate, to the ouerthrow and destruction of the Church of Christ in that Kingdome, which untill that time with so great paine and trauaile had beene there established. But afterwards the man did so wander and stray out of the way of truth, that he fell from one sinne to another, and in the end quite relinquished and abandoned all true Religion. Yet at the last, the said Francisco died, and was solemnly buried.

For not long after, there came to rob and spoyle the Kingdome of Congo, certaine Nations that liue after the manner of the Arabians, and of the ancient Nomades, and are called Giachas. Their habitation or dwelling is about the first Lake of the Riuer Nilus, in the Prouince of the Empire of Moenemugi. A cruell people they are, and a murderous, of a great stature, and horrible countenance, fed with mans flesh, fierce in battell, & valarous in courage. Their weapons are Pauises or Targets, Darts and Daggers: otherwise they goe all naked. In their fashions and daily courte of liuing, they are very sauage and wilde: They haue no King to gouerne them, and they leade their life in the Forrest vnder Cabbins and Cottages like Shepheards.

the Giachas are: Their conditions, and weapons.

The Giachas spoile the province of Batta. The Giachas come to the Royall Citie of Congo.

King Aluaro flyeth into the Ile of Horse. The Giachas surprise the Citie, and rule ouer all the Kingdome.

The King, and those that followed him, plagued with an extreame famine.

Many of the bloud Royall sold for Slaues to the Portugalls.

King Aluaro fleeth into a drop sicke.

King Aluaro sendeth to the King of Portugall for succor. Don Sebastiano the King of Portugall sendeth succor vnto him. Francisco di Gouea restoreth the King, and driueth the Giachas out of Congo.

Francisco di Gouea, after foure yeeres returneth into Portugall with letters for more Priests.

The King becommeth a good Christian, and marieth.

This people went wandring vp and downe, destroying, and putting to fire and sword, and robbing and spoyling all the Countreies that they passed through, till they came to the Realme of Congo, which they entred on that side where the Prouince of Batta lyeth. Those that first came forth to make resistance against them, they ouerthrew, and then addrested themselves towards the Citie of Congo, where the King remayned at that time in great perplexitie, for this victorie that his enemies had gotten in the Countrey of Batta: yet some comfort he tooke to himselfe, and went out against his Aduersaries with such Souldiers as he had, and in the same place, where in times past Mani-Pango fought with the King Don Alfonso, he ioyned battell with them. In which encounter the King being halfe discomfited, retyred into the Citie, wherein when hee perceiued that he could not remayne in good safetie, being vtterly forsaken of the grace of God 10 by reason of his sinnes, and not hauing that confidence in him, that Don Alfonso had, he thought good to leaue it for a prey to his Aduersaries, and to betake himselfe to an Iland within the Riuer Zaire, called Isola del Canallo, that is to say, The Ile of Horse; where he continued with certaine Portugall Priests, and other principall Lords of his Kingdome. And thus were the Giachi become Lords and Masters of the Citie Royall, and of the whole Realme. For the naturall Inhabitants fled away, and saued themselves in the Mountaynes, and desert places: but the enemies burned and wasted, Citie, and Churches, and all, and spared no mans life, so that hauing diuided themselves into seuerall Armies, they ruled and gouerned sometimes in one Prouince, and sometimes in another ouer all the Kingdome.

As for the poore people, they went wandring like Vagabonds ouer all the Countrey, and perished for hunger and want of necessaries. And for the King with those that followed him, and had saued themselves in the Iland, they also, because the Ile was very little, and the multitude great, were oppressed with so terrible a scarcitie of victualls, that the most part of them died by famine and pestilence. For this dearth so increased, and meate arose to, so excessive a rate, that for a very small pittance (God wor) they were faine to giue the price of a slaue, whom they were wont to sell for ten Crownes at the least. So that the Father was of necessitie constrained to sell his owne Sonne; and the Brother, his Brother, and so euery man to prouide his victualls by all manner of wickednesse. The persons that were sold, for the satisfying of other mens hunger, were bought by the Portugall Merchants, that came from Saint Thomas with their ships laden with victualls. Those that sold them, said, they were Slaues; and those that were 30 sold, iustified and confirmed the same, because they were desirous to be rid of their greedie torment. And by this occasion there was no small quantitie of Slaues, that were borne in Congo, sold vpon this necessitie, and sent to the Ile of Saint Thomas, and to Portugall, among whom there were some of the bloud Royall, and some others, principall Lords.

By this affliction, the King did manifestly learne and know, that all these great miseries and aduersities abounded for his misdeeds: and although he was not much punished with hunger, because he was a King, yet he did not escape the cruell infirmitie of the drop sicke, that made his legs to swell exceedingly, which disease was engendred, partly by the aire, and very ill diet, and partly by the moystnesse of the Iland, and so it accompanied him euen vntill his death. But in the meane while, being stricken to the heart with these misfortunes and calamities, he conuer- 40 ted and turned to God, requiring pardon for his offences, and doing penance for his sinnes: and then was counselled and aduised by the Portugalls, that he should send to request succours of the King of Portugall, by certaine Embassadors, that might recount vnto him all the mischiefs which had lighted vpon him. This embassage was accordingly performed, at the same time that the King Don Sebastiano began his reigne, who with great speed and kindnesse sent him succours by a Captaine, called Francisco di Gouea, a man well exercised in diuers warres, both in India, and also in Africa, who lead with him sixe hundred Souldiers, and many Gentlemen Adventurers, that did accompanie him.

This Captaine, Francisco di Gouea, carried with him a commandement from his King, that the 50 Iland of Saint Thomas should prouide him ships and victualls, and whatsoever else was requisite for this enterprise. And with this prouision he arriued at the last in the Ile of Horse, where the King of Congo was resident. In whose companie the Portugalls departing from thence, and gathering together all the men of warre in that Countrey, with all speed possible, put themselves on wards against their Aduersaries, and fought with them sundrie times in plaine battell, so that at the end of one yeere and a halfe, they restored the King into his former estate. Which victorie they atchieued indeed by the noyse and force of their Harguebusses, for the Giachi are exceedingly afraid of that weapon.

The Portugall Captaine stayed there for the space of foure yeeres, to settle the King in his Kingdome, and then returned into Portugall with letters of request to his King, that hee would send ouer some more Priests to vphold and maintayne the Christian Religion. And the King be- 60 ing thus established in his former degree, and the Kingdome all in quiet and peace, became a very good Christian, and married the Lady Katharina, who is yet alieue; by whom hee had foure daughters, and by certaine Maid-seruants, which he kept, two sonnes and one daughter. And because in those Regions the women doe not succeed: there remayned as Heire of his Kingdome his elder sonne, called also Don Aluaro, who liueth at this day, 1588. During

During the time, that the foresaid Captaine stayed in Congo, the King of Portugall, Don Sebastiano vnderstanding, that there were in that Kingdome diuers Caues and Mines of Siluer, of Gold, and other Metals, sent thither two persons that were cunning and skilfull in that Arte, (for therein they had serued the Castilians in the West) to make search for them, and to draw some profit thereof. But the King of Congo was by a certaine Portugall, called Francisco Barbuta, that was his Confessor, and great familiar, perswaded to the contrarie, that he should not in any case suffer those Mines to be discovered: signifying vnto him, that thereby peradventure the free enioying and possession of his Kingdome, might by little and little be taken quite from him, and therefore aduised him that he would cause these skilfull Masters to bee led and guided by some other wayes, where he knew there were no metall Mines to be found, which he did accordingly. But assuredly, it grew afterwards to a great mischief: for, thereupon began the great trade and trafficke in that Countrey to cease, and the Portugall Merchants did not greatly care for venturing thither, or dwelling there any more. And so consequently, very few Priests resorted among them. So that as well vpon these occasions, as also for other such causes afore rehearsed, the Christian Religion waxed so cold in Congo, that it wanted very little of being utterly extinguished. But the King Don Aluaro ceased not still to send new Embassadors into Portugall, with earnest request that he might haue more Priests, and such as were skilfull in the holy Scriptures to maintaine the Catholike Faith, which was now almost utterly forgotten in that Realme, onely for want of religious persons, that should teach the people and administer the Sacraments. He had none other answer from him, but words and promises, that he would haue a care of the matter that was demanded: but in the meane while he provided neither Priests, nor Diuines to be sent for Congo. Whereupon the King of Congo dispatched againe another principall Embassadour, being his kinsman, called Don Sebastiano Aluarez, together with a Portugall, to beare him companie. But he was faine to returne home againe into Congo, without any Priests or Religious persons to goe with him.

Three yeeres after, the King Don Sebastiano dispatched a certaine Bishop (called Don Antonio de gli Oua, being a Castilian borne) principally to the Iland of Saint Thomas: but withall hee gaue him also a commission to visite the Kingdome of Congo: who being arrined at Saint Thomas, fell at iarre with the Captaine there, and so sailed into Congo; there he stayed eight moneths, and then departed againe, and left behind him in Congo, two Friars, and foure Priests. The Bishop being thus gone, and the King ouerthrowne in Africa, there was exalted to the Crowne of Portugall, Don Henrico the Cardinall, to whom the King of Congo did write, with great instance, and earnest request; that hee would send him some religious persons, and Preachers.

After Don Henrico succeeded Philip King of Castile, who sent advertisements to the Captaine of Saint Thomas, that he was inuested in the Crowne of Portugall, and Letters also to the King of Congo, to the same effect: and in his Letters proffered to discover vnto him the metall Mines, which heretofore had bene concealed from all the other Kings his Predecessors: and withall sent him diuers trials of them; beseeching him especially withall affectionate entreatie, that (as soone as possibly he could) he would furnish him with some store of Priests: But Costa, which was sent, died by the way, the Vessell wherein he sailed being cast away vpon the shoare of Portugall, and euery man drowned that was in it: and the naughtie newes were knowne by the contents of the Letters, that were found in a little Chest, which was driuen on Land by the waues of the Sea.

After this he made choise of one Odoardo Lopez a Portugall borne, from whose mouth Pigafetta tooke this present report, and put it in writing. This man had dwelt now a good time in those Regions, and was well experienced in the affaires of the World.

The summe of his Embassage was this: That he should present his Letters to the King Don Philip, and at large discourse vnto him the state, wherein the Kingdome of Congo stood, touching matter of Religion, by the reason of the former Warres, and scaritie of Priests, and thereupon request his Maiestie to provide him a competent number of Confessors, and Preachers, that might be sufficient to maintaine the Gospell in those remote Countreies, being lately conuerted to Christianitie. Moreover, that he should shew vnto him the sundrie trials of Metals, which he had made, and many other matters, which were worthe to be knowne: and withall, that he should proffer vnto him in his name, free and liberall trafficke of them, which heretofore was euer denied to his Predecessors. Touching the Pope, That he should likewise on his behalfe kisse his feet, deliuer vnto him his Letters, and recount the miserable trouble and detriment that his people had suffered for the Christian Faith. That he should recommend those poore soules to his Holinesse, and beseech him, as the vniuersall Father of all Christians, to haue compassion vpon so many faithfull persons, who because they had no Priests to deliuer the holy Faith vnto them, and to administer the wholesome Sacraments, were by little and little falling into euerlasting perdition. And being thus dispatched he departed from the Court, and went about certain seruices for the King, wherein he spent about eight moneths. So that in Ianuarie, being then Sommer time in Congo, he embarked himselfe in a Vessell of one hundred Tunne burthen, which was bound with her lading for Lisbon. But forced by leakes and winds, the Pilot thought it better to turne his courle, and taking the wind in the poope, to goe and saue themselves in the Ilands of Noua Hispania. And they arrived with much adoe, at a little Iland, called Cubagoa; and situate ouer against the Ile of Saint Margarete, where they fish for Pearles. From thence, when they had in some haste amended amended their ship, and some-what refreshed themselves, they sayled with a short cut to the firme Land, and tooke Haven in a Port, called Cumana, or (as it is called by another name) The new Kingdome of Granada in the West Indies. This battered and weather-beaten Vessell, was no sooner arriued in this safe Harbour, but it sunke presently.

While the foresaid Embassadour endeauoured in this place to recouer his former health, the company of ships, which is called La Flotta; that is to say, The Fleet, and vseth euery yeare to saile from that Coast for Castile, departed from thence, so that he was constrained to stay for a new Nauie, and so consumed a whole yeare and a halfe without doing any good. In this meane time, the King of Congo sent another Embassadour with the selfe-same commandements, called Don Pedro Antonio, the second person in all his Realm, & with him one Gaspar Diaz, a Portugal. 10

But an infortunate end had this Embassadour, for he was taken at Sea by Englisshmen, and his ship also, which being drawne towards England, when it was neere vnto the Coast, by great misfortune it ranne a-thwart the shoare, and there Don Pedro Antonio, and his Sonne were both drowned: but the Portugall and some few others with him escaped, and arriued in Spaine, at such time as the said Odoardo was come to the Court, and had entred vpon the charge of his Embassage.

There he was courteously entertained by his Catholike Maiestie, to whom he propounded the contents of his Commissions. But diuers great accidents there happened. For first, he heard the dolorous newes of the Kings death, that sent him on this message: and then the King Don Philip was wholly busied about the Conquest of England, so that his businesse went nothing for- 20 wards, but was delayed from time to time: neither did he see any meanes of dispatch, but rather he was giuen to vnderstand, that for that time they could not intend to harken vnto him.

Now the foresaid Odoardo, being afflicted with so many aduersities, renounced the World with all the deceitfull pompe and glorie thereof, and in Madrill apparelled himselfe in a grey course habit, and so went to Rome, to declare to Sixtus Quintus the Pope, the Tenor and Commission of his Embassage, because he would not altogether neglect the good intent and meaning of the King, that had sent him, although hee were now descended into a better life. Hee was kindly welcommed and receiued by his Holinesse, to whom he discoursed the miserable estate wherein the Christian people of the Realme of Congo did stand, for want of the worship and seruice of God, and also the small number of Priests, that were there to instruct them in the Do- 30 ctrine of the Gospel, and to deliuer vnto them the Sacraments of the Church, especially the multitude in that Countrey, being (as it were) innumerable, that euery day resorted together, to be baptised, instructed, confessed, and communicated. Moreouer, he made a vow and resolved in his mind, that with such store of wealth, as God had blessed him withall in Congo, (which was not very small) he would build a house, wherein for the seruice of God, there should dwell certaine learned men, and sundry Priests, to instruct the youth of those Countries in all good Languages, and in the Arts Liberall, and in the Doctrine of the Gospel, and in the Mysteries of our Salvation. Out of which House, as it were out of a holy Schoole, there might come forth from time to time, many learned men and well studyed in the Law of God, that should be able in their owne naturall Countrey Tongue, to awaken and raise againe the Faith of Christ, which 40 was now asleepe, and dried vp in those Regions: and thereby in proceesse of time there would spring vp many fruits of blessing, and vigilant soules in the Christian Faith. Hereunto hee meant also to adde an Hospitall, that might be a Recourse and Harbour for Gods poore, which comming and sayling out of strange Countries should haue reliefe and entertainment in that Hostelry, and the re be cured and restored of their infirmities and necessities. With this purpose therefore he went to Rome, to obtaine of his Holinesse a Licence to erect this Seminarie and Hospitall, and to beseech him also that he would grant him Iubilies, Indulgences, and other Dispensations, that for such Christian and wholesome workes are requisite, especially to the vse and benefit of those Countries, which are so remote from Christendome. He presented himselfe to the Pope, and deliuered vnto him his Letters of credence, and then declared vnto him at large 50 the Tenor of his Commissions, wherein hee had a gracious audience. But when the Pope did vnderstand that the Kingdome of Congo belonged to the King of Spaine, he remitted that matter wholly vnto him.

§. VII.

Of the Court of the King of Congo. Of the apparell of that people before they became Christians and after. Of the Kings Table, and manner of his Court.

The ancient apparell of the King of Congo, and his Courtiers.

In ancient time this King and his Courtiers were apparelled with certaine Cloth made of the Palme-tree (as wee haue told you before) wherewith they couered themselves from the Girdle-stead downewards, and girded the same strait vnto them with certaine Girdles made of the same stuffe, very faire and well wrought. They

They vsed also to hang before them, like an Apron, certaine delicate and daintie skinnies, of little Tygres, of Ciuet-cats, of Sabels, of Maternes, and of such like creatures for an ornament: and for a more glorious pompe and shew, they did weare vpon their shoulders a certaine Cape like a Hood. Vpon their bare skinne they had a certaine round Garment like a Rotcher, which they call Incuto, reaching downe to their knees, made after the manner of a Net, but the stufte of it was very fine cloth of the said Palme-tree, and at the skirts there hung a number of threed-tassels, that made a very gallant shew. These Rotchers were turned vp againe, and tucked vpon their right shoulder, that they might be the more at libertie on that hand. Vpon that shoulder also they had the tayle of a Zebra, fastned with a handle, which they vsed for a kind of brauerie, according to the most ancient custome of those parts. On their heads they wore Caps of yellow and red colour, square above and very little, so that they scarcely couered the tops of their heads, and worne rather for a pompe and a vanitie, then to keep them either from the Aire or from the Sunne. The most part of them went vnshod: but the King and some of the great Lords did weare certaine shooes of the old fashion, such as are to bee seene in the ancient Images of the Romanes, and these were made also of the Wood of the Palme-tree. The poorer sort and common people were apparellled from their middle downewards, after the same manner, but the cloth was courser: and the rest of their bodie all naked. The women vsed three kinds of Trauerfes, or (as it were) Aprons: beneath their Girdle-stead. One was very long and reached to their heeles: the second shorter then that, and the third shorter then both the other, with fringes about them, and euery one of these three fastned about their middle, and open before. From their breasts downewards, they had another Garment, like a kind of Doublet or Iacket, that reached but to their Girdle: and ouer their shoulders a certaine Cloake. All these seuerall Garments were made of the same cloth of the Palme-tree. They were accustomed to goe with their faces vncouered, and a little Cap on the head, like a mans Cap. The meaner sort of women were apparellled after the same manner, but their cloth was courser. Their Maid-seruants; and the basest kind of women were likewise attyred from the Girdle downeward, and all the rest of the bodie naked.

The ancient apparell of the meaner sort.

30 But after that this Kingdome had receiued the Christian Faith, the great Lords of the Court beganne to apparell themselves after the manner of the Portugals, in wearing Cloakes, Spanish Caps, and Tabbards, or wide Jackets of Scarlet, and cloth of Silke, euery man according to his wealth and abilitie. Vpon their heads they had Hats, or Caps, and vpon their feet Moyles or Pantoffles, of Veluet and of Leather, and Buskins after the Portugall fashion, and long Rapiers by their sides.

Their new kind of apparell.

The common people, that are not able to make their apparell after that manner doe keepe their old custome. The women also goe after the Portugall fashion, sauing that they weare no Cloakes, but vpon their heads they haue certaine Veiles, and vpon their Veiles blacke Veluet Caps, garnished with Jewels, and Chaines of Gold about their neckes. But the poorer sort keepe the old fashion: for onely the Ladies of the Court doe bedecke themselves in such manner as we haue told you.

After the King himselfe was conuerted to the Christian Religion, hee conformed his Court in a certaine sort after the manner of the King of Portugall. And first, for his seruice at the Table when he dineth or supbeth openly in publike, there is a Throne of Estate erected with three steps, couered all ouer with Indian Tapistrie, and thereupon is placed a Table, with a Chaire of Crimson Veluet, adorned with Bosses and Nayles of Gold. He alwayes feedeth alone by himselfe, neither doth any man euer sit at his Table, but the Princes stand about him with their heads couered. He hath a Cupboord of Plate of Gold and Siluer, and one that taketh assay of his meate and drinke.

The Court of Congo now imitateth the Court of Portugall.

50 He maintayneth a Guard of the Anzichi, and of other Nations, that keepe about his Palace, furnished with such Weapons as are aboue mentioned: and when it pleaseth him to goe abroad, they sound their great Instruments, which may be heard about fise or fixe miles, and so signifie that the King is going forth. All his Lords doe accompany him, and likewise the Portugals, in whom hee reposeth a singular trust: but very seldome it is that hee goeth out of his Palace.

Twice in a weeke hee giveth audience publikely, yet no man speaketh vnto him but his Lords. And becaule there are none, that haue any goods or Lands of their owne, but all belongeth to the Crowne, there are but few Suites or Quarrels among them, sauing peraduenture about some words.

The Customes and Lawes of Congo.

60 They vse no Writing at all in the Congo Tongue. In Cases Criminall they proceed but slenderly, for they doe very hardly and seldome condemne any man to death. If there be any Riot or Enormitie committed against the Portugals by the Moci-Conghi, (for so are the Inhabitants of the Realme of Congo, called in their owne Language) they are iudged by the Lawes of Portugall. And if any milchiefe bee found in any of them, the King confineth the Malefactor into some Desart Iland: for he thinketh it to be a greater punishment to banish him in this sort, to the end he may doe penance for his sinnes, then at one blow to execute him. And if it so happen, that those which are thus chastized doe liue ten or twelue yeares, the King vseth to pardon them, them, if they be of any consideration at all, and doth imploy them in the Service of the State, as persons that haue beene tamed and well schooled, and accustomed to suffer any hardnesse. In Ciuill disagreements there is an order, that if a Portugall haue any Suite against a Moci-Congo, he goeth to the Iudge of Congo: but if a Moci-Congo doe impleade a Portugall, he citeth him before the Consul, or Iudge of the Portugals: for the King hath granted vnto them one of their owne Nation to be Iudge in that Countrey: In their bargaines betweene them and the Portugals, they vse no Writings nor other Instruments of Bills or Bonds, but dispatch their businesse onely by word and witnesse.

No Writing.

Time measured by the Moone.

They keepe no Histories of their ancient Kings, nor any memoriall of the Ages past, because they cannot write. They measure their times generally by the Moones. They know not the houres of the day nor of the night: but they vse to say, In the time of such a man such a thing happened. They reckon the distances of Countries not by miles or by any such measure, but by the iourneyes and trauell of men, that goe from one place to another, eyther loden or vnladen. 10

Their manner of Assemblies. Their Instruments of Musick.

Touching their assembling together at Feasts, or other meetings of ioy, as for example, when they are marryed, they sing Verses and Ballads of Loue, and play vpon certaine Lutes that are made after a strange fashion. For in the hollow part and in the necke they are somewhat like vnto our Lutes, but for the flat side (where wee vse to carue a Rose, or a Rundle to let the sound goe inward) that is made not of wood, but of a skinne, as thinne as a Bladder, and the strings are made of haire, which they draw out of the Elephants tayle, and are very strong and bright: and of certaine Threeds made of the wood of Palme-tree, which from the bottome of the Instrument do reach & ascend to the top of the handle, & are tied euery one of them to his seuerall ring. For towards the necke or handle of this Lute, there are certaine rings placed some higher and some lower, whereat there hang diuers plates of Iron and Siluer, which are very thinne, and in bignes different one from another, according to the proportion of the Instrument. These rings doe make a sound of sundry tunes, according to the striking of the strings. For the strings when they are stricken, doe cause the rings to shake, and then doe the plates that hang at them, helpe them to vtter a certaine mingled and confused noyse. Those that play vpon this Instrument, doe tune the strings in good proportion, and strike them with their fingers, like a Harpe, but without any quill very cunningly: so that they make thereby (I cannot tell whether I should call it a melodie or no, but) such a sound as pleaseth and delighteth their senses well enough. 20 30

Speech by Instrument.

Besides all this (which is a thing very admirable) by this Instrument they doe vtter the conceits of their minds, and doe vnderstand one another so plainly, that euery thing almost which may be explained with the Tongue, they can declare with their hand in touching and striking this Instrument. To the sound thereof they doe dance in good measure with their feet, and follow the iust time of that Musicke, with clapping the palmes of their hands one against the other. They haue also in the Court, Flutes and Pipes, which they sound very artificially, and according to the sound they dance and moue their feet, as it were in a Moresco, with great grauitie and sobrietie. The common people doe vse little Rattles, and Pipes, and other Instruments, that make a more harsh and rude sound, then the Court-Instruments doe. 40

Their Physick.

In this Kingdome, when any are sicke, they take nothing but naturall Physicke, as Herbes, and Trees, and the barks of Trees, and Oyles, and Waters, and Stones, such as Mother Nature hath taught them. The Ague is the most common Disease that raigneth among them: and plagueth them in Winter by reason of the continuall raine, that bringeth heat and moysture with it more then in Summer, and besides that the sicknesse which heere wee call the French Disease, and Chitangas in the Congo Tongue, is not there so dangerous and so hard to be cured, as it is in our Countries.

Their Medicine for an Ague.

Their Medicine for the head-ache, & other griefes of the bodie, is letting of blood.

Their Medicine for the French Poxes.

Their Purgations.

Curing of wounds.

They heale the Ague with the poulder of a wood, called Sandale, or Sanders, whereof there is both red and grey, which is the wood of Aguila. This poulder being mingled with the Oyle of the Palme-tree, and hauing anointed the bodie of the sicke person two or three times with all from the head to the foot, the partie recouereth. When their head aketh, they let blood in the Temples, with certaine little boxing hornes: first, by cutting the skinne a little, and then applying the Cornets thereunto, which with a sucke of the mouth, will bee filled with blood: and this manner of letting blood is vsed also in Egypt. And so in any other part of a mans bodie, where there is any griefe, they draw blood in this fashion and heale it. Likewise they cure the infirmitie, called Chitangas, with the same Vnction of Sanders: whereof there are two sorts, one red (as we told you) and that is called Tanila: the other grey, and is called Chicongo: and this is best esteemed, for they will not sticke to giue or sell a slaue for a piece of it. They purge themselves with certaine barks of trees, made into powder, and taken in some drinke: and they will worke mightily and strongly. When they take these purgations, they make no great account for going abroad into the Ayre. Their wounds also they commonly cure with the iuyce of certaine Herbes, and with the Herbes themselves. 50 60

§. VIII.

Of the Countries that are beyond the Kingdome of Congo, towards the Cape of Good-

Hope: Of the Riuer Nilus, and of Sofala, Monomotapa, the Amazones, Saint LAURENCE, and other Ethiopian

Countries.

10 QUIMBEKE (which is the Kingdome of Matama) from the first Lake, and the Confines of Angola, containeth althe rest of the Countrey Southwards, till you come to the Riuer of Brauagull, which springeth out of the Mountaines of the Moone, and ioyneth with the Riuer Magnice, and that springeth out of the fore said first Lake: These Mountaines are diuided by the Tropicke of Capricorne, towards the Pole Antarcticke, and beyond this Tropicke lyeth all the Countrey and borders of the Cape of Good-Hope, which are not ruled and gouerned by any one King, but by diuers and sundry seuerall Princes. In the middelt betweene that Cape and the Tropicke, are the said Mountaines of the Moone, so famous and so greatly renowned among the ancient Writers, who doe assigne them to be the originall head and spring of the Riuer Nilus: which is very false and vntrue, as the situation of the Countrey doth plainly shew, and as we a little here-20 after will discover vnto you. This Countrey is full of high and rough Mountaines: it is verie cold, and not habitable: It is frequented and haunted with a few persons that liue after the manner of the Arabians, vnder little Cabbins in the open fieldes, and apparelled with the skins of certaine beasts. It is a sauage and rusticall Nation, without all faith and credite, neither will they suffer any strangers among them. Their furniture is Bowes and Arrowes. They feed vpon such fruits as the land breedeth, and also vpon the flesh of beasts.

Among these Mountaines of the Moone, there is a Lake called Gale: a very little one it is, and lyeth somewhat towards the West. Out of this Lake there issueth a Riuer, called Camissa, and by the Portugals, named, the Sweete Riuer, which at the point of the Cape of Good-Hope, voydeth it selfe into the Sea, in that very place that is termed, The False Cape. For the shippes 30 of the Indies sayling that way, doe first discover another greater Cape, which is called, The Cape of the Needles, and then afterwards this lesser Cape: Whereupon they call it the False Cape, because it is hid and couered with the true and great Cape. Betweene these two Capes or Promontories, there is the distance of an hundred miles, containing the largenesse and breadth of this famous Cape: which being diuided into two points, as it were into two hornes, it ma-keth a Gulfe, where sometimes the Portugall ships doe take fresh water, in the Riuer that they call the Sweete Riuer.

Beyond the Cape or Point of the Needles, there are many competent Harboroughs and Hauens, the principall whereof is Seno Formoso, the Faire Bay: and Seno del Lago, the Bay of the Lake: For there the Sea maketh a certaine Gulfe, wherein are sundry Ilands and Ports: and somewhat beyond there runneth into the Sea the Riuer of Saint Christopher, and at the mouth thereof there lye three pretie Ilets. And a little further forwards, the Coast runneth all along by a Countrey, which the Portugals call, Terra do Natal, the Land of the Natinitie, because it was first discovered at Christmas: and so reacheth to the Cape, called Della Pescheria. Between which Cape and the Riuer Magnice, within the Land is the Kingdome of Butua, whose Territories are from the roots or bottomie of the Mountaines of the Moone, vntill you come to the 30 Riuer Magnice towards the North, where the Countrey of Monomotapa standeth, and West-wards from the Riuer Brauagul towards the Sea, all along the bankes of the Riuer Magnice. In this Kingdome there are many Mines of Gold, and a people that is of the same qualities and conditions, that the people of Monomotapa is, as hereafter shall bee shewed vnto you. And so going along the shoares of the Ocean, you come to the Riuer Magnice, which lyeth in the very entrance of the Kingdome of Sofala, and the Empire of Monopotapa.

but by the Inhabitants it is named Nagoa. The second tooke the name of one Lorenzo Mar-

they are called, Toroa: out of which Mountaines they did thinke, that famous Nilus tooke also his beginning: but they were vtterly deceiued. For (as wee haue already told you) the first Lake ariseth not out of those Mountaines, but lyeth a great way distant from it: and betweene it and them, is there a very great and a huge low plaine. Besides that, the streames that flow from the said Mountaines, doe runne towards the East, and bestow their Waters vpon other great Riuers, so that it is not possible for them to passe into the foresaid Lake, much lesse into Nilus, considering especially that the Riuer Magnice, springeth out of that first Lake, and by a farre different course from the course of Nilus, runneth towards the East, and so ioyneth it selfe with the two Riuers aforesaid. The third, is called Arroe, and ariseth on another side out of the Mountaines of the Gold Mines of Monomotapa, and in some places of this Riuer there are found some small pieces of Gold among the Sand.

These three Riuers enter into the great Magnice, neere vnto the Sea, and all foure together doe make there a great Water, in a very large Channell, and so dischargeth it selfe into the Ocean. From the mouth of this Riuer all along the Sea Coast, stretcheth the Kingdome of Sofala, vnto the Riuer Cuama, which is so called of a certaine Castle or Fortresse that carrieth the same name, and is possessed by Mahometans and Pagans: but the Portugals call it, The mouthes of Cuama; because at the entry into the Sea, this Riuer diuideth it selfe into seuen mouthes, where there are five speciall Islands, besides diuers others that lie vp the Riuer, all very full, and well peopled with Pagans. This Cuama commeth out of the same Lake, and from the same springs from whence Nilus floweth. And thus the Kingdome of Sofala is comprised within the said two Riuers, Magnice and Cuama, vpon the Sea coast. It is but a small Kingdome, and hath but a few Houses or Townes in it: The chiefe and principall head whereof, is an Island that lyeth in the Riuer called Sofala, which giueth the name to all the whole Countrey. It is inhabited by Mahometans, and the King himselfe is of the same sect, and yeildeth obedience to the Crowne of Portugall, because he will not be subiect to the Empire of Monomotapa. And therevpon, the Portugals there doe keepe a Fort in the mouth of the Riuer Cuama, and doe trade in those Countries for Gold, and Iuory, and Amber, which is found vpon that Coast, and good store of Slaues, and instead thereof, they leaue behind them Cotton-cloath, and Silkes that are brought from Cambata, and is the common apparell of those people. The Mahometans that at this present doe inhabite those Countries, are not naturally borne there, but before the Portugals came into those quarters, they Trafficked thither in small Barkes, from the Coast of Arabia Felix. And when the Portugals had conquered that Realme, the Mahometans stayed there still, and now they are become neither vtter Pagans, nor holding of the Sect of Mahomet.

From the shoares and Coast, that lyeth betweene the two foresaid Riuers of Magnice and Cuama, within the Land spreadeth the Empire of Monomotapa, where there is very great store of Mines of Gold, which is carried from thence into all the Regions thereabouts, and into Sofala, and into the other parts of Africa. And some there be that will say, that Solomons Gold, which he had for the Temple of Ierusalem, was brought by Sea out of these Countries. A thing in truth not very vnlikely: For in the Countries of Monomotapa, there doe remaine to this day many ancient buildings of great worke, and singular Architecture, of Stone, of Lime, and of Timber, the like whereof are not to be seene in all the Prouinces adioyning.

The Empire of Monomotapa is very great, and for people infinite. They are Gentiles and Pagans, of colour blacke, very couragious in Warre, of a middle stature, and swift of foot. There are many Kings that are vassals and subiects to Monomotapa, who do oftentimes rebell and make warre against him. Their weapons are Bowes and Arrowes, and light Darts. This Emperour maintaineth many Armies in severall Prouinces, diuided into Legions, according to the vse and customes of the Romanes. For being so great a Lord as he is, he must of necessitie be in continuall warre, for the maintenance of his estate. And among all the rest of his Souldiers, the most valourous in name, are his Legions of Women, whom he esteemeth very highly, and accounteth them as the very sinewes and strength of his militarie forces. These Women doe burne their left paps with fire, because they should be no hindrance vnto them in their shooting, after the vse and manner of the ancient Amazons, that are so greatly celebrated by the Historiographers of former prophane memories. For their weapons, they practise Bowes and Arrowes: They are very quicke and swift, liuely and couragious, very cunning in shooting, but especially and aboue all, venturous and constant in fight. In their battailes they vse a warlike kind of craft and subtiltie: For they haue a custome, to make a shew that they would flye and runne away, as though they were vanquished and discomfited, but they will diuers times turne themselues backe, and vex their enemies mightily with the shot of their Arrowes. And when they see their Aduersaries so greedy of the victorie, that they begin to disperse and scatter themselues, then will they suddenly turne againe vpon them, and with great courage and fiercenesse make a cruell slaughter of them. So that partly with their swiftnesse, and partly with their deceitfull wiles, and other cunning shifts of warre, they are greatly feared in all those parts. They doe enioy by the Kings good fauour certaine Countries, where they dwell alone by themselues: and sometime sometimes they choose certaine men at their owne pleasure, with whom they doe keepe company for generations sake: So that if they do bring forth Male-children, they send them home to their fathers houses: but if they be Female, they reserve them to themselves, and breed them in the exercise of warfare.

The Empire of this Monomotapa lyeth (as it were) in an Iland, which is made by the Sea-coast, by the River Magnice, by a piece of the Lake from whence Magnice floweth, and by the River Cuama. It bordereth towards the South, vpon the Lords of the Cape of Good-Hope, before mentioned, and Northward vpon the Empire of Mohenemugi, as by and by shall be shewed vnto you.

The situation of the Empire of Monomotapa.

10 But now returning to our former purpose, that is to say, to runne forwards vpon the Sea-coast, after you haue passed ouer some part of the River Cuama, there is a certaine little Kingdome vpon the Sea, called Angoscia, which taketh the name of certaine Ilands there so called, and lye directly against it. It is inhabited with the like people, both Mahometans and Gentiles, as the Kingdome of Sofala is. Merchants they are, and in small Vessels doe Trafficke along that Coast with the same Wares and Commodities, where-with the people of Sofala doe Trade.

The kingdome
of Angoscia.

A little beyond, suddenly starteth vp in sight the Kingdome of Mozambique, situate in foureteene degrees and a halfe towards the South, and taketh his name of three Ilands, that lye in the mouth of the River Meghinicate, where there is a great Hauen and a safe, and able to receive all manner of ships. The Realme is but small, and yet aboundeth in all kind of Victuals.

20 It is the common landing place for all Vessels that sayle from Portugall, and from India into that Countrey. In one of these Iles, which is the chiefe and principall, called Mozambique, and giueth name to all the rest; as also to the whole Kingdome, and the Hauen aforesaid, wherein there is erected a Fortresse, guarded with a Garrison of Portugals, whereupon all the other Fortresses that are on that Coast doe depend, and from whence they fetch all their prouision: all the Armadas and Fleetes that sayle from Portugall to the Indies, if they cannot finish and performe their Voyage, will goe and Winter (I say) in this Iland of Mozambique, and those that trauell out of India to Europe, are constrained of necessitie to touch at Mozambique, to furnish themselves with Victuals. This Iland, when the Portugals discovered India, was the first place 30 where they learned the language of the Indians, and provided themselves of Pilots to direct them in their course. The people of this Kingdome are Gentiles: Rusticall and rude they bee, and of colour blacke. They go all naked. They are valiant and strong Archers, and cunning Fishers, with all kind of hookes.

tants of *Mo-

of Quiloa.

As you go on forwards vpon the foresaid Coast, there is another Iland, called Quiloa, in quantitie not great, but in excellency singular: For it is situate in a very coole and freshe Ayre: It is replenished with Trees that are alwaies greene, and affordeth all varietie of Victuals. It lyeth at the mouth of the River Coano, which springeth out of the same Lake from whence Nilus floweth, and so runneth about sixtie miles in length, till it commeth neere to the Sea, and there it hath a mightie streame, and in the very mouth of it maketh a great Iland, which 40 is peopled with Mahometans and Idolaters, and a little beyond that, towards the Coast on the West, you may see the said Iland of Quiloa. This Iland is inhabited with Mahometans also, which are of colour some-thing whitish. They are well appparelled, and trimly adorned with Cloath of Silke and Cotten: Their Women doe vse ornaments of Gold, and Jewels about their hands and their neckes, and haue good store of household-stuffe made of Silver. They are not altogether so blacke as the men are: and in their limbs they are very well proportioned. Their houses are made of Stone, and Lime, and Timber, very well wrought, and of good Architecture, with Gardens and Orchards, full of Hearbs and sundry Fruits. Of this Iland the whole Kingdome tooke the name, which vpon the Coast extendeth it selfe from Capo Delgado, (the Cape Delicate, that bordereth Mozambique and Quiloa), and is situate in nine degrees towards the South, 50 and from thence it runneth out vnto the aforesaid River of Coano. In old time the Kingdome of Quiloa was the chiefe of all the Principalities there adioyning, and stood neere to the Sea: but when the Portugals arrived in those Countries, the King trusted so much to himselfe, that he thought he was able with his owne forces not onely to defend himselfe against them, but also to drue them from those places which they had already surprised. Howbeit the matter fell out quite contrary. For when it came to Weapons, he was vtterly ouerthrowne and discomfited by the Portugals, and so fled away. But they tooke and possessed the Iland, and enriched themselves with the great spoiles and booties that they found therein. They erected there also a Fortresse, which was after ward pulled downe by the commandement of the King of Portugall, because he thought it not necessarie, considering that there were others sufficient enough for

And heere we may not leaue behind vs the Ile of Saint Laurence, so called by the Portugals, because they did first discover it vpon that Martyrs feast day. It is so great, that it containeth in length almost a thousand miles, and standeth right ouer against the Coast which wee haue described, beginning directly at the mouthes of the River Magnice, which are in sixe and twentie degrees of the South, and so going forwards to the North, it endeth right against the mouths of Cuama in the Kingdome of Quiloa. Betweene this Iland and the firme Land, there is (as it were) a Channell, which at the entry West-ward, is three hundred and fortie miles broad: in the middelt where it is narrowest, ouer against the Iland of Mozambique, one hundred and seuentie miles, and for the rest, it enlargeth it selfe very much towards India, and containeth many Iles within it. The ships that goe from Spaine into India, or returne from India to Spaine, doe alwaies for the most part passe and sayle in, and through this Channell, if by time or weather they be not forced to the contrary. And surely, this Iland deserueth to be inhabited with a better people, because it is furnished with singular Commodities. For it hath many safe & sure hauens. It is watred with sundry Riuer, that cause the earth to bring forth fruits of diuers kinds, as Pulse, and Rice, and other Graine, Oranges, Limons, Citrons, and such like fruit. Flesh of all sorts, as Hens, &c. and Venison, as wilde Boare, & Deere, and such like, and all this of a very good taste and relish, because the soyle is very fat: their Fish also is exceeding good. The Inhabitants are Pagans, with some of the Sect of Mahomet among them. They are of the colour which the Spaniards call Mulato, betweene black and white. Very warlike they are, and giuen to their weapons, which are Bowes and Arrowes, and Darts of very light Wood, strenghtned with Iron, whereof they make the heads of their Darts, which are crooked like hookes: and these they will cast and throw most slightly and cunningly. They vse also Targets, and Iackes that are made of certaine beasts skinnes, wherewith they saue themselves in fight from the blowes of their enemies.

This Iland is diuided among seuerall Princes, that are at enmitie one with another: for they are in continuall Warres, and persecute one another with Armes. There are diuers Mines of Gold, of Siluer, of Copper, of Iron, and of other Metals. The sauage people doe not vse to sayle out of the Iland, but onely from one side to the other they goe coasting along the shoares, with certaine Barks that are made but of one stocke of a Tree, which they hollow for that purpose. The most part of them doe not willingly entertaine strangers, neither will they consent that they should Trafficke or conuerse with them. Notwithstanding, in certaine Ports the Portugals doe vse to Trade with the Ilanders, for Amber, Waxe, Siluer, Copper, Rice, and such other things, but they neuer come vpon the Land. In the Channell before mentioned, there are diuers Ilands, some greater, and some lesse, inhabited with Mahometans. The chiefe of them is the Ile of Saint Christopher, and then of Santo Spirito: and another, called Magliaglie, and so the rest, as the Iles of Comoro, Anzoame, Maiotto, and some other.

But let vs returne to the Sea side, and prosecute the Coast of the Kingdome of Quiloa, where we left. Next vnto it, is the Kingdome of Mombaza, in the height of three degrees and a halfe towards the South, which taketh the name from an Iland inhabited with Mahometans, which is also called Mombaza, where there is a faire Citie, with houses that haue many Sollers, furnished Pictures, both grauen and painted. The King thereof is a Mahometan, who taking vpon him to resist the Portugals, receiued the same successe that hapned to the King of Quiloa, so that the Citie was raniacked and spoyled by his enemies, who found therein good store of Gold and Siluer, and Pearle, and Cloath of Cotton, and of Silke, and of Gold, and such other Commodities. This Kingdome lyeth betweene the borders of Quiloa, and Melinde, and is inhabited with Pagans and Mahometans, and yeeldeth obedience to the Empire of Mohenemugi.

A little beyond is the Kingdome of Melinde, which being likewise but a little one, extendeth it selfe vpon the Sea Coast, as farre as the Riuer Chimanchi, and lyeth in the height of two degrees and a halfe: and vp the streame of that Riuer, it reacheth to the Lake Calice, the space of one hundred miles within land. Neere vnto the Sea, along the bankes of this Riuer, there is a great deale of Countrey inhabited by Pagans and Mahometans, of colour almost white. Their houses are built after our fashion. But there is one particularitie to be admired, that their Muttons or Sheepe, are twice as great as the Sheep of our Countrey: for they diuide them into fise quarters, (if a man may so call them) and reckon the tayle for one, which commonly weigheth some fise and twentie, or thirtie pound. The Women are white, and sumptuously dressed, after the Arabian fashion, with Cloath of Silke. About their neckes and hands, and armes, and feet, they vse to weare Jewels of Gold and Siluer: When they go abroad out of their houses, they couer themselves with Tassata, so that they are not knowne but when they lift themselves. In this Countrey there is a very good Hauen, which is a landing place for the Vessels that sayle through those Seas. Generally, the people are very kind, true and trustie, and conuerse with Strangers. They haue alwaies entertained and welcomed the Portugals, and haue reposed great confidence in them, neither haue they euer offered them any wrong in any respect.

In the Sea betweene these two Capes of Mombaza and Melinde, there are three Iles: the first, is called Monfie; the second, Zanzibar; and the third, Pemba; all inhabited only with Mohometans, that are of colour white. These Iles abound in all things as the others do, whereof we made mention before. These people are somewhat enclined to Armes: but they are in deed more addicted to dresse and manure their ground: For there groweth much Sugar, which in small Barks they carrie away to sell into the firme Land, with other fruits of that Countrey.

Besides

Besides these three Realmes last described, Quiola, Melinde, and Mombaza, within the Land is the great Empire of Mohenemugi, towards the West. It bordereth vpon the South, with the Kingdome of Mozambique, and with the Empire of Monomotapa to the Riuer Coano, vpon the West with the Riuer Nilus, betweene the two Lakes; and vpon the North it ioyneth with the Empire of Prete-Gianni. Towards the Sea, this Emperour standeth in good termes of peace with the foresaid Kings of Quiola, Melinde, and Mombaza, by reason of their trafficke together, and the better to secure the entercourse and trade by Sea: by meanes whereof they haue brought vnto them much cloth of Cotton, and cloth of Silke from diuers Countries, and other merchandises that are well esteemed in these parts: and particularly certaine little balls, that are made in the Kingdome of Cambaja, of a kind of Bitumen or clammye Clay, like vnto Glasse, but that it is (as it were) of a red colour, which they vse to weare about their neckes, like a paire of Beades instead of Neck-laces. It serueth them also instead of Money, for of Gold they make none account. Likewise with the Silkes that are brought vnto them, they doe apparell themselves from the girdle downewards. In exchange and barter of all these commodities, they giue Gold, Siluer, Copper, and Iuorie.

But on the other side towards Monomotapa, there are continuall warres; yea, and sometimes so bloudie, that it is hardly discerned who hath gotten the victorie. For in that Border there meet together two of the greatest and most warlike Powers and Forces that are in all those Regions: that is to say, on the Partie of Monomotapa, there came forth into the field the Amazones, of whom wee told you before; and on the other partie of Mohenemugi are the Giacchi, (as the Moci-Congi doe call them) but in their owne tongue they are called Agagi, who did sometime so greatly afflict the Kingdome of Congo, as you may remember. Neither are these people lesse couragious or strong then the Amazones, but are of a blacke complexion, and presumptuous countenances. They doe vse to marke themselves about the lip vpon their cheekes with certaine lines, which they make with Iron instruments and with fire. Moreover, they haue a custome to turne their eye-lids backwards: so that their skin being all blacke, and in that blacknesse shewing the white of their eyes, and those marks in their faces, it is a strange thing to behold them. For it is indeed a very dreadfull and Deuillish sight. They are of bodie great, but deformed, and liue like beasts in the field, and feed vpon mans flesh. In fight they shew themselves exceedingly couragious, and doe vtter most horrible shouting and crying, of purpose to daunt and affright their Enemies. Their weapons are Darts, and Pauises of Leather that couer all their whole bodie, and so defend themselves therewith. Sometimes they will encampe together, and sticke their Pauises in the ground, which are vnto them instead a trench. Sometimes they will goe forwards in the battell, and shrowd themselves vnder them, and yet annoy their aduersaries with the shot of their Darts. And thus by warlike policie they doe ordinarily plague their Enemies, by endeavouring with all subtiltie to make them spend their shot in vaine, vpon their Targets: and when they see that they haue made an end of shooting, then doe they renew the battell a fresh, and druing them to flight, make a cruell slaughter of them without all mercie. And this is the manner which they vse against their Enemies, and the Amazones. But the Amazones, on the other side, which are very well acquainted herewithall, doe fight against them with other militarie stratagems (as we haue aboue declared) and doe ouercome the forces of their Aduersaries with their swiftnesse, and great skill in matters of Warre. For, they doe assure themselves, that if they be taken, they shall be deuoured: and therefore with doubled courage they fight for life, that they might ouercome, and in any case saue their liues from that fierce and cruell Nation. And in this sort doe they maintaine continuall Warre, alwaies with great mortalitie on both sides. These Agags dwell at the beginning of the Riuer Nilus, (where it runneth Northwards out of the Lake,) vpon both the bankes of the Riuer, till it come to a certaine limite, wherein they are bounded; and then Westwards all ouer the bankes of the said Nilus, euen to the second Lake, and to the borders of the Empire of Prete-Gianni. Touching these Agags, I thought it conuenient in this place to adde this, which before I had omitted. Betweene the confines of this Mohenemugi, and Prete-Gianni, there are sundrie other petie Lords, and people that are of a white colour, and yeeld obedience sometimes to one of these two Princes, and sometimes to the other. They are men of a farre greater stature then all the rest of the people in those Countries.

Towards the Cape of Guarda-Fuy, there are many places inhabited with Mahometans, all along the Sea-side, of colour being white. Vpon this shoare there are diuers good Hauens, where the ships of sundrie Countries doe trafficke with the foresaid merchandises. The first of these places, is called Patee; the second, Brana; the third, Magadoxo; the fourth, Affion; and the last is, the famous Promontorie and Cape of Guarda-Fuy: which because it is very great, and iutteth out a good way into the Sea, is well knowne to all Sailers that come from India, and from Ormuz, and from Arabia Felix. It is the place and harbour where the Portugals are wont to attend, and yeerely with their Nauies to watch for the Vessels of the Mahometans, that being laden with precious merchandises, doe saile into those parts without their licence, they being the Lords of the trafficke and trade for Spicerie, and all other commodities that are brought from

And this is the farthest place wherein you shall find any people with white skins: for here the men beginne to be all blacke. Then there is Ceila, and Dalaca, and Malaca, and Carachim: and all this Coast is called in that Countrie language, Ba-ragiam. The People that inhabite therein are all blacke, valiant in Armes, and apparelled from the girdle downewards with cloth of Cotton: but those that are of the best account among them, doe weare vpon their shoulders certaine Clokes with Hoods, called Bernussi, such as the old Romans vsed, and were termed Saga Romana. CHAP. V.

The Voyage of Sir FRANCIS ALVAREZ, a Portugall Priest, made vnto the Court of PRETE IANNI, the great Christian Emperour of Ethiopia.

I know not who translated this Booke, I found it in Master Hackluyes papers, and haue abbreviated it where I could; al-

N the Name of Iesus, amen. I, Francis Alvarez, Priest of the Masse, which by especiall commandement of the King our Lord, Don Emanuel (whom God hath receiued into his glorie) went with Edward Galuano, a Gentleman of his house, and one of 60 his Counsellors; which was Secretarie vnto the King Don Alfonso, and vnto King Iohn, his Sonne, till his dying day; and by King Don Emanuel was sent Ambassadour vnto King Prete Ianni, haue determined to write all things which hapned vnto vs in this Voyage, and to describe the Countreies wherein we were, with the qualities, customes, and vsages ges thereof, and how they agree with Christian Religion. Neither doe I here take upon me to reprehend or approve their customes and vsages, but leane them wholly vnto the Readers (which are able to instruct mee) to praise, amend, and correct whatsoeuer they shall thinke good. And because I may seeme sometimes speaking of one Countrey, and of another, to confound the same together, I say, that wee were resident in these Countreies for the space of sixe yeeres together, wherein I sought to know a great part of the Countreies, Kingdomes, and Signories of the said Prete Ianni, and their customes and vsages, some by sight, and some others by the report of credible persons. And euer, as I came to the knowledge of them, so I put them downe in writing, that is to say, deliuering such things as I saw, as hauing seene them; and things reported, as receiued by hearing: and therefore I sweare and protest vpon my conscience, that I will not wittingly report any vnto. And euen as I hope and trust in our Lord God, that my confession shall be true vnto my liues end, so likewise shall this my present writing be true: for he that lyeth to his neighbour, lyeth to God.

10 with marginall notes, &c. He that compareth these Relations with those of the Great Mogoll in Sir T. Roe, shall find great correspondence in the vnciuill customes whereinto wild Maestrie and barbarous Greatnesse, both here and there, haue degenerated: both vast bodies rather then strong; the one flourishing, the other fallen, and now retayning but the struggling extremes of that giantly vnweldinesse here by this eye-witnesse in those times obserued. He calls him Prete or Priest Iohn, following the vulgar error, growing from the relations of a Priest Iohn in Asia, and by ignorance applied to this Negus of Ethiopia, as in my Pilgrimage you may see at large. I esteeme his relations true in those things which he saith he saw: in some others which he had by relation of enlarging Trauellers, or boasting Abissines, hee may perhaps sometimes rather mendacia dicere then mentiri. Euen yet the Law-giuer is not departed from Iuda, it Melchis posteritie hath euer since reigned, wily wits had their pia fraudes to make Religion a stirrup of State.

¶ I. MATTHEW the Ambassadour of PRETE IANNI, is conducted by the Portugals vnto the Haven of Maczua in the red Sea, and what hapned to his death.

30 WHereas I said that I went with Edward Galuano (whom God pardon) true it is that I did so, and he died in Comoran, an Ile of the red Sea, neither tooke his Ambassage any effect, during the time that Lopez Suarez was Captaine generall of the Indies. Diego Lopez de Sequeira succeeding Suarez in the gouernment of India, effected that which Lopez Suarez would neuer execute, to wit, the conducting of Matthew (who was sent Ambassadour from Prete Ianni to the King of Portugall) to the Haven of Maczua, neere vnto Ercoco, being a Port-towne of Prete Ianni. This Diego Lopez prepared a goodly and great Fleet, wherewith we sailed into the red Sea, and arriued at the said Island of Maczua on Monday in the Octaues of Easter, the sixteenth of the moneth of Aprill, in the yeere 1520. which Island we found abandoned and forsaken by the Inhabitants, because that five or sixe dayes before they had knowledge of our comming. This Ile is distant from the Continent about two Crosbow-shots, whither the Moores of the said Island were fled with their goods. Our Fleet therefore riding betweene the Continent and the Island. The Tuesday following, there came vnto vs one Christian and a Moore from the Towne of Ercoco. The Christian said that the Towne of Ercoco belonged to the Christians, and was vnder the Iurisdiction of a great Lord, called Barnagasso, being subiect vnto Prete Ianni; and that the Inhabitants of this Ile of Maczua, and of Ercoco, when the Turkes came thither, fled all into the Mountaines; but at this present they would not flee away, hauing vnderstood that wee were Christians. Our Generall hauing heard thus much, gaue thanks to God, that he was come to the happie knowledge of Christians; and this procured great fauour vnto Matthew, which before that time was little accounted of.

50 2. The day following being Wednesday, the Captaine of the said Towne of Ercoco came to speake with our Generall, and presented foure Oxen vnto him, and the Generall gaue him very courteous and honourable entertainment.

Twentie or foure and twentie miles from this place standeth a very high Mountaine, with a famous Monasterie thereupon, which Matthew oftentimes made mention of, being called the Monasterie of Bisian, that is, Of the Vision. The Friars of this Monasterie hauing knowledge of vs, came seuen of them the Thursday after the Octaues, to visite vs; whom our Generall and all his people went on shoare to meet, with great ioy and gladnesse: and they seemed to reioyce no lesse; and said, that they had long time looked for Christians, because they had certaine Prophecies in their written Booke, which foretold that Christians should arrive at this Haven, and that a pit should there be digged, after the opening whereof, no more Moores should dwell in that place: with many other Speeches tending to the like purpose. At all these things the Ambassadour Matthew was present, whom the foresaid Friars did greatly honour, kissing his hands and his shoulders, according to their manner; and he, on the other side, tooke great delight in them also. These Friars said that they obserued then the Feast of Easter, and eight dayes next ensuing,

The Chapters, as they are diuided in Ramusio, are expressed by the figures in the beginnings of the lines: which method I haue reduced to our wonted forme of Paragraphs, lest so many diuisions should make the Booke to swell ouer-much. fuings, and that during those eight dayes they vsed neither to trauell, nor to doe any other work; but so soone as they heard say that Christians were arriued at that Hauen (a thing which they so earnestly desired) they craued licence of their Superiour to vndertake this iourney for the seruice of God, and that Barnagasso was likewise informed of our arriuall, but that he would not set forward out of his house till eight dayes after Easter.

3. These Friars vse to carrie Crosses in their hands, and other people weare them about their neckes, made of blacke wood, and all our companie bought of the same Crosses which they weare about their neckes, because it was a new thing, and not vsuall amongst vs. While these Friars abode with vs, the Generall commanded one Fernando Diaz, which vnderstood the Arabike Tongue, to goe and view their Monasterie.

4. On Tuesday the foure and twentieth of Aprill, Barnagasso came to the Towne of Ercoco, and gaue vs aduertisement of his arriuall. Order was taken, that they should meet one another in the mid-way. Barnagasso came thither first, but he would not come to the place which was prepared for him. The Generall being lighted, seing that he would not come thither, caused the preparatiues to be carried before neere vnto the place where he stood: which againe, to maintayne his grandure and reputation, would not once stirre with his people to come vnto the place prepared, so that the said Anthonie de Saldanza and Matthew the Ambassadour, were constrained to returne againe, which in the end resolued, that both of them at one instant, should set forward, that is to say, the Generall and Barnagasso, and so they did, meeting together and conferring in a large champaine field, as they sate on the ground vpon certaine Carpets. And among many discourses that they had together, giuing thanks to God for this their enteruiew. Barnagasso taking a Crosse of Siluer in his hand (which was there readie for the same purpose) said, that he sware vpon the signe of the Crosse, vpon which our Lord suffered his Passion, in the Name of Prete Ianni his Master, that he would alwaies fauour and aide the people and affaires of the King of Portugals, and also assist his Captaines which should arriue at that Hauen, or in any other Hauens or Lands, where it lay in him to aide and assist them, and likewise that he would take into his protection the Ambassadour Matthew, and other Ambassadors, which it pleased the Generall to send into the Kingdomes and Dominions of Prete Ianni, with all such people and goods as they should carrie with them.

The Generall sware, on the other part, to doe the like for the Subiects and Affaires of Prete Ianni, and of Barnagasso, there and in every place where he should find them, and that the rest of the Captaines and Lords of the King of Portugall should doe the like. The Generall gaue vnto Barnagasso a faire Armour, and certaine pieces of cloth of Silke; and Barnagasso gaue vnto the Generall a faire Horse and a Mule: and so they departed glad and contented on either part.

This Barnagasso had in his traine two hundred persons mounted vpon Horses and Mules, and two thousand Footmen. Our Gentlemen and Captaines seeing these so good newes which God had sent vs, and that a doore was opened to exalt the Catholike Faith, whereof afore wee had small hope of any successe, all men holding this Matthew for no true Ambassadour, but for a false man and a Counterfeit, whereupon they were onely of opinion to put him on Land, and let him goe his way, when they had seene these things (as wee haue said before) they all rouzed vp themselves, requesting the Generall of his fauour, that hee would suffer them to goe with the said Matthew to Prete Ianni, in that Ambassage; considering that by that which they had seene, it was perfectly knowne that the said Matthew was a true Ambassadour. And albeit, many requested this charge, yet was it granted to Roderigo de Lima: and the Generall appointed certaine that should goe with him, which were these, George de Breu, Lopez de Gama, Iohn Scolaro Secretarie of the Ambassage, Iohn Goncalues Interpretor and Factor of the same Ambassage, Emanuel de Mares an Organist, Pedro Lopez, Master Iohn the Physician, Gaspar Pereira, Stephen Pagliarte, both Kinsmen of Don Roderigo, Iohn Fernandez, Lazarus de Andrada Painter, Alfonso Menzdez, and my selfe, Francis Aluarez Priest, though vnworthy. All we before mentioned went in the company of Don Roderigo, and likewise, three Portugals accompanied Matthew, of whom, the one was named Magaglianes, another Aluarenga, the third, Diego Fernandez, Presents also were prouided.

We went to Ercoco, where we were appointed by Barnagasso, which caused vs to lodge two or three Crosse-bow-shoots, distant from the Towne in a certaine Plaine, which is at the foot of a Mountaine, whither immediately hee sent vs of free gift an Oxe, and Bread and Wine of the Countrey. We staid there, because in that place they were to prouide vs of Horses and Camels to carrie our goods. This was vpon a Friday, and because in this Countrey they obserue the old and the new Law, we rested the Saturday and the Sunday to keepe both those dayes holy.

In this meane space, the Ambassadour Matthew, dealt very effectually with Don Roderigo, and with vs all, not to stay with Barnagasso, although hee were a great Lord, but that it was farre better to goe vnto the Monastery of the Vision, where wee should haue farre better dispatch. Whereupon, giuing him to vnderstand, that wee were not to stay with him, hee departed and went his way, neuerthelesse hee gaue vs fourteene Horses and tenne Camels to carrie our goods.

6. We departed out of this Plaine, neere vnto the Towne of Ercoco, on Munday, the thirtieth of Aprill, wee trauelled not aboue two miles from that place, but that wee rested about noone, neere vnto a Riuer which was dryed vp, which had no water sauing in certaine small Pits. And because the Countrey through which we were to trauell, was dry and barren, and the heate extreme; each of vs carried with him his Vessels and Bottles of Leather full of water. Vpon the bankes of this Riuer grew many trees of diuers sorts, among which were Sallowes, and trees of bearing the fruit, called Inuba, with other fruitlesse trees. While we rested by this Riuer, about noone there came a Gentleman vnto vs, named Framasqual, which in our Language signifieth, The Seruant of the Crosse, who in his blacknesse was so faire; that he seemed to be a Gentleman indeed, and they said that he was allyed to Barnagasso, that is to say, his Wiues Brother. Before he came at vs, he lighted from his Horse, because this is their custome, and they vse it also for a courtesie. The Ambassadour Matthew, hearing of his comming, said he was a Thiefe, and came to rob vs, and that we should all betake vs to our Weapons; and Matthew himselte caught vp his Sword, and put on his Head-piece. Framasqual hearing this noyse, sent to craue leaue to come vnto vs, and though he could not obtaine it of Matthew, yet neuerthelesse, he came vnto vs as a man well brought vp and very courteous, and as one that had bene conuersant at the Court. This Gentleman had a very good Horse before him, and a faire Mule whereon hee rode, and foure men which went by him on foot.

7. From this Lodging we departed all together, and the said Gentleman riding vpon his Mule with his Horse before him, accosted our Ambassadour, Don Roderigo with his Interpreter, and they rode a great while conferring and deuising together. Hee was in his conference and in his answeres very gentle, and courteous, and the Ambassadour tooke singular delight in him. Wee found a Carauan of Camels and people, which came from Ercoco, because they trauell not but in Carauans for feare of theeues. Wee lodged all in a Wood where there was water, being an ordinary place for Carauans to lodge in, and the foresaid Framasqual remayned with vs, where we and those of the Carauan kept watch all night for feare of wild beasts. The next morning, we departed from this place, alwayes traueilling ouer dry Riuer and Brookes, most huge Mountaines standing on both sides of the way, with great Woods and Trees of diuers sorts, most beautifull and tall, the greatest part whereof were without fruit, and among them were some which I my selfe knew, being called Tamarindi, which beare clusters of fruit like vnto Grapes, which being pressed are somewhat blacke, because they make Wine of them, some quantitie whereof they carrie vnto all their Faies, as they vse to make of Raisins. The Riuer and wayes whereby we passed, seemed to be high and ragged, which commeth to passe through the fury of the water of stormes and tempests mingled with Thunder, which waters hinder not the way, according as they told vs, and as we saw our selues in other places like vnto these. The remedie was at the time of these stormes to stay vpon the side of some Hill, the space of two houres, vntill the force of these stormes be runne downe. And how great and terrible soeuer these Riuer became through the foresaid showres, the water is no sooner false from the said Mountaines, and come into the Plaine, but it is disperfed and foked vp, and neuer commeth vnto the Sea: neither could we learne that any Riuer of Ethiopia entereth into the Red Sea, but that all of them haue their ending, as soone as they come to the low and plaine fields.

Vpon these Mountaines and Rockes, are many beasts of diuers kinds, as we our selues saw, to wit, Elephants, Lions, Tygres, Buffes, Badgers, Ante, Deere without number, and other beasts of all sorts, sauing two, which I neither saw, nor heard to be in those parts, that is to say, Beares, and Conies. There are likewise all kind of singing Birds, which may be imagined, and also Partridges, Quails, wild Hens, Doves, and Turtles, in such incredible numbers, that they couered the Sunne, of all those sorts which are in our parts, sauing that I saw no Pyes, nor Cuckoes. All along these Riuer and Rockes I saw great plentie of sweet Herbes, which I knew not, sauing onely Basil, whereof there was exceeding store, which yeelded a fragrant and sweet smell, and had leaues of diuers sorts.

8. The time of resting our selues being come, Matthew determined to cause vs a-new to leaue the high way, and to trauel with him toward the Monasterie of the Vision, through Mountaines and Woods exceeding full of high Trees.

We departed from this Lodging, and trauelled through a more rough and craggie Countrey, and through farre greater and thicker Woods, being our selues on foot, and our Mules before vs, which were not able to trauell. The Camels yelled out as though they had bene possessed with Devils. It seemed, to vs all, that Matthew had brought vs into this way, eyther to make vs lose our liues or our goods, for in that place we could doe no other but call vpon God to helpe vs; and the Woods were so darke and fearefull, that Spirits would haue bene afraid to passe them. We saw many sauage and cruell beasts at noone-dayes, passing this way and that way, without being any whit afraid of vs. For all this we went forward, and began to find people of the Countrey, which kept their fields that were sowne with Millet, and came farre off to sow it vpon these high and craggie Mountaynes. We saw likewise many Herds of goodly Oxen, and Goats feeding. The said people which we found there, were all naked, and hid in a manner, no part of their bodies. They were very blacke, and were said to be Christians. They had their Wiues with them, which couered their Priuities with a ragge of cloth halfe torne. These women weare vpon their heads a kind of attyre, made after the fashion of a Crowne, as blacke as Pitch, and their haire bound vp in round wreathes like Kandles of Tallow: the blacknesse of these attyres, with these Lockes of haire fastned vnto them, seemed a very strange thing to behold. The men weare a piece of skinn before their Priuities.

Thus traueilling forward through many other Woods which could hardly be passed, and wee our selues lighting on foot, and vnlading our Camels there met vs tenne or twelue Friers of the Monasterie of the Vision, among whom, there was foure or fve very aged, and one older then the rest, whom all the rest did reuerence, and kissed his hands; and our selues did the like, because Matthew told vs that he was their Bishop, but afterward we knew that he was no Bishop; but that he had the Title of David, which signifieth a Warden; & that in the Monasterie there was another about him, whom they call Abba, which signifieth a Father, beeing like vnto a Pro- uinciall, and in regard of their age and drynesse (for they were as dry as a stocke) they seemed to be men of a holy life at the first blatt. The foresaid Friers trauelled through the Woods to gather their Millet which they had sowed, as also to gather vp their Roots, which are payed vnto them by such as sow Corne in those Mountaines and Woods. Their apparell was made of dressed Goat-skinnes, others weare apparell made of old yellow Cotton, and went bare-foot. From hence we departed not till our Camels had rested a little: afterward, within the space of halfe a mile, we came to the foot of a very rough and cragged Mountaine, vpon the which our Camels could not ascend, and hardly the Mules without their burthens, and heere wee rested our selues at the foot of a Tree.

9. The next day the Ambassador Matthew commanded his goods to be laden vpon the backs of Negroes, to carry them into a small Monasterie, halfe a league distant from vs, called Saint Michael de Iseo. Here Framasqual departed from vs, and wee came vnto the Monasterie halfe dead, as well for the roughnesse and steepnesse of the way, as also because of the great heat.

While we aboad there, the said Matthew came vnto vs with a counter-mand, and said vnto vs, that he had written vnto the Court of Prete Ianni, and to Queene Helena, and to Marke the Patriarke, and that the answere could not bee returned in lesse then fortie dayes, and that without the same we could not depart, because from that place they were to furnish vs, and to haue Mules for vs, and for our goods; neither was he well assured of the performance of this, but said that Winter began to approach, which lasted about the space of three monethes, wherein we could not trauell, and that therefore it was needfull, that wee should prouide victuals for our selues: for three monethes in the Winter they trauell not in these Countries, to wit, from the midst of Iune to the midst of September, which is their ordinarie Winter. Within a short space after our arriual here, our people as well Portugals as slaues fell so sick, that few or none escaped vntouched, and many were sicke to the point of death, insomuch that they stood in need often to be let bloud and to be purged. Among the first, Master Iohn our Physician fell sicke, which was all our humane helpe, yet it pleased God that he recouered, and from that time forward he laboured for vs with all his power.

Among these, Matthew the Ambassador fell sicke also, which had many Medicines ministered vnto him, and when he seemed to be very well recouered and strong, he rose vp and commanded his goods to be carried to a Towne belonging to the Monasterie of the Vision, where he yeelded vp his spirit vnto our Lord, which was the foure and twentieth of May, Anno Dom. 1520. and I confessed him, and ministered the Communion vnto him, and he made his will in the Portugall Tongue, but it was also made in the Abassin Tongue, by a Frier of the said Monastery. We caused the corps to bee buried very honorably in the said Monastery, where wee said Seruice and Masse for him according to our custome, and the Friers did the like according to theirs.

10. Wee determined, to send to request Barnagasso, that hee would giue vs some meanes to returne into our Countrey, to the end wee might not perish in that place. The Friers vnderstanding this, tooke it in very ill part, and calling Don Roderigo aside, perswaded him not to send thither, praying him to attend the comming of the Provinciall, which would bee within ten dayes, and if he come not, they would furnish vs with necessaries for our iournies. And because they are people of small trust themselves, they gaue no credit vnto vs, although the Ambassador had promised them to doe so, but sought to minister an Oath vnto each of vs vpon a Crucifixe, that we would stay during those tenne dayes, and they likewise tooke an Oath to performe that which they had promised.

§. II.

Of the manner and situation of the Monasteries, and of their holy Rites, Times, Places, and Things: And first of this of Saint MICHAEL.

11. First, this Monasterie is situate vpon the cragge of a Mountaine, which is very wild, seated at the foot of another huge Mountaine, vpon the which no man can ascend. The stone of these Rockes is of the colour and graine of the stone, wherewith the wall of the Cities of Portugall are built, and the stones are verie great. All the ground except these stones is couered with many great Woods, and the greatest part are wild Oliue Trees, and great store of Herbs grow among them, and the most part is Bafill. The Trees which were not Oliues, were not knowne of vs, and all of them were without fruit. In certaine narrow Vallies, which belong to this Monasterie, were Groues of Orange-trees, Limons, Cedars, Vines, and Figs of all sorts, as well of those which are found in Portu-gall, as those of India, and Peaches: there were also Cabbages, Corianders, Cressis, Worme-wood, Mirtles, and many other kindes of Herbes fragrant and medicinall: and all was ill husbanded, because they are people of no industrie; and the Earth bringeth forth the things afore said, as it bringeth forth wild things, and would bring forth much better, all they should plant or sow. The House of the Monasterie seemeth, indeed, to bee a Church-building beeing made like vnto ours: it hath about it a circuit like to a Cloyster, and the couering aboue is fastned to the couering of the Church. It hath three gates, as ours haue, to wit, one chiefe gate in the fore-front, and one on each side in the midst. The couering of the Church, and of the circuit is made of wild Reed, which lasteth the life of a man.

The body of the Church is made with Iles, very well wrought, and the Arches are very well stored, it seemeth all to be made like a Vault: It hath a little Quire behind the great Altar, with a Crosse afore it, whereupon hang Curtaines which goe from one side to another; and likewise, there are other Curtaines before the Gates, passing from one Wall to another, and they are of Silke, and the entrie by these Curtaines is at three places, and are fastned against the Walls; and at these three entrances or gates, are little Bels fastned to the Curtaines, about the bignesse of Saint Antonies Bels; and a man cannot enter in at the gates, but these Bels will ring. There is but one Altar belonging to the whole Church, which standeth in the great Chappell. Aboue the Altar is a Cloath of Gold borne vp with foure pillars, and the Altar toucheth all these foure Pillars, and the said Cloath of Gold is hollow like a Vault, it hath his Super-Altare, or consecrated stone, which they call Tabuto, and vpon this stone standeth a very great Basen of Copper, and it is flat in the bottome, and is low brimmed, which reacheth vnto all the foure Pillars of the Altar, because the Pillars are set in a square, and in the said Basen is set another lesser Ba-son, and on euery side of this cloth of Gold, that is to say, behind and on both sides a Curtaine hangeth downe which couereth the whole Altar downe to the ground, sauing that it is open before.

Bels of stones

Their Bels are of stone, that is to say, long and thin stones, hanged vp with Cords, and they beat them on the inside with a piece of wood, and they make a very strange sound, like to the sound of broken Bels when they are heard as farre off. And likewise on Festiuall dayes, they take Basens, and strike them with certaine small stickes, which make them sound very loud. They haue likewise Bels of Iron, which are not fully round, but haue two sides like vnto the Iacket of a Muletier, whereof the one part couereth him before, and the other behind; they haue a clapper which beateth the same first on the one side, and then on the other, and it maketh a sound like vnto a man that diggeth Vines. They haue also other Bels ill-fanouredly made, which they carrie in their hands when they go on Proceffion, and ring them altogether vpon Festiuall dayes, on other dayes they vse their Bels of stone, and of Iron; they ring to Mattens two houres before day, and they say them by heart without light: onely there hangs a Lampe before the Altar, wherein they burne Butter, for they haue no Oyle.

They sing and say with a loud and harsh voice, as of one that cryeth, without any art of singing: they say no Verses, but their speech is as it were in Prose, and yet they are Psalmes, and on their Holidayes, besides their Psalmes, they say Prose, and according to the Feasts so is their Prose, and alwayes they stand on their feet in the Church. They say not aboue one Lesson at their Mattens, with a harsh, disordered and vntuneable voice, and like vnto that wherein wee pronounce the words of the Iewes, in representing the Passion of our Sauour Christ. And although their voice be so harsh, yet they speake it running, as fast as the tongue of a man can wagge, and a Clerke or a Frier saith the same; and this Lesson is read before the principall gate.

as there be Crosses. They weare certaine Copes of Silke, but rudely made, for they be no broader then the breadth of a piece of Damaske, or of any other piece of Silke from the vpper part to the neather part; and on the breast before, they haue a traierse; and on both sides they sewe a piece of other Cloth of what colour soeuer, although it agree not with the principall; and of the principall Cloth they let a traine hang downe vpon the ground. They make this Procession in their Circuit, which is like vnto a Cloister. Which being ended on Saturdayes, and Sundayes, and Festiuall dayes, he which is to say Masse, with two others, enter into the Chappell, and take out an Image of our Ladie, which they haue in an old Cell (for in all Churches they haue of their * Cells) and they put it on a Crozier, turning the face toward the principall gate, and this Image holdeth her hand before her breast, and they which stand on both sides of it hold lighted Candles in their hands, and then they which are before it beginne to sing in manner of prose, and they goe all crying and dancing as if they were in a Towne-dance. And going before this Image with this their song or prose, they ring their little Bells and Cymbals with the like sound, and as often as any chanceth to passe before this Image they doe great reuerence to it, which seemeth to the beholder to be done with great desire of deuotion: and so they carrie in this Feast Crosses and Censers, as they did in their Procession.

When this is ended, which continueth for a long space, they salute the Image, and then they goe vnto a certaine closet, which standeth toward the North; and that part where the Gospell is said, according to our Masse, is without the circuit, wherein they make the Host, which they call Corbon, and they carrie Crosses, Censers, and Bells with them, and from hence they bring a Cake of Wheat-flowre vnleavened, newly made, very white and very faire, of the bignesse and roundnesse of a great Paten, because there are but a few people in this Monasterie: but in other Monasteries and Churches (whereof there be many) they make this Cake great or small according to the number of the people, for all doe communicate, and according to the breadth so they make the thicknesse, either halfe a finger, or a whole finger, or a thumbe thicke: and they carrie this Cake in the little Bason which is one of them that belong to the Altar couered with a cloth, with a Crosse and Censer, and a Bell ringing afore them. Behind the Church where that Quire is, which they hold as a Cloister, no man may stand which is not in holy Orders*, but all of them must stand before the principall gate, where there is another great circuit which all Churches haue, but it is not couered, and there may stand any man that list.

When they goe in Procession with this Cake, all they which stand in the Church and in the circuit, when they heare the little Bell, bow downe their heads vntill the Bell cease, which is, when they set it vpon the Altar in the lesser Bason which is set (as I said before) in the greater Bason, and they couer it with a blacke Cloth like vnto a Corporall. This Monasterie hath a Chalice of Silver, and likewise in all principall Churches and Monasteries they haue Chalices of Silver, and in some they haue Chalices of Gold. In the Churches of the poorer people (which they call the Churches of the Balgues, that is to say, of the Husbandmen) they haue brazen Chalices. These vessels are more wide then ours are, but euill made; but they haue no couers. They powre into the Chalice, wine made of Raisins in great quantitie; for, as many as receiue the Bodie, receiue also the Bloud.

Hee that is to say this Masse, beginneth, saying, Halleluia, with a lowd voyce, rather squeaking then singing, and all the companie answere him; and then he holdeth his peace, and beginneth to blesse them with a little Crosse which he carrieth in his hand; and as well they that are about, as those which are within beginne to sing, vntill a certaine time, when as one of them two that stand at the Altar take a Booke, and receiue blessing of him that sayeth Masse, and the other taketh a Crosse, and a Bell, and goeth ringing the same toward the principall gate, where all the people standeth in that circuit; and there he readeth the Epistle running very fast with his tongue, and afterwards singing returneth backe to the Altar: suddenly he which singeth the Masse taketh a Booke from the Altar, kissing the same, and giueth it to him which is to say the Gospell, which boweth downe his head, and asketh him blessing; which when hee hath receiued, as many as stand at the Altar doe kisse the same, a candle is borne with this Booke, and he which reads the Gospell, readeth it as the Epistle was read, very hastily, and with as high a sound as his tongue can vtter, and his voyce can beare: and returning to the Altar, on the way he beginneth likewise another song, and those which goe with him follow him: and when they be come to the Altar, they giue the Booke to kisse to him that sayeth Masse, and so they put it in his place.

And suddenly, he which sayeth Masse, taketh a Censer, and censeth the vpper part of the Altar, and they goe often about it and cense the same. When they haue done these censings, he turneth to the Altar, and blesseth it very often with the Crosse, and then hee vncovereth the Cake which he had couered in stead of the Sacrament, and taketh it vp in both his hands, and lifting vp his right hand the Cake remayneth in his left hand, and with his thumbe he maketh five signes like prickles, that is to say, one in the top, another in the midst, another in the bottome, and the other two on both sides; and therewithall he consecrateth it in his owne Language, with the very words that we vse, and he useth no elevation. The very same he doth ouer the the Cup, and lifteth it not vp, he sayth ouer the same, the very words that wee vse in his owne Tongue, and he couereth it, and taketh the Sacrament of the Bread in his hands, and breaketh it in twaine, and of the part that is in his left hand, hee breaketh a little Morfell of the top of the same, and the other two pieces hee layeth the one vpon the other. The Priest taketh this little Morfell for himselfe, and likewise taketh part of the Sacrament of the bloud, and afterward he taketh the Basen with the couered Sacrament, and giueth it to him which hath said the Gospell, and likewise he taketh the Chalice with the Sacrament, and giueth it to him which read the Epistle: and suddenly they giue the Communion to the Priests which stand at the Altar, receiuing a small piece of Sacrament out of the Basen, which a Deacon holdeth in his right hand; and while the Deacon giueth the same, a Sub-Deacon taketh of the bloud in a spoone of Gold, of Siluer, or of Copper, according to the abilitie of the Church, and giueth it vnto him which receiue the Sacrament of the body in very small quantitie: and on the other side, standeth another Priest with a little Vessell of holy Water, and powreth into the palme of his hand, which receiued the Communion, a litle of that water, wherewith he washeth his mouth, and afterward swalloweth it vp.

This being done, they all goe to the Altar with this Sacrament, before the first Curtaine, and in this sort they giue the Communion to them which stand there, and afterward to all those of the other Curtaine, and lastly, to the Secular people which stand at the principall gate, as well men as women, if the Church be such that women may bee suffered to come thither: at the giuing of the Communion, and at all other diuine Seruices all stand vpon their feet: and when they goe to receiue the Communion, all of them come with their hands lifted vp before their shoulders, with the palmes of their hands spread abroad before them: and when any man receiue the Sacrament of the bloud, he receiue of that Holy Water, as I said before. And also generally al such as are to receiue the Communion before the Masse, vse to wash their hands with water, which is placed in all Churches and Monasteries for this purpose. The Priest which saith the Masse, and they which stood with him at the Altar (the Communion being ended) retorne vnto the Altar, and wash the Basen wherein the Sacrament was put with the water remayning in the Vessell, which they say is Holy Water: this Water is put into the Chalice, and he which said Masse drinketh it vp all. This done, one of the Ministers of the Altar taketh a Crosse and a sacring Bell, and beginning a little Song, goeth to the principall gate where the Epistle and Gospell were read, and where they ceased to giue the Communion, and all they which are in the Church, and without the Church, incline their heads and take their leaues, saying, That this is the blessing, and that without this no man may depart. On Saturdaies and Sundaies, and Feastiuall daies, in all Churches and Monasteries, they vse to giue holy Bread. The forme of Ceremonies which this little Monasterie vseth (which hath not aboue twentie or foue and twentie Friers) is obserued in all other Monasteries and Churches. The seruice of the Masse, (except the Processions) is very short, because the Masse in the weeke daies, is ended almost as soone as it is begun.

12. The manner how they make the Cake aforesaid, is this: The house where they make it in all Churches & Monasteries, is placed (as is said before) toward that part where the Gospel is said without the Church, and the couered circuit, which is as a Cloyster in all Churches and Monasteries: and they vse the other circuit which is without and not couered, as a Church-yard. This house is as bigge as the Quire behind the great Altar, and somewhat bigger, and in all Churches and Monasteries they haue nothing else in that house, but that which serueth for this businesse; to wit, a Staffe to beate the corne out of the eares, and an Instrument to grinde the Meale, because they make it very white, as is convenient for such a purpose: because they make not the said Sacrament with Meale or Wheate, wherein Women haue put their hands. They haue Earthen Platters, wherein they knead the Meale, and they make the Dow harder then we make it, they make a little Ouen like a Still to Still Water, and vpon the same a plate of Iron, (and some Churches haue it of Brasse, and some others of Bricke) which is round, with a large compasse, and they put the fire vnderneath it, and when it is hot, they make it cleane with a course cloath, and then lay a good piece of this Dow vpon it, and spread it abroad with a Woodden Knife, as broad as they will haue it, and make it very round; and when the Cake is baked they take it away, lay it aside, and make another after the same fashion; and this second Cake after it is likewise ready, they take the former, and lay it thereupon, to wit, that side which was vppermost they turne downe-ward, and so both these two Cakes are laid together, as they were one Cake, and they doe nothing all the while but turne and trosse them vpon this Plate, vntill they bee baked beneath and aboue, and on euery side, and so they make as many as they will. In the same house are also the Raisins where-with they make their Wine, and the Instrument where-with they presse the same. In these houses also is the Holy Bread made, which is distributed on the Saturdaies and Sundaies, and other Feastiuall dayes, and when their great Feasts are held, as Christmas, Easter, and our Lady of August, they fetch out this Sacrament of Bread with a Vestment, Bells and Crosses, very deuoutly, and before they enter into the church therewith, they go once about the circuit, which is like vnto a Cloyster, but when it is not Holy day they go strait into the Church. The Saturday before Ascension day when we use to say our Letanies, these Friers made a Procession, and because we were strangers in the Countrey, it seemed a goodly sight vnto vs, and it was on this wise: they tooke Crosses and a consecrated stone of the Altar with great reuerence, couered with cloth of Silk, & a Friar which carried it on his head, was likewise wholly couered with the like cloth of Silke: they carryed also Bookes, Bells, Censers, and holy water, and went into certaine fields sowed with Millet, and there they made their deuotions, with cryes after the manner of Letanies, and with this Procession they returned vnto the Monasterie. And when we asked them wherefore they did this, they said, because the Wormes doe eat their Corne, therefore they went to sprinkle them with Holy Water, and pray to God to take them away. He which saith Masse, hath no other difference in his apparell from a Deacon and Sub-deacon, sauing a long Stole slit in the midst, so that hee may thrust his head through it, and behind and before it reacheth downe to the ground. The Friers which say Masse weare their haire long, and the Priests weare it not, but are shorne, and so they say Masse, and are alwayes bare-footed, and no man may come shod into the Church, and for this purpose they alleage that which God said vnto Moses, Put off thy shooes, for the place where thou standest is holy ground.

13. In this Monasterie of Saint Michael, where we were, we said Masse euery day, not in the Monasterie, but in the circuit which is like a Cloyster: because in this Countrey they say but one Masse a day in euery Church or Monasterie. The Friers came vnto our Masse with great deuotion, as they seemed, and supplied our want with Censers and Incense, because wee had brought none with vs: and they thinke it an ill thing to say Masse without Incense, and they said that all things seemed well vnto them, sauing that they thought it not commendable for one Priest alone to say Masse, because among them they use not to say Masse, except they bee three, or fve, or sixe, and all these stand at the Altar. Also, they misliked that we went with our shooes into the Church, and much more when we did spit in the Church. But wee excused our selues, saying; That this was the fashion in our Countrey. And so wee said Masse euery day vntill Trinitie Sunday, and when the Munday after the said Trinitie Sunday came, then they would suffer vs to say no more Masse in the morning, and we marueiling thereat, and not well pleased, and hauing at that instant no Interpreter to learne wherefore they would not suffer vs to say Masse, at length we vnderstood, that which by experience afterward we saw, to wit; that they obserue the Old Testament in their fasting; for they fast very straitly in the Lent, which they begin the Munday after the Sunday of Sexagesima, which are ten dayes before our Shrouetide, and so they make their Lent of fiftie dayes, and say that they take those dayes before, for the Saturdayes on which they doe not fast: and their Fast is to eate at euen-tide, and euery day they receiue the Communion, and therefore they say not Masse but in the euening, and when Masse is done, they receiue the Communion and then goe to supper. And like as they haue these fiftie dayes of fast, so they take as many dayes after Easter and Whitsontide, wherein they fast not at all; and when it is not fasting day, they say Masse in the morning, and all those dayes they eate flesh without obseruing any one of them, and say Masse in the mornings, and strait way goe to dinner because they fast not.

When this time is ended, and Trinitie Sunday past, all the Clerkes and Friers are bound to fast euery day sauing Saturdayes, Sundayes, and this Fast continueth vntill Christmasse day. And because they fast all, they say Masse at night, alleaging for prooffe hereof the Supper of Christ, how that it was fasting time, and almost night when he consecrated his Bodie. But commonly, the Lay-people as well men as women are bound to fast weekly on Wednesdayes and Fridayes, from Trinitie Sunday vntill Aduent: and from Christmasse day till the Purification of the Virgin Marie (which they call the Feast of Saint Simeon) they fast not at all. The three dayes after the Purification being not Saturday nor Sunday, are an exceeding strait Fast for the Clerkes, Friers, and Lay-people, for they say that they eate but once in all these three dayes, and they call it the Fast of Ninue. These three dayes being ended, vntill the beginning of Lent, they fast againe as they did before, vntill the Feast of the holy Trinitie. In the Aduent and all the Lent the Clerkes, the Friers, the Laitie, the men and women, small and great, sound and sicke doe all fast. And likewise, from Easter vnto Trinitie Sunday, and from Christmasse vnto the Purification, the Masse is said in the morning because there is no Fast, all the rest of the yeare it is said in the euening because they fast.

The Monasterie where we buried Matthew, is distant from this wherein we aboad three miles space of very bad way, & it is called, The Monastery of the Vision of Iesus. It is seated vpon the point of a Rocke exceeding high, and from euery part as a man looketh downward, there is a Valley which seemeth to be as deepe as Hell. The Church of the Monasterie is very great of bodie, & greater in reuenues, and is very well disposed and gouerned. It is built with three great allies or walkes, which are very finely made with their Arches and their Vaults, which seeme to bee made of wood, because they are all painted ouer, so that a man cannot perceiue whether the Church be built of stone, or of wood. It hath two walking places in forme of a Cloyster about the bodie of the Church, which are both couered and painted with the Pictures of the Apostles, and and Patriarkes, and with the storie of all the Old Testament, and with Saint George on Horse-backe, which is to be seene in all their Churches. And likewise, there is in the same a great piece of Arras, wherein is wouen a Crucifixe, our Ladie, the Apostles, the Patriarkes, and Prophets, and euery one hath his title or name in Latine, which sheweth that the same worke was not made in those Countries. There are also many ancient Images, which stand not vpon the Altars, because it is not their fashion, but they keepe them in a Vestry lapped vp with many Bookes, and they bring them not forth but on Holy-dayes.

Saint George on horse-backe in all their Churches. Saints in Arras Images in a Vestry.

In this Monasterie there is a great Kitchin, with all things thereto appertayning, with a great roome to dine in, where they sate altogether, and they eat three and three in a Treen dish which is not very deepe, but plaine like vnto a wooden Platter. Their Dyet is very homely, their Bread is made of Millet and of Barley, and of another Seed which they call Taso, which is small and blacke. This Bread they make round, about the bignesse of an Apple of Adam, and they giue three of these to each one, and vnto the Nouices they giue three of them betweene two, and I wonder greatly to thinke how they can liue with so little a quantitie. Likewise, they giue each of them a little fresh fish without Oyle or Salt. Of the selfe-same Dyet, they send so many aged and honorable Friers, towards whom they vse great reuerence, which come not vnto the dining hall. And if any man aske me how I know this, I answer, that besides that which I saw when we buried Matthew, the greatest part of the sixe yeares which wee aboad in Ethiopia, our Lodging was not farre from the said Monastery, so that I departed oftentimes from our house vpon my Mule, and came in the euening to the Monasterie, and for the most part I went to passe the time with the Friers, and principally at their Festiuall times, and I learned many things of them concerning their Affaires, Reuenues, Vsages, and Customes. An hundred Friers are commonly in this Monasterie, and the most part of them are very aged, and as dry as a stocke, few of them are young. There are also many little children, of eight yeares old and vpward, which they bring vp, and many of them are lame and blind. This Monasterie is walled round about, and hath no entrie but by two gates which are alwayes shut.

14. This Monasterie is the head of sixe Monasteries, which stand about the same among these Mountaines, and that which is farthest, is not past nine and twentie or thirtie miles off, and all of them are subiect and yeeld obedience vnto this Monasterie. In euery one of them there is a Dauid, that is to say, a Warden placed by the Abbot or Prouinciall, and that Monasterie which hath a Dauid, that is to say, a Warden is subiect to the Abbot, which is as Prouinciall. I alwayes heard reported, that there were about three thousand Friers in this Monasterie, and because I doubted much thereof, I came once to their Feast of our Ladie in August, to see how many were assembled there together: and surely, I tooke pleasure when I beheld the riches of this place, in a certaine Procession which they made, and in my iudgement, the Friers were not above three hundred, and the greatest part of them were old men. I saw a great circuit, which this Monasterie hath about two places, which are like to Cloysters, which circuit is open; but at that time it was all couered ouer with great and small Clothes of Gold, Veluets of Mecca, all long pieces sewed one vnto another, to hang round about that circuit, through which they made a goodly Procession, all clad in Copes of the said Cloth of Gold, but made ill-fauouredly, as I haue said before. They carried fiftie Crosses of Siluer, small and badly made, and as many Brazen Censers; when they said Masse I saw a great Chalice of Gold, and a Spooone of Gold, wherewith they gaue the Communion. And of the three hundred which were assembled in this Monastery, there were very few of mine acquaintance: I enquired of certaine of my friends, wherefore seeing so many Friers belonged to this Monastery, as they said, so few were present at so great a Solemnitie: they answered me, that the number was greater then they looked for, because they are diuided in other Monasteries, Churches, and Faires to earne their liuing as long as they be yong: for they cannot be maintayned in the Monastery, but by their owne industrie, and when they are so old that they cannot trauell, they come to end their dayes at this Monastery. This day I saw seuentene yong men taken into Orders.

In this Monastery is the buriall of an Abbot or Prouinciall, called Philip, and his workes of Holinesse were very great: for they say, that there was once a King or Prete Ianni, which ordained that they should not keepe the Saturday holy throughout all his Kingdomes and Dominions. And this Philip repaired immediately vnto him with his Brethren and with many Bookes, and shewed him how God had commanded that the Sabbath Day should bee obserued, and that whosoever obserued it not should be stoned. This man disputed this question before all the religious men of Ethiopia, and was commended before the King: and therefore they take him to bee a Saint, and they obserue an Holy-day vnto him euery yeare in the moneth of Iuly, which they call the Fascar of Philip, which signifieth the Testament or Memorie of Saint Philip. And therefore the Inhabitants of this Countrey and Monasterie are more infected with this Jewish Heresie, then any other part of the Dominions of Prete Ianni, although all of them bee in part infected: but these are more then any others. I haue seene them with mine eyes see the fish on the Sabbath, and bake bread also: and on the Sabbath in this Monastery, they make no fire at all: on the Sunday following, they make readie all things needfull for their Dyet, and I came twice to this Fascar of Philip, at which times they received me with great honour. And at this Feast yearly, they kill many Oxen, and at one of them I saw them kill thirtie, and at another eight and twentie, which were offered by the Inhabitants their Neighbours, for deuotion vnto this Philip, and they giue this flesh raw to all the people, that come to the Fascar without any bread at all. The Friers eat no kind of flesh.

They sent me yearly two great and fat quarters of beefe, with much bread and wine of Honey, which likewise the Friers drinke not in the Monastery, but when they are abroad with vs Portugals, they drinke wine and eat flesh if they be but one alone, but if they be two, they doe it not, for feare the one of the other. This Monastery and all the rest which are subiect to it, obserue an order, that no women may enter into it, nor shee Mules, nor Kine, nor Hens, nor any other beast of the female kind. This I both learned and saw my selfe; for when I came thither a Crosse-bow shoot distant from the Monastery, they came to take my Mule, not suffering mee to come with her to the Monastery, and they sent her to a house of theirs, called Giangargara, where Matthem died. They kill their Kine and Hens, a certaine distance from the Monasterie. I saw but one Cocke in the Monastery with two bels at his legs, without Hennes, and they said, that they kept him to crow at the time of their Mattens. If any women come into the house, they know it, for oftentimes I asked certaine children which were brought vp there, whose Sonnes they were, and they named vnto me, the Friers for their Fathers, and so I know the yong Friers to be called the Sonnes of all the old Friers.

Hese Friers or those of other Monasteries, their subiects might very well play the good Husbandmen, and might cherish vp Trees, Vines, and Orch-yards with their diligence, yet neuerthelesse, they do nothing at all, and the soile is good and fit to bring forth euery thing, as may be gathered by that which is wild and sauage, but they till nought else but fields of Mill, and keepe swarmes of Bees, and as soone as night is come, they goe not once out of their houses, because of the wild beasts which are in that Countrey, and they which keepe their Millet, haue their houses very high from the ground vpon Trees, where they lodge in the night. There are about this Monastery, and in the Vallies of these Mountaines, great Heards of Cattell kept by Arabian Moores, which goe fortie or fiftie together with their wiues and children, and the Captaine among them is a Christian, because the Cattell which they keepe, are Christian Gentlemens of the Countrey of Barnagasso. The Moores receiue none other wages for their paines, but the Millie and Butter which they get of the Kine, and therewithall they sustaine themselves, their wiues, and their children. Certaine times it chanced vs to lodge neere these Arabians, and they came to know of vs whether wee would buy any Cattell, and offered them vnto vs at a reasonable price. It is reported, that they are all Theeues fauoured by the Lords which are Owners of the Cattell, and that men trauell not among them but in great Carauans.

The Reuenues
of this Mona-sterie very great.

The Reuenues of this Monastery of the Vision are very great, as I saw and vnderstood. First, this Mountaine whereon this Monastery is seated, containeth thirty miles in compasse, whereon they sow much Millet, Barley, Rye, and Tasi, and of all this they pay a portion vnto the Monastery, and also for the pasturing of their Cattell. In the Vallies of these Mountaines are great Townes, and the most part of them belong vnto the Monastery, and within one or two dayes iourney, there are very many and sundry places which belong vnto the Monastery, and they are called, The Gultus of the Monastery, which signifieth, priuiledged places, Don Roderigo the Ambassador and I, on a certaine time trauelled towards the Court, departing from this Monasterie five dayes iourney at the least, and came to a certaine peopled place, called Zama, where we rested all Saturday and Sunday in a small Village, where there were to the number of twentie Houses. There they told vs that this place belonged vnto the Monastery of the Vision, and that there were one hundred places all belonging to the Monastery, and therewithall shewed vs many of them, and told vs that these one hundred places payed vnto the Monastery euery third yeare, one Horse apiece, which amount to thirtie foure Horses euery yeare.

Rent Horses.

The Alicasin, this agreeth to Antiquitie.

And to vnderstand the same the better, I enquired of the Alicasin, of the Monastery, which signifieth, The Auditour or Steward of the House, because hee receiueh and disburseth all things. And hee told mee that it was true that they payed the said Horses. And I enquired of him why the Monasterie required so many Horses, considering that that they vsed not to ride; he said, That they payed not the Horses, but Kine in their stead, that is to say, Fiftie Kine for one Horse; and this tribute of Horses continued all the time that these places were in the Kings hands, which endowed the Monastery with these iurisdic-tions. And afterward the Inhabitants of those Countries compounded with the Monasterie, and changed the payment of Horses into so many Kine: besides which, they payed many other tributes of corne. This Monastery hath, aboue fiftene daies journey distant within the Kingdome of Tigrimation, a great Territorie, which is sufficient to make a Dukedonie, which is called Adetyeste, which payeth yearly sixtie Horses, and infinite tributes and rents. There goe alwaies vnto this Territorie, aboue one thousand Friers of this Monasterie, because therein are 10 many Churches. Of these Friers some be very good, reuerent, and deuout; and other some as bad and euill conditioned. Besides the tribute of the foresaid Horses, which are payed vnto the said Monasterie, are many other places which appertaine onely to the King, which pay tribute of Horses according to their ancient custome; and these are places which frontier vpon the Countrey of Egypt, from whence come good and stately Horses, and other places of the Arabi-ans, which likewise haue good Horses, but not so good as those of Egypt.

An excellent breed of horses in Egypt.

From this Monasterie of Saint Michael, we departed the fiftenth of the moneth of Iune, some went on foote, there were also but few people to carrie our goods, and the Oxen being not able to trauell through the Woods and Thickets, because all the way was rocky and craggy: the Gunners with their Skourers were left behind, and the Barrels of Gun-powder; and they 20 had not traualled past two miles from the Monasterie, but that the Embassadour and we which were in his company ouer-taking them, found all the goods vnladen, and when we could not learne wherefore they had done so, we caused them to lade them againe. Hauing passed ouer these Mountaines, we found certaine dry Riuer, which in Winter time are very great and terrible, that is to say, During the time of the stormes and Thunder; and as soone as the storme and tempest is ouer, suddenly the Riuer become dry, and on both sides of the said Riuer are most high and steepe Mountaines, as sauage as the rest which we passed. Along these Brookes are very mightie Forrests of Trees, which are very faire and tall, but such as we knew not: among which, vpon the bankes were certaine Palme-trees. Neere one of these Riuer we lodged one night, with very great showers of Raine and Thunder.
Riuers in extremity, either very full or dry.

30 17. The day following, we went ouer another high Mountaine, exceeding wilde and sauage, so that we could not well trauell ouer the same, neither on our Mules nor on foote. In this Mountaine we found many Beasts of sundry sorts, and an infinite number of Apes in squadrons, and commonly they are not seene in all the Mountaine, sauing onely where there is some great rupture and hole, and some Caue; and they went not fewer then two or three hundred together, and where there is any plaine ground aboue those ruptures, they make their abode, and they leaue not any one stone vnremoued, and they digge the earth in such sort, that it seemeth to be ploughed. They are very great, and from the middle vpwards, are hairie like Lyons, and are as big as Weathers. After we had passed this Mountaine, we lodged in a place at the foote thereof, called Calote. From the Monastery whence we departed vnto this 40 place, is about sixtene or eightene miles. We passed a Riuer of running water, which was very cleare.
Squadrons of Apes. Their number, forme, and labour.

The next day we said our Masse in the Church of the said place, which is called Saint Michael, and the house with the furniture thereof, are very poore. In this Church were three married Priests, and other three Zagonari, that is to say, Priests of the Gospell, and three other must be of necessitie, for with a lesser number they cannot say Masse. This Sunday we departed about the Euening-tide, because the people of the Countrey, which were our guides, would haue it so: and from thence we began to trauaile through plaine Countries, sowed and manured after the manner of Portugall: and the Woods which were betweene these manured places, are all of wilde Oliues, exceeding faire without any other Trees. We lodged neere a running Ri-uer, among many good Villages.

50 18. We came vnto the Towne of Barna, which is about nine miles from the Towne of Calote, the eighteenth of the moneth of Iune: this is the chiefe Towne of the Countrey, and Kingdome of Barnagasso, where his principall Palaces are; which they call Bete-Negus, that is to say, The Houses of the King. The same day that we came thither, Barnagasso departed before we came into the Towne vnto another. Heere we were exceedingly well lodged, according to the Countrey, and in great houses, very well furnished in the lower part, and aloft they were flat couered with earth.
Barna.

The third day after our arriuall there, the Embassadour purposed to visite Barnagasso, who tooke five of vs with him in his company, all riding vpon Mules, and wee came to the place 60 where he was about Euening; and from the place whence we departed vnto the Towne where Barnagasso remained, was eleuen miles, or thereabout. Being come thither, we lighted before his Palace, neere vnto the Church doore, whereinto we entred and said our Prayers, according to our manner; which ended, we tooke our way toward his Palace, supposing all of vs that we should suddenly be admitted to his speech: but they would not suffer vs to enter in, saying, That he was a sleepe, where staying a while to speake with him, they tooke no order for vs, but lodged vs in a Goats-coate, wherein hardly we could all stand: for our lodging, in stead of beds, they sent vs two Oxe hides with the haire on them; and for our Supper, they sent vs Bread and Wine of the Countrey in abundance, and one Sheepe.
Barnagasso visited. His brutish entertainment.

The Ambassadour had audience of Bar-

No houses with stories.

The day following, wee stayed a great while, looking when they would send for vs to haue audience. At length, we were sent for, and entring into the first Gate, wee found three men like vnto Porters, hauing each of them a staffe in their hands, and when we would haue entred they would not suffer vs, saying, that we should giue them some Pepper, where they kept vs out for a long while. At length, being entred in at the first Gate, wee came to the second, where we found three other Porters, which seemed to be men of more account, who made vs to stand wayting there aboute halfe an houre vpon a little straw, and the Sunne so scorched vs, that we were almost smothered with heate; and we should haue stayed there much longer, had not the Ambassadour sent him word in choler, either to admit him into his presence, or that he would returne againe vnto his lodging. Then one more honourable then the rest, came and told vs, that we might come in. The said Barnagasso was in a great house in a lower roome, because in those Countreies they build no houses with stories; and hee lay vpon a couch, as his manner was, compassed with certaine Curtaines which were very homely: hee had sore eyes, and his wife sate at his head. Here, after due salutations, the Ambassadour offered him his physician to cure him: to whom he answered, That he needed no Physician, and that he made no reckoning of him. Then the Ambassadour besought him of his courtesie, to furnish him with meanes for the performance of our voyage; Barnagasso replied, That he could not giue him Mules, and that we must buy them our selues, but that hee would furnish vs with all other things, and would send a son of his with vs, which should accompany vs to the court of Prete Ianni, and so he dismissed vs.

Their diet.

19. Being come forth out of the house where Barnagasso remayned, they caused vs to sit downe vpon certaine Mats spread vpon the ground, whither they brought vs a treene dish full of Barly meale halfe kneaded into dowe, with an horne of Wine made of honey: and because wee were not vsed to eat nor to see such kind of meats, wee would not eat thereof, but after that we were vsed thereunto, we ate thereof willingly: and so at that time wee rose without eating of ought at all, and returned to our lodging, and straight-way got to horse-backe two houres before noone; and being about two miles on our way, a man came running after vs, which prayed vs to stay for him, because the Mother of Barnagasso had sent vs meat, and that she would take it in ill part, if we accepted not thereof, and so we stayed for him, and they brought vs five wheaten Loaves very great and good, and one horne of good Wine, which was made of honey. Let no man maruell, in hearing mention of a horne of wine, because the great Lords and Prete Ianni himselfe, make their Vessels to drinke wine in, of hornes of Oxen: and some hornes there are that contayne five and sixe measures. Moreouer, shee sent vs a quantitie of the said meale in dowe; saying, that in that Countrey they take it for a good food. This food is made of parched Barly ground into meale, and they knead it with a little water, and so they eat it. After we had eaten we followed our iourney to the Towne of Barua, where we had left our goods, and where we were lodged. In this Countrey, and in all the Kingdomes and Dominions of Prete Ianni, they reckon not by Leagues nor Miles: and if you aske them how farre it is to such a place, they will answere you, if you set forth at Sunne-rising, You shall come thither when the Sunne is there, pointing to the place of the Sunne in the skie: and if you trauell softly, You shall come thither when the Kine be shut up, which is at night: and if the way be long, you shall come thither in one Sambete, that is to say, in one weeke. Between these two Townes is a very goodly Countrey, that is to say, very well manured, and Fields of Wheat, of Millet, of Barly, of Chich-peason, of Lentils, and of many other kinds of graines, which are in that countrey vnkown to vs, to wit, Taso di guza, and Millet-Zaburre, and this Taso di guza, is a seed very good and delicate among them, and greatly esteemed, because the Wormes eateth not the same, which is wont to deuoure their corne and other Pulse, and it is of long continuance. On both sides of the way, a man may see aboute fiftie great Villages which are very well inhabited, and all of them seated in goodly greene fields. Vpon the said manured grounds, Herds of wild Kine range vp and downe, fortie, fiftie, and sixtie in a companie, and we Portugals hunted them with great delight, and slue very many of them: for they of the Countrey will take no paines, although they receiue great damage by them in their Corne, but they know not how to kill them.

Barua.

Common women.

20. In this Towne of Barua, where we were, and where afterward we aboad a long time, are three hundred houses, and the greatest part of the Inhabitants are Women; for in this Towne is kept, as it were, a Court, for many respects. One is, because it is neuer without people belonging to the Court of Prete Ianni; and those which come thither, hauing no Women with them, vse the Women of the Towne as their Concubines. Another is, because here the Court of Barnagasso is kept, where for the greatest part of the yeere hee maketh his residence, and continually hath in his stable aboute three hundred Horses, and as many more, which daily come thither, to dispatch their businesse with Barnagasso, in regard of their affaires and suites. And few or none of them will bee without their Concubines; and hence it is that heere many many light young Women settle their abode, which after they be growne old, betake themselves to another kind of life: For in this Towne there is a great Market every Tuesday, where there is three or four hundred persons met together, and all the old Women and young Lasses carrie Measures in their hands, wherewith they measure in the Market all the Corne and Salt that is sold, and in this sort they earne their living. And moreover, they lodge those that remaine in the Towne, and keep the goods which are left vsold vntill the next Market day, and all things else in like sort. And because there are many women in this town, those which be rich and haue the meanes, take two or three Wiues, neither is it forbidden them by the King nor the Iustice, but onely by the Church; because all such as haue about one Wife may not come

During the time we abode in this place, a Cousin of mine and my selfe lodged in the house of a man, whose name was Ababitay, which had three Wiues, which were all of our acquaintance, and our good friends; and he told me that hee had seuen and thirtie children by them, and that no man had forbid him their company, sauing that the Church admitted him not to the Communion. Before our departure he had dismissed two of them, and held himselfe to one onely; namely, to her which he had last married, and for all this he was restored to all the Sacraments, and licensed to come to Church, as though he had neuer had but one Wife. And there-

Marriages vnstable.

20 or more of them, according to their pleasure. Their marriages are very vnstable, for they will be diuorced for a small trifle.

I haue seene many of their Women married, and my selfe was present at a certaine marriage, made without the Church, which was celebrated on this manner. In a Court before a house, was placed a Litter or Couch, and they caused the Bridegroome and the Bride to sit downe thereon, and there came three Priests, which beganne to sing with a loud voyce, Haleluia, and thus singing as it were, certaine verses, they went thrise about the said Couch or Litter: afterward they cut off a locke of haire from the Bridegroomes crowne, and as much from the same place of the Brides head, bathing the said haire in Wine made of Honey, and the Bridegroomes haire they laid vpon the head of the Bride, and the Brides haire they laid vpon the head of the Bridegroome, in the same places where they were cut off; and vpon the same they cast holy Water, and afterward they beganne to make a feast, after the manner of marriages, and at night the said married persons were accompanied home vnto their house. And for the space of one moneth no man entred into that house, sauing onely one man which is the Bridegroomes God-father, who remaineth all the moneth with them, and the moneth ended hee departeth home. And if the Bride be a Woman of account, it is fise or sixe moneths before she commeth out of her house, and she weareth continually a blacke veile before her face; and if she be with child before sixe moneths, she layeth off her veile, and if she proueth not with child within sixe moneths space, she layeth it aside.

Rites of Baptisme.

21 Moreover, I haue seene Abuna Marco, whom they call their Patriarcke, vse certaine blessings in the Church, that is to say; before the principall gate, where they caused the Bridegroome and the Bride to sit downe on a Litter, about which he went with Incense and a crosse, and comming vnto the said couple, he laid his hand vpon their heads, saying, That they should obserue that which God commanded in the Gospell, and that they should remember that they were no more two, but vnited together in one flesh, and that they ought so to bee in heart and mind, and they stayed there till Masse was done, where, after they had receiued the Communion, hee gaue them his blessing. This I saw done in a Towne called Dara, which is in the Kingdome of Xoa. Another of these marriages I saw in a Village, being in the Parish of Coquete, being a place in the Kingdome of Barnagasso. And when these marriages are made, they are concluded by contract or couenant in this sort: If thou leaue me, or I thee, he which shall be the cause of this diuision, shall pay such or such a penaltie: which penaltie is appointed, according to the qualitie of the persons, either in so much Gold or Siluer, or so many Mules, or so many Kine or Goates, or so many Cloathes, or so many measures of Corne. And if any man would diuorce himselfe, immediatly he seeketh an occasion wherefore he may doe so: and by these meanes few doe fall into thole penalties; and thus they diuorce themselves, as well the Husband as the Wife.

Diuorces.

And if any obserue the order of Matrimony, they be the Priests which cannot be diuorced, and also the Husbandmen which loue their Wiues, because they be a great helpe vnto them in keeping of their Cattell, and bringing vp their Children, and in digging their fields, and weeding of their Corne, and because they find all things needfull made ready, when they come home at night, and therefore by reason of these commodities, they continue married as long as they liue. And whereas I haue said, that in their contracts they put downe penalties; The first, Barnagasso, whom hee knew (whose name was Dari) was diuorced from his Wife, and payed for a penaltie one hundred ounces of Gold, which are one thousand Pardas, that is to say; One thousand duckats, and was married to another, and his Wife married vnto a Gentleman, called

Aron, brother to the said Barnagasso, and both these Brethren had Children by this Woman, whom we our selues knew. These are great Lords, and are Brethren to the Mother of Prete Ianni, whom all of vs did very well know, and we Portugals knew also Romana Orgue a noble Lady, the sister of Prete Ianni, which was married vnto a great and noble young Gentleman; and in our time shee was diuorced from this her husband, and was married to a man aboue fortie yeeres of age, a person of great credit in the Court, whose name was Abucher, and his Father had the Title of Cabeata, which is one of the great Lords that remayne in the Court: thus I haue both seene and knowne many of these diuorcements, and I thought good to put downe these, because they fell out among great personages. And whereas I haue said, that Aron tooke to wife the wife of his brother Dori, maruell not awhit thereat, because it is the manner of this Countrey, and seemeth not any strange thing, that a brother should lye with his brothers wife, for they say, that the brother rayseth vp seede vnto his brother, as was accustomed.

22. Any man may circumsise that listeth, without any ceremonie; onely they say, that they finde it written in their Books, that God commanded them to be circumcised. And let no man maruell which heareth this, for they circumsise women as well as men, which thing was not vsed in the old Law. They baptize in manner following; men children they baptize within fortie dayes, and the female sexe after sixtie, and if they die before, they goe without baptisme. And I often told them, and in sundrie places, that herein they committed a great error, and that they did against the Gospell of our Lord, which saith: That which is borne of the flesh, is flesh; and that which is borne of the Spirit, is Spirit. Whereunto they answered me very often, that the faith of the Mother, and the communion which shee receiued, while shee was with child of them, was sufficient for them. And this Baptisme they minister in the Church as wee doe, but not in the christning Fount, but at the Church-gate with a pot of water, and so they blesse them, and they powre Oile as we doe vpon the top of their fore-heads, and vpon their shoulders; neither doe they vse the Sacrament of the Chrisme, nor the Oile of extreme Vnction. Their forme of Baptisme is not so long as that which is vsed in the Archbishoprick of Bragança, but seemeth to be about the length of that which is vsed in the Church of Rome.

At the time when they wil baptize the Infant with this water, one which is there as a God-father, taketh the Infant out of the hands of the Midwife which beareth the same, and he taketh it vnder both the armes, and so holdeth it hanging downe, and the Priest which baptizeth it hath the pot in his one hand, and sprinkling the water vpon the child with the other hand, hee washeth it, saying the same words that we vse, to wit: I baptize thee in the Name of the Father, and of the Sonne, and of the holy Ghost. They alwayes minister this Sacrament on the Saturday, or on the Sunday, and it is done in the morning at the Masse, and all that they baptize, as well Males as Females, they cause to receiue the Sacrament of the Lords Supper in small quantitie, and by force of water they constrainethem to swallow it. Touching this point, I said, that this Communion was very dangerous and nothing necessary. And whereas I haue said, that they powre oile vpon the crowne of the childs head, this is because all the Infants are brought to bee baptized with their heads shauen.

And those markes which wee see certaine Negro slaues to haue on their noses, and betweene their eyes, or on their eye-browes, are not made with fire nor for any token of Christian Religion, but onely for a brauery, with a cold Iron; and they say, that these markes are very beautiful to behold. And there are women which are very skilfull in making these markes. And they make them in this sort: they take an head of Garlick, which is great, cleane washed, and somewhat stale, and they lay it to the eye or to the other part where they will make the marke, and then they cut round about it with a sharpe knife, to wit, about the said head of Garlick, and then they widen the said cut, and powre vpon it a little waxe; and vpon the waxe they clap a little dowe, and binde it with a cloth, and so bound, they let it alone for one night, and this marke remayneth as long as the partie liues, which seemeth to be made with fire, because the colour of that marke is blacker then any part of their bodies.

When any one dyeth, I haue seene them carried, as well persons of Honour, as them of the middle and poorest degree, all after one sort. First, at the time of their death, they are not accustomed to light candles, but after they be dead, they bestow vpon them much censling, and wash them, and then winde their whole bodies in linnen cloth. And if it be a person of Honour, they lay an Oxe-hide ouer the street, spreading it ouer the Litter: and the Priest comming to carry him to the buriall, saith a short seruice, and they take him and carry him to the Church, with a Crosse, a Censer, and holy Water, running as fast as ever they can, so that a man cannot overtake them: and when they are come to Church, they bring not the dead corps into the same, but streight way set him downe at the graue, neither say they any of our seruice for him, that is to say, no seruice for the dead, nor any Psalme of David, nor of Iob. And when I inquired what it was which they said, they answered me, that it was all the whole Gospell of Saint Iohn, which being ended, they put the corps into the graue, but first they cense it and sprinkle it with holy water. Neither say they any Dirige or Masse at all for the dead, and much lesse for deuotion of any man liuing, onely they say one Masse a day in euery Church, and euery body which commeth thither receiue the Communion.

§. IIII.

Of the situation of Barua, the chiefe Towne of the Kingdome of Barnagasso, and of their Houses, and of the wild Beasts, and Fowles. Of his Dominion and Government; of their two Winters, Churches, Church-yards, and Priests marriages: their departure to Timei, and qualitie of that place.

10 His Towne of Barua is a very commodious and pleasant place, and standeth vpon a very high Rocke, on the side whereof runneth a Riuer. The Kings houses are built vpon the said Rocke, very well made, in forme of a Fortresse: all the rest of the countrey is mightie champion, manured fields, wherein are exceeding many Townes to be seene, and the soile is very fertile to reare vp Cattell, to wit, Oxen, Goates, Sheepe, and many other wild beasts, apt for hunting. Much good fish is in the Riuer, many wild Geese, and wild Duckes; here are likewise great store of wild beasts of all sorts, to wit, wild Oxen, and Hares in great number, so that euery morning we killed twentie or thirtie of them without Dogs, on- ly with Nets. Partridges there are of three sorts, which differ not from ours, but in their big- nesse, and in the colour of their feet and beaks; for they are as big as Capons, and of the colour that ours are of, but their feet and beaks are yellow. There are other like Hennes, but their feet and beaks are red. There are also certaine others, in nature like vnto our Partridges, but have their feet and beaks gray; which although they differ in colour and greatnesse from ours, yet all of them taste like ours, sauing that they are more delicate. Turtles there are without num- ber, which in flying darken the Sunne, and are very fat and good, and likewise Hennes, and wild Geese, and infinite numbers of Quails, and all sorts of fowles that may bee named or knowne, as Poppingayes, and many other kind of birds vnkowne to vs, both great and small, of infinite sorts and colours. There are likewise birds of prey, to wit, royals Eagles, Faulcons, Le- nards, Sparrow-hawkes, and great store of Girfaulcons, and Faulcons for the Riuer, and Cranes, and of all sorts that may be named.

30 In the mountaines are wild Swine, Stags, Roes, beasts called Ante, wild Goats, wild Oxen, Lions, Luzerns, Tygres, Foxes, Wolues, Porcupines, and diuers other sorts of knowne and vn- knowne beasts, and all wild. If any man shall aske mee how it is possible, that there should be so many wild beasts in this Countrey, and fishes in the Riuer, seeing the same is so well peo- pled: I say that no man hunteth, nor fisheth, nor hath any engine or way to take them, nei- ther delight they to feed vpon them: and therefore it is a very easie matter to goe on hunting, and to kill as much game as a man list, because the beasts and the fowles are not molested by the people: and the wild beasts (as it hath bene told me) hurt no person, yet the people of the Countrey stand in great feare of them. At one time onely, at a place called Camarua, a mile di- stant from Barua, while a man slept in the night at the gate of his Oxe-cote, with his little son, there came a Lion and killed the said partie, so that no man perceiued it, and hurt not the child at all, but eat the mans nose, and opened his heart. The people of this Towne were greatly a- mazed hereat, saying, this Lion hath begunne to sauer mans flesh, he will doe much mis- chief, and no man shall escape him: yet (blessed be God) it was not perceiued that hee did any more harme; and wee at the same time went often on hunting nere the same place, and neuer found any Lions. Wee found indeed Panthers, Ounces, and Tygres, which we hurt not, nor they vs.

40 24. The authoritie of Barnagasso is in manner following. By his title hee is called a King: for, Nagas signifieth, a King; and Bar, the Sea: and so Bar-nagas signifieth King of the Sea. And when they giue him this gouernment, they giue it him with a Crowne of gold vpon his head, and it is giuen according to the will of Prete Ianni, and lasteth as long as it pleaseth him. For in fixe yeeres space while we remayned there, I saw foure Barnagassos. At our comming into the Countrey, Dori was Barnagasso, and he died of his naturall death, whose Crowne was giuen to his sonne Bidla, a child of ten or twelue yeeres old, which after hee was made Barnagasso, was straightway called to the Court of Prete Ianni, whom he deprived of the gouernment, and gaue the same to a noble Lord, called Arraz Annubiata. This man held it two yeeres, and then it was taken from him, and he was made the chiefe Lord of the Court, which in their Language is called, Bettude; and he gaue the gouernment of Barnagasso, to another Lord, named Adubi, a very gentle person, which is now Barnagasso. Vnder his gouernment are many great Lords, which are called Xuus, which signifieth Captaines, and these Xuus are men of great authoritie. And it is said, that two gouernments of this Land was wont to bee the Kingdome of Queene Candace, which in her time had no other dominion, and shee was the first Christian that this Land had.

60 Also there are two other Gouernments, to wit; Dassila, and Consila. These border vpon Egypt, and these Captaines and Lords remaine vpon the Frontiers, and haue Trumpets carried be- fore them, which they call Vgardas, which none can haue but such as are great Lords; and all these attend vpon Barnagasso to the warres, when he goeth forth, and wheresoeuer he goeth. He hath

And I haue seene the said Arraz Aderao twice at the Court, and both those times walking before the gate of the King, without any shirt, and with a cloth of Silke girt from the middle downwards, and a Lions skin vpon his shoulders, and in his right hand a Dagger, and in his left hand a Target. I asked why so great a person went on that fashion; it was told me, that that was thought to be the most honourable habite that could be imagined, for him that was Arraz di Canal, that is, Head of the men at Armes. And in the very same habite there followed after him twentie or thirtie Foot-men with Daggers and Targets, but alwaies the Arraz marched before.

The said Barnagasso hath other two, namely, Arraz Tagale, and Arraz Iacob, Lords of great Countreyes, which I knew, and many other Xuu Captaines, and Lords of other Countreyes. And as well he, as the other Lords are subiect vnto Prete Ianni: and he it is that giueth and taketh away their offices, when he seeth good, and it pleaseth him: and to him they pay the Gulbre, that is to say, the Tribute of the Countrey. And all these Lordships are towards the parts of Egypt and of Arabia, from whence come the good Horses, cloth of Gold, and Silks, whereof they pay him tribute; that is to say, all of them pay to Barnagasso, and he payeth it ouer againe to Prete Ianni for himselfe, and for the rest euery yeere, to wit, one hundred and fiftie Horses, and a great quantitie of Silke, and cloth of Gold. They pay likewise great store of Cotton-cloth of India, for the customes which are gathered in the Hauen of Ereoco.

25. The people of this Towne of Barua, and their neighbours round about them haue a custome to enclose themselues, ten, twelue, or fifteene of them in a Court all walled and strongly enclosed, which Court hath not past one gate, and herein they shut vp their Kine, of which they haue their Milke and Butter: they shut vp likewise their small cattell, as Seepe, Mules, and Asses; and besides the locking vp of their gate in the night, they make fires also at the gate, and place men to watch there, for feare of wild beasts which range about their lodgings. And if they should not take this course, no beast of theirs should escape vndeoured. And of this Towne of Barua, and the other Townes adioyning, are the men which goe to sowe Millet vnto the Mountaines of the Vision, and they goe thither three moneths before the Generall Winter: and the cause why they goe thither, are two: the first is, because they are neere to the Sea, whereby all victuals are transported to Mecca, to Ziden, to Toro, and to all Arabia, and India. And hauing many sorts of Corne, they seeke a fit place for the vent thereof. The second cause is, for that in this Countrey there are two Winters, diuided into rainy stormes; neither do the Cornes grow, but with abundance of water: therefore they depart from Barua, and goe to sowe their Corne in the Mountaines of the Vision, where at that time it is Winter, which lasteth all the time of Februarie, March, and Aprill, and the selfe same Winter is in another Countrey, which is vnder the gouernment of Barnagasso, called Lama, distant from the Mountaines of the Vision, at least eight dayes iourney. At this very time also it is Winter in another Countrey, which is called Dobas, being thirtie dayes iourney from this place. And because these seeds of Millet require much raine, therefore these Winters being out of the ordinarie season of the places aboue mentioned, they goe to sowe them where it raineth, and so they make their profit of the two foresaid Winters.

In this Towne of Barua are two very great and goodly Churches, wherein are many Priests, the one fast by the other: one is for the men, called Saint Michael; and the other for the women, called, The Church of the Apostles, that is, of Saint Peter, and Saint Paul. They say that the Church belonging to the men was built by a great Lord that was Barnagasso, who gaue it this priuiledge, that no woman should enter therein, saue the wife of Barnagasso with one maide onely, and that onely when shee went to receiue the Communion; and yet might shee not enter into the Church, for women come not into the Church, but stand at the gate in the circuit before the Church, and there they receiue the Communion with the Lay people; and so likewise doe the women in the other Church of the Apostles, which receiue it in the forme aforesaid before the gate. And in the womens Church I haue alwaies seene the wife of Barnagasso goe to communicate with the other women, not yfing the priuiledge granted vnto her, to goe to communicate in the Church of the men.

These two Churches haue the circuit of their Church-yards, which toucheth one another, and are compassed about with high walls, and they make the Sacrament, that is to say, the Bread, for both of them in one house, and both of them say their Masses at one and the selfe same time, and the Priests that serue in one Church doe serue in the other, that is to say, two parts of the Priests in the Church of the men, and the other part in the Church of the women, and being thus diuided, they say their Diuine Service. These Churches haue no manner of Tithes, onely they haue great possessions which belong vnto the Priests, and they cause them to be tilled and manured, the reuenues whereof are diuided among them, and the Barnagasso alloweth them whatsoeuer is needfull in the Churches, that is to say, Reparations, Ornaments, Waxe, Butter, Incense, Incense, and all things else belonging thereunto. At these Churches are twentie Priests, and ten or twelue Friers continually resident; and I neuer saw Church of Priests where there were not Friers, nor Monasterie of Friers, where there were any Priests, for the Friers are so many, that they couer the World: both in the Monasteries, the Churches on the waies, and in all Markets, and lastly, in all places are Friers.

Abundance of Friers.

26. The Priests marrie with one Wife, and obserue Matrimonie better then the Laytie. They continue alwaies in House with their Wife and children, and if perhaps their Wife die, they marrie no more; and likewise if the Priest die, his Wife marrieth not a second Husband, but she may become a Nunne if she will. And if a married Priest lie with another woman, hee entreth no more into the Church, neither is he partaker of the Reuenues thereof, but becommeth as it were, a Lay-man. And this I know to bee true, for I saw a Priest accused before the Patriarke, that he had lien with another woman, and I heard him confesse the fault, and straight way the Patriarke, commanded, that he should neuer carrie Crosse more in his hand, nor come any more into the Church, but should become a Lay-man. And if any Priest being a Widdower doe marrie againe, he becommeth a Lay-man, as it hapned to Abuquer, whom I mentioned before, which being a Widdower was married to Romana Orque, the Sister of Prete Ianni. This man hauing beene a Priest and principall Chaplaine to Prete Ianni, after hee had beene Widdower many yeares married againe, and Marke the Patriarke digraded him, and made him become a Lay-man, and he came no more into the Church, but stood at the Church-porch, to receiue the Sacrament, as the Lay-people doe.

Losse of orders or degradation

20 The Priests Sonnes for the most part become Priests, for in this Countrey no Schooles are vsed to teach children to reade or write, neither are there any Schoolemasters: and the Priests teach their children that little which they know, and so they make them Priests, being admitted into Orders by Abura Marke, that is to say, Their Patriarke: for through all Ethiopia there is none other, neither Bishop nor any bodie else that giueth Orders, and Orders are giuen to these Priests, twice in the yeare, as I will hereafter declare, hauing my selfe oftentimes beene present at their taking of Orders. In all these Countries the Church-yards are enclosed with very strong wals, that beasts may not come and digge vp the dead bodies. They vse great reuerence to their Churches: and no man is so hardy as to rule on horse-backe by a Church, but lighteth, and walketh on foot, till he be gone a great way beyond the Church, and the Church yards.

Bad peoples

27. We aboad in this Towne of Barna, and could not at the first, for many daies space, get any order for our dispatch: yet at the last, we departed the eight and twentieth of Iune, 1520. being verie glad and well appayed of our dispatch: and the people which carried our stufte would carrie them but two miles onely from the Towne, saying, that they were not bound to carrie them any farther, because there ended the limits of their Countrey. Beeing thus in the wide fields in the moneth of Iune, and in the depth of the Winter of these Countries with our said goods, and induring most huge raines and showres, the Ambassadour with three of vs in his company returned to Barna, to speake with Barnagasso. He alwaies gaue vs good words but bad deeds; yet at last after foure daies he sent for the said goods.

28. The next day, a Gentleman came thither from Prete Ianni, whom Barnagasso so highly entertained, that he forgot vs, and went forth of the Towne to receiue him as far as a litle hill without the Suburbs, accompanied with much people, and the said Barnagasso was naked from the middle vpward. As soone as the Gentleman was come thither, he mounted vp that litle hill aboue all the rest, and the first speech that hee vsed was this: The King greets you well; at which words the whole company bowed downe their heads, touching the ground with one of their hands, which is the honour and reuerence that they vse in this Countrey. These words ended, the Ambassage which he brought him from Prete Ianni, followed. After he had ended his speech, Barnagasso clad himselfe in verierich array, and brought the Gentleman to his Palace. This is the manner of hearing the message which Prete Ianni sendeth, to wit, abroad without doores, and on foot; and naked from the Girle vpward, vntill the same be ended: And if it be an acceptable message from Prete Ianni, he which receiueith it clotheth himselfe; but if the message be sent in displeasure, then hee which receiueith it abideth still naked, shewing himselfe to bee in disgrace of his Soueraigne. This Barnagasso was Brother to the Mother of Prete Ianni.

With what reuerence these Lords receiue the Ambassadors of Prete Ianni.

Manner of hearing messages from the Prince.

After many delayes, the Ambassador prayed him to lend him twelue Mules: he answered, that he could not lend vs them, and that if he would haue them he must buy them; and as we would haue bought them of the Countrey people, which willingly would haue sold them vnto vs, his Seruants came and threatned them, that if they sold vs any they would punish them, and take the Gold from them: for no other money runneth currant in this Countrey. When we sought to buy vs Mules, all the Countrey people refused to sell vs any, saying, That they were afraid of Barnagasso, because he himselfe would haue the selling of their Mules. The Custome of all the Realme of Prete Ianni, is, that there is no other coined money currant, but onely Gold, and it passeth from man to man by waight, and the principall waight is an ounce, which maketh ten Pardaos, or ten Cruzados; the next is halfe an ounce; and the least money is a dramme, and ten drammes make an ounce; and the value of a dramme is according to a dramme in the Kingdome

Moreouer, the said Barnagasso had commanded that none but himselfe and his Officers, should keepe any Waights to weigh Gold withall; and whosoever would buy and sell must come to intreat them for their Waights, and by this meanes he and his Factors vnderstood to whose hands the Gold came, which Gold afterward he would take from them at his pleasure, as it was told mee by themselves.

Processions.

29. In this Towne of Barna, there is a Church of our Ladie, which is great, new, and verie well painted, and notably furnished with many Ornaments, and Cloth of Gold, Cloth of Silke, Crimson and Veluet of Mecca, and red Chamblets. In this Church the Seruice is the selfe-same which is vsed in the Church of Barna, before mentioned, sauing that here it is something more solemne, because Barnagasso is here resident, and many more Priests, and great numbers of Friers. The Church is gouerned by Priests, and one time while I was there, I saw a Procession made about the Church in the greatest Circle which is in the Church-yard, wherein were many Priests and Friers, men and women (for in this Church, the women receiue the Communion with the Lay-men) in which Procession were the rich Ornaments afore said; and they compassed the Church at least thirtie times, singing, as it were, Letanies, and ringing many Basons like vnto Drums and Cymbals.

In this Towne is a great Market, as there is at Barna, and likewise, once a weeke, there is a Market kept in al those places which are head-towns. In these Markets they vse to exchange one thing for another; namely, to giue an Ass for a Cow, and that which is wanting of the worth, is supplied with two or three measures of Corne or Salt. Moreouer, they change Goates for Bread, and for Bread they buy Cloth; and for Cloth, Mules and Kine: but especially, they may haue what they will for Salt, for Incense, for Pepper, for Myrrhe, and for small Pearles, all which are things much esteemed and had in price, and make account of them as of Gold, and these runne as currant through all the Kingdomes of Prete Ianni, and of the Gentiles: for euery small thing, they change Hens and Capons. To be short, whatsoever a man would buy is here to be had in the Market by exchange, for no money is here currant. Neither vse they many words in their bargaines, but are soone agreed, whereat we greatly maruelled.

The greatest Chapmen in these Markets, are Priests, Friers, and Nunnes. The Friers goe decently apparelled, with their Habit downe to the ground: some weare yellow apparell of course Cotton-cloth, others weare Goats-skins drest like Chamois. The Nunnes also weare the like Habit. Moreouer, the Friers weare Cowles, like the Cowles of the Dominican Friers, made of the said skins or of yellow Cotton-cloth, and also weare their haire long. The Nunnes weare neither Cowles nor long haire, but onely a Gowne, and haue all their heads shauen, and haue a thong of Leather tyed strait about their heads, and when they be old, they weare a certaine attire vpon their heads, and Veiles ouer the same. They are not inclosed in Monasteries, but dwell in certaine seuerall Townes; and because all the Monasteries are of one order, therefore they are obedient vnto the Monasterie that is next them, from whence they receiue their Habit. These Nunnes enter not into the Church, but doe as other women doe. The number of them is very great, and in a manner, as great as the number of the Friers: they say that some of them are women of a very holy life. Againe, some of them haue children. The Habit which the Priests weare, is little differing from the Habit of the people, for it is made all of one Cloth, and they are girded like the common people; their difference is, in that they carrie a Crosse alwaies in their hands, and their heads are alwaies shauen. And contrariwise, the Lay-people weare their Lockes long, and the Priests shauie not their Beards, but the Lay-men are shauen vnder the chinne, and cut off their Mustaches. There are also certaine other Priests, called Debeteras, which is as much to say, as Canons, these are Priests of great Churches, as a man would say, of Cathedrall, or Collegiate Churches: and these men goe very well apparelled, so that they well declare what manner of men they bee: and these goe not vp and downe the Markets as the rest doe.

Barnagasso
State.

30. The state of this Barnagasso (although he be a great Lord, and hath the title of a King) is very poore. Whensoever we spake with him, we found him sitting in a Litter couered with a Quilt, the Testerne was of Cotton-cloth, which they call Basuto; it is very good according to that Countrey. There bee some verie deare, and behind the said Litter or Couch, the wall was hanged with foure verie rich Swords, fastned to foure pieces of wood, fastned to the wall, and two great Bookes likewise hanged thereon: before the Litter vpon the ground were spread certaine Mats, on which they sit which come to see him. They sweepe not their Houses very often. His Wife alwaies sitteth at his elbow vpon a Mat, which is layed at his beds head. Also many people and men of account are alwaies before him, which sit vpon the said Mats. Ouer against him, right before his Litter, stand alwaies foure Horses, one of which is alwaies saddled, and the rest are onely couered with Couerings, and there they stand eating.

Courts of Iustice.

In all his Houses are two round places inclosed as it were Courts; each circuit hath his gate, and euery gate hath his Porters, with their stauies in their hands. In the gate next vnto him stand the principall Porters, and betweene these two gates is alwayes one of his Alicazi, which signisignifieth an Auditor or Steward of the House; and he it is that ministreth Iustice when he hath heard both the parties. And if the cause be of great importance, he heareth both the parties till they haue made an end of speaking, then he relateth the whole matter to Barnagasso, and hee himselfe decideth the matter; and if it be but a small matter, and the parties agree together, and the said Alicaxi giue sentence thereof, the cause is so ended. Moreouer, their must needs be there present, a man of honour and account, which by his office, is called Mallagana, which signifieth the Notary of Prete Ianni, at all sentences which Barnagasso or this Alicaxi giueth. And if any of the parties will appeale to Prete Ianni, or vnto his Auditors, in such cases they send vnto him the state of the cause, and by this meanes Prete Ianni vnderstandeth all the complaints of his subiects, as well great as small: and all the Lords of the Dominions of Prete Ianni, haue each of them one Alicaxi, and one Mallagana, placed by himselfe, and the Captaines subiect to Barnagasso haue the like.

Appeale.

The great Lords which remaine in the Court of Barnagasso, and others which come vnto him for their affaires, come in this manner. Departing from their houses, they ride vpon a Mule, with seauen or eight men on foote, which goe before him vnto the first gate, and there hee lighteth; if he be a greater Lord, he rideth with seuen, or eight, or ten Mules, his whole company riding, or with more, according to his quality, and commeth vnto the first gate; and being come thither, they all alight, and then they go to the second gate, and if peradventure they cannot get in, they sit there without, as Bees doe in the Sunne, all in a cluster. All these honorable persons, weare Sheepe-skinnes about their necks and shoulders, and those which weare Lions, Tygers, or Leopards skinnes, are more honourable, and when they come before Barnagasso, they put them off to honour him, as we put off our hats.

Manner of comming to him.

While wee were in this Towne of Barna, on a Market day was a great Proclamation made, that Barnagasso would goe to warre against the people of Nubia. The order of this Proclamation was in this wise: One carried a Cloath like a Banner vpon a Iauelin, and another went crying warre against the Nubians, which they say are very farre off in the vtmost Confinnes of their Countrey, fve daies iourney towards Egypt, and border vpon the Countries of Canfila and Dassila, as hath beene before mentioned, being subiect to the said Barnagasso. These people of Nubia, are neither Mobres, Iewes, nor Christians; but they say at sometimes they were Christians, and that through default of euill Ministers they lost their Faith, and are become Iufidels, and without Law.

Nubia.Nubians, what people.

Moreouer, they told me, that they had slaine one of Barnagasso his Sonnes not long before, for which cause he purposed to goe into those parts, to be auenged of them. And it was told me, that in this Countrey of Nubia, is found abundance of fine Gold, and that vpon the Frontiers thereof, are alwaies foure or fve hundred Horse-men kept, which are excellent men of Armes, and that their Countrey is very fruitfull, and aboundeth with all sorts of Victuals and Cattell, and it cannot be otherwise; because it lyeth on both sides of the Riuer of Nilus, which passeth farre many miles space through the midst of the same. The Proclamation said, That within fve daies space, Barnagasso would set forward, but as yet there was no furniture of Weapons prepared: for in that Countrey there is no great store of them, saue onely the Canas, which are the men of Armes, were there present, which carrie a Iauelin, a Target, and a Bow, with store of Arrowes, and persons of more honour weare an arming Sword, and a Iacke of Male, but not many of them. Vpon this occasion of going to warre, Barnagasso begged a Sword of our Embassadour, which gaue him his owne sword which he weare in that expedition, which was very faire and good, and this notwithstanding, with great importunitie he begged another, which he knew that he had, being very well garnished, and very rich, saying; That hee had great need thereof. Our Embassadour being not able to shift him off, was forced to buy one for him among his Company, which had a Veluet skabberd, and the Hiltis gilded, and so he gaue it him in exchange for one of his. And in the house where we kept our goods, and where wee lodged, which was without gates: the night following, they robbed vs of two Sallets, and one head-piece, you may well thinke, that they pilfered the same vpon occasion of this warre.

Gold,

Armes,

Base begging.

In this Towne we bought Mules for our iourney, and Barnagasso gaue vs three Camels, and with much paine wee departed from thence, through the great Thunders, Tempests, and Raines, which terribly troubled vs; for at this season is the tury of Winter, which beginneth about the fifteenth of Iune, little more or lesse, (as we haue said before) and endeth the fifteenth of September, and at the end thereof is their Summer, as it is with vs: and what it taketh of the one, it leaueth of the other. During all this Winter-season in some of these Countries, they trauaile not, but we notwithstanding proceeded on our iourney, because wee knew not the custome of the Countrey, and much lesse the danger whereinto we thrust our selues. And so we set forward on our iourney with part of our goods, because we left the greatest part at Barna with our Factor, and came to a place called Temei, which is in the Countrey of Maizada, distant from the Towne of Barna whence we came, about twelue miles, wee spent three daies in this iourney, by reason of the cruell Winter and huge raines, our goods which we carried, being spoyled with water.

At this place where we arrived, we found a Xum, that is to say, A Captaine, whose name was Primo, and hee was one of Barnagasso his Brothers, an honourable person, and of great worth, who vsed vs very courteously. They said, that he was likewise Brother to the Mother of Prete Ianni, and that he had in his Xumeta, or government of the Countrey of Maizada, twentie Townes, and not about, because it is the least Shire within the Kingdome of Barnagasso. This town is seated vpon a steepe hill, not of Stone, but all of arable ground, with certaine small Villages thereon; and vpon three sides a man may see the Champaine Countrey, for fortie or fiftie miles about; and on the fourth side, by the space of three miles, beginneth an huge bot-tome or downe-fall, which the ground maketh toward a great Riuer, neere vnto which a man may behold most goodly champaine fields, all manured and fruitfull, wherein are seated about one hundred Villages; in so much, that I thinke in no part of the world is any Countrey so well inhabited, nor so full of all sorts of Graine, as this is. Neither doe the raines in Winter any harme thereunto, for this is the best season they can wish for, for at that time the Corne groweth best, and becommeth most beautifull. And I thinke there is no Countrey wherein such abundance of Cattell, as well tame as wilde, may be found, and where a man may catch such store of Wilde-fowle, as in these champaine fields; but of wilde Beasts there, none other sorts but Tygers, Wolues, and Foxes, which also are common in all the Countrey. They eat not many sorts of beasts, as Hogges, Hares, Wilde-Geese, and Ducks, and all because they are not clouen-footed: neither eat they any other kind of Beast, if it chanceth to dye, before it be eaten; and by this meanes so many beasts doe multiply, which neither are molested nor chased, because they haue no Dogges for this purpose. And when we went on Hunting without Dogges, we caught sometimes twentie Hares in our Nets at a time, in the space of an houre, and as many Partridges we droue vnto the snares, as though we had driuen Hens into an house, because they are not very wilde, nor much afraid of men, for as much as they see them all the day long; and in this manner we killed as many of them as we would desire. Those kinds of Beasts which they eat not of, we fed vpon in secret, that they should not report any euill of vs.

IN this Countrey, and in all the Dominions of Prete Ianni, is a very great and horrible plague, which is an innumerable company of Locusts, which eat and consume all the Corne and Trees, and the number of these Creatures is so great, as it is incredible, and with their multitude they couer the earth, and fill the ayre in such wise, that it is an hard matter to be able to see the Sunne. And againe, I say, that it is an incredible thing to him which hath not seene it. And if the damage which they doe, were generall through all the Prouinces and Realme of Prete Ianni, they would perish with famine, and it were impossible to inhabite the same, but one yeare they destroy one Prouince. Sometimes in two or three of those Prouinces; and wheresoeuer they goe, the Countrey remaineth more ruinate and destroyed, then if it had bene set on fire. These Vermine are as great, as a great Gras-hopper, and haue yellow wings. We know of their comming a day before, not because wee see them, but we know it by the Sunne, which sheweth his beames of a yellow colour, which is a signe that they draw neere the Countrey, and the ground becommeth yellow, through the light which reuerberateth from their wings, whereupon the people become suddenly as dead men, saying, We are vndone, for the Locusts come.
Neither will I omit to declare what I haue seene three times, and the first time was in the Towne of Barna, where we remained three yeares; and here, oftentimes we heard say, Such a Countrey, or such a Realme is destroyed with Locusts. During our abode in this Towne, we saw the signe of the Sunne, and the shadow of the earth, which was all yellow, whereat the people were halfe dead for sorrow. The next day, the number of these Vermine which came, was incredible, which to our iudgement, couered foure and twentie miles in compasse, according as we were informed afterward.
This plague of God being come vpon vs, the Priests of this place repaired vnto me, beseeching mee to giue them some remedy to chase them away; to whom I answered, That I could tell them none other remedie, saue only to pray deuoutly to God, that he would chase them out of the Countrey. And I went my selfe vnto the Embassadour, and told him, that peradventure

it would doe well to goe on Procession, and to pray to God to deliuer the Countrey, and that it might be that he would heare vs, for his mercies sake. This motion highly pleased the Embassadour.

Through the prayers of the Portugals, the Locusts were all destroyed and killed.

The next day we assembled the people of the Towne, and all the Priests, and taking a consecrated stone and a Crosse, according to our custome, all wee Portugals sung the Letanie, and I commanded those of the towne to cry vnto God like as we did, saying, in their language: Zio Marina Christos, that is, Oh Lord God haue mercy vpon vs. And with this our cry, we went through one field, whereas there grew store of Corne, for the space of one mile, vnto a little hill, and there I caused them to take vp a quantity of these Locusts, and made of them a coniuration, Exorcising the Locusts.

10 which I carried with me in writing, which I had made the night before, Requiring them charging them, and excommunicating them, willing them within three houres space to begin to depart toward the Sea, or toward the Land of the Moores, or toward the desert Mountaines, and to let the Christians alone; and if they obeyed me not, I called and adured the Fowles of the Heauen, the Beasts of the field, and all the Tempests, to scatter, destroy, and consume their bodies. And for this purpose I tooke a quantitie of these Locusts, and made this Admonition to them which were present, in the name of themselves, and of those which were absent; and so I let them goe, and gaue them libertie. It pleased God to heare vs Sinners; for as we returned homeward, there came so many of them behind vs, that it seemed they would breake our heads, and our shoulders, they stricke vs so hard, that they seemed to be blowes of stones and of stauies, and went from this part toward the Sea. The Grasshoppers excommunicated.

20 Men, Women, and Children which stayed in the Towne, were gotten vp to the roofes of the houses, praising God, because the Locusts began to depart and fly before vs, and part of them followed after vs. In the meane while, arose a great storme and Thunder toward the Sea, which came right against them, which lasted three houres, with an exceeding great shower and tempest, which filled all the Riuer, and when the water ceased, it was a dreadfull thing to behold the dead Locusts, which we measured to be aboue two fathomes high vpon the bankes of the Riuer, and in some Riuer there were exceeding great Mountaines of them, in such wise, that on the next morning there was not one of them found aliue vpon the ground.

Incredible swarmes of dead Locusts.

The people of the Townes adioyning, hearing heereof, many men came to make inquiry by what meanes this thing came to passe. The Countrey people said: These Portugals are holy Diuers censures.

30 men, and by the power of God haue chased away, and killed the Locusts. Others said, (chiefely the Priests and Friars of the places adioyning) that we were Witches, and that by witchcraft we had chased the said Vermine, and that thereby also, we were not afraid of Lyons, or of any other wilde beasts. Three daies after this acte, comes vnto vs Xuum or Captaine of a place, called Coiberia, with Men, Priests, and Friars, beseeching vs for Gods sake to helpe them, saying, That they were vndone by the Locusts, and this place was a daies iourney distant towards the Sea.

Another experiment.

They came vnto vs at Euentide, and at that instant I and foure Portugals departed with them, we trauiled all night, and came thither an houre after day-breake, where wee found all the people of that place gathered together, with many of the places neere adioyning, and they also were troubled with the Locusts, and suddenly vpon our arriual, we made our Procession round about the Towne, which is seated vpon an high hill, from whence wee saw many Villages and Townes all yellow with the multitude of Locusts. Hauing ended our Ceremonies, as in the former place we went to dinner, and the people adioyning besought vs instantly to goe to them, promising vnto vs a great rewards. It pleased God, that as soone as euer we had dined, we saw the ground cleane, so that one Locust appeared not in their sight, to their great admiration. When they saw this, not wholly trusting in the Grace of God receiued, they besought vs to goe with them to blesse their fields, for yet they were afraid least they would returne againe.

33. At another time while we were in a Towne, called Albuguna, Prete Ianni sent vs to 50 this Towne, that here we might furnish our selues of victuals, which is in the Kingdome of Angote, and is distant from the Towne of Barua, where wee abode thirtie daies iourney. When we came hither, I went with the Embassadour Zaga Zabo (which afterward came into Portugall) and five Genoueses, to a Towne and a Mountaine, called Agoan, and we trauiled five daies iourney through places wholly waste and destroyed, wherein Millet had beene sown, which had stalkes as great as those which we set in our Vineyards, and we saw them all broken and beaten downe, as if a Tempest had beene there, and this the Locusts did. The Trees were without leaues, and the Barkes of them were all deuoured, and no Grasse was there to be seene, for they had eaten vp all things, and if we had not beene warned and aduised to carrie victuals with vs, we and our Cattell had perished. This Countrey was all couered with Locusts without wings, 60 and they told vs, that those were the seede of them which had eaten vp all, and that as soone as their wings were growne, they would seeke after the old ones. And the number of them was so great, that I will not speake of it, because I shall not be beleued: but this I will say, That I saw Men, Women, and Children, sit as forlorne and dead among these Locusts; and I Harke I said vnto them, Why stand yee as dead men, and will not kill these Vermine, to be reuenged of Ple.

The hurt they saw done by Locusts elsewhere.

Zaga Zabo, an Embassadour sent into Portugall.

Their mischievous spawne.

Hark I say.

the mischief of which their fathers and mothers haue done vnto you, seeing that those which you shall kill shall neuer be able to doe you more harme? They answered, that they had not the heart to resist the plague which God sent vpon them for their sinnes. And all the people of this Countrey departed, wee found all the wayes full of men and women, traueilling on foot with their children in their armes, and vpon their heads, going into other countries where they might find food, which was a pitifull thing to behold.

Men driuen by Locusts out of their Habitations.

While wee abode in the said Signorie of Abuguna, in a place called Aquate, at another time came such an infinite swarme of Locusts, as it is incredible to declare. They began to come about three of the clocke in the after-noon, and ceased not til night, and as they came they lighted, and the next day in the morning, they began to depart, so that by nine of the clocke there was not one of them left, and the Trees remained without leaues. The same day and houre, there came another Squadron of them, and these left neither bough nor Tree unpilled, and so they continued for the space of five dayes, and they said, they were the yong ones which went to seeke the old ones, and they did the like, where wee saw them that were without wings, and the compasse which these Locusts tooke, was nine miles, wherein was neither leaues nor barke on the Trees.

Hurt to Trees.

This Countrey seemed not to bee burnt vp, but rather to bee couered with Snow, by reason of the whitenesse of the Trees, which were all pilled, so that all the Countrey remayned bare. It pleased God that the Haruests were alreadie gathered in, but wee could not vnderstand whether they went afterward, for they came from the Sea-coast out of the Kingdom of Dancali, which belongeth to the Moors, which are continually in warre, neither could we learne where at last they lighted.

Dancali.

Tigremahon.

34. The next day after our comming to this Towne of Timei, before our goods remayning in Barna, were brought thither our Ambassadour, departed with sixe on Horse-backe in his company, to goe to the Court of Tigremahon, which hath the title of a King, and vnder his Government and Iurisdiction, are many great Lords and Townes. The Ambassadour requested him to giue him aide: and while we here stayed two dayes for people to carrie our goods, a Capitaine came vnto vs, with many people to carrie the same, and hence wee departed the third of August, with great Thunders and a terrible storme of raine, and trauelled for the space of three miles through manured fields. Then beganne we to descend downward, by a very rough craggie, and steepe wayes, many miles more, and at euening lodged in a Church-yard, where wee abode in great feare of Tygres, and maruelled much at the Winter and stormes. Departing thence the day next following, wee trauelled through craggie Mountaines full of Woods and Trees without fruit, but very Greene and faire, and such as wee knew not, and came vnto a Riuer, which because it was Winter, was swollen and very dangerous to passe, which is called Marabo: and vpon this Riuer is seated the Towne of Barna, as I haue said before, and it runneth towards Nilus: and this Riuer parteth the Iurisdctions of Barnagasso, and Tigremahon, and from this Riuer vnto the place where we lodged, are about sixe miles, and albeit the Mountaines be craggie and full of Woods, yet are they inhabited with store of people, and haue many places manured in them.

Contention.

35. When we were come vnto the Riuer, they which were with vs layed downe our goods, and suddenly we heard on the other side the Riuer a great noise of Drums, and of people. We demanded what the matter was, it was told vs that it was a Capitaine of Tigremahon, which came to carrie our goods. And hauing passed the Riuer, we found a goodly company which came to meet vs, and they were betweene six or seuen hundred men. Suddenly we saw a great contention fall out betweene these people, and those which come thither with vs: for they which belonged to Tigremahon said, that they were not bound to take charge of the goods vntil they were past the Riuer: and the others said, that they were not bound to carrie them further then the waters side. While they were in this contention, because the Riuer was greatly swollen, they agreed all together to transport the goods vpon a raft, and that this should be nothing preiudiciall at all, but that, it should remaine free for them as before, and so wee passed the Riuer with our goods. These people trauelled so lustily with our stuffe, that we could not stay them back, with our Mules.

Herds of wild Hogges.

During that little part of the day which remayned, wee trauelld ouer most craggie Mountaines, and saw wilde Hogges in diuers Herds, and they were aboue fiftie in a companie, Partridges innumerable, and other sorts of Birds of diuers colours most beautifull to behold, which couered the Ground and the Trees: and wee were informed, that in these places were all kinds of rauinous beasts, and it cannot bee otherwise, as it seemeth by the terrible Mountaines.

Fires for feare of beasts.

High hills.

This night wee lodged abroad in the field in places enuironed with people and many fires, being informed, that they made these fires for feare of wild beasts, and here immediately wee found great difference in the People and in the Soyle, and in the Trees, as also in the qualitie of the Countrey, and in the Traffique of the Inhabitants: and here wee began to trauell ouer certaine Mountaines so exceeding high & craggie, that they seemed to touch the Skies, & in regard of

of their height they winded a little at the foote, and all of them were proportionably situate, and they are diuided one from the other, and stretch in length a very great way : and all those which are accessible, although there be great danger in traouelling of them, haue Chappels builded on the tops of them, and the most part of them are dedicated to our Lady; and on many of the tops of these Hills we saw Chappels, where wee could not imagine how they could ascend vp to build them. We lodged at a place, in the midst of these Mountaynes, called Abasacem, whereon standeth a Church, dedicated to our Lady, very well builded, with an Ally in the midst, mounted higher then the other two, on both sides, and the windowes thereof aboue the other Allies are vnder the middle Roofe, and the whole Church is vaulted; and in all this Countrey wee haue not seene a fairer nor better builded Church then this, which is like vnto those Churches of Badie, situate betweene the Riuer of Duora and Minio in Portugall.

Hard by this Church, standeth a mightie, huge, and a goodly Tower, as well for the height as the compasse thereof, and for the making of the wall, which seemed to stand as though it would fall; and it is of free stone finely hewed, which seemed well to bee a Princely worke; neither haue wee seene any other the like building, and it is enuironed with most beautifull houses, which are very answerable vnto the same, as well in regard of their walls, as of their Roofes and Lodgings, which seeme to haue belonged to some great Princes. They say that Queene Candaces dwelt in this place, and that her House was not farre from thence, and this is not vnlike to be true. This Towne, Church, and Tower, are seated in the midst of those cragie Mountaynes, in very beautifull and goodly greene fields, all watered with Fountaynes of water, which fall from the feet of those Mountaynes, and all these Fountaynes are made of free stone. The Graines which here are watered, are Wheat, Barly, Beanes, Chiches, Lentils, Peas, and all the yeere long they haue Garlicke, and exceeding great Leekes, and Mustard-seede, and Cresses grow about their houses; and on those Rockes grow great store of a kind of herbe, called Crescioni, and certaine other kindes of herbes which they feed on. In the said Church are very many Priests, very well apparelled, which seeme to be men of vertuous conuersation.

36. We lodged in another Towne, which is named, The houses of Saint Michael, because the Church is called Saint Michael; and coming hither, they would giue vs no lodging, saying, that they were priuiledged and exempted from such kinde of molestation: and because of the great raine, we lodged in the circuit of the Church as well as we could, and set vp our Mules in the other circuit, which serueth for a Church-yard, because there was great store of grasse, which was growne very much, by reason of the winter and the showers, which grasse in Portugall, is called Wild Panick, and it was very long and high, because it was made luttie by reason of the dead bodies there buried. In this Countrey they vse not to eat but once a day, that is to say, at euen-tide; certaine moneths of the yeere when they doe fast, and so is the custome throughout all the Realme of Prete Iunni: and as they refused to giue vs lodging, so they were slow to giue vs food, in which meane space we were almost dead for hunger. Our Factor seeing this, said, I haue two sodden Hens, if it please you, let vs eat them. The Secretarie and I marvelled much, that he wished vs to eat flesh without bread; howbeit, we were compelled to eat them. Afterward they seemed so good vnto mee (I thinke by reason of mine extreme hunger) that I would oftentimes eat the like againe, to wit, bread without flesh, and flesh without bread, and bread dipped onely in Salt, Water, or Pepper. And thus by reason of these diuers sorts of dyet, I forgot that, which at the first I so wondred at. Howbeit, in the euening they brought vs meate after their manner, and wee lodged in the foresaid circuits. And because we would be more cleane, we got neere to the place where they vse to receiue the Communion. Here hauing with vs a candle lighted, the Doves began to flie about the same, which when we perceiued, we ran to shut the gates, because they could escape none other way, and so running vpon them there escaped not one of them, for we tooke them all, euen to the young ones that were in the nest, so that we filled a sacke with them. And this was the cause, that at another time, when after certaine yeeres wee returned thither, they gaue vs lodging, that the second time wee should not take all the Doves of their Church, which by that time were replenished anew.

The difference of the people of this Countrey from those of Barnagasso, is, that the men weare certaine aprons two spannes long bound about them, and these are of Cloth, or of tanned Leather, full of plights, like vnto those which our women weare, which when they stand vp, doe couer their secrets; but when they sit downe, or goe in the wind, they hide nothing. The married women weare their aprons much shorter, so that all their secrets are seene. Young maides and other vnmarried women, and such as haue no Suters weare girdles of Beades about their middles, and about their priuities, which other women weare about their neckes. They weare also many garlands full of Timaquetes, which are a little round kind of fruit of trees, which make a noise like vnto Lupines. And such as can get any small Bells weare them vpon their priuities for a brauerie, and some weare sheep-skins about their neckes, wherewith they couer but one part of their bodies, and not the other, because they weare them loose, and bound onely about their neckes, with one foot hanging before, and another behind, and with neuer so little mouing of it, a man may see from one side of the bodie to the other, whatsoeuer he listeth. They wash themselves euery day once at the least, and sometimes twice or thrice, and by this meanes they are very cleane, and this manner of attire is for the base people, for the wiues of Gentlemen and Lords goe all couered. The way which they trauell in this Countrey of Prete Ianni, is this: he which trauelleth from the red Sea, commeth to Barna; and he which commeth from Egypt, arriueeth at Suachen, and suddenly turneth his backe to the North, and beginneth to trauell Southward, vntill he come to the gates, called Baba Baxe.

37. Caxumo, is two dayes iourney distant from the Towne of Saint Michael, alwaies tra-uelling ouer these rough Mountaines, in which place wee abode at another time eight moneths, 10 by the commandement of Prete Ianni. This place was in old time, the Citie Chamber, and residence of the Queene of Saba, whose proper name was Maqueda, and this was shee which brought Camels laden with Gold to Salomon, when he was to build the Temple in Ierusalem.
In this Towne is a very noble Church, wherein we found a most ancient Chronicle, written in the Abissine Tongue; in the beginning whereof it was declared, that first it was written in the Hebrew, afterward translated into the Chaldean Tongue, and lastly out of that, into the the A- bissine Language. And it began in this manner: Queene Maqueda hearing of the great and rich buildings which Salomon had begun at Ierusalem, determined to goe and visite him, and laded certaine Camels with Gold to bestow vpon his work-men. And being come neere to the Citie of Ierusalem, and being to passe a Lake ouer certaine Bridges, suddenly inspired by the holy Ghost, shee lighted, and knee- 20 ling downe, worshipped the timber of those Bridges, and said: God forbid, that my feet should touch those beames on which the Sauour of the World shall suffer.

38. In this very Towne of Caxumo, was also the chiefe residence of Queene Candaces, whose proper name was Indith, and from her sprang the beginning of Christianitie in these parts: and from the place where the said Queene was borne vnto Caxumo, are two miles; which is a little Towne, being at this time inhabited with people, which by their trade are Carpenters. The Christian Faith beganne here in this manner. Their bookes in the Abissine Tongue say, (as also is written with vs, in the Acts of the Apostles.) And they say, that the Prophecie was herein fulfilled, wherein it is said, that Ethiopia shall stretch out her hands vnto God. And thus they say, that they were first conuerted vnto the Christian Faith, and that the Eunuch returned sud- 30 denly to Ethiopia with ioy, vnto the house of his Ladie and Mistresse, and conuerted and baptized her with all her household; for he declared vnto her all which had hapned vnto him by the way, and so the Queene caused all the people of her Kingdome and Dominions to be baptized, and the Faith began in a Kingdome which is now called Burro, being situate in the Eastern part of the Kingdome of Barnagasso, which is now diuided into two Signiories: and in this Towne of Caxumo, she built an exceeding goodly Church, which was the first, which is said to haue beene made in Ethiopia, and it is called Saint Marie of Sion, because that from Sion, the consecrated stone of the Altar was sent; for in these Countreyes they call the Churches by no other name, but by the Altar-stone, wherein is written the name of the place from whence it was fetched. 40

This Church is very large, and hath five allies of sufficient breadth, and very long, made like a Vault, and aboue the Vault is a Tarrax, and vnder the Vault, and on the walls it is painted, and the Church is built of free stone exceeding faire, and ioyned together: it hath seuen Chap-pels, which are all situate with their shoulders toward the East, and their Altars very well adorned; it hath a Quire like vnto ours, sauing onely that it is so low, that with the top thereof it reacheth onely to the Vault; and there is another Quire built ouer the Vault, but they vse it not. This Church hath a great compasse builded with very great free-stones, as big as the stones wherewith we couer graues, which circuit is enuironed with very great walls, and is vncouered, contrarie to the rest of the Churches of this Countrey. And besides this circuit, it hath another as great as the compasse of a Castle or a Towne, within which are goodly houses of one 50 storie, and each of them hath Fountaines, which send forth their water through the Images of certaine Lions, made of stone of diuers colours. Within this great circuit are two faire Palaces made of diuers stories high, the one on the right hand, the other on the left, which belong to the Two Gouvernours of the Church; the other houses belong to the Canons and the Friers. Within this great circuit, neere vnto the gate which is next vnto the Church, is a square field of ground at this day lying waste, which in times past was full of houses, wherein in each corner is a square Pillar of free-stone, very high, and cunningly carued with diuers workes, and in the same are letters ingrauen to bee seene, but no man vnderstands them; neither doth any man know of what Tongue they be, and there are many of these kinds of Epitaphs, and this place is called, Ambacabete, which signifieth, The house of Lions, because in times past Lions 60 were kept bound there.

Before the gate of the great circuit is a great Court, wherein groweth a mightie Tree, which is called, The Fig-tree of Pharaos; and from the one end to the other are certaine faire Cisterns made of free-stone, well wrought, and well seated, whereunto the Tree doth some harme, one-
ly

ly where it reacheth vnto them with his roots.ouer these Cisterns are twelue Seats of stone placed, raised in order one behind the other, as well wrought as if they were of wood, with their feet and seats beneath, and they are not made of one entire stone, but of diuers pieces; which seats (they said) serued for the twelue Auditors or Iudges of the Law, which at this day are resident at the Court of Prete Ianni. Without this circuit are many goodly houses, the like whereof for beautie and greatnesse are not to be seene in all Ethiopia; there are also many goodly Wells of water, adorned with very goodly stones, and likewise in the most part of the houses are antique Images, as of Lions, Dogs, and Birds, and all of them are made of exceeding hard and fine stone. Behind the backe of this mightie Church, is a Lake of springing water at the foot of a little Hill, where at this day the Market is kept, and about the same are many Chaires, wrought in such sort as those are which belong to the circuit.

Curious Works

This Towne is situate vpon the entrance of a faire Medow, betweene two small Hills, and the greatest part of this Medow is replenished with most ancient buildings, wherein are many of those Chaires with many Pillars, which haue letters on them, whose Language no man vnderstandeth; but they are very well ingrauen. At the entrance of the said place are many Ruines of stone, part standing vp, and part ouerthrowne to the ground, which are very high and goodly, with faire antique-worke, whereof one standeth as yet vpright, built vpon another beeing wrought like vnto an Altar-stone, and as it were carued into the same; and this which is built vpon the other is exceeding great, being sixtie foure yards* in length, and sixe in breadth, and three in the flanks, and very straight and well wrought, all carued with windowes from the foot to the top, to wit, one window aboue another, and the top of the said stone is like vnto an halfe Moone, wherein are five nayles in the part which standeth towards the South, nayled into the said stone in forme of a Crosse, the rust of which nayles running downe in rainy weather along the said stone, a spanne distance from the said nayles, seemeth to bee like vnto fresh bloud. This Pillar of stone standing yet so high from the ground toward the South, hath the forme of a gate in it, wrought in the very stone, with a chaine which seemeth to bee lockt, and the stone vpon which this same is seated, is a fathome thicke, and very square, and this stone is also set vpon other great and little stones, wherein I could not discerne how farre this stone entred into them, or whether it went downe into the ground. Neere vnto these are a very great number of stones, very faire and well wrought, which (as it seemeth) were brought hither to be framed in some piece of building, and also those other which were so great, and set vpright. Of these stones, some were fortie fathoms* long, and some thirtie, and in the most part of these stones, are very mightie letters ingrauen, which none of the Countrey is able to reade. And among the stones which lie vpon the ground, there are three very great and very fairely wrought, and one of them is broken into three pieces, and euery piece is aboue eight fathoms long, and ten fathoms broad; neere vnto which, are other stones, whereon these should haue beene set.

39. Neere vnto this Towne of Caxumo standeth a little Hill, from whence descendeth a great deale of ground on all sides. A mile distant from the Citie are two houses builded vnderneath the ground, wherein a man cannot enter without light. These houses are not made with vaults, but are made of very goodly hewen stone, all euen, as well on the sides as ouer the head, and are twelue fathom high, and the said stones are so well couched together, that they seeme to be all one piece, for the ioynts thereof cannot bee discerned. One of these houses is diuided into many roomes. At the entrance of the gates are two holes, wherein they put the post where-with they fasten the gates. In one of the chambers of this house are two great Arches of foure fathoms long, and one and an halfe broad, and as much in heighth, to wit, the hollownesse within, and albeit they lacked their couer, yet seeme they to haue had one. They say that these were the Chists of the treasure of the Queene of Saba. The other house is somewhat broader, and hath but one chamber and a porch, and from one gate to the other is the distance of a stones cast, and the open field is vpon the top of the houses. In our companie were certaine Genoueses and Catalans, which had beene slaues vnto the Turkes, who sware that they had seene many goodly buildings, but that they neuer saw such huge buildings as these of this Towne of Caxumo. And we iudged that Prete Ianni sent vs hither to solace our selues of set purpose, that we should see these kind of buildings, which are farre greater then I haue written.

Having heard them speake of so much Gold, I purposed to make a Table, like those which I haue seene made in the Towne of Foz de roca in Portugall, and at the Bridge of Muzella, and so I began to wash the earth, and to lay it vpon Tables; but I found no Gold at all: I wot not whether it fell so out, because I knew not how to wash the earth; or else, because I knew not the Gold; or, that there was none at all; but the fame thereof was very great.

Two Nebret.

They say, that the Church of this Citie is the most ancient Church in all Ethiopia. And it seemeth to be no lesse, for it is more honoured then the rest, and Diuine Seruice is said therein very solemnely after their manner, and there are in it one hundred and fiftie Debeteres or Canons, and as many Friers. And it hath two principall Gouernours, which in their Language are called Nebreti, that is to say, Masters of instruction, one of which two is ouer the Canons, and the other ouer the Friers, and these two are lodged in the Palaces which are within the circuit of the Church, and the Nebret of the Canons lodgeth in the Palace on the right hand, and this is the greater and more honorable of the two, and hath authoritie to execute iustice, not only vpon the Canons, but also vpon the Lay-men of the Countrey, and the Nebret of the Friers executeth iustice vpon the Friers only, and both of these haue Trumpetters in their Courts, and others which play vpon certaine Instruments like vnto Drums, and haue exceeding great Reuenues. Besides these, there is giuen them daily out of the Countrey a portion of Bread, and a portion of the Countrey-wine, called Mambar, which is giuen vnto them when Masse is ended; and they giue it vnto them in two parts; to wit, one vnto the Friers, and another to the Canons, and this their portion is so great, that seldome the Friers eate any more then this, for this sufficeth them for all the day. And hereof they faile not euery day, except Good-friday; for, on that day they neither eate nor drinke. The Canons receiue not their portion in the circuit of the Church, and seldome times they stay in it, sauing onely when they say Diuine Seruice; as also the Nebreti stay not in their Palaces, saue onely when they giue audience to the people: and thus they doe because they bee married, and liue with their wiues and children in their houses, which houses be very good, and are without the circuit of the Church, wherein to women are not suffered to enter, neither may the Lay-people come into the Churches. But there is another very faire Church, whereunto the Lay-people and women repaire to receiue the Communion.

Mountaine.

40. There is an high Mountaine, and small as well at the bottome as at the top, which seemeth to reach vp to Heauen, which hath three hundred steppes to the top, and vpon the same stands a very holy and faire Chappell, which hath about it a circuit of stone, wrought very well, as high as the breast of a man, from whence a man would be afraid to looke downe. The circuit of this Church is so broad, that three may walke in it together in a ranke, and is called by the name of Abbot Pantaleon, which was a most deuout and holy man, and there lies his bodie; and this Church hath great reuenues, and hath in it fiftie Canons all honourable persons, and well apparelled, and their chiefe Gouernour is called Nebret.

Now he returneth to his Voyage.

41. From this Citie of Caxumo Westward men trauell toward Nilus, where there are great Cities and Lordships: and they say that toward this part is the Citie of Sabaim, of which the Queene of Saba tooke her name, from whence shee had that blacke wood which shee sent to Solomon, to polish the works of the Temple. And from this Towne of Caxumo, vnto the beginning of the Townes of Sabaim, are two dayes iourney; and this Signiorie is subiect to the Kingdome of Tigremahon: and the Lord and Captaine of the same is Cousin to Prete Ianni; and it is reported to bee a good and large Signiorie. Toward the North is a Countrey, called Torrato, all full of Mountaines, toward which within the space of twelue miles, is an high Mountaine, which is great at the bottome, on which is a Plaine of two miles long, full of Woods of exceeding straight and beautifull Trees, neere vnto which Woods, there is a Monasterie which hath large reuenues, and great number of Monks, which is called, The Monasterie of Alleluiah, and the cause of this name is said to be this, that at the first building thereof, there liued a Frier of most holy life, which spent the most part of the night in prayers, and hauing heard the Angels in Heauen sing Alleluiah, Alleluiah, he told the same vnto his Superiour, and thus was this Monasterie called by that name. And as this Frier was very holy and good, so the report is, that they which liue there at this present are as bad and wicked.

About this Hill whereon this Monasterie is seated, are Riuers to be seene, which are dried vp, which run not, but in the time of great tempests & thunders. But now to returne to our voyage, about eight miles distant from Caxumo, is another Monasterie on a Mountaine, which is called, The Monasterie of Saint Iohn: and sixe miles beyond this is another, which is called, Abba Gariman, whom they report to haue bene King of Grecia, and that forsaking his Kingdome and Government, he came hither to doe penance, and here he ended his life deuoutly, and yet, they say, hee doeth many Miracles, and wee were there present on the day of his solemnitie, where wee saw about three thousand persons, some blind, some lame, and some sicke of the French Poxe.

places we had oftentimes beene lodged, which no body else may vse, but such Noblemen as represent the Kings person, and they vse such reuerence to these houses, that the gates thereof stand alwaies open, and no man dare presume to enter, or to touch them, saue one-ly when the Gouvernour is within, and when he is gone out, they leaue the gates open, and the beds whereon they sleepe, and their prouision to make their fire, and their Kitchin. Departing from this place, we trauailed about fifteene miles, and lodged vpon an high Mountaine, which standeth neere vnto a great Riuer, called Bacinete, and so likewise is the Towne and Territorie called, whereof the Grand-mother of Prete Ianni was then Gouvernesse; and at the time when we were there, it was taken from her, because she had done wrong vnto the Inhabitants, and 20 Prete Ianni beareth as great affection and respect vnto his Subiects, as to his Kinsfolkes, and this Countrey is subiect to the Kingdome of Tigremahon, and in euery part is very well peopled, and manured in all parts: but especially it is full of fruitfull Mountaines, and Riuers which runne continually towards Nilus. All their habitations are seated and built vpon high places, and out of the way, and thus they doe, because of the Trauailers, which take away such things as they haue perforce. They which carried our goods for feare of wilde beasts, made a hedge with Fagots of Thornes very strong, and lay within the same, and we with our Mules, and that night we had no harme.

We departed from Bacinete, and trauailed fixe miles vnto our lodging, vnto a place called 30 Malue, which is compassed with many goodly manured fields, full of Wheate, Barley, and Millet, and Pulse of all sorts, the like whereof, so faire and so thicke, we had not seene in any place together. Neere vnto this Towne, is an exceeding high Mountaine, but at the foote not very great, for it is as great in a manner at the top as beneath, because it is as steepe as a Wall or fortresse right vp, all bare without Grasse, or any greene thing; and it is diuided into two parts, to wit, the two outward sides are sharpe, and the midst is plaine, and on one of those sharpe tops, trauailing vp into the same, aboue two miles, there is a Monasterie of Friers of our Ladie, called Abba Mata, and they are men of an holy life. The order of Friers heere, is all one, because through the Realme of Prete Ianni they are all of one order; namely, of the order of Saint Anthony the Hermite, and out of this order is sprung another, which is called oftentimes they burne some of them, because there are many heresies among them; namely, because they will not worship the Crosse which they themselues make, because all the Priests and Friers carry Crosse in their hands, and the Laity at their neckes: and the cause why they will not worship them, is, because they say, That Crosse is onely to be worshipped, whereon Christ dyed for vs, but that those which they and other men make, are not to be worshipped, because they are the workes of mens hands: and for other like heresies, which they say, hold, and maintaine, they are greatly persecuted. The place where this Abba Mata is, seemeth to be three miles distant from Malue, I would haue gone thither, but I was wished not to goe; for though it be but a daies iourney thither, yet I should be driuen to spend foure daies in the same, and to climbe vp thither vpon my hands and my feete, for otherwise a man cannot come

In the midst of this Mountaine, which is as flat as a Table, standeth another Church of our Lady, wherein very great deuotion is vsed; and on another sharpe Mountaine, is another little Church, called Saint Crosse. And beyond these, foure miles and an halfe, there is another Moun-taine, like vnto that of Abba Mata, and there is another Monasterie, called Saint Iohn. The young Women are much out of order, and if they be twentie, or fure and twentie yeares of age, they haue their breasts so long, that they reach downe vnto their waste, and this they take for a goodly thing, and they goe naked, and from the girdle vpwards they weare Cordans of Beads

The same day that we came thither, Tigremahon sent for the Embassadour, which went thither with his Company, but when we were come vnto his Palace, it was told vs that he was gone to the Church with his Wife to receiue the Communion, and this was about halfe an houre past two and twentie * of the clocke; for about that time they say Masse in this Countrey, except it be Saturday or Sunday. And we went to meet him as he came from Church with his Wife, who rode vpon two Mules richly furnished, as is requisite for persons of great Estate, and such as are accompanied with men of great Nobilitie.

This Tigremahon is an old man, of a goodly pretence, and his Wife was wholly couered with Blue Cotten-cloath, and that in such sort, that we could see neither her face, nor any other part of her body. When we came neere vnto him, he prayed me to giue him a Crosse which I had in my hand, which he kissed, and gaue vnto his Wife to kisse, and she not vncovering her face, kisse it vpon her veile, and he made vs good cheare, and vsed vs with great courtesie. This man hath a great Court of men and women alwaies with him, and greater furniture then Barnagaf so had.

In this Kingdome Prete Ianni placeth and displaceth, when it seemeth good vnto him, and when he pleaseth, with cause or without cause the Kings, and those which are vnder the Kings, and therefore when they are depriued of their gouernment, they make no shew of melancholy or sadnesse, and if they take it euill, they keepe it secret. While I was in these parts, I saw great Lords depriued of their States, and they which were placed in their roomes, oftentimes talking and conferring with them as good friends, but God knowes the heart. In this Country, whatsoeuer thing happen vnto them, whether prosperitie or aduersitie, they say, That God sends it. These Lords which are as Kings, pay tribute vnto Prete Ianni, which tribute is in 20
Horses, in Gold, in Silke, in Imbroidered Cloath, and in Cotton-cloath, according to the abilitie of the Countries. And these Countries are so greatly inhabited and peopled, that their reuenues must needs be great, and when the Noblemen liue in the Townes, they liue at the common charges of the poore people.

After the deliuerie of Presents, Tigremahon suddenly tooke order for the carriage of our goods before denied, and that through all his Dominions they should furnish vs of Bread, Wine, and Flesh, on free cost. Hauing receiued this newes vpon the ninth of August, we departed, and came to our lodging in certaine small Villages, enclosed as the former, for feare of Tygers. And that night which we lodged there, being about two of the clocke in the night, two men went out of the Towne to goe to a certaine stall of Kine, and on the way they were assaulted by Ty- 30 gers, and one of them was wounded on the leg. It pleased God that we heard them cry, and ran out to succour them, for otherwise they would haue slaine them. In this Country are diuers Villages, inhabited by Moors, diuided from those of the Christians, who (as they say) pay great tribute of Cloath, of Silke, and of Gold, to the Lords of the Countrey, but they are not put to other troubles which the Christians are put too; and these Moors haue no Church at all, for they will not suffer them to vse any. All these Countries are fertill, as well in Pasture, as in Wheate, and other Corne.

Neere vnto our lodging was a Church of Saint George, very well gouerned, after the manner of our Churches, it was vaulted, and well painted with their pictures; to wit, with the Apo- 40 stles, Patriarks, Noah, and Elias, wherein serue ten Priests, and ten Friers. And till wee came hither, we saw no Church gouerned by Priests, without hauing Friers with them, but where the Friers be the chiefe, there are no Priests. Three miles distant, is the Monasterie of the Holy Ghost, where the Friers were griued, because it was Saturday, whereon they might not gather fruits to giue vnto vs as they desired, and prayed vs to excuse them, and said; They would giue vs such things as they had in the Couert, and so going into the house, they gaue vs dried Garlick & Limons, and at last prepared for vs in the Refectorie, Cabbages cut in manner of a Sa- 50 let, and mingled with Garlick. Behind the Towne where we lodged, for the space of six miles, is a Towne called, Agro, wherein Tigremahon hath a Palace, where we were oftentimes lodged, and here is a Church of our Ladie digged out of a Rock by force of mans hand, very well made, with three Iles or Allies, and with pillers hewed out of the said Rocke, and the great Chappell, the Vestry, and the Altar, are all likewise of the same Rocke, and the principall Porch, with the Pillers thereof, as though it were made of sundry pieces, it cannot be fairer then it is. In the sides it hath no gate, for on each side is the mightie and terrible Rocke, and it is very pleasant to heare them sing Diuine Service, for the voyces of them which sing, make a wonderfull resounding.

45 On the thirteenth of August, we departed from this place, where wee rested all Saturday and Sunday, and came to a place, called Angugui, where there is a Church like a Bishoppes See, very great and faire with Allies, and with Pillars of stone very faire and well wrought, and it is called Chercos, that is to say, Saint Quirico. The place is very faire vpon a very goodly Ri- 60
uer: the Inhabitants haue a priuiledge, that none may enter the Towne on horse-backe, but onely on Mules.

Bellette, where stands a Betenegui, a very good Lodging. The situation of the place is very pleasant, and hath abundance of good waters, and wee were lodged in the said Palace. During our abode here, there came vnto vs a great Lord, named Robel, being Gouvernour of a Prouince, named named Balgada, wherof taking his name, he is called Balgada Robel. This Nobleman had with him a great train all on horse-back, and many other Horses and Mules led by hand, which they vse to do for authority and reputation, and there were many Drums in his company: it is said that he is subiect to Tigremahon. And comming to the Palace where our Ambassador was, he sent to request him to come out and speake with him, because he might not enter into the house in Tigremahon's absence. The Ambassador hearing this request, sent him word backe againe, that he had travelled aboute fifteene miles, and that if he would see him or speake with him, he should come into the house, for he would not come forth. Then this Nobleman sent him an Oxe, a Sheepe, a Vessell of Honey as white as Snow, and hard as a stone, and a Horne full of very good Wine. And sent him word, that he would come and see him although the penalties were very dangerous, and that he hoped that he should be pardoned of the penaltie, because Christians were lodged in that Betenegus.

As he was come neere vnto the Palace, there fell such store of raine, that hee was constrained to enter into it, and there he talked with the Ambassadour and vs, enquiring of the state of our Voyage, and of our Countries, which till that time he had neuer knowne nor heard off, and then discoursed of the Warres which he made against the Moores, which ioyned vpon his Countries toward the Sea-coast, saying, that he neuer ceased to warre with them, and he gaue a very good Mule for a Rapier to one of our company. The Ambassadour seeing his courtesie, gaue him an Helmet.

And they say, that his gouernment is very great, and that he hath the best commoditie in all Ethiopia, to wit, Salt, which goes currant in steed of mony, as well in the Kingdomes of Prete Ianni, as in the Dominions of the Moores and Gentiles, and they say, that it passeth from thence as farre as Congo, vpon the West Sea. And this Salt they digge out of Mountaines, as it is reported, as it were out of Quarries; the length of euery stone is a handfull and an halfe, the breadth foure fingers, the thickeesse three, and so they carie them in little Carts, and vpon beasts backs, like short cliffes of Wood. In the place where they digge this Salt, one hundred or one hundred and twentie of these stones are worth a dramme of Gold, which dram (in my iudgement) is worth three hundred Reais, which are three quarters of a Ducate in Gold. And as soone as it commeth vnto a certaine Faire which is in our way, in a Towne, called Corcora, a dayes iourney distant from the place where the Salt is digged, five or sixe stones lesse make a dramme; And so it diminisheth in passing from Faire to Faire. And when it commeth to the Court, sixe or seuen stones onely make a dramme: and I haue also seene them in the Winter time buy five for a dramme. Great bargaines are made with this Salt, and it is very deere in the Court. They say, by that time it commeth to the Kingdome of Damute, they buy a good slaue for three or foure stones, and passing farther into the Countries of the Moores, they say, that they may buy a slaue for one stone, and in a manner, waight for waight in Gold. Wee found in this way, three or foure hundred beasts in a company, laden with Salt, and as many more emptie which went to fetch Salt, and they said that these belonged to Noblemen, which send thither euery yeare for their necessarie expenses in the Court, and other twentie or thirtie beasts laden, which belong to driuers of Mules. Also we met men laden with the said Salt, who carried the same from Faire to Faire, which valueth, and runneth currant for money, and whosoever hath it, may haue by way of trucke, whatsoever he needeth.

46. Departing from this Betenegus, we lodged in certaine poore and ill-provided Villages in a Countrey, called Bunace. And the next day wee departed from thence following our stuffe, which was sent before vs, which we found vnladen in the midst of a Medow, which was full of water, and seeing the same so badly conueyed, wee marvelled greatly: and while wee were in this muse, there met vs five or sixe riding vpon Mules, hauing tenne or twelue foot-men with them, among whom was a Frier; which comming to the place, caught the Captaine of Tigremahon, who conducted our goods by the haire of the head, and beat him with a Cudgell, wherevpon all of vs ranne to him to know wherefore hee did so. Our Ambassadour seeing the Captaine so beaten and hardly handled, falling into Choler with the Frier, tooke him by the brest to stab him, but I know not whether he hurt him or no, and all of vs likewise came vpon his back. The poore Frier began to speake a little Italian, which George de Breu one of our company vnderstood, which if he had not done, it had gone hard with the Frier. When euery one was pacified, the Frier said, that he was come thither by the Commission of Prete Ianni, to see our goods conueyed, and whereas he had beaten him, he did it for the negligence which hee vsed in conueyance of them.

The Ambassadour answered, that it was no time to make any tumult, especially in his presence, for hee tooke it as if hee had done the same to his owne person. And thus being pacified, the Frier said, that he would goe to Signior Balgada Robel, which dwelt behind vs, and that from thence he would bring vs Mules and Camels to carrie our stuffe, and that wee should goe before, and stay for him in a Betenegus, halfe a daies iourne distant from this place. This was the same Frier which was afterward sent by Prete Ianni, as his Ambassador into Portugal with vs. And so we departed, each man his way, he forward, and we toward the said Betenegus, and that night night we lodged in a little Village, where was a goodly Church, called Saint Quiricus, and that night we feared least we should haue beene deuoured of Tygres. The day following, wee traueled about two miles, and found the Betenegus which the Frier told vs of, which is in a Town, called Corcora, hauing good Lodgings, and in that place there is a very faire Church, and here wee stayed all Saturday and Sunday, wayting for the Frier vntill the Munday. Eastward of this place, they say, there is a faire and rich Monastery, called Nazareth, which hath great Reuenues and many Friers. And West-ward towards the Riuer of Nilus, they say there are many Mines of Silver, but they know not how to digge it, nor to take any profit of the same.

¶ VII:

Departure from Corcora, the pleasant Countrey which wee passed through, and of another Forrest: how the Tygres set upon vs. Dofarso, the Moores of Dobas: Ancona, Angote, Salt, and Iron Money. Other Monasteries and Churches.

A goodly Countrey.

47.  N Tuesday morning, seeing the Frier came not, wee went forward on our iourney along the banke of a passing goodly Riuer, for the space of fixe miles, through a very pleasant and goodly Countrey, and full of greene Herbs, and Trees fruitfull and fruitlesse, and on both sides were Ridges of Mountaines exceeding steepe, which are all sowed with Wheat and Barley, and replenished with wild Oliue Trees, which shew like yong Oliues, for they often cut them, that they may the better sow their Corne. In the midst of this Valley is a passing faire Church of our Ladie, about which are many Houses, Lodgings and Habitations of Priests. There are also infinite abundance of Cypressse Trees so tall and great, as it is strange to speake of, and many Thickets of Trees of sundry sorts which we knew not.

Cypresses.

A field sowne euery moneth, and in the same field haruest in Seed-time.

* Roucia.

Neere vnto the principall gate of the Church, was a very goodly and cleere Fountaine, which enuironed the Church, and afterward spread it selfe into a great Champaigne field, which may be watered throughout with the streames thereof, and therefore is sowed euery moneth of the yeare, with all kind of Seeds: as Barley, Millet, Lentils, Fitches, * Beanes, Chiches, Taffo di Guza, which is very good, and withall other Pulse, which are in this Countrey, and at the same instant some Seeds are sowed, others are sprung vp in the blade, some are full ripe, some are new cut downe, and some threshed, a thing not seene in our parts of Europe. At the head of this Valley, there is a great ascent, and so craggie a Mountaine, that sixtie miles beyond the same, there is none other passage, and it seemeth verie likely to be so, by the great store of people that alwayes passe that way.

Manadeli, a Towne of one thousand households.

Dobba.

Hauing gotten vp to the top of that Mountaine, wee descended into a goodly Champaigne Countrey, full of all kind of Cornes, which they sow all the yeare long, as that was which I spake of before, and there is a World of Medowes for pasture. This Champaigne and Valley, may be in length about fixe miles, and in breadth two, and it hath on euery side high Mountaines, and at the foot of euery Mountaine, are many Townes and Churches to bee seene, howbeit, they be but smal, among which there is one, named Saint Crosses, and another Saint Iohn, and each of them hath twentie Friers. When we had passed this Valley, we beganne to change the soile, and entred into certaine rough Mountaines not very high, but very steepe, the greater part whereof we passed by night, by meanes whereof we lost one another, and the Ambassadour remained with foure onely in his company, and my selfe with fve, and another of our number, with two, and our stuffe was left in these wild places with one man onely, as it pleaseth God. And in that part where I was, we saw a fire, which because it was night, seemed neere vnto vs, but was about three miles distant from vs. And while wee sought to goe that way, there followed vs such a sort of Tygres, as was wonderfull, and if we entred into any Thicket, they came so neere vs, that wee might haue thrust them through with a Pike, and none but one in our companie had a Pike, the rest had Rapiers. At length wee concluded, to stay in certaine Corne-fields for our more securitie, and here wee tyed our Mules together, and kept watch and ward all night with our naked Rapiers.

The next day about noone-tyde, wee met with our Ambassadour in a Towne well-peopled, distant from that where we lodged, about fixe miles, and it is called Manadeli, which hath one thousand Households in it, and the Inhabitants thereof are Moores, Tributaries to Prete Ianni, and among them are fteene or twentie Families of Christians, which dwell there with their wiues, and take vp the Tributes. Whereas I said before, that wee beganne to change the soile of the Countrey, it is to be vnderstood; that vnto this time, which is two monethes space since we begin to trauell, it was alwayes Winter, and when wee entred into the Valleyes betweene these Mountaines, it was not Winter but very hot at that season, and the Countrey is called Dobba, and it was Summer there, and this is one of the Countries, which I spake of before, where I said said it was Winter in Februarie, March and Aprill, contrarie to the other. The like is also from the Monastery of Vision vnto the Sea, and in another Countrey of the Realme of Barnagasso, called Carna. These Countries which haue the Winter altered, are very low, and lye vnder the Mountaines: and the length of this Territorie is about fifteene dayes iourney, the breadth is vnknowne, because it entreth into the Countrey of the *Moore*s. The generall and common Winter is from the midst of Iune, to the midst of September. There are very goodly Oxen in this Countrey of Dobba, and in such multitudes that they cannot well be numbred, they are of greater stature then Oxen of any other place. But many miles before wee came to this Towne Manadeli, we met many Christian people in the fields with their Tents set vp, which said vnto vs, that they were come thither to pray to God for water from Heauen for their Cattle, which dyed for thirst, and to sow their Millet and their Corne, which had indured great want of water. Their Cry and Prayer was this: Zio Marina Christos, which is, Oh, Christ, haue mercie vpon vs.

Winter and Summer neere Neighbours.

Winter particular and common.

Great drought

Now, to returne to this Towne of Manadeli, I say, that there is Traffique vsedas it were in a great Citie, and there are infinite sorts of Merchandize, and a wonderfull number of Merchants, and there be *Moore*s of all Languages, as namely, of Giadra, of Marocco, of Fez, of Bugia, of Tunis, of Turkie, of Rumes, that is to say, White Men of Grecia, * *Moore*s of India, which are heere as free Denizens of Ormuz, and of Cairo, which from all the Countries aboue-named, bring Merchandize of all sorts. While we were here, the *Moore*s of the Towne complayned, saying, that Prete Ianni, had taken from them one thousand ounces of Gold perforce, adding, that Tigremahon also, as Lord of the Countrey, sought also to draw his maintenance from them, so that they were no longer able to hold out. In this Towne euery Tuesday is a Market.

Manadeli, a Towne of wonderfull traffick. * Or rather Turkes of C. neere Constantinople, called new Rome.

48. Assoone as the Frier was arriued, wee departed, and the same euening wee went two miles from thence to a Betonegus, seated on a Hill. The next day wee came to a great Towne inhabited by Christians, and contayning one thousand Families, which is called Dofarso. And there is a Church, wherein are aboue one hundred Priests and Friers, and as many Nunnes, which haue no Monasterie, but dwell in priuate houses like Lay-women, sauing, that the Friers dwell alone by themselves in two Courts seperated one from another, wherein are many Cottages of little value. And the number of these Priests, Friers and Monkes is so great, that the rest of the Laytie cannot stand in the Church, for which cause they haue set vp a Tent of Silke before the Church, wherein the Lay-people receiue the Communion: and heere they vse those Solemnities, which they cannot in the Church, as sounding of their Drummes and Cymbals, during the time of ministring the Communion. While we lodged here two nights, the Nunnes came and washed our feet, and after they had washed them, dranke off that water, and washed their faces with part of it, saying, that we were holy Christians of Ierusalem.

Dofarso, a Towne of one thousand Christian households.

In this place, the Master of the house said vnto me, that yeare wherein we gather but a smal crop of Corne, sufficeth vs for three yeares. And farther he told me, if it were not for the Locusts and the Tempests which sometimes doe them harme, they would not sow halfe so much Seed as they doe. We saw great Herds of Oxen comming toward the Towne, and those of our company iudged them to be aboue fiftie thousand. The Tongue of this Countrey differeth from the Tongue of the other Countrey which we had passed, for here beginneth the Tongue of the Kingdome of Angote, the Towne is called Angotina.

Exceeding plentie.

The Kingdome of Angote, and the Towne of Angotina. * Beere or Ale.

In all this Countrey they make bread of all sorts of Graine, namely, of Wheat, Barley, Millet, Chiches, Peason, Fitches of diuers colours, of Beanes, of Lin-seed, and of Taffo di Aguzza. Likewise they make Wine * of these Seeds, but the Wine made of Honey is better then any of the rest. This people after the Frier was come vnto vs gaue vs victuals, and defrayed our charges of this kind of bread, by the commandement of Prete Ianni, but we could eat none of it, but that which was made of Wheate, and they brought vs these their victuals out of due season, that is to say, (according to their custome) at Euen-tyde, for they eate but once a day, and that in the Euening, and their Dyet is raw flesh, and a certaine sawce made of the Gall of the Cow, which we could not looke vpon, and much lesse feed vpon, but we ate that little which our slaues dressed for vs, and wheaten bread, and so we continued vntill the Frier vnderstanding our Dyet and custome, caused them to send vs flesh, which was roasted and sodden by our slaues, to wit, Hens, Partridges, Mutton, Beefe, and such like.

One meale a day. Raw flesh.

49. Departing from this Towne, we trauelled through the midst of certaine fields of Millet growing high, and hauing stalkes as bigge as small Canes. Towards the Sea-coast, all the Inhabitants are *Moore*s, called Dobas, and it is no Kingdome, but this Prouince is diuided vnder foure and twentie Captaines, and sometimes the one halfe is in peace, and the other halfe in warre, and the same time while wee were in those Countries, they were all in a manner at continuall warres: yet we saw twelue of them in the Court of Prete Ianni, which came to craue pardon for a new Rebellion moued by them.

And when they came neere the Pauilion of Prete Ianni, which liueth alwayes in the field, euery one of these Captaines carried a great stone vpon their heads, laying both their hands vpon the same, which Ceremonie is a signe of peace, and of comming to craue mercie. Whom Prete Ianni curteously receiued, and shewed them good countenance, and they brought with them aboue one hundred Horses, and faire Mules, which they led in their hands, but they came into the Court on foot, with stones on their heads, where they stayed aboue two moneths without their dispatch; and they had daily giuen them Oxen, Sheepe, Honey, and Butter. At length Prete Ianni sent them aboue three hundred miles from their Countrey; namely, into the Kingdome of Damute, with a very great Guard. As soone as the people of these Captaines vnderstood, that they were banished into those Countreyes, they rose vp in Armes, and made as many moe new Captaines, beginning to make warre and breake the peace.

This warre and contention (they say) beganne with this Prete Ianni, which now raigneth, more then with his Predecessors, both because these Moors were of ancient time Tributaries to the former Prete Ianni, and also because the Ancestors of him, which now raigneth haue alwaies had five or sixe wiues, the daughters of the Moorish Kings, his neighbours; and not the daughters of the Pagan Kings, and also one or two wiues of the Signiories of the said People called Dobas. If they were of age, and one of the daughters of the King of Dancali, and another of the King of Adel, and another of the King of Adea. And this present Prete, hauing promised to take for wife a daughter of the King of Adea, when hee saw that her fore-teeth were very great, he would none of her; neither would he deliuer her to her father, because shee was now become a Christian, but married her vnto a great Lord of his Court: and they say, that since that time vntill this present day, he would neuer take wiues of this Moorish Kings race; and he married a daughter of a Christian, and would marrie but one wife, saying, that he would liue according to the commandement of the Gospell, and still he requireth the tribute, which these Moors are bound to pay him: and they, because they payed it not before, in regard of the marriages which they made with his Predecessors, therefore they will not now pay it to him, and hereupon these warres arise.

These Moors of Dobas are very valiant men, and haue a Law among them, that none of them may marrie, vnlesse he can proue that he hath killed twelue Christians; and for this cause, no man trauelleth alone this way but in Carouan, which they call Nagada, and first one great companie assembleth together, which passeth that way twise a weeke, for one halfe of them goe, and another come, and none of these companies are fewer then one thousand persons with their Captaine; and these Carouans goe from two Faires, to wit, of Manadeli, and Corcora, vnto Angote; and though they goe in great companies, yet notwithstanding the Moors assault them, and sometimes murther many of them.

50. Departing from hence wee trauelled through the said Plaine along by certaine Mountaines, which belong vnto the Christians, all inhabited by these Giannamori: and wee passed ouer certaine Riuers which fall from those Mountaines, hard by which Riuers wee found certaine very shadie places, by reason of the abundance of Willows which were there, being very pleasant to rest vnder at mid-day, and so we rested a little, because it was exceeding hot, and a very cleere day, and this Riuer had not so much water in it as might driue a Mill, and we stood talking, one part on the one side of the water, and another part on the other; and while wee were thus reasoning, suddenly we heard a great thunder, and it seemed to be farre off, and they told vs, that it was so drie, as sometimes it was wont to bee in India. And being thus out of feare of raine or wind, and that the thunder was ceased, wee began to set our stufte in order, to set forward on our Voyage, and had newly lapped vp a Tent wherein we dined, and Master Iohn going vpward the Riuer about some businesse, began to cry vnto vs, take heed, take heed, and as we turned our selues about, we beheld the water comming as high as a Lance, with exceeding great furie, which carried away part of our goods, and if by good fortune wee had not taken downe our Tent, it had carried the same and vs quite away, and many of vs were constrained to climbe vp into the Willows. And this furious streame of water came running downe betweene certaine Mountaines, where it had thundred; and it brought downe with it exceeding great stones, and the noise and furie of the water was so great, and the clattering of the stones which beat one against another, that the Earth trembled, and the Skie seemed to be readie to fall. And as it was sudden in comming, so it suddenly passed away; for we passed the same that very day, and we saw a great number of other exceeding great stones, tumbled vpon those stones which were there before, which came downe with the water from those Mountaines. Departing from hence, wee tooke vp our lodging in certaine poore Cottages; when wee came neere them, we saw our selues constrained to lodge without doores, and that without our supper, and that night about the breake of day, we heard of exceeding great thunders and raines in that Plaine, as it fell out the day before vpon the Mountaines.

51. Wee departed all from this place for want of food. And thus wee trauelled without our stufte all that day, and came at night vnto a great Riuer, called Sabalette, which endeth the Kingdome of Tigremahon, and is the beginning of the Kingdome of Angote. And in a very high Mountaine Westward, out of which this Riuer springeth, is a Church, called Saint Peter of Angote; and they say, it is the chiefe of this Realme, and the Church of the Kings, and that when this Kingdome is newly giuen to any, they goe thither to take possession thereof, and toward the East, in another exceeding high Mountaine fixe miles out of the way, there is a very great Monasterie with many Friers, whereof we saw nothing but the high Trees which are about the same, and here endeth the Countrey of the Moors. And on Saturday, we rested by this Riuer, and on Sunday at night about our first sleepe the Tygres assaulted vs, although wee had made great fires, so that the greatest part of our Mules brake loose for feare. On Tuesday, descending downe from the top of the Mountaines, we came into the way where our stufte was, neere vnto a Church called, Our Ladie, enuironed wholly with shade of most pleasant and stately Trees, (and here by reason of the heate wee rested about noone) which Church hath many Priests, Friers, and Nuns, and is gouerned by Priests: and the Towne is called, Corcora, of An-

10 gote. With much trauell we passed that night a very high Mountaine, where sometimes wee were faine to goe on foot, and sometimes we were faine to cawle vpon our hands and feet, and hauing passed this bad way on the top of the Mountaine, we found certaine other Mountaines, and Hills, which make valleys, where small streames runne; but among the rest there is one Hill very great, on both sides full of Pastures, and of Corne-fields, wherein all the yeere long they sowe and reape all kind of seeds; for at all times when wee walked that way, we found them at that instant sowing of Corne, and some newly sprouted, and some in grasse, some eared, some ripe, and some cut downe, and that which I speake of Wheat, is also to be vnderstood all kind of Corne and Pulse. In this Countrey they conuay not streames to water the same, because it aboundeth with Riuers, and is as it were a Marish, and all Countreys which are like vnto this, or which may bee watered beare fruit as this doth, that is to say, they are sowed in all moneths of the yeere, and yeeld their haruest. This Countrey round about is peopled, and full of Villages, because it is exceeding fat and fruitfull, and in euery Towne there is a Church, which hath about it great store of Trees.

52. On Wednesday the fift of September, we trauelled but a little way, but that we began to descend into a pleasant and wide Valley full of exceeding great Millet, and abundance of Beanes, through the midit whereof passed a great Riuer, the fields on both sides being sowed. And this Riuer is called, The Riuer of Ancona; and in the highest part of this Valley is a beautiful Church, called Saint Marie of Ancona, which hath exceeding great reuenues, wherein are many Canons, whose head is called Licanate, and besides the Canons there are many Priests and Friers, and in all great Churches from this place forward, which are called the Kings Churches, there are Canons, and their Head is called Licanate. This Church hath two Bells of Iron badly made, and hanging low neere the ground: and in this Countrey wee saw no more but these two. Wee stayed in this place vntill Thursday, for on that day here is kept a great Market, which they call Gabeia. In this Towne, and in all the Kingdome of Angote, Iron runneth currant for money, which is in fashion of Bullets, and it cannot be wrought so round in any thing, but they breake them as they haue need, and giue ten, eleuen, and twelue, of them for a dram, which dram amounteth to three quarters of a Ducat in gold. Moreouer, Salt in this place runneth currant for money, as it doth through all the Countrey, and here they giue fixe or seuen stones of Salt for one piece of this Iron.

40 Here beginneth towards the West a Countrey called, Bugana, which is a very cold Countrey, by reason of the exceeding high Mountaines which are there, whereupon groweth great store of that herbe whereof they make ropes, that is to say, Hempe; whereof at one time I brought a certaine quantitie to certaine Genoues which were here with vs, who told me, that they had neuer seene any so good, and that it was better then that of Alicante. The food of these Mountaines is great store of Barley, and in the Valleys is abundance of Wheat, the fairest that euer I haue seene in any place. The Cattell are small of stature, like those which are in the Countrey of Maia, betweene the Riuers of Minius and Dorius in Portugall. The Lord of this Land is called, Abunaraz; the Countrey is fixe dayes iourney in length, and three in breadth. They say, that after the Land of Caxumo was conuerted vnto the Christian Faith, this was the second, and that the Kings here kept their Court, as the Queenes kept theirs in Caxumo, although the same be barren by reason of the Mountaines. The buildings which I saw, are these: first, in an high Mountaine there is an exceeding mightie Caue, wherein is builded a very goodly Monasterie and Church of our Ladie, not so much for the greatnesse thereof, as for the goodly proportion which it hath, which is called, Icono Amelaca, which is as much to say, as, God be praised. The seat of the Countrey where it is builded, is called Acate. It hath poore reuenues, but many Friers and Nuns, the Friers dwell in an Hill aboue the Caue, which Hill is enclosed. They haue but one way to come to their Church. The Nuns dwell beneath in the side of the Caue, and are not enclosed: they till and digge the fields, and sowe them with Barley and Wheat, for the Monasterie affordeth them little sustenance. The faire proportion of this Monasterie causeth it to be inhabited, because it is builded in this great concautie or caue of the Hill, and it is made like a crosse, and is well compassed about, and they may goe on Procession round about it, and all the Friers may goe afront in this circuit, if they were more then they bee; before the gate of which Monasterie there is a place enclosed with a wall, as high as the brimme of the Caue, which is not a Church, and here stand the Nuns to say Diuine Service, and here likewise

This Roome for the Nunnes looked toward the South, because the Church standeth East and West; and toward the right side ouer this Caue falleth a Brooke, made of diuers Springs, downe from the Mountayne, which runneth continually, and when it commeth to the top of the Caue, is diuided into three branches; and one falleth right vpon the midst thereof, which is a goodly sight; the other two branches runne in Gutters, made by hand, on both sides of the Caue, and ioyne themselues toward the place of the Nunnes, hard vnto a Wall which stoppeth them, and these branches water their Gardens. The body of this Church hath three Gates, one which is principall, and two on the sides, as though it were builded vpon a Plaine: and because the mouth of the Caue is great, therefore there is light enough.

53. As we departed from this Monasterie or Church before mentioned, traueilling toward the West two dayes iourney, there is another great and rich Church, made in another Caue, wherein, to my iudgement, three great Ships with their Masts may stand vp-right, but the entrance is no bigger then the space whereby two Carts may enter with their Ladders, and it is fixe good miles to the top of the Mountayne: and I would needs goe thither, for the desire I had to see that Church: but surely, I thought, I should haue died, the way was so hard and rough; but God assisted me, for it was very coole, and I had with me one of my Slaues, which holpe me to goe, and drew me vpward with a cord, and another behind which led our Mules by hand, lest they should fall and cast vs backward. I set forward from the bottome of the Mountayne before day, and could not get vp to the top before noone. The Woods and Trees, which I saw, are of sundrie sorts, which I knew not, sauing store of Broome, whose yellow flowers made a goodly shew, and great store of Hempe to make Ropes withall. The Church which is within this Caue, is as great as a Bishops Sea, and hath goodly Allies well adorned and wrought, and all are vaulted; it hath three Chappels exceeding faire and stately adorned. The entrance of this Caue is towards the East, and the Chappels are vaulted towards the same entrance, and when you be passed the third Chappell, there is no light, and they say seruice by candle-light. The Church hath two hundred Canons, and there be no Friers, but it hath a Licanate, and very great Reuenues and Possessions, and they liue like honorable Gentlemen, by reason of their wealth; and this Church is called Imbra Christos, that is to say, The way of Christ.

As you enter into this Caue, the said Chappels are right before you: and on the right side are two little Chambers finely painted, which, they say, a King caused to be built, which ended his life in that place, and caused the same Church to be builded. As you enter in on the left hand, are three most honorable and stately Tombs, neither haue I seene the like in all Ethiopia, whereof one is chiefe and very high, and hath fise steps round about it, and is all ouer-cast with white chalke, which was couered ouer with a great cloth of Gold, and of Veluet of Mecca, to wit, part thereof of Gold, and part of Veluet, and it was so large, that on euery side it touched the ground, which cloth the same day they had layed vpon the said Tombe, because it was a festiuall day: and this was the Tombe of that King which dwelt there, whose name was Abraham. The rest are like vnto this same, sauing that the one hath three and the other hath foure steps, all of them are in the midst of the said Caue. The greatest is the Tombe of a Patriarke, which came from Ierusalem, to visite the said King for his holinesse, and after his death was buried here. The least is a Daughters of the said King, who, they say, was aboue fortie yeeres a Priest of the Masse, which euery day did minister the same, which thing I found written in a Booke of this Church, wherein the life of this King was recorded. Among other miracles, they say, that when he ministred the Communion, the Angels brought him Bread and Wine, and in the beginning of the Booke, the King is painted like a Priest apparelled at the Altar, and it seemeth that one hand reacheth out of a Window, with an Host and with a Chalice of Wine, and after the same sort he is painted in the greatest Chappell.

When I came to the top I found a quarrie of the like blacke stones, and the place whence they were digged, and I was much astonied, considering how so many of them should be digged vp by them of so hard a graine, which haue no kinde of meanes nor skill to cut and polish them. In the same Booke was also written, that the said King neuer tooke money nor Tribute of his Subiects, and if they brought him any, he caused the same to be distributed to the poore, and maintaine himselfe of the Reuenues of his Lands, which he caused to be tilled. Likewise, that it was reuealed vnto him, that if he would keepe his Kingdom in quiet, all his sonnes should be shut vp, sauing his first borne, as hereafter shall be declared. This day being the day of his Feast, I was desirous to goe to the said Church to see, if that which was told mee were true: and I saw twentie thousand persons, who all come thither for deuotion, and to receiue the Communion; and this Feast was kept vpon the Sunday, and they said Masse very early, and Masse being said, they began to giue the Communion in all three Porches of the Church, and it continued vntill the Aue Maria, which thing I saw, for I was there from the beginning, and afterward going to dinner, I returned, and found that it continued vntill that houre.

54.  Dayes iourney distant from this Church, are such kind of building, that in my iudgement, I beleue, the like are not to be found in all the World, which are Churches all hewen in free-stone out of soft Mountaynes, very well wrought: and the names of the Churches, are these: Emanuel, Saint Saujour, Saint Mary, Faire Church, Holy Crosse, Saint George, Golgota, Bethlehem, Marcorius, and The Martyr. And the principal, is called Lulibella: and they say, that this was the name of a King of this Countrey, which Lulibella reigned before Abraham the aforesaid King, about eightie yeeres, and caused the said building to be erected. His Sepulture is not in the Church of his name, but in that of Golgota, which is of lesse capacitie, being wholly hewen out of a mayne Rocke, being one hundred and twentie spannes in length, and sixtie in breadth, the Roofe is built vpon fve Pillars, two on each side, and one in the midst, as it were, in a square, which Roofe is flat and smooth as the floore beneath; on both sides it is well wrought, the Windowes and Gates are most excellently engrauen, so cunningly, that no Siluer-smith could make them more faire. The Kings Tombe is like vnto the Sepulchre of Saint James of Galicia, in Compostella. This Church hath another body vnderneath it, hewen out of stone, as bigge as all the floore aboue, and of the heighth of a Speare or Lance. The Kings Tombe is directly before the Altar of the vpper Church: In the floore whereof is the entrie to goe downe beneath, which is shut with a stone, made like vnto a Graue-stone, layed in very euen and closely, but no man goeth into it, because (mee thinkes) the said stone cannot be remooued, which stone is bored through the midst, with a hole that passeth quite through, of three handfulls wide, wherein the Pilgrimes (which in exceeding great number come thither for deuotion) doe put their hands, and say, that there are seene many miracles. Golgota, a double Church, hewen out of a Rocke.
- 30 About this Church is a way like a Cloyster, but fve steps lower then the Church, wherein toward the East are three Windowes, which giue light to the Church that is beneath, which Windowes are as high as the floore of the vpper Church, which is higher then that Way or Cloyster, by as much as the fve steps doe contayne, and if you looke through the said Windowes, you may see the said Tombe placed right before the Altar, as I haue said. Before the great Chappell is a Tombe hewen out of the same stone which the Church is of, and they say, it is like vnto the Tombe of Christ in Ierusalem, whereunto they doe great honour and reuerence: and in the same stone, on the right hand, are two Images carued and engrauen out of the same stone, so well made that they seeme to haue life: one is of Saint Iohn, and the other of Saint Peter, which they shewed me as a rare thing, and I tooke great delight to behold them, whereunto they doe great reuerence. The holy Sepulchre resembled.
- 40 This Church hath also on the left hand a Chappell, made after their manner, which seemeth to be a Church, because it hath Allies. It hath sixe Pillars about it, cut out of the same Rocke, well and finely made; and the middle Ally is very well arched or vaulted. The Gates and Windowes are very well wrought, to wit, the principall Gate, and one side-gate, for the other serueth for the great Church. This Chappell is as long as it is broad, to wit, two and fiftie spans euery way; and on the right side, it hath hard vnto it another small Chappell very high, but narrow, after the manner of a Bell, with very faire Windowes: and the said small Chappell is sixe and thirtie spannes high, and twelue broad. All the Altars of the said Churches haue their clothes of silke, and their Pillars made out of the said Rocke. There is about the Church a very great circuit, hewen out of the selfe same Rocke of the Mountayne by force of Masonrie, which is square, and all the walls thereof haue holes in them, as bigge as a Cube, and all these holes are stopped with small stones, and they are burials, for a man may see that they are but newly stopped. The entrance of the circuit is thirteene spannes deepe beneath the Mountaine, and all made by force of Masonrie. A Chappell.
- 50 The Church of Saint Saujour, is hewen out of a Rocke of a great Mountaine, the body of the Church is two hundred spans long, and one hundred and twentie broad, and it hath fve Iles, and euery Ile hath seuen pillers, which are square, &c. These Churches haue their portraictures cut in Ramusio.
- The open circuit of the Church which is the Cloyster, is all hewen out of the same Rocke, and is sixtie spans broad in euery part, and in the front of the principall Porch, it is one hundred fathome wide, and aboue the Church, where it should be couered, where nine great Arches stand on each side, they all reach from the top vnto the ground, where the Tombes are on each side, placed like those in the other Church. The entry to passe into the circuit or Cloyster of the said Church, is hewen vnder the Rocke, the space of eightie spans, wrought artificially, so broad, that ten men may goe side by side, and is a Lance high, and it ascendeth by little and little. The Cloyster. The Entrie.

tle. This way or entry hath foure holes aloft, which giue light vnto the passage. And on the top of this Mountaine, round about the Church, is a champaine field, wherein they sow Barley, and there are also many dwelling houses.

I take God to witnesse, in whose hands I am, that all that I haue written is most true, without adding any thing thereunto: for hauing heard report of the maruels of these Churches, I would needs goe thither twice, to see them and describe them, so great was my desire to make the excellency of them knowne vnto the world.

This place is seated on the side of a Mountaine, and to go vp to the top thereof is a very great ascent, which I thinke cannot be performed in a day and a halfe, such is the height thereof, and yet notwithstanding, aboue the same, there seemeth to be another Mountaine, and that this hill is separated from the other. And to goe downe from this place into the plaine, is about fifteene miles space, and in the way are mightie fields, which seeme to continue a good daies iourney and more, all which stretch toward the Riuer Nilus, wherein are as great store of habitations as in the Towne of Caxumo, built exceeding stately with square stones, for here they say, the Kings were wont to haue their dwellings: and that the worke of these Churches cut into the hills, was made by Gibetes, that is to say, White men: for they know well, that themselves cannot turne their hands to make any such worke: and that the first King which caused them to be made, was called Balibela, which signifieth a Miracle: because at his birth he was couered with Bees, which made him cleane, without doing him any hurt: and he was the Sonne of the Sister of a King, which King dyed without heire, and therefore his Nephew was made King, and that he was a Saint; and their deuotion is so great, that all Ethiopia hath concourse hither, and here they see very many miracles.

This Signiory of Abugana, where these buildings are, before our departure the Prete Ianni bestowed vpon the Frier, which afterward came with vs as Embassadour into Portugall: and therefore I say, that I was twice to view these Churches and buildings; and the second time that I came thither, was when the Embassadour came to take possession of the same Lordship. During whose abode in that place, there came thither two Calacenes, that is, Messages or Commandements of the King, and they told the said Embassadour or Captaine, that the Prete Ianni sent him word, that he should send him certaine tributes, which his Predecessour ought to haue paied him; which was one hundred and fiftie Oxen for the Plough, thirtie Dogges, thirtie Ianelins, and thirtie Targets. He answered them, that hee would see what goods there remained of his Predecessour, and that he would pay it all very willingly, although he found none at all.

Returning now vnto our Voyage, we departed from the Church and faire of Ancona, and hauing trauiled nine miles, we came with our goods to certaine Villages, where they would not lodge vs, saying; That they were places which belonged to the Mother of Prete Ianni, and were subiect to no body else but to her. And they would haue beaten the Frier which guided vs. They basted well a Seruant of his: Leauing our stufte here, wee came to our lodging at a place called Ingabela, which is great, and replenished with goodly houses, and situate vpon a little hill, in the midst of a field, enuironed round about with Mountaines, at the bottome of which Mountaines there are so many peopled Townes, that I haue not seene the like in any place; there are also great store of Fountaines and Brookes, which runne downe on euery side, which water a great part of the Countrey, which is called Olaby. And while we were heere, I saw them building a most beautifull Church, wee found heere exceeding great abundance of Hennes, whereof we might haue had an infinite number in exchange, of a few Graines of Pepper, so small account they make of Hennes, and so highly they esteeme of Pepper. In this place were infinite store of Limons, Citrons, and Orenge. We abode here Saturday and Sunday, on which day the Tygres assailed vs, and we could not so well defend our selues, but they deuoured an Asse of ours.

56. On Thursday, the foureteenth of September, we went with our goods to a dry Riuer, three miles off where the Lord of this Kingdome of Angote had his residence, which is called Angotera. Before we came thither, we saw much people assembled together, and we supposed that they were assembled to carrie our goods: but they came to doe vs small pleasure, for they enclosed vs betweene them, getting vp into three small hills, and we were in the bottome, and vpon euery top of the said hills, were about two hundred persons assembled, the greatest part with slings to sling stones, the rest flung at vs with their hands, so that the number of the stones was such, as it seemed to raine stones, and we stood in great feare of our liues. And all of vs which were in company with the Frier, were about fortie persons; to wit, the Captaines which waighted vpon him, with certaine of their Men, and some of our Slaues; and all saue my selfe, and a young man which was with vs, which was sicke of the Measles, were very shrewdly stoned and wounded: but God of his Grace vouchsafed to preserue him and me. They tooke some of vs also Prisoners, and wee which fled in the Evening, came to our lodging where our stufte was, without our Suppers.

On Saturday Angotera sent for vs to his house, where at our entrance wee found no hinderance rance at all of guard, but entered freely, and found him with his Wife, and certaine of his familiar friends, and he gaue vs good intertainment as well in countenance as in speache. Foure Jarres of excellent Wine made of Hony were standing by him, and by every Jarre was set a Cup of Cry stall Glasse, and so we began to drinke, and his Wife and two other Women in the company invited vs.

On Sunday next wee went to Church, where we found Angoteraz, which came to meete vs with great courtesie, and then he beganne to speake of matters concerning our Faith, and called vnto him two Friers, besides the Interpreter and the Frier that conducted vs. And his first question was, Where Christ was borne, and which way he went, when he went into Egypt, and how many yeares he abode there, and how old he was when our Lady lost him, and found him in the Temple, and where he made of Water Wine. It pleased God to helpe me, so that I answered him according to the truth, better then I knew. The Interpreter told me, that the Frier which guided vs, informed the other two Friers, that I was a man that vnderstood much, vpon which speaches they fell downe vpon the ground, and whiche I would or no, would needs kisse my feet, & Angoteraz embraced me, and kissed me on the face, who, as I was informed afterwards, is one of the best, and most learned Priests in all Ethiopia: and at our returne, wee saw him honoured with the Title of Barnagasso. Afterward, he desired vs to heare Masse with them, which being ended, he invited vs to dinner, but the Embassadour hauing vnderstood before hand what meate they would set before vs, thought good to send for our owne dinner, which was certaine fat roasted Hens, and fat Beefe, and fresh Fish.

Angoteraz a

The house where we dined, was great, and made with earth, which is (as wee haue said) a Betenegus. Before the bed, whereat Angoteraz sate, many Mats were spread vpon the ground, and he came downe from his bed and sate downe vpon them, where many skins of blacke sheepe were spread, and two great platters of exceeding white wood, with low brims, like those which we vse to picke Wheate in, which they call Ganetus, and they were very large, great, and large, with a brim of two fingers broad, the greatest was about eightene spans in compasse, and the lesser foureteene, and these be the Tables of great Lords. And here we sate round about with the said Angoteraz: we had water brought vs, and washed our hands, but they brought vs no Towell to dry them with, much lesse to set our bread vpon: but in the said platters were loaves brought, made of sundry sorts of Corne, to wit, of Wheate, of Barley, of Millet, of Fitches, and of Tasso. Before we beganne to eate, Angoteraz commanded one to bring him a great piece of the courtest bread, and with his owne hand laying a piece of raw Beefe vp-on the same, he sent it to the poore which stood without the gate, waiting for an almes. Wee indeed said Grace after our manner, whereat he seemed to take great delight.

household delicacies.

Then came there in the Imbandigioni, whereof I dare not in a manner speake, but yet they are ordinary dishes in that Countrey, and these were their sauces or broaths, wherein were certain pieces of raw flesh with warme blood, which in this Countrey is esteemed for a most delicate dish, and none but great personages eate thereof. These sauces were brought in certaine little dishes, very finely made of blacke earth, and they strewed vpon them certaine crums of bread, and alwaies powred butter vpon them. We would not taste at any hand of these their meats, but fed of that, which our Ambassadour had caused to be brought for vs, as I said before. And like as we could not eate of their meats, so neither would they taste of ours. But as for their wine, in truth it walked about with great furie, and the wife of Angoteraz dined hard by vs, vpon such a Table as we vsed, and we sent vnto her of our meats, and we could not see whether she tasted thereof, because there was a Curtaine betweene her and vs, but in drinking she brauely seconded vs. After al other dishes, a breast of Raw Beefe was brought to the boord, which we did not once touch, but Angoteraz fed thereof, as if he had eaten Marchpane or Comfits after dinner. After we had dined, and giuen thanks vnto Angoteraz, we returned home vnto our lodging.

On Munday morning, we went to take our leaue of Angoteraz, & the Frier led vs through a mightie thicke Wood, so that we knew not whither we went, but wee came to the place where we were stoned: and hither he would needs goe to see Iustice done. We were eight vp-on Mules, and fiftene on foote, and comes to our lodging in the house of one of them, which were the principall that made the assault, and we found them all fled vnto a Mountaine neere ad-ioyning, but there was good prouision for our selues, and for our Mules. This night the Frier returned, and brought with him a couple of Mules, one Oxe, and eight pieces of Cloath, which they had giuen him, in recompense of the blood which they had shed. And the Iustice vsed in this Countrey, is to take the goods of Malefactors; as namely, their Oxen, and their

Heere we began to enter into a pleasant and delectable Countrey, lying among very high Mountaines, but infinitely peopled, at the foore thereof, with great Townes, and very Noble Churches, which was tilled and sowed with all kind of Corne. Here we saw infinite store of Indian Figges, Limons, Orenge, and Citrons, without number, and Pastures with an incredible multitude of Cattle. And because I trauid another time this way with the foresaid Frier, which then was called the Embassadour, and stayed a Saturday and a Sunday, in the house of an honourable Canon, and euery day went to Church with him, where wee saw very great number of Canons, We asked him, how many Canons there were in all; He told vs, aboue eight hundred. We inquired farther, what reuenues they had; He told vs, very little among so many: We replied vnto him, Why are you so many, seeing your reuenue is so small; He answered vs, that at the beginning when these Churches were first founded, they were not many, but that in proesse of time they were increased: because that all the sonnes of the Canons, as many as doe descend of them, become all Canons: and this custome is obserued in the Kings Churches: and that the Prete Ianni, as often as he buildeth any new Church, sendeth for Canons hither, and so he diminisheth their number, as hee did when he built the Church, called Machan Celacem, when he tooke away two hundred, and that in this same Signiory there were eight Churches, wherein were about foure thousand Canons: and that if the Prete Ianni should not take them away for the furnishing of these new Churches, and those of his Court, they should be drinen to eate one another.

IX.

Of the exceeding huge Mountaine, wherupon the Sonnes of PRETE IANNI are kept, where we were almost stoned to death: The greatnesse, guard, manner of sending, punishments; Of the PRETES Kindred.

THE foresaid Valley, reacheth vnto a most huge Mountaine, whereon the Sonnes of Prete Ianni are continually kept, as it were in prison. And they haue accorded in their old Bookes, that in the daies of a King of Ethiopia, called Abraham, it was reuealed vnto him one night in a dreame, That if he desired to keepe his Realme in quiet and obedience, he should shut vp his Sonnes, which were many, in a Mountain, and suffer none of them to come abroad, sauing him which he would haue to be his Successour, and that this order should alwaies be obserued, as a thing which came from God, otherwise Ethiopia being large and great, some part thereof would fall to insurrection, and would bee disobedient vnto the heire, or else perchance would kill him. The King standing doubtfull concerning this relation, where such a Mountaine might be found; it was againe reuealed vnto him, That he should send to search out all the Countrey, till he found a place where they should finde Goates vpon the craggies and cliffes of Rockes, so high, that it should seeme they would fall downe, and that in this place he should shut them vp. Which being done, this Mountaine was found out, which is so huge, that they say a man must spend many daies in compassing the foote thereof.

This Mountaine is exceeding steepe, round about from the top to the bottome, so that it seemeth to be a wall that riseth vpright, and to a man that looketh vpward, the sky seemeth to rest vpon it. It hath onely three entrances or gates, and no more, whereby a man may ascend vp to it, and of these I saw one, vpon this occasion. We came from the Sea vpon a time, to goe to the Court, and one of those Seruants of Prete Ianni, whom they call Calacem, was our guide, which was not very well acquainted with the Countrey, and when we sought to lodge in a Village the Inhabitants would not receiue vs, because they said, It belonged to a Sister of Prete Ianni, and we were inforced to trauaile forward: the night was farre spent, and this guide began to ride a great pace, and hastened vs forward, saying; That he would bring vs to a good lodging. I caused Lopez de Gama, which had a good Mule, to ride in sight of the said Calacem, and my selfe followed him, and the Embassadour and the rest kept me in sight. And hauing trauailed aboue three miles out of our way, toward the Mountaine where the Sonnes of Prete Ianni are kept, as soone as we were perceiued by the trotting of our horses, in a moment there assembled so great a multitude of the people of all those Townes, that they had almost killed vs with stones, and we were inforced to diuide our selues. The Embassadour stayed behind, and I went forward, because I could not otherwise choose, to a place where it rained stones on all sides, and the night was exceeding darke, and because they should not perceiue me, I alighted, and gaue my Mule to a Slaue of mine.

It was my chance, that a Warder of this Mountaine, a very honest man, rode next vnto mee, who enquired of me what I was, I told him I was a Gaxia Negu, that is to say, a stranger of the King. This man causing me strait-way to ride neere him, held one of his armes ouer my head, saying vnto me, Ate fra, Ate fra; that is to say, Feare not, feare not; and brought me into an Orch-yard neere vnto his house, where stood many long pieces of Timber set vp against certaine Trees, vnder which he caused me to goe, because they were in manner of a Cabin, where being as I thought in securitie, I caused a Candle to be lighted, and immediatly they beganne to

rairie stones, whereupon I suddenly caused it to bee blowne out. This honest man afterward brought me to his house, and gaue me a very good Supper, to wit, roasted Hennes, and Bread and Wine; and on the morning taking me by the hand, he led me to shew me the way whereby they goe vp into the Mountaine and Rockes, which were rent on euery side, and there stood a verie high gate, which is kept shut, within the which is a very great Garrison of Souldiers. And hee told mee, that if any man should presume to enter, hee should suddenly haue his hands and his feet cut off, and his eyes bored out, and that wee were not in fault for comming so neere vnto that gate, but that they which were our guides deserved to be punished.

59. The manner of the sending of the Sonnes of the Prete into this Mountaine, is this: that whereas all the Prete Ianni, the Predecessors of this David were wont to haue five or fixe Wiues, and many Sonnes by them, at their death the first borne did inherit. Others say, that he inherited which seemed to be most fit, and of most vnderstanding: and others, hee which had most Followers, and greatest authoritie. Touching this point, I will say, that which I haue heard spoken by many Courtiers of experience and wisdom. King Alexander, the Grand-father of this present King David, dyed without Sonnes, and although hee had Daughters, yet notwithstanding the great men of the Court went vnto this Mountaine, and fetcht from thence Nahu his Brother, which was the Father of this David. This Nahu brought with him from the Mountaine a lawfull Sonne of his, which was a very noble and valiant Prince, but he was something head-strong and proud. After he was settled in the Kingdome he had other Wiues, and Sonnes, and Daughters, and after his death they would haue made his eldest Sonne King, which came from the Mountaine with his Father, but it was objected, that because he was so proud and obstinate, he would intreat all the people badly.

Prete Sonnes.

King Alexander

Others were of opinion, that he could not inherite, being borne in captiuitie, where he had no right of succession, and so they made this David King, which was the first borne, after his father was made King, and was eleuen yeares old. The Patriarke Abuna Mark did tell mee, that he and Queene Helena made him King, because they had at their commandement, all the great Lords of the Court; and so also it seemeth vnto me, that next after the Title of first borne, the adherences, friendships, and treasures may doe much. The rest of the sonnes of Nahu, the Brethren of the said David, which were young, were sent to bee kept in the said Mountaine with that eldest Sonne of his, which was brought with him from thence: and so all the Sonnes of the Prete haue bene vsed from the time of that King Abraham vnto this present day. They say it is very cold on the top of this Mountaine, and that it is round, and that it cannot be compassed about in lesse then fifteene dayes. And in my iudgement, it appeareth so to be. In this part where our way lay we travelled almost two dayes, and then we left it, which reacheth vnto the Kingdome of Amara, and Bogamidri, which confineth ypon Nilus, which Kingdome is very farre from hence.

Vpon this Mountaine are other Mountaines which make certaine Vallies, wherein are very many Riues and Fountaines, and Fields which are manured by the Inhabitants. There is also a Valley betweene two Mountaines, which is very strong, so that by no meanes a man can goe out of the same, because the passage is closed vp with exceeding strong gates, and in this Valley which is very great, and hath many Townes and Dwellings in it, they keepe those which are of the Bloud-Royall, and it is but lately since they haue found this meanes to keepe them in the said Valley, thinking that they be safer here: but the Kings Grand-children and Nephewes, and such as are almost forgotten are not kept with so great a Guard, notwithstanding, this Mountaine is guarded round about with exceeding great Garrisons, and grand Captaines; and the fourth part of the people which come vnto the Court are of the Captaines and Garrisons of this Mountaine, which haue their Lodging separate from all others, neither doe they come to any other, nor others vnto them, because they will not haue any bodie else to know the secrets of the said Mountaine. And when they come to the Court of the Prete, immediately hee sendeth his message to them, and euery man with-draweth himselfe, and all other businesse whatsoeuer ceaseth, while these Affaires are handled.

60. Touching the state of these Sons of the Prete, I saw a Frier of thirtie yeares of age, which was brought vnto the presence of the Prete, and about two hundred men with him, who was said to haue brought a Letter to Prete Ianni, from those of the Mountaine; and these two hundred men were part of the Garrisons of the same. They beat this Frier euery other day, and in like sort they beate these men, diuided into two parts; and that day when they beate the Frier, they beate the one halfe of them, and alwayes they begun with the Frier, and all the rest were continually present, and still they inquired of the Frier who gaue him that Letter, and for what cause, and whether hee had euer carryed any more Letters, and of what Monastery he was, and where he was made Frier. The naughtie wretch answered, that sixteene yeares past he came out of the Mountaine, and that then the Letter was deliuered vnto him, and that he neuer after returned thither, and that he neuer durst deliuer the same till now, that the Deuill had prouoked him thereunto. And this might be true, seeing it is not the manner in this Countrey, to put any date vnto their Letters, neither of yeare, nor moneth, nor day. The men were demanded nought else, but how they had let the said Frier get out.

The manner of beating them was after this sort, they throw the Malefactor on the ground upon his belly, and bind his hands vnto two stakes, and a cord about both his legs, and two men hold this cord and draw it out strait, and two Ministers of Iustice stand by, one at the head, and another at the feet, neither do they alwayes strike them, but betweene whiles, for if they should beat them continually, they would die, they lay on so cruelly. I saw them carrie one away, and before they could couer him with a cloth, he gaue vp the ghost, whereof the Prete being informed (because this execution was done before his Tents) he commanded that the dead man should be carried backe vnto the place where he was beaten, and that they which were beaten, should lay their heads vpon the feet of the dead corps. This execution lasted a fortnight, wherein this order of beating the Frier, and halfe of the Guard from two dayes, to two dayes neuer ceased, 10 saying onely vpon Saturday and Sunday, whereon they punish no Malefactors.

During the time of our abode in this Countrey, a Brother of the Prete, of sixteene yeares of age, fled out of the Mountaine, and came at length to his Mothers house, which was Queene Helena, and was Wite to the Father of this King. And because no man might receiue any that came out of the Mountaine vpon paine of life, the Mother would not harbour her Sonne, but tooke him and brought him to Prete Ianni, who asked him why hee fled away, which answered, because that he was starued for hunger; and that he came thither for nothing else, but onely to giue him witting thereof, because no bodie else would bring him this message. It was giuen out, that the Prete apparelled him in rich array, and gaue him much Gold and cloth of Silke, and sent him backe into the Mountaine. It was also giuen out through all the Court, that this yong man fled, thinking to escape away with the Portugals. This Nobleman which fled and was sent backe a- 20 gaine into the Mountaine, while we abode with the Ambassadors of Prete Ianni, which came into Portugall, in the Countrey of Lulibella, (where the Churches are which are hewen into the Rockes) passed that way with a Calazen, and with a great traine of people, which conducted him vpon a Mule, and he rode all couered ouer with blacke clothes, so that no part of him might be seene, neither could any part of the Mule bee seene, saue her eyes and eares. It was reported, that he fled away the second time in a Friers Weed with another Frier, and that this Frier his companion discovered him the same day, that they should haue departed out of the Countrey of Prete Ianni, and so they led him away Prisoner with the Frier, neither would they suffer them to speake to any bodie, and two men alwayes went hard by his Mule. Euery bodie reported, 30 that hee should bee put to death, or haue his eyes put out. I know not what became of him.

We heard reported of another, which would haue fled out of the Mountaine, and hid him- selfe vnder many boughes and leaues of trees, and certaine Husbandmen which passed that way, seeing the said boughes stirre, went to behold what the matter was, and laid hold on him; and the Guard, as soone as they had him in their clutches put out his eyes, and yet he liueth till this present, and is great Vncle to this Prete Ianni. It is reported, that there are great numbers of the Bloud-Royall in this Mountaine, whom they call Israelites, or the Sonnes of Dauid, for they are all of the same Kindred and Bloud that Prete Ianni is of. In the same Mountaine are many Churches and Monasteries builded hauing many Priests and Friars in them, and many In- 40 habitants which neuer come downe out of that place.

61. The Prete Ianni hath no Kinsfolkes at all, for those which came of the Mothers side, are not taken nor named for his Kinsfolkes, and those of the Fathers side are shut vp in the said Mountaine, and held as dead men. And although they marrie, and haue great store of children there, yet none of the male-children may come forth, except (as I haue said before) the Prete die with- out heire: then they fetch out of that place the next of Kindred, and fittest to gouerne. Some of the Females come out to be married, but are not esteemed as the Kinswomen, Daughters, or Sisters of the Prete, but are honoured during the life of their Father or Brother, and as soone as he dyeth, they become like to any other Ladie. All of vs saw a Ladie in the Court, which was the Daughter of a Prete, which albeit, when shee went abroad, had a Canopie carried ouer her, yet notwithstanding, she had a very simple Trainee. We knew also a Sonne of hers, which was 50 in as meane a case as any poore foot-man, so that in a very short space the fame of his Paren- tage was extinguished.

This King David which now liueth, at our departure had two sonnes, and three daughters, to whom he allotted out great reuenues, which he intended to bestow vpon them, and the place was shewed me, where one of them possessed these reuenues: but the report was generall, that as soone as the father should decease, and that one of them was made King, the other should be sent vnto the Mountaine, whither hee should carrie nothing but his person with him, And it was told me, that the third part of the charges which the Prete is at, is spent in the keeping of these Israelites, to whom he maketh better allowance, then any of his predecessors haue done. And besides the great reuenues which belong vnto them, he sendeth them much Gold, cloth of 60
Silke, and fine clothes, and much Salt, which runneth for currant money in these Kingdomes. And at our coming thither, hauing presented him with our Pepper, wee vnderstood of a cer- taintie, that he sent the one halfe thereof vnto them, willing them to reioyce and be merrie, because the King of Portugall, his father, had sent to visite him, and had sent him that Pepper. Wee

Wee vnderstood also of a suretie, and as eye-witnesses in many places, that Prete Ianni hath great lands and possessions, manured by his owne slaues and Oxen; and that these Slaues are apparelled by the King, and are exempted from other people, and marrie together, and are alwaies Slaues. The whole reuenues of these Possessions which are about the Mountaine are carried vp into it, the reuenues of other places goe vnto the Monasteries, Churches, and the poore, and specially to certaine poore and aged Gentlemen, which in times past haue beene in gouernment, and at this present are out of authoritie. Twise also hee sent of this Wheat vnto our companie, to wit, once fise hundred burchens in Caxumo, and fise hundred more in Aquate, neither keepeth hee any part of these possessions vnto himselfe, but bestoweth all in manner abouesaid.

ABRAHAM. Strange trenches and gates in the entrance to Xoa: and what hapned before the PRETE called for them.

62. Returning to our Voyage, I say, that wee went along the foot of this Mountaine by a Riuer side, and the Countrey is very goodly and faire, sowed with much Mill and other Corne of the Countrey, but there is very little Wheat. There are many Villages on both sides of this Riuer, and on the side of the Mountaine, and at the end of the Valley we left this Riuer, and began to find a wooddie Countrey full of stones. Here are no Mountaines, but certaine small Valles sowed with Wheat and Barley, and Pulse of the Countrey: and here endeth the Kingdome of Angote, and the Kingdome of Amara beginneth. In the beginning whereof towards the East, is a great Lake, whereby we lodged, which is eight miles long, and three miles broad. It hath a little Iland in the midst, and a Monasterie of Saint Stephen with many Friers, wherein are many Limons, Oranges, and Citrons, and to passe ouer to the Monasterie, they vse a raft made of Timber and Bull-rushes, with foure great Gourds, and they make it in this former: They take foure Poles of wood, and lay Bull-rushes vpon them, standing vpon these Bull-rushes, being very well bound together, and vpon these they lay other foure Poles well bound and fastened, and at euery corner there is a great Gourd, and in this manner they passe ouer to the Ile. This Lake runneth not but in Winter time, when the water ouerfloweth, and it issueth out at two places. There are in this Lake certaine great beasts which they call Gomaras, which are Sea-horses, and also a fish like vnto a Congre, which is very great and long, and hath the most mis-shapen head that may be imagined, made after the manner of a Toad, and the skinne vpon the head thereof seemeth to be like the skinne of a Snake, and all the rest of the bodie is smooth like a Congre, and it is the fattest and most delicate fish that is in the world. There are great store of Villages about this Lake, which reach downe to the brinke of the water, and there are fifteene Kimetes or Captainships, and most pleasant fields of Wheat and Barley. We haue seene many Lakes in these Countreys, but this is the greatest of all that I haue seene. The Countrey is very faire and fruitfull.

Wee trauelled from hence aboue sixteene miles, through a Countrey very well sowed with Millet, and replenished with Fountaines. The three and twentieth of September, wee went from thence to a Towne, called Azzel, which is seated vpon a small Hill, betweene two Riuers, and all the field was sowed with Wheat, Millet, and all kind of pulse, and it is a place wherem a great Faite is kept. Beyond one of these Riuers there is a Towne of Moores, rich and of great trafficke, as of Slaues, cloth of Silke, and of all other sorts of merchandise, as it is in the Towne of Manadeli vpon the Confines of Tigremahon. These Moores pay great tribute to the Prete, and here the Christians and the Moores are very familiar together, for they bring them water, they wash their cloth, and daily in this place the Christian women keepe companie with the Moores, of which their doing we thought not well. Wee stayed all Saturday and Sunday at the foot of this Towne, where all night our men fought with their Lances against the Tygres, which would haue carried away our Mules, and slept not a winke. The next day, we trauelled through a plaine Countrey, well peopled, and well manured for the space of fixe miles. Then wee ascended vp an high Mountaine, without all kind of Rockes and Woods, but was all plowed and sowed, and rested our selues about noon-tide. While I stayed here, ten or twelue men of account, and our Interpreter were with me, and wee began to discourse of the height of this Mountaine whereon we stood, and the waste Countrey which we viewed with our eyes. They shewed me the Mountaine where the Sonnes of the Prete are kept, which seemed not past twelue twelve miles from vs, and we might see the Rocke which was all ragged on euery side, which stretcheth so farre toward the Riuer Nilus, that wee could not discerne the end thereof, and it was so high, that the Mountaine where we were, seemed to bee vnder the foot thereof. Heere they informed me particularly of the great Garrisons, which were maintained for the keeping of the Kings Sonnes, and of the abundance of victuals and apparell which they had. They told me moreouer, that this high Mountaine whereon we stood, diuided the Countrey where the Millet growes, from that where the Wheate groweth, and that from hence forward we should find no more Millet, but Wheate and Barley.

63. We trauelled ouer the top of this Mountaine, hauing a plaine way about nine miles, and on euery side were fields sowed with Wheat and Barley. Here wee found another Lake but not so great, it might be some three miles long, and two miles abroad. Wee lodged in a field all full of goodly pasture, where we found such a multitude of Flies, which were very great, that we thought they would haue killed vs. This field was not sowed, because it was halfe ouer-flowne with water, for they know no meanes to conueigh away the water, and cause it to passe downe from the Mountaine.

Cold nights.

Nakednesse.

We began afterward to enter into a Countrey, wherein the day time it was very hot, and in the night exceeding cold, and we saw the Inhabitants weare about them before their priuities, a piece of an Oxe-hide. The women likewise weare a piece of cloth twice as bigge as the mens was, and couered as much as they could therewith, yet the greater part was seene neuerthelesse, the rest of their bodie was all naked. Their haire was diuided in two parts, the one hanging downe to their shoulders, and the other to their eares, and they say, that these Lands belong vnto the Trumpetters of Prete Ianni. A little out of the way is a great Wood of Trees vnkowne to vs, but exceeding high, neere vnto which there is a Church of many Canons, built by a King that lyes there buried. Hauing passed this day ouer very huge Mountaines, we came to our lodging being gotten out of them, at the enterance of a passing goodly field.

Machan Ca-
cen.

The fixe and twentieth of September, in the morning we trauelled through the said Champaigne field, descending still for the space of six miles, and came to a faire and mightie Church, called Machan Celacen, which signifieth, The Trinitie, which we saw afterward with Prete Ianni, when he remoued his Fathers bones. This Church hath two great circuits, one compassed about with an high wall of planks, and the other paled round about, and the paled circuit, contained about two miles in compasse. We went thither very ioyfull, thinking to haue seene the said Church, but when we came neere it within a Crosse-bow-shoot, two men came vnto vs to cause vs to light: for this is the custome when any man commeth neere to a Church. And when we were come to the gate of this circuit, they would neither suffer vs to enter, nor yet the Frier that was our giude, and with their fists they thrust him in the brest, telling him, that he had no authoritie to bring vs in.

Goodly coun-trei.

This Champaigne field, and the situation of the Church are very beautifull: for all the Countrey is manured for the space of ten or twelue miles, neither is there any one spanne of ground, which is not manured and full of all kind of Corne, except Millet: and in all monethes of the yeare here Corne is reaped and sowed, so that alwayes here is some Corne ripe, and some Greene. On both sides of this Church, runneth an exceeding faire Riuer, without any Trees growing on the bankes, and they fetch water out of the same to water the fields, and out of certaine hils adioyning, descend also many Fountaines of water, which water all the Countrey. There are likewise many Houses and Towns, the one separated from the other with their Churches; for wheresoeuer the King hath a Church, there also must be Churches for the Hubandmen.

64. After we were passed through these Champions, we trauelled in greater fields about thirtie six miles Eastward, where they shewed vs a Church of S. George, wherein the Grandfather of this Prete Ianni lyeth buried. Heere they informed vs, that the ancient Kings which came out of the Kingdomes of Barnagasso and Tigremahon, when they had their first beginning, enlarged their Kingdomes through these Countries of the Moores and Gentiles, and passing through the Countrey of Tigrai, and so through Angote they came into the Kingdome of Amara, but before they came thither is the Kingdome of Xoa, wherein are certaine exceeding great trenches, and here they dwelt a long time, & builded many Churches and houses, endowing the same with great Reuenues, neither is there any span of ground which belongeth not to the Churches. And Nabu the Father of this Prete began the Church of Machan Celacen, and his Sonne afterward furnished and endowed it. This Realme hath no more the name of a Signiorie, for the title thereof was Amara Taffila, which signifieth King of Amara, as Xoa Taffila, King of Xoa.

And when the bones of this Nabu was remoued, into the said Church of Machan Celacen, at which Translation we Portugals were present. This present Prete finished, and confirmed the Donations made of all this Signiory vnto this Church. There is neuer a Monastery in all this Kingdome, but all are Churches. The Canons and Priests of which, and those of the other Churches of the rest of the Kingdomes before spoken of, serue the Prete in all seruices, sauing in war. And in these Countries Iustice is executed vniuersally, vpon the Canons, Priests, and Friars. And the Frier which guided vs for the conueiance of our stufte, if he were not obeyed, caused both both Friers and Priests to be beaten. As we trauelled through these mightie Champaine fields, we thought wee passed through a Sea, being not able to see any Mountaine at all. The last of Huge Champs.

September, we came to a small Village, where was a Church of our Ladie. Heere toward the paines. East, beginne certaine ragged and strong Mountaines, with certaine Vallies so wonderfull deepe, that a man would thinke they descend downe to Hell, neither would any man easily beleue how deepe they be. And euen as the Mountaines, where the Sonnes of the Prete are kept, are Horrible Vallies, twelve or fifteen miles deepe.

10 knew perfectly, that they stretch vnto the Countries of the Moors, where they bee not so rough and wilde as they be here. In the bottome of these Vallies, are great Townes and places manured, and infinite number of great Apes are there, which are hairy on the fore-part of their breasts, like Lyons. Great Hairy Apes.

65. The first of October, 1520. we trauelled still through a plaine Countrey, till we came to these Vallies, in which our trauell wee found an infinite number of small Lakes and Fountaines, for the space of twelve miles, and came to our lodging in a certaine place, where wee were to passe ouer these low bottomes. The third of October, hauing trauelled two miles, we came to certaine gates vpon a craggy Rocke, leauing one of them on the right side; and the other on the left, and it was so narrow, hard by these gates, that with much adoe a Cart could passe vpon the passages which the Mountaine made, and they are stopped vp, where these Gates are so streight in euery Valley: and passing through this gate, you descend downe a Speares length through a narrow way, made as steepe as a Dart in the midst, so that you can passe it neither on foote, nor on horse-back, and this way is so steepe and down-right, that a man cannot go downe vnlesse it be on all foure: and it may easily bee perceiued, that it was made by arte of man, for the safe keeping of that passage, and after we were passed through this narrow way, wee trauelled for a certaine space, by a way made almost as steepe as a Dart, for the space of six spans, and on both sides are exceeding great downe-falls, and if I had not seene our Mules and people passe before me, I would haue sworne that Goates could not haue passed that way: and so wee put our Mules before vs, as thinking them lost, and wee came after them. This rough way lasteth the space of a Crosse-bow shot, and this place is called Aquisfagi, which signifieth, The death of Asses. They pay Toll there. Many times afterward we passed by these gates, and neuer came that way, but we found Mules and Oxen dead. Besides this passage, there are sixe miles more of very bad way, all of Rocke, descending downe-ward. In the midst whereof is a Caue digged into the Rocke, out of the top whereof, water continually droppeth, which continually dropping, maketh proportions in the stone of diuers formes. Gates: see the like in Finches description of the Mogols.

At the end of these sixe miles, we found a great Riuer, which is called Anacheta, wherein, as they say, is store of great and goodly Fish. Afterward we trauelled still vp the hill for three miles space, vntill we come to a little gate, which when we had passed, we found another Riuer, where are certaine other gates, which are not vsed. And they which passe these bottomes and deep Vallies, come hither to their lodging, because they cannot passe in one day from one end to the other. Heere the Frier which guided vs, vsed such crueltie towards a Xuam or Captaine, as a man would not haue vsed to a Moore. This Captaine sent not his men to carrie our stuffe so soone as he should, therefore he destroyeth certaine fields of Beanes, and vtterly spoyled them, of which Beanes they liue in these Vallies, because here groweth nothing but Millet and Beanes. And because we spake against his doing, he said; That this was the Law of the Countrey, and daily he caused many of them which carried our stuffe to be beaten, and sometimes he tooke away their Mules, Oxen, and pieces of Cloath, saying, That whosoever serued badly, was so to be vsed. The Riuer of Anacheta. Other Gates: A begger on horse-backe.

50 The fourth of October, we trauelled still by these bad waies, and came to a Riuer, by which we lodged, which is very great and faire, and is called Gemma, and aboundeth with Fish, as the Countrey people say: and these Riuers ioyne together, and fall into Nilus. Wee descended downe this Mountaine for sixe miles space, at the end whereof we found other gates, where we also payed for our passage. From these gates we came to our lodging in a Champaine field, where we found no Vallies nor any thing else, but all was plaine & euen ground. The distance between both the gates aforesaid, is aboue fifteene miles, and here is the diuision of the Kingdomes of Amara and Xoa. And these gates are called Baba Bassa, which signifieth, The new Land. In these Vallies and rough grounds, are infinite numbers of all sorts of Fowles. The Riuer of Gemma. Baba Bassa.

66 The fifth of October, wee trauelled through Champaines, not farre distant from the said Rockes and deepe Vallies, and we lodged in the mid-way towards a Monasterie, called Bilibranos, whereof I will speake that which I saw Prete Ianni doe three times. The first was, when he came to performe a yearely solemnitie for a Prelate of that Monasterie, which was deceased, whose name was Gianes, and was taken for a Saint. His Title was Ichee, and he is the chiefest Prelate of all Ethiopia, sauing the Patriarke Abuna Marke. The second time, hee came to the election of another Ichee, whose name was Iacob, a man of wonderfull holy life, which sometimes Ichee, the second, Prelate of all Ethiopia, and next to the Patriarke.

Huge winds.

times had beene a Moore. This Ichee was our great friend, and he told vs, that he was admonished in a night by a Vision, that he was not in the right way, and that hee should repaire vnto the Patriarke Abuna Marke, who receiued him graciously, and made him a Christian, and instructed him in all points of our Faith, as if he had beene his Sonne. Ichee, in the tongue of Tigrat, signifieth an Abbot, which is vsed in the Kingdome of Barnagasso, and Tigremahon. In this Champaine through which we traualled, were certaine small houses, made almost vnder-ground, and so were the yards likewise round about them, where they keep their Cattell, & they said they builded their houses so low, because of the huge Winds, which are rife in those parts. Heere wee saw the people badly apparelled, but such store of Oxen, Mules, and Mares, as it is incredible.

67. The Wednesday following, we found a better Countrey, sowed with Wheate and Barley, and in some of these fields wee saw some Corne ripe, some newly cut downe, and other which seemed newly to be sowne. This Countrey is called Tabagun, and is very well peopled, with many great Townes, and hath infinite heardes of all kinds of Cattell, to wit, of Oxen, Horses, Mules, and Sheepe. In these Countries many are sicke of Agues, vnto whom, as wee perceived, they ministred no remedy, expecting onely the helpe of Nature, and if any man hath paine in his head, they let him bloud in the head; and if he be sicke in his breast, sides, or shoulders, they seare him with a red-hot Iron, as we vse to seare our Cattell.

On Wednesday, to our great comfort, we began to behold a farre off, the Campe and Pauilions of Prete Ianni, which seemed to be infinite, and to couer all the fields, and heere we lodged. On Thursday, we made no great iourney. From Friday at noone, we rested all Saturday and Sunday in a little Towne, where there was a new Church, which was not yet painted, (for they paint all their Churches) neither was it very curiously wrought, which was called Auriata, that is to say, The Church of the Apostles, and they said it belonged to the King, vnto whose Tents was some three miles distance: and from this place vnto the Church where Abuna Marke was lodged, is a mile and a halfe, which Abuna Marke is his great Patriarke.

68. There came vnto vs a great Lord, who by his office was called Adrugaz, that is to say, Great Master of the Household, who told vs, that the Prete Ianni vnderstanding of our comming, had sent him to guard vs, and provide vs of all things that wee stood in need of, and streight-way willed vs to take Horse and goe with him, and supposing hee would haue led vs to the Court, we prepared our selues. He caused vs to goe backe againe, not the same way which we came, but made vs compasse certaine small hils, and turned vs backe againe about three miles, willing vs not to take it in ill part, because Prete Ianni came that way whether we went, as indeed hee did: we saw also sixe or seuen men, mounted vpon very goodly Horses, ride skirmishing and playing before vs, hauing their faces wholly couered, so that one could not bee discerned from the other, and many followed after them vpon Mules, and wee iudged that this Canalcada was made of purpose for our sakes, because the Prete was desirous to see vs, and they led vs on the backe-side of certaine small hils, where this Gentleman was lodged in his Tent, and caused vs also to be placed hard by him, in another goodly Tent, and saw vs plentifully provided of all things, which we stood in need of. We were not farre distant from the place, where Prete Ianni himselfe was lodged, the Frier also came and lodged neere vs. On Wednesday, in the morning, they brought vs another goodly great Tent, which was white and round, saying, That Prete Ianni lent vs the same, and that no man might haue the like Tent, sauing the Prete and the Churches, and that himselfe lodged in the same when he traualled: and so we stayed vntill Friday, without vnderstanding what we should doe, but were alwaies well provided of victuals. The Gentleman which guarded vs, and the Frier likewise admonished vs to haue a good eye vnto our stuffe, because in that Countrey there were many Theeues; and the Franks, that is, The White men, which were in the Court, gaue vs the like warning, and told vs that there were Captaines, and others like Toll-masters ouer the said Theeues, which payed a Tribute to Prete Ianni, of such goods as were stolne.

§. XI.

How the Embassadour and we were called for by the Commandement of PRETE IANNI, and of the order which we found, and of the State and Maiestie of PRETE IANNI. His conference, allowance, remoue;
The Embassadours Audience.

The Portugals
sent for.

69.  N Friday, the twentieth of October, about three of the clocke, the Frier came vnto vs, and told vs in great haste, that the Prete Ianni had called for vs. The Embassadour commanded all the goods to be laden, which the Captaine Generall had sent, and charged vs to put our selues in order, which we did in very good sort by the help of God, and many people as well on foote as on horse-backe, came to waite waite vpon vs, with whom we came in good order vnto a Gate, from whence we beheld on all sides, an infinite number of Paulions and Tents, like vnto a Citie, and those which belonged to Prete Ianni, were set vp in a wide field, all White, (as I haue said, it is their generall vse) and before the same was a very faire Red Tent, which they say, is neuer set vp, but on daies of great Feasts, or of some great audience. Before the said Red Tent, were two rankes of Arches erected, couered with White and Red Cloath of Silke, to wit; one arch couered with Red, and another with Silke, and they were not couered, but had the Cloath of Silke round about them, as it were a piece of Wood, which supporteth a Crosse, hauing a Stole wrapped about it; and so these Arches stood on one front, and were about twentie: their bignesse and breadth was like vnto the arch of a little Cloyster, and one ranke was distant from another, about a stones cast.

The Arches

Here were an infinite number of people placed together, which to my iudgement seemed to be aboue fortie thousand persons, and all of them stood in good order on either sides without stirring, and the people which were best apparelled, were next vnto the arches, among whom were certaine Canons and Church-men very honourable, with great hoods on their heads, not like vnto Miters, but with certaine sharpe points on the top, painted with Colours, and were of Cloath of Silke, and Crimzon, and other people in very rich array, before whom stood foure Horses, to wit, two on the one side, and two on the other, which were saddled, and richly couered with Embroydered Cloath downe to the ground: the Armour which they were vnder the same, was not to bee seene: These Horses had high Crownes vpon their heads, which mounted aboue their eares, and went downe to the Bits of their Bridle, with great Plumes of Feathers of sundry Colours, and vnder the said Horses stood many other good Horses, saddled and couered with Silke and Veluet, and the head of each one was equall, and as it were in order with the people: next vnto these Horses, behind them (because the throng of people was so great) stood many honourable persons, which were apparelled onely from the girdle downe-ward, with very fine and White Cotton cloath. The rest of the people which were basely apparelled, stood betweene them and the rest.

Fortie thousand persons.

Canons and Church-men.

The great pompe and magnificence of Prete Ianni.

It is a Custome, that before the King and great men of Commaundement, there alwaies goe men which carrie Whips, that is, A little staffe with a large Thong of Leather, and when they lash in the Ayre, they make a great noyse, to make the people giue backe. Aboue one hundred of these Fellowes came to meete vs, all apparelled in certaine small Iackets of Silke, which made such a noyse with lashing, that one man could not heare another. The men on Horse-backe, and vpon Mules which were with vs, lighted a farre off, and wee were led on Horse-backe yet a great way farther, and lighted within a Crosse-bow shot of the great Tent, and here they which conducted vs, beganne to doe their accustomed reuerence, and we likewise, because wee were so instructed, which is, to stoope downe with the right hand vnto the ground.

One hundred vnder Marshals

Reuerence, how done.

Likewise, in this place, within a Crosse-bow shoote, there met vs at least fixtie men, which were, as it were, Porters with Maces, and they came halfe running, for so they are wont to runne with all Messages which the Prete sendeth. They were apparelled in white Iackets, of good Cloath of Silke, and vpon their shoulders they had certaine skinnies, of Roane or Tawny colour, very hairie, which they said, were Lyons skinnies, and reached downe to the ground. And vpon those skinnies they had certaine Chaines of Gold, rudely wrought, with Iewels set in them, and likewise other Iewels about their neckes. They weare certaine Silke Girdles of diuers Colours, in breadth and making, like to the Girts of Horses, sauing that they were long with Flakes and Tassels downe to the ground, and they went halfe on the one side, and halfe on the other, and waited vpon vs to the first ranke of the arches, where we stayed.

Messengers.

But before we came to the said Arches, there stood foure great Lyons, tyed with their Chaines in the way which wee were to passe, and hauing passed them in the midst of the fields: vnder the shadow of the said Arches, stood foure men of Honour, among which, was one of the two greatest Lords which are in the Court of Prete Ianni, which is called Betudete, that is to say; The Grand Captaine, and there are two of them, whereof one waiteth on his right hand, and the other on his left. He which waited on his right hand, was (as they said) in warre against the Moores; and hee that waited on his left hand, was the same which stood there; the other three were great Personages. When wee came vnto them, we stood a great while without speaking any word, neither we to them, nor they to vs. In the meane while there came an old Priest, which was (as they say) the Kinsman and Confessor of Prete Ianni, wearing a white Bonet, like vnto a Bernusse, and a great hood of Silke.

The Cabeata being arriued, demaunded of the Ambassadour, what hee would haue, and whence he came: The Ambassadour answered, That he came from India, and brought an Ambassage vnto Prete Ianni, from the Grand Captaine and Gouvernour of the Indies, vnder the King of Portugall. Herewithall, hee returned to the Prete from whom he came, and returned three times with the very selfe-same Questions and Answeres. To all their demaunds, the Ambassadour answered after one sort. The fourth time, the Cabeata said, Say what you will, and I will declare the same to the King. To whom the Ambassadour answered, That He and his whole Companie kissed his Highnesse hands, and greatly thanked God, which had fulfilled their holy desires, in ioyning Christians together with Christians, and that they were the first which had performed the same. With this answer, the Cabeata departed hence, and straightway returned with another Message, and alwaies the foresaid foure Honourable persons went to meete him, in such sort, as we haue before already declared, and comming vnto vs, he said, That we were right welcome to Prete Ianni, and that we should go to our lodging and rest our selues.

At this first Audience, he vseth no other words, neither in his Maiestie to bee seene, for the better maintaining of his reputation. Then the Ambassadour deliuered out by seuerall parcels, all the Presents which the Grand Captaine sent vnto his Highnesse, and ouer and besides the same, foure bagges of Pepper, which we brought to defray our charges. All the particulars were forth-with conueyed to the Tent of the Prete, and afterward brought backe againe to the Arches where wee stood, and they hanged vp the Cloathes of Arras which we gaue them, vpon the Arches: and likewise, euery parcell of the rest of the goods and things; and while they hung vp in the sight of all men, all men were commaunded to keepe silence, and one which is called the Lord Chiefe Iustice of the Court, spake with a lowd voyce, and declared piece by piece, what the things were which the Grand Captaine had sent to Prete Ianni, and willed all men, To giue thanks vnto the Lord God, for hauing caused Christians to meete together, and that if any Man were there that were grieued thereat, hee might weepe and howle; and whosoener reioyced thereat, might sing. Then all the people that were there assembled, gaue a mightie shoute in manner of praising God, which continued for a great space. This beeing ended, they licensed vs to depart, and brought vs to our lodging, a great Crosse-bow shoote distant from the Tents of the Prete, where our Pauillion, which hee had sent vs, was set vp, and where the rest of our stuffe remained.

70. In the remoouing of these our goods, we beganne to see by experience, the aduise which was giuen vs concerning the Theeues, for suddenly on the way, they tooke by force from one of our Seruants, foure Basons of Latton, and foure Dishes of Porcellan, and certaine other small things belonging to our Kitchin, and because the Seruant would haue defended himselfe, they gaue him a great wound on the Legge. The Ambassadour could doe no more, but cause him to be healed, and of these goods could neuer after recouer any whit. As soone as wee were lodged, Prete Ianni sent vs three hundred great White Loaves of Wheate, and many Iarres of Wine of Hony, and tenne Oxen, and the Messengers which brought these things, said; That Prete Ianni had commaunded, that wee should haue fiftie Oxen giuen vs, and as many Iarres of Wine. The Saturday following, which was the one and twentieth of October, he sent vs great store of Bread and Wine, and many Haggasses of Flesh, of diuers sorts, which were very well made and dressed, and the like was done vpon the Sunday, whereon among other many and sundry Haggasses, a young Calfe was brought vnto vs, all whole laid in Paste, so well dressed and seasoned, with Spices and Fruits put in the belly thereof, that we could neuer satisfie our selues with feeding thereon.

On Munday following, there was a rumour spread through all the Court, that wee had kept backe many bagges of Pepper, which the Grand Captaine had sent vnto the Prete, which was vntrue; and because they make exceeding great account of Pepper, and that it is the greatest merchandize that runneth through Ethiopia, therefore the Frier came vnto vs, with a cunning, saying vnto vs, That if the Ambassadour would giue all his Pepper to Prete Ianni, that he would giue order, that our charges should be defrayed during our abode there, and vntill our returne vnto Maczua: and thus they ceased to giue vs Victuals; neither were the fiftie Oxen sent vnto vs, nor the Iarres of Wine. Likewise, they forbade all the Frankes in the Court, that they should not speake with vs.

They willed vs also, not to depart out of our Tent, because it was the Custome, that all they which come vnto this Court, should speake with no man, till they had talked with the King, and that for breaking this order, they had cast in prison a Portugall of Acugna, which which came to speake with vs on the way with another Franke, laying to their charge, that they came to reueale vnto vs the secrets of the Court. This Portugall fled on a night with his manacles on his hands from an Eunuch, which kept him, and came to our Tent to saue himselfe. The next morning with speed they came to seeke him, but the Ambassador would not deliuer him, but sent his Factor and the Interpreter to speake with the Betudete on his behalfe, and to aske him, why hee cast the Portugalls into fetters, and handled them so badly by Eunuchs which were Slaues. The Betudete answered nothing to the purpose, saying; Who sent for you hither? and added further, That Matthew went not into Portugall by Prete Ianni his commandement, nor by the commandement of the Queene Helena. And that if this Slaue had put the Portugalls into fetters, the Portugalls likewise might put this Slaue againe into fetters, for such is the iustice in those countries.

71. On Tuesday, the foure and twentieth of October, wayting, while the Prete would send for vs to speake with him, hee departed with all his Court toward the same place from whence hee came, which was about sixe miles off. In the meane season the Frier came vnto vs, and wished vs if wee would goe to the place where the King lay, that wee should buy our selues Mules to carry our stuffe, and told the Ambassador, that if hee would buy or sell hee might so doe. The Ambassador answered him, That wee were not come thither to play the Merchants, but onely to serue God and both the Kings, and to vnite one Christian people with another, and this they did onely to sift out what our iutention and purpose was. Vntill this present they had forbidden all Christians in the Court to speake with vs, or to come vnto our Tents, and if they came thither they came very secretly, because the Frier was alwayes with vs as our Guardian.

72. When Lopez Suarez, grand Captaine and Gouvernour of India, came with his Fleet to the Hauen of Ziden; in which Fleet I my selfe was, wee found in the same place sixtie Christian men, which were Slaues vnto the Turkes, and they were of diuers Nations, who were part of these which at this present we found in this Court, who say, that they wayted for the grace of God, to wit, while the Portugalls should come into this Hauen of Ziden, that they might escape away with vs; and because the people of our Fleet could not goe on Land, therefore they stayed behinde; and few dayes after, fiftene of these white men, with as many more Abissines of the Countrey of Prete Ianni, which likewise were Slaues, found two Brigandines, and fled away to get vnto our Fleet; and being not able to come vnto the Ile of Camaran, they came to the Ile of Maczua, which is neere vnto Ercoco, a Towne of Prete Ianni. And comming on land they funke the Brigandines, and came vnto the Court of the Prete, whom we saw more honorably and courteously vsed then our selues, till this present. And they haue giuen them Lands and Slaues which serue them and maintayne them. These are the Frankes, the greatest part whereof were Genoueses, two Catalanians, one of Sio, one a Biscaien, and one an high German, which afterward came all into Portugall, and they call vs Portugalls also Frankes. All other white people, to wit, those of Syria, of Grecia, and of Cairo, they call Gibetes. These Frankes preuailed with vs to giue foure bags of Pepper, and foure Chests couered with leather, for a present to the Prete, which wee carried the thirtieth of October, which was but collusion of the Courtiers for their owne aduantage. The Frankes which were in the Court came after to our Tent and told vs, that the great men of the Court were our enemies, and that this Frier had put into their heads, to counsell Prete Ianni to suffer vs not to returne, nor to depart out of his Kingdome. Because wee reported euill of the Countrey, and that wee would speake much worle when wee were departed out of the same, and that was alwayes the custome of these Kingdomes, not to suffer Strangers to depart which came into the same. Wee suspected thus much by that which wee had heard, and they confirmed the same. For wee knew very well, that Iohn Gomez, and Iohn Prete, Portugalls, (which were sent hither by Tristan de Acunna, Lord Gouvernour of India, together with a Moore, which yet liueth and dwelleth in Manadeli) were not suffered to depart; because they threatned to kill them, if they departed; and likewise one Peter de Couillan a Portugall, and two Venetians.

On Tuesday, the last of October, Prete Ianni came downe from the Tents where hee lay, toward this Circuit where wee aboad; and when hee passed by hee saw our Tent, not farre distant from his, and sent a man to the Ambassador, to wish him to remooue his Tent, because the ayre was bad where the same stood, and yet our Tent stood in the same place which they had appointed vs the day before. The Ambassador sent him word, that he had no people to remooue his Tent nor his stuffe, and that if he might haue people, he would cause it to be remooued, whither soeuer it pleased his Highnesse. This day at euening came a message from the Prete, saying, That if the Ambassador or his companie, had any Crosse of gold or of silver, that hee should send it him, for hee desired to see it. The Ambassador sent him word, that neither hee nor his companie had any, and that one which he had brought with him he had giuen to Barnagasso, herewithall the Page departed, but suddenly returned againe, saying, That we should send him any that we had.

Wee sent him a Wooden Crosse of mine, with a painted Crucifixe, which by the way I carried in my hand, according to the custome of the Countrey. Immediately he sent it backe vnto vs, saying; That he tooke great pleasure in beholding of it, because he perceiued that wee were good Christians.

The Ambassadour sent word vnto the Prete by the said Page, that he had yet a little Pepper, to defray his owne and his companies charges, which hee desired to bestow vpon his Highnesse, and also foure Chests to keepe apparell in, and that when it pleased him, he might send for them. The Page departing with this message, returned suddenly, saying; That the King desired no Pepper nor Chests, and that the Cloathes which he had giuen him, were bestowed vpon Churches, and that the Pepper was giuen to the poore. For so it had beene told him, that the Grand 10 Captaine of India had done, in giuing all the cloathes sent him by the King of Portugall, vnto Churches. The Ambassadour answered, That whosoever had told him any such thing, had not told the truth, because it was all laid vp together, and kept in safetie. This answer beeing sent, there came another message, saying; That Prete Ianni commanded, that the Ambassadour without all delay, with his whole Company should come vnto him, and it was three houres at least within night. Forthwith we all beganne to put on our best Apparell, to goe whither we were sent for. When we were ready, another came which brought vs word, that wee must not go; and thus we stayed at home in our dumps.

Going to the court by night.

74. On Wednesday the first of Nouember, two houres within night, Prete Ianni sent for vs by a Page, and hauing put our selues in order, we went our way, and comming to the gate or entry of the first circuit or hedge, we found Porters, which caused vs to waite there a good houre, in the cold and dry winde. From the place where we stood, we saw many lighted Torches, standing before the other part of the circuit of the hedge, and men held them in their hands. While wee stayed thus in this entry (for they would not suffer vs to passe) our men shot off two Harquebusses, and suddenly there came a word from the King; demanding, why we had not brought many Harquebusses from the Sea. The Ambassadour answered, that we came not as Warriors, and that therefore wee brought not the said Armour with vs; but that we brought onely these three or foure Harquebusses, to shew pleasure and pastime. While we waited heere, fise principall men came vnto vs, among whom was one called Adrugas, to whom we were appointed at our first comming to the Court. As soone as they were come with the word of the Prete, forthwith they did their wonted reuerence, and we in like manner, and began to set forward, and hauing gone fise or six paces, but we and they stood still. They went on the side of vs, as if they had led vs by the hand, & on the one side of them, went two men with two Torches lighted in their hands, & two before them on the other side, and as they guided vs, each of them in his course began to cry with an high voyce, Hurcha, Hiale, Huchia, Abeton, which signifieth; Him which you haue commanded me (Sir) heere I bring vnto you. And when one had made an end, another beganne, and so they followed one after another, and vsed this speech so long, vntill we heard a voice from within, vttered by diuers, which was, Casacinelet, that is to say, Come yee in?

The Rites of admitting to presence. Strange Ceremonies of State. Ten pauses.

We went a little farther, and they began againe to stay, and vttered the foresaid words againe, vntill they heard an answer from within, as at the first. They made aboue ten of these pauses, from the first entrance vnto the second, and euery time when they said within Casacinelet, because it is the word of the King, they which were our guides, and wee with them, bowed downe our heads and our hands to the ground. And hauing passed the second entry, they began to make another song, which was this; Caphan, Hiam Caynba, Afrangues, Abeton, which signifieth; The Franks which you commanded me here, I bring them, my Lord. And these he vttered as often as the other words before, and attended an answer from within the house, which was like vnto the former, and so from pause to pause, we came vnto a Bed or Table, before which stood many burning Torches, which we saw in the first entry, and told them to bee eightie on euery side, in euen ranke, and that no man might goe out of the ranke: Those which held them, had before them certaine long Canes in their hands, which went ouer-thwart breast-high, and the said Torches stood all equall.

The presence.

This Bed was placed within the entrance of a great house of earth, whereof we spake before, which is built vpon very great Pillers of Cipresse; the rooffe standing vpon these Pillers, was Painted with certaine goodly colours, and it was Wainscoted directly downe from the top to the bottome. The couering of the rooffe, was of the Grasse of the Countrey, which lasteth (as they say) the life of a man. In the entry of the house, that is to say, at the vpper part thereof, were fise Curtaines prepared, which hung before the said bed, and the middlemost of them was embroidered with Gold, and the others were of fine Silke. Before these Curtaines, on the floore was laid a great and rich Carpet, and neere vnto it, two great cloaths of shaggy Cotton, like Carpets which they call Basutos: all the rest was couered with painted Mats, so that no part of the bare floore could be seene. And likewise from the one end vnto the other, the whole roome was full of lighted Torches, like those which we had seene while wee were without.

While

While wee thus stood still from behind the Curtaines, there came a word from Prete Ianni, Manner of audience. saying, abruptly, that he sent not Matthew into Portugall, though it were granted that hee went thither with his Licence, seeing the King of Portugall, had sent him many things, what was become of them, and wherefore were they not brought as the King had sent them? And that those things which the Grand Captaine had sent him from India, were already deliuered? The Ambassadour answered, that if it pleased his Highnesse to vouchsafe to heare him, he would satisfie him in all points; and suddenly he began to say, those things which the Grand Captaine sent him were already presented, and other and aboue, that he had giuen him part of that Pepper which he brought with him for his expenses. Touching the goods sent vnto him by the King of Portugall, the cause why they were not brought vnto his 10 Maiestie was, because the Ambassadour which brought them, named Edward Galuan, deceased in Camaran, and besides that certaine Portugals deceased in the Ile of Delaca; among whom were the Factor and Interpreter, that should haue deliuered the same; and finally, the Grand Captaine, being not able to recover the Hauens of Maczua, through contrary winds, returned into India, and from thence departed home vnto Portugall; to the Captaine which succeeded in his place. The King of Portugall not knowing of the death of the said Edward, but thinking he had bene come to the Court of your Highnesse, gaue no further Commission, but only to come into the Red Sea to destroy the Moores, and to har-
 20 ken after his Ambassadour; which Grand Captaine, doubting that he should bee able to recover no Hauens, as at other times they could not, would not bring the goods which the King of Portugall had sent him which are preserved in India, layed up together, and that hee desired onely to conduct Matthew thither with him, that if it were his chance to recover any Hauens on the Coast of the Abissini, hee might there put him on shoare, and afterward send him those goods. And because it pleased God, that they arrived at the foresaid Hauens of Maczua, which is in his Territories, although it bee in the hands of the Moores, the Grand Captaine determined to send vnto him himselfe, Don Roderigo with these goods and Peeces wherewith he had preserved him, and that he should come in company with Matthew, onely to see him, and to learne the way against another time, when it should please him to send the Ambassadour of the King of Portugall, and that Matthew was departed out of this life at the Monasterie of the Vision. At the end of this Answer, returned another Message; saying, If three were slaine in Delaca, how escaped Matthew? Hereunto it was answered, that Matthew escaped because hee would not stirre out of the ship. And the Ambassadour besought him very humbly, to vouchsafe to 30 giue him audience, because he should vnderstand the truth, and that likewise, hee would deliuer him in writing, that which the Grand Captaine had sent him by word of mouth, besides the Letters, and that by this meanes he should vnderstand the whole matter. Questions and Answeres passed too and fro, without any conclusion, and so they dismissed vs. The next day hee sent vs great store of Bread, Wine and Flesh, and two men which said, that they had charge to giue vs euery day our dyet and other necessaries.

75. On Saturday the third of Nouember, the Prete Ianni sent for vs, and we went at twentie foure of the clocke, and comming to the first gate or entrance, while we stayed a while, there came a message, that we should shoot off our Peeces, but without Bullets for hurting no bodie, and within awhile after, they let vs come in, and we vsed the like respite that we did before, 40 and comming in betweene the Gates and the Curtaines, where we stood at the first, we saw the place of the Bed very richly trimmed, and decked as before, and all behind and before, was covered with embroydered cloth, and the people were more richly arrayed, and stood on both sides all in a ranke with their naked Swords and Daggers in their hands, and placed, as though they had bin to fight one with another. There were two hundred Torches lighted on both sides standing in a ranke, as they did the other day, and when wee were come in; he began to aske vs questions, and send vs Answeres by the Cabeata, and by a Page called Abdenago, which is Captaine of all the Pages, with these his Messages he carryed his naked Sword in his hand, and the first which he brought was this, How many we were, and how many Harquebusses wee had brought? and straic way there came another; demanding, Who had taught the Moores to make Hand-gunnies, and great
 50 Ordnance, and whether they shot at the Portugals with them, or the Portugals at them, and who were most afraid of the Moores or the Portugals?

Each of these Questions came at severall times, and we made a severall Answer vnto each of them. And touching the feare of the great Ordnance, wee said, that the Portugals were so well armed in the Faith of Iesus Christ, that they were not afraid of the Moores, and had they feared them, they would not haue come so farre off, without any necessitie to seeke them. Touching the making of Calieuers, and great Ordnance, they said, that the Moores were men, and that they had wit and understanding as well as any of vs.

He sent to enquire whether the Turkes had good Artillery? The Ambassadour answered, that 60 their great Ordnance was as good as ours, but that wee were not one whit afraid of them, because wee fought for the faith of Iesus Christ, and they against the same. Then he demanded who had taught the Turkes to make great Ordnance? Wee answered him as before, to wit, that the Turkes were men, and had understanding and capacitie of men in all perfection, sauing in the Faith. Then hee sent to know, whether there were any in our company that could play at Rapier and Dagger, for that he would gladly see them play. The Ambassadour appointed George de Bren and another tall fellow to play, which both did very well, and performed as much as was to bee expected, of men exercised and trained vp in Armes, and the Prete might very well behold them from behind the Curtaines, and tooke great pleasure at them, as we were informed.

Playing, singing and dancing.

When they had done, the Ambassadour sent to Prete Ianni, beseeching him to giue him audience, and to vnderstand the message which the Grand Captaine of the King of Portugall had sent vnto him, and that he would dispatch him, that he might returne to their Fleet against the time of their arriual, and not to put him to any more expenses without profit. An answer was returned, that wee were but newly come thither, and had not seene one third part of his Lands and Dominions, and that we should take our pleasures: For assoone as the Grand Captaine should come to Maczua, he would send to speake with him, and then we should depart, and if the said Captaine would build a Fortresse in Maczua, or in Suachen, or in Zeila, that hee would see the same forth-with furnished all things necessary. And because the Turkes are many and we few, when such a Fortresse were builded with on the Red Sea, wee might very well finde out a way whereby wee might passe to Ierusalem, and the Holy Land with an Armie. The Ambassadour answered, that all theses were the very things which the King of Portugall desired, and that still hee besought him to giue him Audience, and if hee were minded not to giue him audience, that hee might send him to the Grand Captaines Letters, and all the whole Message in writing, which he sent him to deliuer by word mouth. He tooke order that all things should be interpreted and written in the Abissin Tongue, and sent vnto him: which the Ambassadour did, requesting him instantly to giue him his dispatch. After this, the Prete Ianni sent him word, that Seeing hee had brought him a paire of Organes, he should send him one to play thereon, and to sing, and so hee did. Then hee desired that we should dance before him after our manner. When the Dance was done, wee signified vnto him that we were Christians, & prayed him to giue vs leaue to sing Masse after our custome, according to the Church of Rome. Suddenly we receiued an Answer, that He knew well that we were Christians, and that since the Moores which were wicked and trecherous had their Prayers after their manner; wherefore should not we haue the same after ours? And that hee would send vs all things necessarie thereunto. Assoone as wee were come to our Lodging, they brought vs three hundred great Loaves of Bread, and twentie foure Iarres of Wine, and the Bearer told vs, that there were hirtie Iarres appointed for vs, but that the Porters on the way had broken sixe of them.

¶ XII.

Of the Questions moued to the Ambassadour, by the appointment of PRETE IANNI, at seuerall times by Interlocutors, and lastly, in presence: wherein many points of their Religion are opened.

76.  He Sunday following many Questions came vnto our Tent from Prete Ianni, to the Ambassadour, and all of them were concerning the Armour which hee vnderstood, that the King of Portugall had sent him, and whether it should bee sent him out of India. The Ambassadour said, that the Armour and all things else which the King had sent him, should come the yeare following, and that the Grand Captaine would either send them or bring them himselfe, and so hee sent him word, and wrote him his Letters. Then he willed our men to shoot with their Calieuers, within the great hedge, and that certaine of his people should shoot also, and whether any of vs could make Gun-powder? It was told him, that there was none that could make the same, but that the Grand Captaine would send men with their Instruments to make Salt-peeter, and that hee would bring Brimstone with him in his shippes. Hee said that Brimstone might bee found in his Kingdome, so that there were Masters to make Salt-peeter, and that his Armies wanted nothing else, but the vse of Artillerie, and men to teach them to make the same, because hee was able to bring vnto the field an infinite number of Harquebusses, wherewith hee might subdue all the Moorish Kings about him.

And to this purpose a certaine Genoues which liued in the Court, told me, that hee had considered, that more Salt-peeter might be made in these Kingdomes, then in any other place of the World, by reason of the infinite number of Cattell which were there, and that heere bee also Mountaines that yeeld Brimstone. He sent vs word afterward, that he would haue vs shew him how we did put on those white Armours, which the Grand Captaine had sent him. Our men forth-with armed one of the company, where he might well see him. Then he sent for the Swords and Curasses, which the Ambassador and his company had brought, that hee might view them.

Sight of the Host.

77. On Munday at Euening, he sent for me, Francis Alvarez, to bring the Hosts vnto him, which he desired to see. I brought him eleuen of them very well made, not in boxes or pixes, because I knew the great reuerence which they vse to their Hosts, which is one Cake onely. And these Hosts had a Crucifixe vpon them, and therefore I carryed them in a very faire Dish of of Porcellan couered with Taffata. I brought him the Surplice, the Chalice, the Altar-stone, the Ampull; and he viewed all, piece by piece, and willed me to open the Cloth wherein the Altar-stone was (which was sewed in a white Cloth) and so he did: which when hee had seene he willed to be couered. This stone on the vpper side was very smooth, square, and well made, and on the nether side was somewhat vneuen, according to the nature, and proportion of stones. He sent me word, that seeing in Portugall there were so good Masons, why had they not polished it on that side also; sayng, that the things which belonged vnto Gods Service, ought to be perfect and not imperfect.

The night being come, he sent for me that I should come to his Tent, and willed I should come in, and so I did. They set me in the midst thereof, which was all spread on the ground with exceeding fine Carpets. I stood foure yards distant from Prete Ianni, which sat behind those Curtaines: he commanded me to apparell my selfe, as if I should say Masse, which I did. When I was apparellled, he caused me to be asked, Who gaue vs that apparell, whether they were the Apostles, or some other Saints? I answered him, that the Church had taken it out of the Passion of Christ. He willed me to tell him what euery one of those pieces signified; and so I beganne with euery part, to shew him what they signified, according to the Passion of our Lord. And when I came to the Manipulum, I told him, that it was a little Cord, wherewith they bound the hands of Iesus Christ. Then comming to the Stole, I told him, that that signified the great Cord, which they cast about his necke to lead him this way and that way, and that the Planet signified the apparell which they put vpon him, for to mocke him * withall; Which when I had ended, he said againe with a very loud voyce, that we were true Christians, because we knew the Passion of Christ so perfectly. And whereas I had said, that the Church had taken this out of the Passion of Christ, he demanded, which was that Church? Because we held two head Churches in Christendome, the first of Constantinople in Greece, and the second of Rome in France. * I answered him, there was but one Church: and though it were granted, that Constantinople was the head in the beginning, yet it ceased now to be, because the Head of the Church ^b is there where Saint Peter was; because Iesus Christ said; Thou art Peter, and vpon this Rocke I will build my Church. And when S. Peter was at Antiochia, the Church was there, because the Head was there, and when hee came to Rome hee abode still there, and there the Head shall alwayes bee: and this Church ruled by the Holy Ghost hath ordained things necessary to say Masse. Moreouer, I proued this Church vnto him, telling him, that in the Articles of our Faith, which the Apostles made, the Apostle Simon ^c saith: I beleene in a the holy Catholike Church. But in the great Creed which was made in the Nicene Councell by three hundred and eightene Bishops, against the Heresie of Arrius, they say: I beleene in one Catholike and Apostolike Church, and this is the holy Roman Church, wherein Saint Peter sat, vpon whom God founded his Church, as he saith. And Saint Paul, a chosen Vessel and Doctor of the Gentiles, calleth it Catholike and Apostolike, ^e because in it are all the Apostolike powers, which God gaue to Saint Peter, and to all the rest of the Apostles of binding and loosing. They answered mee, that I gaue a good reason for the Church of Rome; but what could I say for the Church of Constantinople, which belonged to Saint Marke, and for the Church of Greece, which belonged to Saint Iohn the Patriarke of Alexandria? Hereunto I answered them, that their reason strengthened mine, because Saint Peter was Saint Markes Master, and he sent him into those parts, and so that neither Marke nor Iohn ^f could plant any Churches, but onely in the name of him which had sent them, which Churches were members of the Head, which sent those Preachers, to which Head all Authorities were giuen. And many yeares after, when Saint Ierome, and many other holy men had separated themselves, they ordained Monasteries of austere and holy life, wherein they might serue God, and that the said Monasteries could not be established without the Authoritie of the Apostolike Church, which is that of Rome; and how can they make Churches in preiudice of the chiefe Head, if they were not builded, and made by our Lord Iesus Christ? They yeilded hereunto, and the Interpreter said that Prete Ianni rooke exceeding great pleasure hereat.

Then they asked me whether in Portugall, the Priests were married? I told them, no. They demanded, whether we held the Councell of Pope Leo ^g which was made at Nice? I told them, yea, and that I had already declared, that the great Creed was made there. They asked me againe, how many Bishops were then with the Pope? I answered, that I had already told them, that there were three hundred and eightene. They replied againe vnto mee, that it was ordained in this Councell, that Priests might marrie, and if this Councell were sworne and confirmed, wherefore were they not married? I told them that I knew nothing else of that Councell, but that the Creed was made there, and that our Lady might be called the Mother of God.

Afterward, they told me many other things which there were ordained and sworne, which Pope Leo brake, and prayed me to tell them what they were: I answered them, that I knew them not, but that in mine opinion if he had broken any of them, they might be some of those, which concerned Heresie, which at that time was very great, but that he had approued things necessarie and profitable, and that otherwise he should not have beene allowed, and canonized for a Saint as he is. Againe, he asked me concerning the Marriage of Priests, inquiring of me, whether the Apostles were married? I told him, that I neuer had read in any Booke, that the Apostles had Wives; after that, they went in company with Iesus, and although Saint Peter had a Daughter, yet he had her by his wife, before he was an Apostle, and that Saint Iohn the Euangelist was a Virgine: and that I had read, that after the death of Christ, the Apostles preached constantly the Faith in him, and doubted not to dye for the same: And that the Church of Rome, which is the true Church, hath ordained and confirmed, that after the imitation of the Apostles, no Priest should haue a wife, to the end they should bee more cleane, and more pure in their consciences, and should not bee busied all their time in bringing up their children, and providing for their living. Hereunto answer was returned me, that their Bookes com- 10

manded, * that they should be married, and that Saint Peter said euen so. They caused me to sing Gloria in excelsis, and certaine Verses of the Creede. At this conference, an Interpreter stood continually, and hard by him the Frier, which had conducted vs in our way. This Frier had beene sometimes in Italy, and vnderstood a little Latine. The Prete Ianni caused him to be asked, whether he vnderstood that which I spake? He answered him, yea, and that I had said, Gloria in excelsis, and the Creed, as they say it.

78. The night that I stayed so long with the Prete, before morning, the Ambassadour was robbed in the Tent where wee lodged, and they stole away two Cloakes of cloath, two rich Hats, seuen fine Shirts, &c. In the morning, the Ambassadour willed me and the Secretary to go to the Tent of Prete, to complaine and craue Iustice for this robbery, and so I did. But because 20 the Ambassadour had taken two Theeues, therefore while we were before the Tent of the Prete, a Woman came crying and crauing Iustice, and said; That the Ambassadour and his Company, the last night, by meanes of an Arabian, that knew the language of the Countrey, had taken away her Daughter by force, and led her to their Tent, of whom they had had their pleasure. And because her Sonne complained for the forcing of his Sister, they had taken him with the Arabian, which had deceiued the Maid, and laid to their charge that they were robbed. When they had heard vs and this woman, they made vs both all one answer, that is, that Iustice should be done, and so they dismissed vs. The same day, the Frier which was with me before the Prete, the night past, came with a rich Tent, but halfe worne, saying; That the Prete had sent vs it to say Masse in, and that immediatly it should be set vp, because the next day was the Feast of the 30 Angell Raphael, and that we should say Masse in it euery day, and pray to God for him. This Tent was Embroidered, and of Veluet of Mecca, lined within with very fine Cloath of Chant. They told me, that foure yeares before the Prete had wonne it in the warre, which he made against the King of Adel, who was a Moore, and Lord of Zeila, and Barbora: and the Prete sent vs word, that we should hallow the same before wee said Masse in it, because of the sinnes committed therein by the Moores. The same night it was presently set vp, and on the morrow, we said Masse therein, and all the Franks which were in the Court, for fortie yeares space, came thither to heare it, as also many people of the Countrey.

79. The eight of Nouember, the Prete sent for vs, and forthwith we repaired thither, the Ambassadour would needs carrie the Chests and bagges of Pepper, which hee had promised him. 40 When we were come vnto the entry of the first hedge, they held vs with certaine friuolous questions, concerning the Negroes which we had taken, for the goods which they had stolne from vs: and the demands continued so long, that in the meane while they sent to loose the said Negroes, without any conclusion or remedy for the theft, and the Prete sent vs three hundred Loaves, and thirtie Iarres of Wine, and certaine victuals of flesh from his owne Table, and so we returned to our Tent. They sent another time for vs, and when we were come, we stood a great while vpon certaine questions, why we tooke not our way from the Sea coast, toward the Kingdome of Dancute, which is farre the neerer way: and seeing we were Seruants to the King of Portugall, why wee had not Crosses marked in our flesh vpon our shoulder, because such is their custome, that all the Seruants of the Prete haue a crosse marked vpon their right shoulders? 50 They asked farther: seeing we had giuen away our Pepper, wherewith we would buy our Victuals for our iourney, &c.

80 The twelfth of Nouember, the Prete sent vs five very great and goodly Horses to our Tent, praying the Ambassadour to come with foure others of his company vpon the said Horses, to skirmish before his Tent: and it was very late, and the Ambassadour was not very well pleased that it was so late and darke: but streight-way there were so many Torches lighted, that it was as light as day. And here they skirmished in such sort, that they delighted the Prete very much, which skirmish being ended, wee returned to our Tent; whither suddenly the Prete sent vs three Iarres of Wine, much better then any he had sent vs before. The next day, he sent to the Ambassadour a Cup of Siluer, very curiously gilt, and made after our manner, as 60 well in the foot, as in the Bowle. On the foote were the Apostles grauen, standing vpright, and in the Bowle were certaine Latine letters, containing these words: Hic est calix noui Testamenti: A cloath of Gold for the Altar of our Church, and a Bason and Ewer made of black-wood, with red and white veines, as faire as euer we saw, to powre water vpon our hands, and sent sent vs word, that we should send him all our names in writing. They were suddenly carried him: he sent backe to know, what Roderigo signified, and what Lima signified, and likewise what was the signification of all the other names. The cause of this demand was, because in this Countrey they neuer giue any proper name, which hath not some signification. The next morning, in the Tent of the Ambassadour, there was another theft committed; for while George de Breu was a sleepe, he had a Cloake stolne that cost him twentie duckats, and from vs also were stolne certaine bagges of stuffe, neither vse they any diligence to cause these things to be restored vnto vs, becaule (as wee haue said) there is a Captaine of the Theeues, which for the setting of the Prete his Tents, hath no other reward, but such things as they steale. This day the Prete sent vs a Saddle for a Horse, wholly beset with stones of Cornallin, (this Saddle, besides that it was very heauy, was also very badly made) saying, That the Ambassadour should ride thereon.

Theeuery.

Theeuery.

81. The Saturday following, the Prete commanded all the Lords and great men of his Court, to goe and heare our Masse, which they also did the Sunday following; but there were farre more on the Saturday; for besides our Masse, we baptized also: and as farre as we could gather by their gestures, and as the Frankes told vs which we found in this Countrey and the Interpreters which were with vs, they marueiled much, and greatly praised our seruice; saying, That they could not speake against it, but onely because we gaue not the Communion to all those that were present at the same, and likewise to those which were baptized. The eighteenth of the said moneth, the Prete sent for me, and moued many questions vnto me, and among others, how many Prophets had prophesied of the comming of Christ. I answered him, that in my iudgement all of them had spoken of the same, to wit; one of his comming, another of his Incarnation, another of his Passion and Resurrection; all which concerned Christ. Likewise, how many bookes Saint Paul had made? I answered him, That it was one Booke onely, diuided into many parts, that is to say, Into many Epistles. Hee asked me likewise, how many Bookes the Euangelists had made? And I made him the same answer. Also, he asked, whither we had a Booke diuided into eight parts, which all the Apostles, being gathered together at Ierusalem, had written, which they call Manda and Abetilis? I answered, that I neuer had heard of any such Booke, and that it was not to be found amongst vs. Hee said, That they obserued all the Commandements written therein.

A strange Booke fastened red vpon all the Apostles.

Admitted to the sight of the Prete.The habite and stature of Prete Ianni.

82. On a Tuesday, we were sent for vnto the Prete, and it was the nineteenth of Nouember, and being come to the first gate or entry, we stayed a great while, the weather being verie cold, and the night well spent. Then we entred with the like pauses and stayes, as we had vsed twice before, and there was a farre greater assembly then before. And the greatest part had their weapons. There were also a great number of Candles and Torches light before the gates, so that it seemed as light as day, neither made they vs to waite any long while, but that the Ambassadour and nine of vs Portugals went suddenly in, euen hard vnto the first Curtaines: which when we had passed, we found others farre richer, and those also we passed, where wee found certaine rich and great Thrones, couered ouer with rich Tapistry. Before these Thrones, hung other Curtaines of farre greater riches, which they opened on both sides, wee standing neere vnto them. And heere we saw the Prete Ianni sitting vpon a skaffold, very richly adorned with sixe steps to ascend thereunto. He had vpon his head an high Crowne of Gold and Siluer, that is to say; One piece of Gold, and another piece of Siluer, and a Crosse of Siluer in his hand. His face was couered with a piece of Blew Taffata, which was to bee mooued vp and downe, so that sometimes all his face was seene, and sometimes all couered. On his right hand stood a Page, cloathed in Silke, with a Crosse of Siluer in his hand, whereon certaine Pictures were engrauen, standing vpright, which from the place where we stood, we could not perfectly discern: but afterward I had this Crosse in my hand, and saw those Images. The Prete was apparelled with a rich garment, Embroydered with Gold, and his Shirt was of Silke, with wide sleeues, which were like vnto a Surplice. Before him downeward, hee was girded with a rich cloath of Silke and Gold, like the Rochet of a Bishop spread abroad, and he sate in Maiestie, after the manner that they paint God the Father vpon the wals. Besides the Page which held the Crosse, there stood on each side another Page in like apparell, each of them holding a naked sword in their hands.

In his age, colour, and stature, he seemeth to be young. Hee is not very blacke, but of the colour of a Chest-nut, or of ruddy Apples, which are not very Tawny, and sheweth a great grace in his colour and countenance, and is of a meane stature, and is said to be three and twentie yeares old, and so he seemeth to be. Hee hath a round visage, great eyes, an Hawkes nose, and his beard began to bud. In his presence and pompe, he seemeth to be a great Lord, as in verie deed he is. We stood the space of two speares length from him: questions and answers passed too and fro, and all by the Cabeata. On euery side of this Throne, stood foure Pages in rich array, euery one holding a burning Torch in his hand. When these questions and answers were ended, the Ambassadour deliuered the Grand Captaines Letters to the Cabeata, which were translated into the Abyssin tongue, and he presented them to the Prete, who read them very readily, dily, and when he had read them, he said: As these be the Letters of the Grand Captaine, so would to God they had beene the Letters of the King of Portugall his Father; howbeit, that these Letters were most welcome vnto him, and that he gaue God most hearty thanks, for hauing granted that great gift vnto him, to behold that which his Ancestors had neuer seene, neither did he thinke he should haue seene himselfe, and that his desires should be fully accomplished, if the King of Portugall would build Fortresses vpon the Ile of Maczua, and in the Towne of Suachen; because he doubted greatly, that the Turkes our enemies would fortifie in them, which if it came to passe, they would greatly disturbe both him, and vs Portugals: and for this purpose he would giue vs all things necessarie, as well people to worke, as Gold and Victuals: and to be short, whatsoever wee should stand in need of: And that in his opinion, besides the building of the said Forts, it was needfull to take the Citie of Zeila, and to build a Fort in the same, because it is a place which aboundeth with all kind of Victuals: and hauing taken this Citie, they might make sure worke, that no Victuals should passe to the Cities of Aden, Zidem, Mecca, and into all Arabia; and vnto Toro and Suez: which Townes being deprived of these Victuals, should be in a manner vndone, seeing they cannot haue Victuals but onely from these parts: that he would binde himselfe to finde all kind of Victuals, Gold and People, to defray all this charge, and for our Fleece: And on condition, that some meanes might be found to open a way, whereby hee might ioyne himselfe with Christian Princes, he would spare nothing that he had in the world. And in this discourse of taking these Townes, and making of these Forts, we spent a great time with exceeding great delight of the Prete.

83. The next day, being the twentieth of Nouember, I was called for by the Prete, and among others, he moued these questions; that I should declare vnto him the liues of Saint Ierome, and Saint Dominicke, and Saint Francis, and of what Countrey they were, and wherefore in the Letters of the Grand Captaine mention was made, that the King of Portugall had builded Churches vnto these Saints, in the Townes which he had taken in the Kingdomes of Congo, Benin, and of the Indies. I answered, that Saint Ierome was borne in Sclauonia, and Saint Dominicke in Spaine, and gaue him large information of their orders, referring my selfe to the Booke which I had of their liues. Suddainly there came an answer, that I should shew him the liues of these Saints, seeing that I said that I had them. After this, they came with another question, whether wee did all things that the Pope commanded vs? I said, yea; for so wee were bound by the Article of our holy Faith, which confessed One holy and Catholike Church. Hereupon they answered me, that if the Pope would command them any thing which the Apostles had not written, they would not doe it: and likewise if their Abuna or Patriarke would commaund them any such thing, they would burne such a Commandement. After this, came another question, Why there are not so many bodies of Saints in Ethiopia, as there be in Italy, Germany, and France? I answered him, That in those Prouinces many Emperours had raigned, whose Ministers being Pagans, were very cruell, and that they which were conuerted to the Faith of Christ, were so constant in the same, that they chuse rather to dye for it, then to worship Idols, and that therefore there were so many Martyrs and Virgins. Touching this point an answer was returned, that I said the truth, which he greatly delighted to heare so plainly deliuered, and asked whether we knew, How long it was since Ethiopia receiued the Christian Faith? I sent him word, that I thought, that within a short time after the death of Christ, this land was conuerted by the Eunuch of the Queene Candaces, which was baptized by the Apostle Saint Philip. An answer was sent me, that by this Eunuch there was no more conuerted but the Country of Tigray, which is in Ethiopia, and that the rest was conuerted by force of Armes; as also he proceedeth in daily conuerting of diuers Kingdomes by the said force of Armes, and that the first conuersion of the Queene Candaces, was ten yeares after the death of Christ, and that from that time vnto this present, it had beene conuerted by Christians, &c.

84. The next day, the Prete sent for my Booke, which is called, Flos Sanctorum, saying; That I should shew them the liues of the said Saints: I sent him my Booke, which presently they sent me backe againe by two Friars, saying, That the Prete willed them to write the name of euery Saint, in the Abissin tongue, and to place the same vpon euery figure. The next day, the said Friars were with their Booke to translate these liues. I durst not go to speake with the Prete, vnlesse I carried with me the Booke of the Kalender, because they asked me the day of euery Saint, and would needs haue me tell it them immediatly. On Saint Katherines day, being Sunday, the Prete sent certaine Canons and Priests, which (a Venetian Painter, called Nicholas Brancalon, which had liued aboue fortie yeares in this Countrey, and vnderstood the Abissin tongue, was their Interpreter) and that euery thing was excellently well handled, saying, That one alone said Masse, and that they gaue not the Communion to all the standers by.

This very day being Sunday, when wee were gone to bed, the Prete sent for vs, and being come vnto the first Curtaines, he caused vs all to put on our best apparell, and to come into the presence of the Prete, who sate vpon his Throne in the very same sort that he sate before. And here he talked with vs of many matters, and among other things, that the Franks which were in his Court might depart this Realme, when it pleased them, and the Ambassadour also with his Company, and that one Franke should stay behind, called Nicholas Muzza, by whom hee would send his Letters, which were to be made in Gold, and that therefore he could not write so soone.

85. He flue and twentieth of the said moneth of Nouember, the Prete remoued in this order. He mounted on horse-backe with two Pages onely, and passed before our Tent, skirmishing and managing of his horse. And suddenly a brute went through the Campe, that the Negus was departed. And every man hastened to follow after as fast as they could. He caused fiftie Mules to bee deliuered vs, thirtie fine to carrie our Meale and Wine, and fiftene to carrie our other Stuffe, with certaine slaues, and we were recommended to a certaine Lord, called Aiaz Raphael. Aiaz is the title of his Lordship, and Raphael his name, who gaue vs euery day an Oxe. Wee departed, and on the Wednesday came vnto the Court, and lodged in a great open field vpon a Riuer side: Est-soones, there came a very honorable Frier to visit vs, which is the chiefe of the Kings Secretaries, and a great Diuine, and also the Nabret of the Friars of Chaxumo, and said, that hee came to visit vs on the behalfe of his Lord.

86. The second of December, Lazarus de Andrada, our Portugall Painter, being neere the Kings Tent, was asked whether he would wrastle; and hee wrastled, misdoubting no danger at all: and at the first bowt his legge was broken, he brake another Portugals arme. This Wrastler of the Prete, was called Gabmariam, which signifieth, The Seruant of Mary, and was a Moore, and is broad-shouldred, and a strong fellow, and worketh cunning with his hand in Silke and Gold. This day came newes from his Grand Betudete, which was in Warre against a King of the Moores, that he had vanquished him; and sent much Gold and slaues, and the heads of certaine great men which he had slaine.

30 At this time one Master Peter Cordiero a Genoues, had a Sonne borne of his Wife, which was a Negro, who requested me to baptize him within eight dayes, because they baptize not their male children before the end of fortie dayes. I baptized this childe the tenth of December, and thither repayed great store of people, and those of the most honourable and principall of the Court.

Baptizing of a childe.

87. Departing from this Countrey, we tooke our iourney by that way, by which wee came vnto the Court. And so great was the throng of people which trauelled on all sides, that for ten or twelue miles space, the people were so neere one another, that it seemed to bee the Procession on Corpus Christi day: and scarcely the tenth part are well apparelled. The rest are all clad in skinnies and other base apparell, and carrie all their riches with them, which are onely certaine pots to make Wine in, and Dishes to drinke in. And if they make no long iourney, these base people, carrie their poore Cottages all whole and couered as they are, and if they goe any long iourney: they carrie nought but the rafts onely, which are certaine small Poles; and the rich men cause their Tents to be carryed with them, which are very good and of great price. I speake not of the great Gentlemen and Lords; for with euery one of them is mooued as it were a Citie or a good Towne, as namely, their Tents carryed partly vpon slaues backes, and partly vpon Mules. We Portugals, and the Franks haue oftentimes considered the number of these Mules, and take them to be aboue fiftie thousand. The Horses are but few, for albeit there are very faire ones, yet because they know not how to shooe them, they quickly marre their feet: and if the Prete trauell any long iourney, all the Townes are full of furbated Horses, which are faine to follow softly after. The Mules of carriage are innumerable, and they ride as well on Male as Female Mules. There are great store of Hacknies which carrie burthens, and yet their feet are not furbated as the Horses be. There are many He-asses more seruiceable then Hacknies. They make many Oxen also to carrie burthens, and in the plaine and Champaigne Countries, the Camels carrie burthens.

Multitude of people.

Very poore. About 50000. Mule in the traine of Prete Ianni. Few good horses because they cannot shooe them.

88. The Prete seldome trauelleth in the high way, neither doth any man know whether hee goeth; but the Altar-stones, that is, their Churches, which are thirteene doe keepe the high way, although the Prete goe out of the way, and all the people commeth after in the way, vntill they find a white Tent set vp, and straite way euery man taketh vp his lodging in his place, and many times the Prete comes not to this Tent, but lyeth in Monasteries and other Religious Aoufes. In this Tent which is erected, they vse continually to sing and play vpon Instruments, as though the Prete were there in person, but not so cunningly as when he is there present. The Altar-stones are carryed with great reuerence, and alwayes by Priests that say Masse, and there be foure of them which carrie the same on their shoulders vpon a square Table, and foure Priests come behind to change courses in carrying of the same. They are couered with rich Embroyded red Cloth and cloth of Silke, and two Clerkes goe before with a Centor and a Crosse, and another ther goeth ringing with a small Bell, and euery man and woman that heareth the same, goeth out of the way: and if hee bee on horse-backe hee strait-way lighteth, and giueth place, that the Church may passe. Likewise there alwayes goe with the Court foure Lions, each of them led with two Chaines, one before and another behind, and euery bodie maketh roome for them. We wayted on the Court till the twentieth of December, and came vnto those terrible Mountaines where the gates are, wherby we passed when we came first into the Countrey, and there they lodged vs.

The cause
why Prete Janni sheweth himselfe to the people thrice a yeare.

After that the Tents of the Prete were erected, strait-way they beganne to make a very high Scaffold neere one of his Tents, because the Prete would shew himselfe to his people on Christmas day. And commonly he sheweth himselfe thrice a yeare, that is to say, on Christmas day, 10 on Easter day, and on Holy Rood day in September. And the cause why he thus sheweth himselfe thrice, is, because his Grand-father, whose name was Alexander, was kept three yeares secret after his death by his Seruants, who gouerned the Countrey all the meane-while: for vntill that time, none of the people might see their King, neither was he seene of any, but a few of his Seruants. And at the request of the people, the Father of this David shewed himselfe these three dayes, and this King also doth the like: They also say, that when he goeth to warre, he alwayes goeth open, that all men may see him, and also when he trauelleth.

89. On Christmas Euening at after-noon, the Prete called for me, and asked mee what Feast kept the day next following? I sent him word, wee kept the Feast of the Natiuitie of Christ. He asked me, what Solemnitie we vsed? I answered, that we kept our vsuall manner, and the solemnitie of three Masses. Hee said, that they did all things like vnto vs, saue that they vsed 20 but one Masse, and willed me to stay one of those three Masses which I would my selfe. Six of vs went and we prolonged the Mattins with Lessons, Hymnes, Psalmes and Prophecies, and searched all such things as wee could best sing and thunder out: and the Prete neuer departed from the gate of his Tent, which was as I haue said, neere vnto our Church: and two Pages neuer ceased to goe and come, and to inquire what it was the which we sung, specially when they perceiued vs to change the tune of the Psalmes, Hymnes, and Responsories. When this was done, and one man confessed, it began to be broad day, and I sent them word, that I would say Masse, and strait way we began a Procession, with a Crosse carryed vp before vs, and an Image of our Lady, and two Torches about the Crosse: and wee beganne the Procession neere the Circle 30 within our Tent. Suddenly the Prete sent vnto vs to make our Procession about his Tents, and sent vs foure hundred great Candles of white Waxe, to carry them lighted before vs, and would haue vs beginne our Procession with our Portugals, and the white people, and that his owne people should follow after. When the Procession was ended, which reached a great Circuit, wee began our Asperges, and I went to giue Holy Water to Prete Ianni, which I might easily sling from our Church, because he was neere vnto vs. There were with him, as I was informed, the Queene his Wife, Queene Helena his Mother, and the Cabeata, with other his familiar friends. In the Tent of our Church stood all the great Nobles and Lords of the Court, which could stand in the roome, and the rest stood without: and from our Altar vnto the Prete his Tent all the way was open, because he desired to see the whole Seruice of the Masse. 40

90. The Procession, Masse, and Communion being ended, the Ambassadors and all the rest of his company were permitted to goe home vnto their Dinner, and I onely with mine Interpreter was stayed behind. Strait way that old Father, the Kings Schoole-master came vnto mee, and said, that the Prete Ianni greatly commended our Seruice, but desired to know what reason we had to suffer the Lay-people to enter into the Church, as well as the Clergie, and that hee was informed, that women also came into the Church. I answered him that the Church of God was not shut vp against any Christian, and that if Christ stood alwayes with open armes to receiue all that come vnto him into his glory in Paradise, why should not wee receiue them into the Church, which is the way to passe into Paradise: and as touching women, although in old time they entred not into Sancta Sanctorum, yet the merits of our Lady were such and so 50 great, that they were sufficient to deserue, that the feminine sexe might enter into the House of God.

They sent me word, that they had fourescore and one Bookes of the old and new Testament, and would know whether we had any more, or no: I sent them word, that wee had about ten times fourescore and one Bookes, which were drawne out of the aforesaid Workes, with many and more perfect Expositions. They told mee that they knew well, that wee had more Bookes then they, and therefore he desired me to tell him the names of those which they had not. And so they held me with Questions and Answeres vntill night, with Messengers that ceased not to trot vp and downe. I stood on my feet leaning vpon a staffe, and Questions came vnto mee not onely from the Prete Ianni, but also from his Wife and from his Mother Queene Helena: and I 60 answered them as God assisted me. At length, I became so wearie and hungry, that I could not stand any longer vpon my legs, and they gaue mee leaue to depart. I was no sooner gone away, but a Page came running after me, and said, that the Prete requested mee very instantly to giue him the Canopie that was ouer my head, prayng me to pardon him, that he had stayed me so long long without meat, and requested me so soone as I had dined, to returne vnto him, because he desired to know other things of me. After I was come to our Tents, and had scarce dined, there came a message vnto mee to pray mee to returne, and so I was constrained to goe thither, and brought them with me which had sung Masse, and there we sung a Compleu, as well as we could. And the Prete with the Queene continually shewed exceeding great attentiuenesse.

The Service being ended, he commanded the Tent of the Church to be taken downe, because he meant to depart that night to passe those bad passages, which are on these mightie high Mountaines whereof we haue spoken before. and so hee did: for at mid-night wee heard a great noyle of Horses and Mules, and euery body saying, The Negus marcheth. And forthwith wee put our selues in order, and followed him. And when we came to the first passage, we were constrained with Lances to make our way behind and before vs, so great was the furie and the throng, and the multitude of people which pressed vs behind. Wee traueled till wee ouer-tooke the Kings Tents, which were pitched in the midst of those great Trenches, which are betweene the Rivers before mentioned: heere wee rested vntill mid-night, and till the Prete beganne againe to march, and we with him: and before morning, we were gotten out of those ill passages. And we heard afterward, that the same night in those passages there perished very many men, women, Asses, Mules, and laden Oxen: and in this second passage, called Aquasaghi, as wee haue said before, it was told mee that a great Lady being vpon a Mule, beeing led by two of her Seruants, all of them being tyed together, fell downe from that great heighth, and were torne in pieces before they came to the bottome: so terrible and fearefull are those Rockes and downefals, that it seemes they goe downe to Hell, to him that beholdeth them. This was our iourney without keeping holy the *Octau*e of Christmas, which in that Countrey is not obserued. I haue said before, that the Court stayed in other places fise or sixe dayes in remoouing, but at these passages they stayed three weekes, and the stufte of the Prete was about a moneth in passing, although they passed euery day.

91. The eight and twentieth of December, 1520. we drew neere vnto a Church which wee saw before, as we came into the Countrey, but we were not thereat, which is called S. Georges, vnder which they set vp the Pavilion of the Prete, and we lodged in our appointed place. The next day very early, the Prete sent to call vs, and signified vnto vs that wee should see the Church, which is great and all painted round about, the walls and paintings are very conuenient, where are many goodly Histories well set forth, and made in due proportions by a Venetian, called Nicholas Brancalon, of whom we spake before, and here his name is so put downe in writing, although in this Countrey they call him Marconius. The walls which are without the body of the Church, and meet vnder the couered circuit, which is like a Cloyster, were all couered from top to the bottome with whole pieces of Embroydered Cloth, of Veluets, and other rich Cloth of Silke. When we came into the gate of the open circuit, and were entring into the couered circuit, they caused the Clothes to be lifted vp, which were hanged ouer the principall gate, which seemed to bee couered ouer with plates, which at the first blush wee tooke to be of Gold, because they told vs so, but when we came neerer, wee perceiued, that they were but plates of Siluer, but gilt ouer, and it was laid so cunning as well vpon the gates, as in the Windowes, that it could not be mended.

The Cabeata, which is so great a Lord, was the man that went with vs and shewed vs euery thing. And the Prete also was present, but enuironed with his Curtaines: yet when we passed by him he might see vs and we him. Whereupon when he saw vs, hee could not containe himselfe, but needs he must send to know of vs, what we thought of that Church and of those paintings. We answered him, that they seemed vnto vs to bee things that belonged to a great Lord and King, which answer pleased him not a little. The rooffe or couering of this Church is framed vpon thirtie six Pillars of wood, which are very thicke, and as high as the Masts of Gallies, and couered all ouer with Wainscot, which are painted, like as all the wals round about.

After diuers fashions, hoping that I should haue bene dispatched, there were fetched out of the Church foure great and rich Canopies, which so soone as I saw them, I greatly wondred at although before I had seene many great and rich ones in India, which doe shadow those Kings, but none of that greatnesse and richnesse, whereat they reioyced that brought them, and ranne to tell it vnto the Prete, who suddenly sent for me vnto him, and standing in the gate of his Pavilion with the Frankes, which remayned in the Court, he willed them againe to be shewed vnto one in their presence, commanding me to view them well, and to tell him what I thought of them. I answered him, that they were exceeding faire, and that I neuer had seene in India, where many of the Kings vse them, neither fairer, nor richer. Then he commanded, that they should be set vp on the ground against the Sunne, so that they made a shadow like vnto a Tent, and willed them to tell me, that when he trauelled, and would rest himselfe and his wife together, he rested himselfe vnder the shadow of one of those Canopies, and tooke his repast, and slept vnder the same. These Canopies might well be of the bignesse of a great Cart-wheele, so that ten men might well stand vnder the shadow of one of them, & were couered all ouer with Silke. After all these Questions and Answeres, hee sent to know what hee desired most to drinke, whether Wine of Grapes or of Honey, or of Zauna, which is made of Barley: His traueilling was after this manner: he rode vncovered aloft, with a Crowne vpon his head, compassed with redde Curtaines, very long and high: onely behind him and on both sides, and he was in the midst. They which carryed the said Curtains were on the outside of the same, & bare the same aloft vpon small Speares. Within the said Curtaines goe six Pages, which they call Lagameneos, which signifieth, Pages of the head, because the Mule which the Prete rideth on, hath a very faire ornament about her bridle, which hath in the cheekes of the bridle, two Cordons of Silke with goodly Tassels, and one of these Cordons, one Page holdeth on one side, and another on the other side, which lead the Mule, as it were by the head: then follow two other Pages likewise, one on the one side, and another on the other side, which lay their hands on the necke of the Mule, and two follow after in the same manner with their hands vpon the buttockes, almost vpon the Crouper. Without the Curtaines and before the Prete March twentie of the principall Pages in very good array, and before the said Pages goe fixe Horses, very faire and richly furnished, each of them being led by foure men, very well apparelled, to wit; two by the head, & two behind, with their hands vpon the Crouper, in such sort as the Prete his Mule was led. And before these Horses goe fixe Mules, saddled and very well furnished, and euery one of them likewise haue foure men to lead them as the Horses were led. And before the said Mules, goe twentie principall Gentlemen riding vpon other Mules, with their fine Serges * about their bodies. And then wee Portugals went before the said Gentlemen, for this place was appointed vnto vs. Neither may any Footmen or Horsemen, either on horse-backe or vpon Mules approach neere him by a great distance, for there bee Curriers which alwayes runne before vpon horse-backe, and if their Horses be tyred, they light and take others, which cause the people to stand out of the way, so that there is no bodie to be seene in the way. The Betudetes march with their Guard a great distance out of the way, and one goeth on the one side, and another on the other, at the least a Calleeuer-shot distance off: and if the way be Champaigne, sometimes they goe a mile and an halfe off, according to the qualitie of the Countrey. And if the way bee rockie and strait, and so continue any long space, and that it bee necessary that euery man must passe that way, the said Betudetes diuide themselues a mile and an halfe asunder, and one goeth before, to wit, hee which is on the right hand, and hee on the left hand commeth behind, with each of which Officers may be about fixe thousand persons, and as I said before; with these men alwaies goe foure Lions chained with great Chaines, both before and behind. They march also which carrie the Churches and the Altar-stones, whereunto they doe great honour and reuerence. Another thing the Prete carryeth with him whither soeuer he goe, for hee neuer stirreth without it, which are one hundred Iarres of Wine of Honey, and as many of Wine of Raisins, euery one of which Iarres may containe fixe or seuen draughts of Wine, and they are as blacke as let, and are very smooth and finely made with a couer of Earth, and then stopped vp, and no man dare bee so hardie as to come neere or to take any of them without the Prete his licence. They carrie likewise one hundred Paniers painted ouer and closed, full of Wheaten bread, and these came after the Prete, not farre distant from him, and they carry them in a ranke, and they came one after another, that is to say, first a Jarre, and then a Panier, and behind them came fixe men which are as it were Stewards of the house. And when they are come to the Prete his Pauilion, they vnlade all these things, and carry them in, and afterward he sendeth some part thereof to whom he pleaseth.

Machan Cellacem.

93.  He first of January, 1521. we came vnto a great Church, which when wee came that way first, and passed neere the same, they would not suffer vs to see. The Church is called Machan Celacem, which signifieth, The Trinitie. Three miles before wee came at the Church, the Prete commanded eight Horses well furnished to be giuen vnto vs, wherewith we should ride before him skirmishing, managing and turning our Horses far better then they could, whereat he took great delight. When we were come within a mile of the Church, there came forth an infinite multitude of people to receiue vs, and there were so many Crosses, Priests and Friars of diuers Monasteries and Churches, that they could not be numbred, and to our iudgement they were about thirtie thousand. And we thought that the Friars came from farre Countries, because in this Kingdome of Amera, there were no Monasteries, because all the great Churches are the burials of their Kings. There were about two two hundred with Miters, which are made like vnto great and high hoods of Silke. And likewise sixtie foure Canopies of those great ones, which might well be told, because they carried them aloft aboue the people: but they were not so faire and rich, as those of the Church of Saint George. All these Canopies belonged vnto Churches, where Kings were buried, because at their death they leaue the same vnto them. This great multitude of people assembled, belonged partly to the Churches and Monasteries, and part of them were of the Countrey, which came to see the Prete, who rid all open, whom they neuer saw ride so before.

The Prete hauing lighted at the Church, and hauing made his Prayers, returned to his Paulion, and straight-way sent for me, and willed that the Ambassadour and his Company should goe to their lodging. Heere he demaunded of me, What I thought of this great meeting and entertainment, which was giuen vnto him by this great multitude, and whether the King of Portugall had any such great entertainment, and of so great number of people? And that this people were farre more then they seemed to be, because the most part of them were naked, and therefore appeared not to the beholders so many as they are, and that our people in France are well apparelled, and in order, and seeme to be many more then they be; and that I should goe rest me with the Ambassadour, whom I met vpon the way. Againe, hee sent me word, that this Church was newly built, and that there was neuer any Masse said in it, and that it was the Custome, that as many as entred thereinto, should giue some offering, and that the Ambassadour should giue his Weapons, and I should giue my Cap which I wore, and likewise each man should giue somewhat.

94. The day following, the Prete sent vs word, that we should come and see the foresaid Church, whither he was gone before. This Church is very great and high, and the Wals are of white stone, wrought with Iron Chizels, with very goodly worke, vpon which they lay no Transames, because they would not beare them, for the stones are not ioyned one with another, nor seamed together, but onely laid one vpon another, without any Ligaments or firme-nesse: and they seeme very faire, to a man that knoweth not how they are framed within. The chiefe gate is made all of plates, as the gate of the Church of Saint George is, and beween these platts are counterfeited stones, and Iewels set with very good Pearles, all very well set in.
Aboue the wall of the principall gate, are two Pictures of our Lady: very reuerendly, and well made, with two Angels, all drawne with Pensill. They say, that a certaine Frier drew them very liuely, and I my selfe was acquainted with that Frier. In this Church are three Iles built vpon sixe Columnes, and the said Columnes are built of pieces of Free-stone, laid one vpon another, and very well wrought: and the circuit without, and couered like a Cloyster, is built vpon sixe Columnes of Wood, as great as the Masts of Gallies, and very high, and vp-on the said Columnes, is Timber laid very flat, which maketh a very thicke Roofe; and doubtlesse, it is a wonderfull thing to thinke, how these people which are without any great wit, were able to set vp these Pillers of Wood which are so high. About the Church are sixteene Curtaines hanged, running which way so euer you will, and they are as deepe as the whole piece is, which are Embroydered Cloathes, very rich and stately, and euery Curtaine is of se-uenteene pieces fastned together.

95. The fourth of January, the Prete sent vs word, that wee should remooue our Tent, and our Church, and should cause it to bee carried a mile and an halfe from thence, where they had made a Poole like a Pond or Lake, full of Water, wherein they went to baptize themselves vp-on twelfth day, because this is their custome to baptize themselves euery yeere, on the same day that Christ was baptized. And so the next day being the Vigil, we went and saw a great circuit enclosed with an hedge in a very large field, and they sent to know, whether we would be baptized or no? I sent them word, that the manner of our Church was to baptize vs once only in our Infancy.

Prete Ianni v-seth to be baptized once a yeare: as also his subjects.

All that night an exceeding great number of Priests, ceased not to sing, vntill the morning ouer the said Lake, saying, that they blessed the said Lake. About midnight they beganne the baptisme, and they say (which I beleue also to be true) that the first which was baptized, was the Prete, and next vnto him the Patriarke, Abuna Marke, and the Queene the Prete his Wife.
And these three persons had cloathes about their priuities, but all the rest were starke naked, as they came into the world: And about the rising of the Sunne, when the baptisme was in the greatest heate, the Prete sent for me to come and see him, I went thither, and stayed there till three of the clock, to see how they were baptized, and they placed me at an end of the said Lake, ouer against the Prete, and they were baptized in this manner.

The Lake hath a great bottome, and it is plaine, and cut into the ground, very right downe and square, and boarded round about, and in the bottome with Plankes, and ouer those Plankes, it is couered with course Cotton-cloath, made like a Cerf-cloath. The Water was conueyed thither by a little Gutter, such as they vse to Water Gardens withall, and ranne into the Lake through a Pipe, at the mouth whereof hung a great Sacke, to straine the Water which ranne into the Lake. And at my comming thither, the Water ceased running, because it was already full of Holy Water, whereinto they had cast Orle. This Lake had on the one side five or sixe steppes, and ouer against them about sixe yards distant, was made a little enclosure of wood, wherein stood the Prete, which had a Curtaine of blue Sindall before him, being halfe slit in twaine, and through this slit he might see those that were baptized, for his face was turned toward the Lake: in which stood that old Father, the Schoole-master of the Prete, with whom I had conference on Christmas day at night. This old man was naked as hee came out of his Mothers wombe, and almost dead for cold, because that night was a great Frost, and hee stood in the water vp to the shoulders, for of that depth the Lake was where they entred, which were to be baptized, downe by the said steps starke naked with their backes toward the Prete, and when they went out, they shewed their fore-parts as well women as men. These people came neere to the said Schoole-master, and he laid his hand vpon their heads, and thrust them downe thrice vnder the water, saying, in his owne Language: I baptize thee in the name of the Father, of the Sonne, and of the Holy Ghost, crossing of them in stead of blessing. And if they were little children, they went not downe all the said steps, but the said Schoole-master came vnto them, and dipped them downe after the manner aforesaid. And as I haue said, I stood on the other side ouer against the Prete, so that when he saw their backes, I saw the fore-parts of those which were baptized.

This Poole or Lake, was compassed and couered with Tents of diuers colours, so well placed and ordered with such store of boughes of Orange-trees, Limons, and Citrons, that it seemed to be an exceeding faire Garden. The great Tilt that hung ouer the said Lake was very long, and all full of red and blue crosses of Silke, which gaue a great grace thereunto.

96. The next day after the baptisme, I went to visit the Abuna, whom till then I had neither spoken withall, nor seene, but onely at the Baptisme; beeing almost dead for cold, where I could not speake vnto him. He tooke exceeding pleasure at my visiting of him, and would not let mee kisse his hand, but rather would haue fallen downe vpon the ground to kisse my feet. And being set downe vpon a Couch, the beginning of his speech was, that he gaue most heartie thanks to God for our meeting together, and that hee conceiued exceeding great pleasure when those things were told him, which I had so often spoken vnto Prete Ianni, and especially concerning that Baptisme, in that I had vttered the truth so freely in his presence, wherein hee would not beleue the Abuna himselfe, because he alone was of that opinion, and that if he had one companion or two to helpe to backe him in telling of the truth, that hee would draw the Prete from many faults and errours, wherein he and all his people were plunged. And while we were talking of this matter, there came in a white Priest, the Sonne of a Gibete, that is to say, of a white man borne in this Countrey, and he asked me why we were not circumcised, seeing that Christ was circumcized? I answered him, that it was true, that Christ was circumcised, and that he would haue it so, because he would fulfill the Law which at that time was used, because hee would not be accused before the time for breaking of the Law, but that shortly after, hee commanded that Circumcision should cease. This Priest forth-with replied, that he was the Sonne of a Franke, and that his Father would not suffer him to be circumcized, and that when he came to the age of twentie yeares after the death of his Father, on an Euening going to bed vncircumcised, the next morning he found himselfe circumcised: and how might this come to passe, if God would not haue Circumcision? I answered him, that this was a notable deceit: for though it were granted that God had not forbid Circumcision, yet hee was not so worthy a person, that God would shew this Miracle vpon him, that is to say, of an imperfect man to make him perfect: and that if it were as he had said, that going to bed whole, he was found the next morning circumcized, it might be the Deuill that had done the same to doe him dishonour. The Abuna, and as many as were in the house, laughed exceedingly at this speech, and tooke great pleasure thereat: and this Priest afterward became an especiall friend to me and to all the Portingals, and came daily to heare my Masse.

After this, the Abuna caused Wine and Fruits of the Countrey to bee brought in, and would needs make vs a little Banquet, and sent vnto our Tents good store of Bread and Wine, and one Oxe. The eighth of Ianuary, the said Abuna, determined to giue Orders, and I went thither to see the manner which hee used in giuing of the same; which was in this wise: A white Tent was erected in a great Champaigne field, where were assembled betweene fise and sixe thousand persons to receiue Orders. Hither came the Abuna, riding vpon a Mule, and my selfe was in his company with an infinite number of others. And sitting on his Mules backe in the midst of that so great Assembly, hee made, as it were, a Sermon in the Arabian Tongue, and one of his Priests expounded it in the Abassin Language. I asked my Interpreter, what it was that the Abuna said: he told me that he said, that if any man there had two Wines or more, although any of them were dead, he should not become Priest, and if he did take Orders, he did curse and excommune him with the curse of God.

This speech being ended, hee sate him downe in a Chaire before the said Tent, and three Priests sate downe before him vpon the ground, euery man with his Booke, and certaine others which directed this businesse, caused all those which were to take Orders, to set downe on the ground vpon their heeles, and all of them stood in three very long rankes or allies, and euery ranke had one of those Priests, which held the Bookes and examined them shortly, so that some read reade not past two words: and after this man went another Priest, with a Bason full of a white tincture, and with a plate made like vnto Seales dipped in the said tincture, and with the same they made a marke vpon the bare of their right arme, which beeing done, they rose from that place, and went and laye downe in the midst of the fields vpon certaine Hillockes of Earth, where they that were examined must stand, and there were very few which went not ouer this. This Examination being ended, the Abuna went into his Tent and sate in a Chaire, and this Tent had two gates, through which they caused all the Examinates to passe, one after another, and as they were presented before the Abuna, comming in at the one gate strait-ways, he layed his hand vpon their heads, and said certaine words which I vnderstood not, and then passed out by the other gate: neither was there any one of them to whom this Ceremonie was not done.

Their manner of giuing Orders vnto Priests.

Then he tooke a Booke in his hand, and read a great while on the same, holding a little crosse of Iron in his hand, and made many signes of the Crosse therewith vpon the whole Companie. This ended, a Priest went out of the gate with a Booke and read, as it might bee, the Epistle or the Gospel, and strait-way the Abuna said a Masse, which continued no longer time, then a man might thrice say ouer the Psalme of Miserere mei Deus: and strait-way he ministred the Communion to all those Priests which were Massing Priests, and were in number two thousand three hundred fiftie sixe, for they make these Priests of the Masse by themselves, and the Clerkes by themselves another day. And the Abuna told mee, that the Clerkes were ordayned to the degree of Deacon, as Saint Stephen was. Yet I saw him make Clerkes and Priests altogether in one day, and that at oftentimes, because hee made them and gaue them Orders, very often, and alwayes in great numbers, because they come to him out of all the Kingdomes and Territories of the Prete, for there is none that can giue Orders but he. They are not registred nor haue any Letters of Testimonie or Certificate of their Orders. And because I haue spoken of the number of two thousand three hundred fiftie sixe, I could not haue knowne the same, vnlesse I had beene told it by him which had the charge to count them, and I thinke he told me true.

None but the Abuna can giue Orders.

97. The next day being the ninth of Januarie, the Prete sent for me; When I was come vnto him he said, that he vnderstood that I had beene to see his Priests consecrated, and asked mee what I thought of them. I answered, that I had seene two things, which though they had bin told me and confirmed by Oath, yet I would neuer haue beleueed them, to wit, the multitude of the Clergie, the Crosses and Miters which were at the receiuing of his Highnesse, and the entertainment which he made them. The second, was this so great and infinite number of Priests, which receiued Orders altogether, and that me thought that Ceremonie was very well performed; but that the dishonestie of the Priests wherein they came to take Orders, displeased mee not a little. Strait-way I was answered, that I needed not to maruell at any of these things: for as touching their meeting of him, there were no Priests that came thither, but onely those which belonged to the Churches of his Grand-father and Predecessor, which were builded in those parts, and that they bare those Miters, Canopies, and Crosses which were left vnto them: and that the Priests which receiued Orders were but a few, in comparison of the number that they were wont to be, for alwayes they are wont to make five or sixe thousand, and that now they were so few, because they knew not of the comming of the Abuna, and that I should tell him what dishonestie I had seene: which was contrarie to the Order of the Church. I answered, that it seemed to mee a very dishonest and shamefull thing, that the Priests which were to be admitted to the ministratiō of the Masse, and were to receiue the bodie of Christ, should come almost all naked, shewing their Priuities: and that Adam and Eue so soone as they sinned saw themselves naked, and when they were to appeare before God did hide themselves: and that these beeing to receiue the Sacrament, which is much more, are not ashamed to shew all their dishonestie, and that I had seene a Frier which was starke blind, which neuer had eyes, and another which was lame of his right hand, and foure or five which were lame of their legs, to haue receiued Orders of Priest-hood, which ought to haue beene sound, and to haue all their limmes sound and perfect. Suddenly hee sent me word againe, that he was highly pleased, that I had marked ouer every thing particularly to tell him my opinion, that afterward things might be amended, saying, that hee would take order for the Priests, that they should not goe naked, and that touching those which were lame, I should conferre with Aiaz Raphael, which was present at this giuing of Orders. This Aiaz Raphael, is that honourable Priest and great Lord, to whom wee were recommended when wee came first vnto the Court.

No Priest ought to bee blind, lame, or maymed in bodie.

Aiaz Raphael.

The tenth of Januarie, the Abuna made Clerkes. These are not examined, because they make them of all Ages, even children that are carryed in the armes and cannot speake, vntill they bee fiftene yeares old, whiles yet they haue no Wiues, but if they haue Wiues they cannot bee Clerkes: and those which take Orders to be Priests of the Masse, while they bee Clerkes, may take Wiues, and so become Priests: for if they become Priests before they take Wiues, afterward they may not marry. The men beare the children in their armes, and cannot speake nor goe, because the women may not come within the Church. Their crying seemeth to bee like the crying of so many yong Kids, because they are there without their Mothers, and are halfe starued for hunger: for this Ceremony is not ended vntill night, and they are enforced to continue without eating or sucking, because they must receiue the Communion. It is certainly knowne, that these little ones are not able to reade, and the great ones also can reade but little.

And they make them after this sort. The Abuna sitting in a Chaire, which is in a Tent placed in a Church, caused these Clerkes to passe along before, and hauing read a while in a Booke, he pulleth from each of their Temples a tuft of haire: then hee readeth a Booke, and causeth them to passe by a second time, and to touch the Keies wherewith they open the gate of the Tent, and they put a Cloath vpon their heads, and at euery one of these actions they must once passe by: and likewise another they put a blacke Earthen Dish in their hands, in stead of the Ampulle, because they haue no Ampullas to serue at the Masse, and at each of these Ceremonies they read a little while, which being ended, the Abuna saith Masse. And it is a fearefull thing to behold the danger which these little Infants suffer, which perforce they make to swallow downe the Communion, by powring water downe into their throats, as well because the Host is made of course Dough, as also by reason of their tender age, and the continuall mourning which they make.

In the end, the Abuna prayed me to goe and dine with him at his Tent, and heere hee desired me to tell him, what I thought of this Ceremony, whereat I was present all the while, and had seene euery thing particularly, and said that the Prete had sent him word to talke with mee concerning this Ceremony: I said, that his Ceremony liked me very well, But to admit Infants new borne vnto Orders, and great Lubbers without learning, me thought it vnseemely to thrust Asses into the house of God. He answered mee, That God had sent him hither to tell the truth, and that he did nothing, but as He was commaunded, and that the Prete had willed him to make all the Children Clerkes, and that they would learne in time to come, because he was now very old, and they wist not when they should haue another Abuna, seeing this Countrey heretofore had beene three and twentie yeares without an Abuna, and that not long since, they had sent two thousand ounces of Gold to Cairo, to haue an Abuna, and by reason of the Warres betweene the Soldan and the Turke, they had sent none, and yet they had detained the Gold, and that now God had caused me to come thither to tell them the truth, that this Countrey might speedily be provided of an Abuna, because hee was not of any long life. After this, I went many times to see these Ceremonies, of giuing Orders to these Priests and Clerkes, because euery day in a manner they receiued Orders, in great multitudes, which came thither daily, and they obserued not the Ember-weekes, nor the Lent. And if at any time there were any intermission of giuing these Orders, straight-way some would come vnto me, and take acquaintance of me, although I knew them not, beseeching mee for Gods sake, to pray the Abuna to giue them Orders, because they dyed for hunger while they waited there: and I befought him in the Euening, and straight-way he commaunded the Tent to bee set vp, to giue Orders the next day following. And certainly, I neuer requested him, but immediatly he did the same, for he bare me exceeding good will, and tooke me as if I had beene his owne Brother.

98. The cause why this Countrey continued three and twentie yeares without an Abuna, they say was this; That in the time of the great Grand-father of this present King, whose name was Ciriacus, the Father of Alexander, which was the Father of Nahu, the Father of this present Prete Ianni, the Abuna dyed: and the said Ciriacus stayed ten yeares, and would send for none, saying; That he would take none from Alexandria, and that if none came from Rome, he would haue none at all, and that he would rather haue all the soules of his people to perish, then to receiue an Abuna from the Countrey of Herericks: and at the end of ten yeares he dyed, without hauing of any Abuna; and his Sonne Alexander stood stiffly in the same purpose, for the space of thirteene yeares. At length the people complained vnto him, saying; That now there were scarce any Priests or Clerkes remaining to serue the Churches, and that if they were decayed, the Churches also would grow to decay; and consequently, the Christian Faith. And the said Alexander sent for an Abuna to Cairo, where at that time the Patriarke of Alexandria remained, which sent him two, that the one might succede the other, and both of them were liuing while wee were there. And during our aboad there, Abuna Iacob dyed, which was to succeed this man who now liueth: who told me, that he came into this Countrey fiftie five yeares past, and that he was as white and hoary-headed, as he was at that instant, and when he departed out of Cairo he was about fiftie, or five and fiftie yeares old, so that he thinketh he is about one hundred and ten yeares of age. And truly, he that beholdeth and considereth him well, would take him to be no lesse.

And farther he told me, that the Prete which sent for him, was a most Christian Prince, and that the Saturdaies were not kept holy as long as he liued, nor any of these Jewish Ceremonies were obserued, and that they did eate Hogges flesh and flesh although it the throat were not cut:
for all these things belong vnto the old Law: and that it was not long, since two Franks came vnto this Court, to wit: one Venetian called Nicholas Brancalion; and one Portugall, called Peter de Couillan, which when they came into the Countrey, before they came into the Court, began to fast and keepe the customes of the Countrey, (for as yet in many places, the Saturday was kept kept holy) and did not eate meates that were forbidden. The Priests and Friers seeing this, which tooke vpon them to know the things continued in the Bible, much better then of any other Bookes, came to complaine to the Prete, saying; What thing is this, that these Frankes which now come from the Kingdomes of France, being both of them of feuerall Countries, do obserue the ancient customes of the Abyssines: how then commaundeth this Abuna, which is come from Alexandria, that we should obserue those things which are not in our Bookes, and hereupon the Prete Ianni forthwith commanded, that they should againe obserue the ancient customes of the Abyssines. Abuna reported all these things vnto me, giuing many thanks to God for our arrivall. This Abuna liued in his Tent after this manner, (for I neuer saw him in

He hath his Curtaines about the said Couch, and likewise ouer the same. His apparell is White, that is to say, Made of most pure and fine Cotton Cloath which commeth out of India, where they call it Cacha: and it is made like a Cardinals Cloake or Paviell, which is ioyned and buttoned together on the breast. He hath also a Scaporrall, which is likewise closed before, made of Blew Silke Chamblet, and on his head a great broad Miter made likewise of Blew Silke. Hee is, as I haue said, a very old man, of small stature, and bald: his Beard is very white, but small, and long in the midst; for in this Countrey the Church-men shauie not their Beards: he is very gracious in his speech and gestures, as any man may be: he neuer speaketh, but he giueth God thanks. When he goeth forth to the Tent

20 of the Prete, or to giue holy Orders, he rideth vpon a goodly Mule, being very well accompanied, as well with men riding vpon Mules, as others following him on foote; he carrieth a little Crosse of Siluer in his hand, and they carrie three Crosses vpon stauies on each side of him, which reach vp higher then he is on his Mule. He carrieth with him whither soeuer he goe, two high Canopies which are to be set on foote, as great as those of the Prete, but not so rich. Moreouer, foure men goe before him with Whips, which make the people giue way on both sides: the ground is couered wheresoever hee trauielleth with Children, Young men, Friers, and Priests, which all runne crying after him. I enquired what they said, and I was answered; that they said, May it please your Lordship to make vs Clerkes, and God Grant you a long life.

99. The twelfth of January, 1521. was a very great assembly of Clerkes and Priests in the said Church, and they continued all that night with Singing and Musicke, and said, That they did consecrate the same, wherein as yet no Masse had beene said, but they said it in another little Church which was neere adioyning, wherein the Father of this Prete was buried, and that they would remooue and carrie him into this great Church, which hee begonne in his life time, and his Sonne had finished, and that they were thirteene yeares since hee deceased, and on a Sunday in the morning, they said Masse there. This Church hath now at the first foundation thereof, about foure hundred Canons, with great reuenues, but when the number shall increafe, as it is fallen out in other Churches, they shall not haue sufficient to sustaine themselves. The fifteenth of the said moneth, wee were called for, and they caused vs to goe to the said Church, where there were gathered together about two thousand Priests, and as many Clerkes, which

30 were assembled before the principall Porch of the great Church, and in the circuit which is like a Cloyster, and the Prete stood compassed in his Curtaines within a Clozet, which vseth to be placed vpon the steppes of the principall gate, and all the Clergie stood before him, which said a long Seruice, with singing, musicke, dancing, and leaping. Which being ended, he caused all the people, and the Clergie, and vs, to goe forth of the Church, and they placed vs toward the North, willing vs not to stirre from that place: and all the Clergie and people went to the little Church, where the Kings Father was buried, which also was towards the North, and therein entred as many as could stand. And as we stood heere, an exceeding great Procession in very good order, beganne to passe betweene vs and the Church, and they carried the bones of the dead King to the great Church, and the Patriarke Abuna Marke went in this Procession, being

40 very feeble, and two men held him vp vnder the armes, by reason of his old age. Then followed the Queenes, to wit, Queene Helena, the Prete his Mother, and the Queene his Wife, each of them vnder a blacke Pavilion, in mourning wise, (for before they vsed white Pavilions) and likewise all the people were clad in blacke cloath, weeping and howling with mightie cries, saying; Abeto, Abeto, that is to say, Our Lord, Our Lord. And they pronounced the same with so abrupt and pitifull a voyce, and with so great abundance of teares, that they made all the multitude to weepe. The Coffin wherein the bones lay, was carried vnder a Pavilion of Embroydered cloath of Gold, compassed about with Curtaines of Damaske, and so they entred into the Church by the side-gate, where we stood, and as many people as the place would hold; and we went to this Ceremony at the Sunne rising, and returned to our lodging at night, by

100. Straight-way we were led into a Tent which was newly set vp, and was placed on the backe side of the great Church in that circuit, and it was very long and flat, and all the Roofe was couered with Crosses, made of Silke, like those of the Tent which was placed ouer the Lake, where they were baptized, and within it was dressed with exceeding faire Tapistries, so that

A royall feast. that it seemed to be a Hall very well furnished : and here he sent vs word to recreate our selues a little for his sake, refreshing our selues, and discoursing of our priuate matters. And while we thus discoursed a good while, we saw comming in very good order, many Iarres of Wine, and a great basket of fine Bread, and great store of meate borne in great Platters, made of blacke earth, very faire, and excellently wrought, which seemed to be of blacke Amber. The meate was made of diuers sorts of Flesh, dressed after sundry fashions, somewhat after our manner, among which, were Hennes all whole, great, and fat, some sodden, and some roasted : and in other Platters came other Hens, which seemed to be Hens indeed, but were onely the skins, in such sort, that they had taken out the flesh and all the bones, with wonderfull diligence, so that the skinne was not broken in any part, but was perfectly whole, and then mincing the flesh verie small, and mingling it with certaine delicate Spices, they filled the same againe with it, which, as I haue said, was perfectly whole, and wanted nothing but the necke and the feete, from the neather ioynt downe-ward, neither could we at any time discern how they could get out the bones, or how they might flay them, and yet could perceiue no rupture at all. We fed very well of these Hens, to our contentment, because they were so good and delicate. Then brought they in grosse and fat meate, so handsomly drest, that wee knew not whether it were sodden or roasted. Afterward certaine White-meates were brought in, in other Platters, and meats of other colours, made partly of flesh stamped, with the sinewes taken out, and part of Birds, and diuers Fruits of the Countrey, and in some of them was store of Butter, in others Hennes suet : of e- uery one of them we tasted, which seemed vnto vs very good and delicate : and we wondred how it was possible, that they should haue so good Cookes in that Countrey. Among the Iarres of the Wine of Raisins, which were all of that Earth like blacke Amber, there was one of Crystall Glasse, with a great Bowle of Crystall, all gilded ouer, and another great Bowle of Silver, Enamuled all ouer with foure exceeding fine stones, which seemed to be Saphires set in the same, standing in a square case, beset with many Rubies, and this Bowle was very faire and rich. When we had eaten as much as we thought good, the Prete sent vnto vs, requesting vs to sing and dance, and to recreate our selues after our owne manner.

101. The eight and twentieth of January, he willed vs to come vnto the great Church, and caused vs to be placed before his Curtaines, which were aboue the place of the steps, which are neere vnto the principall gate. Here was an infinite multitude of Clerkes, which, as they did at the moouing of his Fathers bones, did nought else but sing, dance, and leape, and in their leaping, did alwaies touch their feete with their hands, first one foote, and then another : and when we had stayed there a good while, he sent to aske vs, whether they sung after this manner in our Countrey ? We answered him, no : because our singing was more quiet and plaine, as well in voyces as in body : for we neither danced nor stirred a whit. He replied : Seeing that our custome was such, whether we thought that his was ill done ? We sent him word, that the things belonging vnto God, after what manner soeuer they be done, seemed alwaies to be wel done. This ceremonie being ended, they began to goe about the Church with five and twentie Crosses, and five and twentie Censers, carrying their Crosses in their left hands, as it were Standards, and the Censers in their right hands, casting Incense vpon them without any spare. And vpon the steppes where we stood, were two great Latton Basons, gilded and wrought about, full of a kind of Incense, sweeter then that which is brought into these parts : and as often as they passed by, they cast great quantity thereof into the Censers, and they which went about in Procession, were clad in very rich Copes, and Hoods, made after their fashion, and so were they which danced and sung.

102. The nine and twentieth of January, the Ambassador and all the Frankes (whereof some were come to this Court before vs) with all his Company, went to visite the Abuna Marke, because he had not as yet spoken with him. We found him as before, sitting vpon a Couch. The Ambassador would haue kissed his hand, but he would not suffer him, but gaue him the Crosse to kisse, which he alwaies carried in his hand, and so he did to all the rest. As soone as we were set, the Ambassador said, that hee was come to visite him in the name of the Grand Captaine, and prayed him to pardon him, that hee came no sooner to him, because they would not suffer him to visite any body. The Abuna answered him, that he ought not to maruaile thereat, for it was the custome of that Court, not to suffer any stranger to goe vnto any mans house, and that this was not by the consent of the Prete, which was a good and godly man, but of the Courtiers which are malicious. The Ambassador told him, that the King of Portugall was informed of his bounty and holinesse, by his Brother Matthew, and also by others, and that therefore he besought him to keepe the Prete Ianni constant and immutable in this enterprize, of chasing and destroying of the Moores. The Abuna answered, That he was no Saint, but a poore Sinner, and that Matthew was none of his Brother, but was a Merchant, and his friend, and although hee came with lies, yet was it manifest, that his comming was ordained by God, seeing it turned to so good seruice and profite, &c.

¶ XV.
A Discourse of PETER COVILLAN: Of the PRETES gifts and presents, and the Portugals quarrels, and their licence to depart out of the Countrey.

103. ¶ Hereas I haue spoken often in this Booke of Peter de Couillan Portugues, being The Storie of an honourable person, and of great credite with Prete Ianni, and all the Court; Peter Couillan 10 It is conuenient that I should declare how he came into this Countrey, and that he is my spirituall sonne, and that I haue oftentimes confessed him, because in three and thirtie yeeres while he liued in this Countrey, he told me that he neuer was confessed, because the custome here is not to keepe that secret which is vttered in confession, and that therefore he went into the Church, when he confessed his sinnes vnto God. His beginning was thus: He was borne in the Towne of Couillan in the Kingdome of Portugall, and being a boy, he went into 10 Castile, and gat into the seruice of Don Alfonso Duke of Simle; and when the warre began betweene Portugall and Castile, hee returned home with Don Iohn de Gusman, brother to the said Duke, which placed him in the house of Alfonso King of Portugall, who for his valour presently made him a man at Armes, and hee was continually in that warre, and serued also abroad in 20 France. After the death of King Alfonso, he was one of the Guard of the King Don Iohn his sonne, vntill the time of the treasons, when he sent him into Castile, because hee spake the Ca- stilian Tongue very well, to spie out who were those Gentlemen of his Subiects, which practised there against him. And returning out of Castile, he was sent into Barbarie, where he stayed a time, and learned the Arabian Tongue, and was afterward sent to conclude a Peace with the King of Tremizen: and being returned, he was sent againe to the King Amoli bela gegi, which restored the bones of the Infant Don Fernando. At his returne, he found that the King Don Iohn, desiring by all meanes that his ships should find out the Spicerie, had determined to send by land certaine men to discover as much as they might. And Alfonso de Paima was chosen for 30 this enterprize, a Citizen of Castle Blanco, a very skilfull man, and very expert in the Arabian Tongue.

His life in his

When Peter de Couillan was returned, King Iohn called him, and told him secretly, That hauing alwayes knowne him loyall and his faithfull seruant, and readie to doe his Maiestie good seruice, seeing he vnderstood the Arabian tongue, he purposed to send him with another companion, to discover and learne where Prete Ianni dwelt, and whether his Territories reached vnto the Sea, and where the Pepper and Cinamon grew, and other sorts of Spicerie, which were brought vnto the Citie of Venice from the Countries of the Moores; seeing hee had sent for this purpose one of the House of Monterio, and one Frier Anthony of Lisbon, Prior of Por- ta de Ferro, which could not passe the Citie of Ierusalem, saying, That it was impossible to tra-40 uell this way without vnderstanding the Arabian tongue, and therefore seeing he vnderstood the same well, hee prayed him to vnder-take this enterprize, to doe him this so principall seruice, promising to reward him in such sort, that he should be great in his Kingdome, and all his Poste-ritie should alwayes lue contented. Peter answered him, That he kissed his Maiesties hands for the great fauour which he had done him, but that he was sorry, that his wisdom and sufficien-cie, was not answerable to the great desire he had to serue his Highnesse; and yet neuerthelesse, as his faithfull seruant he accepted this message with all his heart.

P. Cou. sent to discover the Spices, and Prete Ianni his Countrey.

And so in the yeere 1487. the seuenth of May, they were both dispatched in Saint Arren, the King Don Emanuel alwayes there present, which at that time was but Duke, and they gaue them a Sea-Card, taken out of a generall Map of the World, at the making whereof was the Li-50 centiate Calzadilla, Bishop of Viseo; and the Doctor Malter, Roderigo, inhabitant of Pietre Nere; and the Doctor Malter, Moyse, which at that time was a Iew: and all this worke was done very secretly in the house of Peter de Alcazona, and all the forenamed persons shewed the vtermost of their knowledge, as though they should haue bene Commanders in the Discoverie, of finding out the Countries from whence the Spices come, and as though one of them should haue gone into Ethiopia to discover the Countrey of Prete Ianni, and as though in those Seas there had bene some knowledge of a passage into our Westerne Seas; because the said Doctors, said, they had found some memoriall of that matter. And for the charges of them both, the King appointed foure hundred Cruzadoes, which were giuen them out of the Treasurie of the Garden of Almarin: and (as I haue said) the King Emanuel was alwayes present, who at that time was 60 Duke. Besides this, the King gaue them a Letter of credit in all parts of the Leuant, that if they fell into any necessitie or perill, they might be succoured and aided thereby. One halfe of these foure hundred Cruzadoes, they desired to haue in readie money, and the other halfe they gaue to Bartholmew Marchioni a Florentine, to be payed them in Naples.

East.

And hauing receiued the Kings blessing, they departed from Lisbon, and came vnto Barcelona on Corpus Christi day, and thence vnto Naples on Saint Iohns day; when their Bills of Exchange were payed them, by the Sonne of Cosmo de Medices. From Naples they went vnto the Ile of Rhodes, and here they found two Portugall Knights, the one called Frier Gonsaluo, and the other Frier Fernando, in whose house they lodged; and after certaine dayes, they tooke their voyage for Alexandria, in a ship of Bartholmew de Paredes; hauing first bought many Iarres of Honey, to shew that they were Merchants. When they were come to Alexandria, they both fell grievously sicke of an ague; and the Cadi tooke all their Honey from them, supposing they would haue dyed. But being recovered, they were payed as they would themselves, and hauing bought sundrie sorts of merchandize, they went to Cairo, where they stayed till they found companie of certaine Moores, called Magabrini, of the Kingdome of Fez and Tremizen, which went to Aden, and in their companie they went by Land to Tor; where taking ship, they sailed to Suachen, vpon the Coast of the Abyssins, and from thence vnto Aden. And because it was the time of the Monsons or Motions, when those Seas cannot be sailed, they diuided themselves the one from the other, and Alfonso passed into Ethiopia, and Peter made his choice to goe into India, as the time serued him for to doe. And they agreed together, to meete at a certayne time in the Citie of Cairo, that they might be able to aduertize the King of their discoverie.

Peter de Couillan, when time serued, tooke shipping, and sailed directly to Cananor, and passed thence to Calicut, and saw the great quantitie of Ginger and Pepper which grow there, and vnderstood, that the Cloues and Cinamon were brought thither from farre Countries. Then he went toward Goa, and passed thence to the Ile of Ormuz, and hauing informed himselfe of certayne other things, he came in a ship toward the Red Sea. Hee landed at Zeila, and with certayne Merchants, which were Moores, he trauelled those Seas of Ethiopia, which were shewed him at Lisbon in a Sea Chart, to the intent hee should vse all his industrie to discover them. And he went so farre, that he came vnto the Towne of Cefala, where he learned of the Mariners and certayne Arabians, that the said Coast might be sailed all along toward the West, and that they knew no end thereof, and that there was a great Ile very rich, which was aboue nine hundred miles in length, which they call, The Ile of the Moone. And hauing vnderstood these things, being very glad thereof, he determined to returne vnto Cairo, and so he came backe to Zeila, and from thence passed to Aden, and then to Tor, and lastly to Cairo, where he stayed a great time, wayting for Alfonso de Paiua, and at length, had newes that he was dead.

Whereupon he determined to returne into Portugall: but it pleased God, that two Iewes, which went to seeke him, by good lucke found him, and deliuered him Letters from the King of Portugall. One of these Iewes was called, Rabbi Abraham, borne in Beggian. The others name was Ioseph de Lamego, and was a * Shoo-maker. These hauing beene before in Persia and in Bagadet, told the King many great matters, which they had learned concerning the Spiceries, and the riches which were found in the Ile of Ormuz, wherof the King conceiued great pleasure, and commanded them to returne thither againe to see the same themselves; but first, that they should seeke out Peter de Couillan, and Alfonso de Paiua, which hee knew were determined to meet together at a time appointed in Cairo. The contents of the Kings Letters were, that if all the things giuen them in commission, were searched out by them, then they should returne, because hee would reward them; but if they were not all discovered, that they should send him particular information of those things that they had seene, and then should doe their best endeavour to search out the rest, and aboue all things, to discover the Countrey of Prete Ianni, and to cause Rabbi Abraham to see the Ile of Ormuz. For which cause, Peter de Couillan, purposed to aduertise the King of all which hee had seene along the Coast of Calicut, touching the Spiceries, and of Ormuz, and of the Coast of Ethiopia, and of Cefala, and of the great Iland of the Moone, concluding, that his ships which traded into Guinea, sayling along the Coast, and seeking the Coast of that Iland, and of Cefala, might easily enter into these Easterne Seas, and fall vpon this Coast of Calicut, for all along there was Sea: he had vnderstood, and that he would returne with Rabbi Abraham to Ormuz, and after his returne he would seeke out Prete Ianni, whose Countrey stretched vnto the red Sea.

And with these Letters, he dispatched Ioseph de Lamego the Iew. And he and the other Iew going againe to Ormuz, and returning to Aden, hee willed him to goe and carrie newes to the King that hee had seene the Ile of Ormuz with his owne eyes. And himselfe passing into Ethiopia, came into the Court of Prete Ianni, which at that time was not farre from Zeila. And hauing presented his Letters vnto him, who at that time was called Alexander, hee was very courteously entertained, and had great honour done vnto him, and was promised that he should speedily be dispatched. But in the meane while, he departed this life, and Nabu his brother succeeded in his stead, which saw him, and made very much of him, but would neuer giue him leaue to depart. Afterward Nabu died also, and his sonne Dauid succeeded him, which raigneth at this present, which would not suffer him to depart, saying, that hee came not thither in his time, and that if his Predecessors had giuen him so great Lands and Reuenues, he ought to enioy them, and to lose none of them: and therefore, seeing they had not giuen him licence, neither might he giue him leaue to depart; and so he remained still in the Countrey: and they gaue him a wife a wife, with very great riches and possessions, by whom he had children, whom we also saw. And in our time, when he saw that we would depart, he was exceeding desirous to returne into his Countrey, and went to craue leaue of the Prete, and we with him, and were very instant on his behalfe, and besought him very earnestly, yet for all that wee could not obtaine leaue. Hee is a man of great spirit and wit, and of his qualitie hee hath not the like in all the Court, and can speake all the Languages, as well of the Christians as of the Moors, Gentiles, and Abassins: and of all things which hee hath knowne and seene, hee can yeeld as particular account, as if they were present. And therefore he is very gracious with the Prete, and all the Court.

104. Returning to our Voyage, or rather to our Historie; The dayes following, the Secretaries ceased not to write the Letters, which wee were to carrie with vs to the King and to the grand Captaine, and they bestowed much time and labour in making them: for their manner is not to write one to another, but their demands, answers, and messages, are all done by word of mouth. And while we were there, they beganne by little and little to learne to write; and when they wrote, they alwaies held before them the Epistles of Saint Paul, of Saint Peter, and of Saint James; and those which studied in them, were taken for the most learned and wise among them. They wrote the Letters to the King in three Languages, The Abassin, the Arabian, and the Portugall; and after the same manner were the Letters made vnto the Grand Captaine. The Grand Berudete comming vnto vs, which is the Lord that standeth on his left hand, brought mee a Crosse of Siluer, and a passing faire Staffe wrought with inlayd worke, saying, that the Prete sent me these things in token of the gouernment which he had giuen mee in the Iles of the red Sea; I gaue his Highnesse thanks in the best manner that I could. There came another message from the Prete, that he had giuen order that thirtie Mules should be giuen vnto vs to carrie our goods. And moreouer, that he had sent thirtie ounces of Gold to the Ambassadour, and fiftie for his companie; and that George, and those which were with him, had receiued their part; and withall, that he had sent one hundred loads of Meale, and as many hornes of Wine of Honey, to serue vs in our Voyage, and willed that we should not trouble the poore Husbandmen by the way, because he was enformed, that in our comming to the Court we had wasted the Countrey through which we trauelled, and that certaine Captaines were appointed for vs, which should conduct vs from place to place, euen to the Sea side, to wit, that euery one should furnish vs through their Countreyes with all things necessarie: and forthwith they appointed vs to a sonne of the Cabeata, because we were to trauell a great way through his fathers Territories, which are those where the great Church standeth, wherein the bones of the Prete his father were layd: which Church (as I haue said) hath foure hundred Canons, and ouer the said Canons there is a sonne of the said Cabeata, which is a Licanate, that is to say, The head ouer all the rest of the heads.

105. This day at euening, were thirtie ounces of Gold brought to our Tent for the Ambassadour, and fiftie for vs, and a great Crowne of Gold and Siluer which was the Crowne of Prete Ianni: and it was not so faire for the worth thereof as for the bignesse, and it was in a round Chist lined with Cloth, and without with Leather, and it was presented by Abdenago, the Captaine of the Pages, which said vnto the Ambassadour, that the Prete sent that Crowne to the King of Portugall, and that he should say vnto him, that a Crowne is not wont to be taken from the Fathers head, but onely for the Sonne: and that he was his Sonne, and that he had taken the same from his owne head to send it to the King of Portugall, which was his Father, and that he sent him the same as the most precious thing that he had at that instant, offering him all the fauours, ayde, and succours, as well of Men as of Gold, and Victuals, which he should stand in need of for his Fortresses and Fleets, and for the Warres which he would make against the Moors in these parts of the red Sea, euen vnto Ierusalem.

The first day of Lent, wee beganne our Voyage, and the sonne of the Cabeata went with vs, through whose Countreyes we were to passe, and Abdenago Captaine of the Pages; for, afterward we were to passe through his Territories. And we trauelled the next day, farre distant one companie from the other, vntill we came to Manadeli, a Towne in the Kingdome of Tigrawahon.

106. Being come to this Towne of Manadeli, which is wholly inhabited by Moors, who are peaceable Tributaries to the Prete: and one Stephen Pagliarte, as it seemeth, fell out with a Moore, which strooke out two of his teeth, and certaine of our people comming running thither at the noise of this garboile, they brake one of our mens heads with a stone. Abdenago ran downe, and caused certaine of these Moors to bee apprehended, which had done the harme: but because it was night, there was nothing else done. The next day he sent vs word to come vnto the place where he held these two Moors prisoners, and caused vs to sit downe on the grasse: and hee sate downe likewise, leaning with his shoulders against his Chaire. And there causing the prisoners to be brought, he began after their manner to demand Gold of them. Then he caused them to be stripped and cruelly beaten, demanding how much they would giue vs: they began to promise one ounce of Gold, two, and three; but still beating of them, they asked how much they would giue; at length they came to seuen ounces, and herewithall they ceased to beat them, and the Gold was giuen to those that were hurt, and the parties which were beaten were sent bound to Prete Ianni. Wee went on still on our Voyage vnto Barna, where wee lodged, when we came into this Countrey. While wee stayed here a long while, there came a Messenger of the Prete, and one of the Moore's which were beaten with him, with the head of the other, saying vnto vs, that the Prete would needs vnderstand and examine the whole matter concerning those Moore's, for the hurt which they had done vnto the Portugals, and that he had caused his head to be cut off which he found to haue done the wrong, the which he had sent vs, that we might be assured of the truth, and might know whether that were it or no: and the other which hee had not found in fault, hee had also sent vs; and that wee might doe with him what we thought good, either kill him, or free him, or make him a Slaue.

107. Two Great men were sent to vs from the Court, which seeing the enmitie and rancour that was betwixt the Ambassadour and Bren, which came from words to blowes, they wist not what course to take concerning our matter, seeing it is a custome in that Countrey, that no great personage may goe from the Court without licence, nor come to the Court vnlesse he be called for: therefore the said Lord stood in doubt, what they should doe concerning vs; because, on the one side, they durst not leaue vs; and on the other side, to bring vs to the Court in such great rancour, being not sent for, they feared they might incurre some great punishment; yet at length, they chose rather to returne to the Court, although they should suffer some great punishment.
